vi. MARRIAGE AS A SYMBOL OF SPIRITUAL
TRUTHS.—Although modern exegesis has given up the idea that in Canticles divine love is set forth under the image of human love, it is a familiar biblical thought that the marriage relationship is typical of the union and communion of God with His people. After Hosea, whose domestic life is reasonably supposed to have impressed him with the suitableness of the imagery, it became a commonplace of prophecy that God was to Israel as a husband, and Israel to God as a bride (Hos 2¹⁹, Jer 3¹⁴ 31³², Is 54⁹). The conception passed over into NT, but with modifications agreeable to the nature of Christianity—the bridegroom being now God in Christ (Mt 91s, Jn 32s), the bride the spiritual Israel elect out of every nation (2 Co 112, Rev 197).

Now, this conception of God as the husband, though it has been little utilized in theology, cannot be said to be less apt or important than the two other conceptions of God which have been made the basis of systems. These are the idea of God as King, which lays the main stress on the divine sovereignty, and the idea of God as Father, which lays the main stress on the divine love. And as the weakness of the system built upon the principle of the divine sovereignty has been widely felt to be that it does less than justice to the ethical being of God; and as, on the other hand, the theology based on the divine fatherhood has been in danger of obscuring the divine might and majesty, there is certainly something to be said for putting in the forefront the thought of Hosea, which, representing God as husband, equally emphasizes to our minds His sovereignty and His goodness.

How large a portion of the body of Christian doctrine may be set forth, and with the sanction of Scripture, under the category of the marriage relation, may be briefly indicated.

(1) Under the doctrine of God this representa-tion, besides embodying as its fundamental principles the divine sovereignty and love, lays special stress on the attributes of clemency and longsuffering, while it safeguards the holiness of God by showing Him grieved and provoked to anger by contumacy and unfaithfulness (Hos passim). husband God also provides for His people (2°).
(2) The doctrine of sin is, from this point of view, characterized as adultery (Hos 22, Jer 39 1327;

*The germ of the conception, according to W. R. Smith, was found in Semitic heathenism; and the service of Hosea was to purify the gross physical conception of the god as the husband of the motherland, and to apply it to describe moral relations of Jehovah with His people (Prophets of Israel, new ed. p. 170 ff.)

on אחרי וועה see Driver on Dt 3116)—a designation which, as regards (a) the nature of sin, indicates that its essence consists in indifference or even hatred toward God, and the giving of the affections to other objects (Hos 2*, Jer 2, Ezk 20); (b) the heinousness of sin, draws attention to its aggravation as unfaithfulness to solemn obligation and ingratitude for high favours (Jer 57); and (c) the punishment of sin, teaches that persistence in it entails a casting off, of which human divorce is a pale emblem (Hos 2¹²⁶, Jer 2³⁵⁶).

(3) In the Christological doctrine the points which are chiefly emphasized by the conception are the love of Christ, His kingly office as exercised in His headship over the Church, and His intimate union with it through the indwelling Spirit (2 Co 11², Eph 5²²⁻²²).

(4) In close relation to the last the doctrine of the Church is elucidated and enriched by the assertion of its mystical union with and dependence upon Christ (Eph. loc. cit.), and of its essential note of sanctity—the latter, which includes all the graces included in sanctification, being beautifully portrayed as the bridal adornment (Rev 198).

(5) Finally, as regards eschatology, the figure concentrates attention on the momentous event of the Second Coming, which is sudden as the coming of the bridegroom (Mt 25¹⁻¹³), and places in a clear light the bliss, the security, and unutterable glory of the everlasting kingdom (Rev 197 212.9).

LITERATURE.—Next to the Scriptures the chief source is the division of the Mishna כרר נשים (Liber de re uxoria), containing, with two others, the treatises nion (de levirorum in fratrias oficio), חובחה (de dote literisque matrimonialibus), סומה (de egleio), mann (de dote literisque matrimonialibus), πυυ (de uxore adulterii suspecta), [181] (de divortiis), and [1811] (de suspecta). [181] (de divortiis), and [1811] (de suspecta). The best of the above material is collected in Selden, Uxor Hebraica, London, 1546, and Hamburger, Real-Encyclopædie für Bibel und Taimud, Breslau, 1870. Of the older articles, that in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopædia is distinguished by Talmudie rudition. The recent German manuals which cover the ground are Benninger, Heb. Arch., Freiburg, 1894, cf. his 'Famille u. Ehe' in Hauck = Herzog²; Nowack, Lehrb. der Heb. Arch., Berlin, 1887, i. pp. 371-395. On primitive marriage the chief works from the general standpoint are M'Lennan, Primitive Marriage, reprinted in Studies in Ancient History, London, 1876; Starcke, The Primitive Family, London, 1893; Westermarck, History of Human Marriage, London, 1891; Post, Studien sur Entwickelungsjeschichte des Familienrechts, Leipsig, 1893; while the theories are tested in the Semitic field with special knowledge by W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage & Early Arabia, Cambridge, 1896, and Wellhausen, 'Die Ehe bei den Arabern' in the Göttinger Nachrichten, 1893, p. 481 fl., following Wilken, Das Matriarchat bei den alten Arabern, 1894. For the interpretation of the laws there is much to be learned from Michaelis, Mosaisches Recht. Eng. tr. 'Commentaries on the Laws of Moese,' London, 1814. Amram, Jewish Law of Divorce according to Bible and Taimud, London, 1897, is an important discussion by a legal expert. MARSENA (κ.τ.τ.; Μαλησεάρ AB, Μαλισεάρ, Μαρσανά; Marsana).—One of the seven princes of Media and Persia, who 'sat first in the kingdom,' and had the right of access to the royal presence (Est 1¹⁴, cf. ADMATHA). The name is doubtless Persian, but the derivation is uncertain.

MARSHAL.—The word does not occur in AV, but in RV it represents two Heb. words. (1) ככר שְּׁהְכֵּים בּשְׁרֶם כֹּנְיּה (Jg 5¹⁴) in the difficult phrase סִיְּהִים בְּּנְיִם כֹּנְיּה (out of Zebulun] they that handle the marshal's staff' (RV). The usual meaning of nob is 'scribe' or writer,' and so AV, agreeing with Syr.* دمک and Targ. במבין בקולמום וספר and Targ. בסנים נשפין, gives

We have verified the Syr. from MSS, viz. the Ambrosian, the Buchanan Bible (Jacobite of cent. xii.), and Camb. Univ. Add. 1964 (Nestorian of cent. xiii.) for Jg 5¹⁴, and from the first two of these MSS together with Camb. Univ. Add. 1965 (Nestorian of cent. xv.) for Jer 61²⁷ and Nah 3¹⁷.

l Mac 5⁴³, έστησεν (sc. Judas) τους γραμματεῖς τοῦ λαοῦ ἐπὶ τοῦ χειμάρρου. The office of a marshal was to help the general to maintain discipline. His wand of office (σκηπτρον or ράβδος) could be used, if necessary, for inflicting chastisement.

(2) אַבְּרָר (Ier 51²) בּבְּרָר (Ier 51²) בּבְּרָר (Nah 3¹²).
The meaning of this word—a loan-word in Heb. is not certainly known, but Lenormant (followed by most scholars) compares the Bab. - Assyr. dupsarru [dupšarru, Delitzsch], 'tablet-writer'; so RVm to Nah 3¹⁷ 'thy scribes.' The title 'scribe' might very well be given to a provost marshal; cf. γραμματεύs in 1 Mac 5⁴² (cited above). The VSS give no help, and the meaning of the word was evidently lost in early times. LXX has βελοστάσεις ('batteries of warlike engines') in Jer, but leaves the word untranslated in Nah. Symm. has έκλεκrovs in Jer (so Field). Syr. * has 4-0 'destruction' in Jer, but in Nah בבבב 'thy aroused ones ' or (possibly) 'thy warriors.' Targ. gives עברי י קרבא warriors' in Jer, but leaves the word untranslated in Nah. All these renderings of the VSS are founded on guesses from the context, rather than on real knowledge.

MAR'S HILL.—See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA (Μάρθα, an Aramaic form [κητρ, fem. of way 'lord'], not found in Heb., meaning 'mistress' or 'lady.' Compare Kupia in 2 Jn., which some interpret as a proper name, and some identify with the Martha of the Gospels).—The name does not occur in OT. Only one person called Martha appears in NT, mentioned in Lk 10^{33, 42}, Jn 11^{1, 5, 12-39} 12². It is not possible to doubt the identity of the Martha of the Fourth Gospel with the Martha of the Third. In both cases there is a sister Mary and similar traits in cases there is a sister Mary, and similar traits in the characters of the two women appear in each of the narratives. But the course of events in Lk would suggest that the village where the sisters lived was situated in Galilee; according to Jn lived was situated in Galilee; according to on it was Bethany. The harmonistic suggestion, that they may have changed their place of abode previous to the events with which they are con-nected in the Fourth Gospel, is evidently a device invented to meet a difficulty; it has no probability. St. John is so exact in his topography that it is not reasonable to suppose he was mistaken in this instance. Bethany is one of the centres round instance. Bethany is one of the centres round which the history in the Fourth Gospel moves. It would seem, therefore, that the order of the narrative is dislocated in Lk, so that a Judæan incident is inserted in the course of events that transpired in the north. Martha here appears actively engaged in serving Jesus and His disciples at a hospitable feast. In this case, and in the Johannine incidents, she takes the lead in a way that implies that she is the elder sister. According to the Synoptic account, it was in the house of Simon the leper that a woman, pouring precious ointment over Jesus, was rebuked by the disciples for her wastefulness (Mt 26⁷, Mk 14⁸); according to Jn, this occurred at the house of Martha and Mary, the latter being the woman who testified her devotion to Jesus by the costly gift (In 121-8). Therefore it has been suggested that Martha may have been Simon's wife or widow. In St. Luke's narrative Martha is gently corrected for her excessive anxiety and the impatience with which she complains of her sister.

I'hus she is seen to be one who, while truly devoted to Christ, and commendably energetic in the service of hospitality, does not possess her soul in quietness; sets too high a value on the material sumptuousness of the feast for which material sumptuousness of the feast for which she is responsible; fails to understand how best to entertain her divine Guest by best pleasing Him; and hastily blames the gentler Mary. According to the oldest MSS and some VSS and Fathers,* Jesus said to her, 'There is need of but a few things or one'—the 'few' pointing to similarity in the previous extends (18 10.0%). plicity in the provisions at table (compare Lk 10th), the 'one' perhaps carrying her thought to what alone He supremely cared for, the kingdom of God (see Mt 63), to show profound interest in which was to receive Jesus in the way most acceptable to Him. In the narrative of the death and raising of Lazarus, Martha and Mary are true sisters, echoing one another's thoughts, both trusting in Jesus as their one friend who could help them in the greatest need. In Jn 12², as in the Lk narrative, Martha is found 'serving.' See, further, under MARY, No. iv.

A tradition, which cannot be traced earlier than the Middle Ages, is cherished all over the south of France, to the effect that during a persecution of the Christians by the Jews, Lazarus and his two sisters, having been sent to sea in a boat without rudder, oars, or provisions, drifted to land near Marseilles, founded many churches in Provence, in particular those at Marseilles, Aix, and Avignon, and finally lived in retreat at Tarascon (see Guettée, Histoire de l'Église de France, i. 402, n. 5; Guerin, Les Petits Bollandistes, etc. x. 91-105, where many childish but picturesque legends of Martha are recorded; cf. also Duchesne, Fastes episcopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, i. 325 ff.).

MARTYR.—The Gr. word µdprvs (from a root signifying to 'remember,' connected with 'memory' and μέριμνα, 'care,' therefore primarily 'one who is frequently translated 'witness,' is rendered 'martyr' in Ac 22²⁰, Rev 2¹³ 17⁶. The Vulg. has martyr in the last passage only, in the other two the usual testis, and Wyc. and Rhem. follow. Tind., Cov., Cran. have 'witness' in all: Gen. and Bish. 'witness' in Ac, but 'martyr' in Rev. The Versions, even the earliest, seem to have used 'martyr' in its modern sense, one who seals his testimony with his blood, not merely a witness, but a witness who suffers. But the Gr. word does out a witness who suners. Dut the Gr. word does not appear to have acquired that meaning within the NT, though it is common in early Christian writings. In Ac 22²⁰ the tr. 'martyr' loses the reference to the preceding 'witness' (μαρτυρία, 22¹⁸). RV gives 'witness' in Ac 22²⁰ and Rev 2¹³, but retains 'martyr' in Rev 17⁶, m. 'witness.'

J. HASTINGS. MARYELLOUS is an adverb in Wis 198, 'seeing thy marvellous strange wonders' (θανμαστά τέρατα, R' 'strange marvels'). Cf. Ps 31²³, Pr. Bk. marvellous great kindness in a strong city'; and Ps 145' 'Great is the Lord, and marvellous worthy to be praised' (but mod. edd. wrongly print 'Great is the Lord, and marvellous, worthy to be praised'). Cf. also Jer 30° Cov. 'Yee all their faces are marvellous pale.' Tindale uses 'marvellously,' as Mt 21° 'When they sawe the starre, they were marvelously glad.' So also often in Shakespeare.

MARY (Heb. τρ. Miriam; LXX and NT Μαριάμ or Mapia; Josephus Μαριάμμη or Μαριάμη or Μαριάμη.*—The name, as Stanley says, probably owes its frequent recurrence in the narratives, alike of the Evangelists and of Josephus, not to the memory of Mirian the sister of Moses, but to the sympathy felt for the beautiful Hasmonaan princess, the high-souled and ill-fated wife of Herod (Jewish Church, iii. 429). We find it used as follows in the NT-

> i. Mary the mother of James. ii. The other Mary. iii. Mary of Clopas.
> iv. Mary the sister of Martha.
> v. Mary Magdalene.
> vi. Mary the mother of Mark.
> vii. Mary saluted by St. Paul.
> viii. Mary the mother of the Lord.

i. ii. iii. Of the above, the first three are generally identified. The first is mentioned in the three Synoptic Gospels as one of those who were present at the crucifixion. In Mt 2755. 55 we read, 'many women were there beholding from afar, which had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother t of James and Joses, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee.' In v. 61 we are told that the same evening, after Joseph of Arimathæa had buried the body in his own new tomb hewn out of the rock, 'Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary (evidently the heave pentioned nother of James) (evidently the before-mentioned mother of James), were sitting over against the sepulchre.' Next day, 'as the sabbath began to dawn towards the first day of the week,' the other Mary again appears with Mary Magdalene (28). It is to them that the angel at the sepulchre speaks words of comfort after rolling away the stone, 'Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which hath been crucified. He is not here; for he is risen, as he And go quickly, and tell his disciples.' In fear and joy they ran to carry the message; and as they went, 'Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and took hold of his feet, and worshipped him. Then said Jesus unto them, Fear not: go tell my brethren that they depart into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

Mark (15³⁰) gives some further details. Mary is called the mother of James the Little and Joses, and Salome is mentioned as one of her companions along with Mary Magdalene. In v. 7 she (now called M. 7 [Lucifros]) is watching where He was laid. In 16 Mary of James' is joined with Salome and the Magdalene, as buying spices and bringing them to the tomb at sunrise on the first day. As they go they wonder how they shall get the stone rolled away; but this is already done when they arrive, and they find in the tomb a young man in white

, *It has been asserted that the form Maριάμ is used exclusively for the Virgin, and Maρια for the others; but, though the Hebraic form is in general used of the former (in the nominative), perhaps as being the more dignified, it is by no means confined to her, nor is the Hellenic form confined to the latter. Thus, where the Virgin is spoken of, WH read Maριά with Codd. BD in Lk 2½, and though they follow B in calling her Maριάμ elsewhere, yet it is only in Lk 137 that this form has the support of all the MSS. In Mt 1333 Maριά is read by C, in Lk 136. 39. 36 and 26 by D, in Lk 134. 39. 46 by both. On the other hand, the best text has Maριάμ is not Magdalene in Mt 2761, Mk 1560, Jn 2016. 13, and this reading has the support of C and L in several other passages. Maριάμ is not used of the mother of James in the best MSS, though C has it in Mt 2756 and Lk 231. Maριάμ is used of the sister of Martha in the best text of Lk 1039.42, Jn 112 23. 2123.

in the best text of l.k 1039.42, Jn 112 20.32 123.

In the other cases the Hebraic and Hellenic forms are used indiscriminately. Thus the best text has the acc. Mapia: of the Virgin in Mt 120 and of St. Paul's friend in Ro 165, but Mapia a of the Virgin in Lk 210.34, of Martha's sister in Jn 1119.38.11.

The gen. Mapiac is the only form used as well of the Virgin as of Martha's sister and the mother of Mark. The dat. Mapia is used of the Virgin in Lk 29, Ac 114, but Mapia of the Magiate in 'Mk' 169.

Here and in Mk 1540 Syr. Sin. has 'daughter' instead of 'mother.'

raiment, who bids them not be amazed, but carry word to the disciples to meet the Lord in Galilee.

afraid' (v.*). In Lk 23.49.56 we are told generally that the women which came from Galilee stood afar off at the crucifixion and followed Joseph to the tomb to see how the body was laid, and prepared spices and ointments, which they brought at early dawn on the first day. Entering into the tomb they saw two men in dazzling apparel, who asked them why they sought the living among the dead. 'Remember the words he spake unto you in Galilee, saying that the Son of Man must be crucified, and the third day rise from the dead. And they remembered his words, and told all these things to the eleven and to all the rest.' From 24.10 we learn that Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary of James were among the number of these

John (19²⁸) tells us that there were standing by the cross, His mother and His mother's sister (identified with Salome, see article on BRETHREN OF THE LORD), Mary of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene. Comparing this with Mk 15²⁶, we naturally conclude that Mary of Clopas must be the same as Mary of James. All we know of Clopas is derived from Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 11), who tells us that he was brother of the reputed father of our Lord, and that Symeon the second bishop of Jerusalem was his son. Whether ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ means wife or (as Jerome suggests) daughter of Clopas is uncertain. Lightfoot (cited in the above-named article) holds that there is no ground for identifying the name Clopas with Alphæus, and that the Peshitta version and Jerome may be right in regarding it as another form of Cleopas. If Mary was daughter of Clopas, she may have been wife of Alphæus, and her son James may be the apostle known as the son of Alphæus. Jerome, however, maintains that Mary of Cleophas, the aunt of the Lord, is a different person from the mother of James (see Ep. ad Hedibiam cited by Lightfoot, Gal. p. 260). John of Thessalonica and other Fathers (quoted by Faillon, i. p. 150) strangely identify the mother of James with the mother of the Lord, thinking that her presence at the crucifixion could not have been passed over without mention by the Synoptists.

the last two Gospels that her name occurs. (1038-42), after narrating the return of the Seventy, says vaguely that, 'as they went on their way, Jesus entered into a certain village: and a certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house. And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word.' When Martha complained that she was left to serve alone, Jesus answered that, whereas she was anxious and troubled about many things, her sister had chosen the good part, which should not be taken from her. In Jn 11 we find the two sisters living with their brother Lazarus in a village named Bethany; and all three are said to have been beloved by the Lord. Jesus, on His last journey to Jerusalem, receives tidings of the sickness of Lazarus, and, when He reaches Bethany, finds that he had been dead four days. The behaviour of the sisters is such as we might expect from Luke's narrative. Martha goes out to meet Him; but Mary sits still in the house, till she receives a message that the Master called for her. Then rising quickly, she came where He was, and fell down at His feet. Both meet Him, however, with the same words of sorrowful reproach: 'If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.' It would seem that, though Martha was apparently the elder sister, Mary was for some reason held in greater consideration. In v. 19 we are told that many of the Jews had come to comfort Martha and Mary; but, while nothing is said of their accompanying Martha, we read in v. 11 that the Jews, who were in the house with Mary, when they saw that she rose up quickly and went out, followed her, thinking that she was going to the grave to weep there; and in v. 12 it is said that many of the Jews that came to Mary believed on Jesus.

In the chapter which follows we have the story of the anointing of the feet of Jesus. Each evangelist tells us of an anointing of the Lord by a woman, whilst He was reclining as a guest at a hospitable entertainment; and there has been much discussion as to how often He was anointed, and (supposing Him to have been anointed more than once) whether the anointing was by one and the same woman. Speaking generally, it will be seen from the conspectus given on next page that Matthew and Mark are in agreement, and that Luke's account differs widely from theirs, whilst John's is independent of either, yet presenting points of contact, now with the one, now with the other. We will consider these differences in order. (1) As to time and place: if we may judge from the context, the anointing described by Luke took place in Galilee while the Baptist was in prison; that described by the other evangelists took place in Bethany shortly before the crucifixion. (2) As to the host: Luke names Simon the Pharisee, the other Synoptists Simon the leper, while John is indefinite, merely stating that after the raising of Lazarus 'they made him a feast, at which Lazarus sat at meat, and Martha served.' (3) As to the action: whilst the first two Gospels speak of the head being anointed with precious ointment, Luke says that the feet of Christ were first wet with the tears of the woman standing behind Him, and then wiped with her hair and anointed; John says nothing of her tears, but agrees in the statement that it was the feet which she anointed and wiped with her hair. (4) As to who or what the woman was, the first two Gospels tell us nothing beyond the fact of her pouring the ointment on the head of Jesus; Luke says that she was a sinner in the city, and that Jesus said of her, 'her sins which are many are forgiven, for she loved much'; John tells us that she was the beloved and honoured sister of Martha and Lazarus. (5) As to the criticism passed upon the action: Mark speaks vaguely of some who were indignant at the waste of money, saying to themselves, 'this ointment might have been sold for more than 300 denarii and given to the poor'; Matthew puts this censure in the mouth of the disciples; John ascribes it to Judas, who bore the bag; while Luke reports quite a different criticism made by a different person, Simon the Pharisee, who becomes suspicious of Christ's pretensions as a prophet, on the ground that He had failed to read the character of the woman who touched Him. (6) As to our Lord's justification of the woman: this, of course, is different in the two cases, since it has to meet two distinct charges. The Pharisee is answered by the parable of the Two Debtors; and a contrast is drawn between his neglect of the ordinary forms of hospitality and the humble devotion of the penitent woman, who is bidden to go in peace. In the other Gospels the disciples are reminded that the poor would be always with them, while their Master would shortly leave them; that the woman had done a good work in anointing His body for the impending burial; nay, that this action of hers would be reported in her praise throughout the world, wherever the gospel was preached.

Such being the diversity of the narratives, it is evident that there are many difficulties in the way of any one who would regard them as all speaking of one person and recording one scene. And yet | it is almost as difficult to suppose that such an action could have been repeated. Is it likely that our Lord would have uttered such a high encomium upon Mary's act if she were only following the example already set by the sinful woman of Galilee; or (taking the other view) if she herself were only repeating under more favourable circumstances the act of loving devotion for which she had already received His commendation? it likely, again, that St. John would have distinguished Mary as 'her who anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair' if he had known that in this she was only doing what had been done by another before her? Taking a more general view, is it likely that so rare an act, the beauty of which lay in its instinctive spontaneity and freedom from self-consciousness, could have been imitated or reproduced without losing all its savour?

Conspectus of the Anointings.

[The thick type is used in the Synoptic Gospels to mark their mutual differences: in Jn for the opposite purpose of marking his resemblances to one or other of the Synoptists].

Perhaps it may be answered that the act was not really unusual, since the context in Luke implies that not to anoint the head of a guest is to be wanting in ordinary courtesy.† It is true we have no other reference to the anointing of the feet in the Bible, but that this was not unprecedented may be seen from Arist. (Γεςη. 605, δ δέ γ' ήδιστον τούτων έστιν πάντων . . . δταν οίκαδ' ίω τὸν μασθὸν έχων . . . και πρώτα μέν ή θυγάτηρ με ἀπονίζη και τω πόδ' άλείφη και προσκύψασα φιλήση), where the daughter is represented as washing, anointing, and kissing the feet of her father, when he comes home from his day's work. Still this does not furnish a precedent for the hair being used to wipe the feet: and it must be remembered, on the other side, that in proportion as we diminish the rarity of the act, we find it more difficult to account for the value set upon it by our Lord, and the importance ascribed to it by St. John.

We turn now to consider how it has been attempted to harmonize the different narratives by those who believe that only one event is recorded. The most elaborate attempt is that made by Hengstenberg,* who replies to (1) the first difficulty above stated, that Luke's context is determined here, not by the order of events, but by the connexion of thought; since the contrast between the Pharisees and the publicans, in vv. 29. 30, and the description of Christ as the Friend of publicans and sinners, in v. 4, naturally lead on to the story of the sinful woman at the house of the Pharisee. This, we think, must be conceded. As to (2), if we are to identify Simon the Pharisee with Simon 'the leper,' we must understand the latter title to refer not to his present condition; for in that case he could not himself have entertained guests, as he does in Luke. Some have thought that he may have been previously healed of his leprosy by Jesus. But this is not at all suggested by the words addressed to him in Luke, nor does it seem consistent with his ungracious behaviour. There is less force in the argument that the injurious title 'leper' would not have been retained in the case of one who had been cured of

Lastly, is it likely that so pronounced a Pharisee as the Sinon of Luke would have entertained Jesus at so late a period in His career, when the Pharisees had already resolved upon His death? or, on the other hand, that one who was so much impressed with the raising of Lazarus as to preside at a banquet given in honour of the occasion, should have shown so little respect for the prophet whom he professed to be honouring?

The other incidents of the supper may be treated together. It is said that the discrepancies in the two accounts are due merely to the different points of view taken by the narrators. The anointing gave rise to both conversations—that with Simon and that with the disciples. Luke seizes the point of her repentance, the other evangelists that of her lavish expenditure. But surely this is psychologically impossible.

Let us examine a little more closely the story in Luke. A notorious sinner, learning that Jesus is sitting at meat in the house of a certain Pharisee, makes up her mind to follow Him there. She enters the house, and immediately takes up her stand behind the Lord.* It is evident that something must have happened to make her loathe the life she had been living, and feel that her only hope of escaping from it was to take refuge with Him whose words, spoken to the scornful Pharisees, may have been brought to her ears: 'I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repent-ance.' As she stands behind Him she wipes away with her hair the penitential tears which fall fast upon His feet. Then, as the agony of shame is gradually conquered by the sense of the Saviour's forgiving love, she kneels and kisses His feet and anoints them with the ointment she had brought with her. She has no thought, no eye, for anything but Him. For a while no notice is taken, but at last words of comfort come, addressed first to another, 'Her sins, her many sins are forgiven, for she loved much'; and then directly to herself,
'Thy faith hath saved thee. Go in peace.' How would it be possible for her after this to have stayed on and listened to the reproaches of Judas and the others, or how could they have ventured to find fault where their Lord had already given His blessing? Turn now to the other side of the story, if we are to piece it out from what we read of Mary. Is it possible that she who had long ago made the good choice, who was now living quietly with her brother and sister, all three noted as especially dear to Christ; she whose house had been especially dear to Christ; she whose house has been chosen by Him for His temporary home before the end came, and who had lately been brought into such intimate contact with Him when He raised her brother from the dead,—is it possible that she should be spoken of as a notorious sinner, who was forcing herself into His company? No! If we want to make one consistent story out of the four narratives, our only course is to suppose with Strauss that the underlying fact has been much falsified by tradition, especially in the case of Luke, who has, he thinks, mixed up with it the story of the woman taken in adultery.

Before examining other explanations, we will just mention the attempts which have been made to get over two minor difficulties: (1) the discrepancy as to the anointing of feet or head; (2) the nature of the locality where the sinful woman lived. As to (1), some have compared Ps

*The reading of the best MSS, Δφ' λε ἐστλδον, in Lk 748, seems to contradict the words ἐτιρτοῦσοι ἔτι πατάπωται in ν. 37, which imply that it was the knowledge of His being scated at table which led her to seek the house herself. This is an argument in favour of the reading ἀστλδον, which is witnessed to by several of the most ancient versions. The reading ἀστλδον is perhaps a repetition from ν.44.

1332, where the precious ointment is said to have run from Aaron's head down to the skirts of his clothing; but (even if the correct trn is 'collar' instead of 'skirts'), this could only happen in the case of one who was standing and not reclining at table. Others have assumed two anointings, first of the head and then of the feet, the former of which they think may have been omitted by John as being generally known. This does not seem probable. The writer's own view of the matter is given below. As to (2), the $d\mu a \rho r \omega \lambda \delta r$ is said to have been 'in the city' $(\pi \delta \lambda \epsilon_t, \operatorname{Lk} 7^{27})$, but Bethany is described as a $\kappa \omega \mu \eta$ (Lk 10^{28} , Jn 11^1). To this it is replied that there is no reason why Bethany should not be regarded as a suburb of Jerusalem.

We will now examine the view which has been most generally held in the Latin Church, viz. that Luke describes a different scene from that in the other Gospels, but that the woman is the same. This gets rid of some difficulties, but is open to the objections stated above, as to multiplying what appears to be a unique occurrence. According to it, we are to suppose that the sister of Martha had at one time lived a vicious life, but had been conscience-stricken by some word of the Saviour, and, hearing that He was in Simon's house, had felt herself constrained to seek Him there, and received from His lips the word of forgiveness and blessing. If we allow an interval of two years, it is, of course, not such a flagrant impossibility for the sinner to have changed into the saint; and the quiet weeping of the one is not unlike the quiet sitting of the other at the feet of Jesus. Some have thought, too, that the remarkable reticence as regards the family at Bethany, which characterizes the Synoptic Gospels, might be explained by the wish not to call attention to a history which would bring discredit on the early life of a leading member of the Church. But if this danger of scandal still existed when the Gospels were written, how much more strongly must it have been felt some 30 years before, when the memory of the past was still fresh, and the Jews were on the watch for anything which might raise a prejudice against the prophet whom they sought to kill. Is it possible that they could have crowded to Bethany to express their sympathy and esteem for one who had so lately done such dishonour to the name of Israel? The difficulty as to the recurrence of the name Simon is perhaps fairly met by calling to mind its frequency at the time: we find no fewer than 9 different Simons in the NT. This led to its often having some distinctive appellation attached, e.g. Simon 'Zelotes,' Simon 'Peter,' and here Simon

The third view is that most generally entertained among Protestant divines, viz. that there were two anointings—one of the feet by the penitent sinner of Galilee, the other of the head and feet by a totally different person, the samtly Mary of Bethany. It has been objected to this that the way in which the latter is described in Jn 112 'Mary was she who anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair,' must refer to some previous occurrence; but the object of the evangelist is simply to introduce Mary to his readers by referring to an action which was in itself famous, though it had not been connected with her name in the earlier Gospels. Just in the same way Judas Iscariot is distinguished, in the earliest list of the apostles, by the addition 'which also betrayed him.' There remains the serious objection already stated: Could John have used these words to describe Mary, if he knew that they were equally true of another woman? Could our Lord have promised world-wide fame to her action, if the same thing had been already done by another

It appears to the present writer that the easiest way in which we can escape these difficulties is by supposing that the story told by St. Luke cannot, in its original form, have contained any reference to anointing. In that case the final words of v. 26 και ήλειφεν τῷ μύρφ and the whole of v. 26 must be regarded as later developments. It is easy to understand their being added under the idea that the words recorded by Matthew and Mark, 'wheresoever this gospel is preached in the whole world, there shall also this that she hath done be told for a memorial of her,' required that the act of anointing should appear in each separate Gospel. If we do not feel ourselves at liberty to make such a supposition, we must find some other means of accounting for the high commendation bestowed on Mary. It cannot have been simply for anointing, but for anointing with the precious spikenard in the prospect of the Lord's death. In any case it seems probable that the anointing with the common ointment, of which Luke speaks, was something of an afterthought. It is hardly likely that one in such extreme agitation of mind would have planned such an action beforehand. How could she know that she might not be forestalled by Simon? It will be noticed, too, that the anointing follows, not, as in John, precedes the wiping of the feet with her hair. If the details are correctly given, we may conjecture that she happened to be carrying a flask of myrrh, and, finding that the Lord's feet had been unwashed and left unanointed, had been seized by a sudden impulse to anoint them.

Prof. W. M. Ramsay * favours this third view, but considers that 'the attempts to harmonize John with Mark and Matthew fail completely. John, who says that "they made him a supper there, and Martha served," obviously places the meal in Martha's house, it scores out to be a supper suppe Martha's house: it seems quite absurd to suppose that she would be serving in the house of Simon.' He thinks Mark fell into error from putting together two separate incidents, one of which was connected with the name Bethany, the other with the name Simon; whom he identifies with a 'Simon who lived at Bethany and was or had been a leper.' It does not, however, seem likely that Mark, whose mother was at this time living in Jerusalem, and whose house was a centre of the early disciples, could have been ignorant of the facts connected with the anointing at Bethany. We must therefore accept the fact that it took place in the house of Simon, just as we accept the fact that Martha had the chief ordering of the feast. The two facts are not necessarily opposed. It may be, as Nicephorus says (HE i. 27), that Simon was the father of Martha, though living apart from his family. But we need not even suppose any such connexion. John's description, from its vagueness, they made him a feast, rather implies a public entertainment given in His honour by the inhabitants of Bethany, probably in the largest or most convenient house in the village, which might be the property of a leper named Simon.+

The fourth view is that there were three distinct anointings by either two or three distinct persons. This view was first propounded by Origen in order to meet the discrepancies between the account given in John and in the first two Gospels. The latter appear to fix the date of the supper two days (Mt 26², Mk 14¹), the former six days (Jn 12¹), before the Passover. The latter represent the ointment as poured upon the head, the former speaks of the feet as anointed and then wiped by Mary with her hair. The latter state that the supper was held in the house of Simon the Leper, the former appears to imply that it was in the In the work entitled, Was Christ born at Bothlehem! p. 91. † Dr. E. A. Abbott suggests that the appellation Assames may represent lazzārūd' (לְצְרָהָן), 'belonging to the leper.'

house of Martha (this difficulty has been already discussed). Hence it has been supposed that 's pre were two different anointings in the same week; that on each occasion the same objection was made by the bystanders, and the same answer returned by Jesus. Such a repetition, we may at once say, is impossible; but what are we to make of the discrepancies? Shall we say that they are of no importance, and only such as must be expected in different reports made several years after the cocurrence? We may be quite prepared to allow this; but it appears to be possible to get a little nearer to explaining them, when we observe that the dates given in the different Gospels do not refer directly to the supper. John's 'six days before the passover' is the date on which Jesus came to Bethany, where, as we learn from the other Gospels, He was lodging during the week before the crucifixion.* On the other hand, the two days of Matthew and Mark refer to the close of His discourses in Jerusalem: 'when he had finished all these words he said to his disciples, Ye know that after two days is the passover.' + Thus both dates may be literally exact, and yet neither may be the precise date of the supper. As to the other discrepancies, it is possible that the narrative in John, which seems to have been edited by the elders of Ephesus (see 21²⁴), has been to some extent affected by that in Luke. It is remarkable that the feet are thrice referred to (in 112 122) as if the writer wished to lay stress on this by way of correcting a current misapprehension. Such a correction seems strange to us in the present day, to whom the written Gospels are the ultimate authority; but in the first century the appeal was still to oral tradition, as we may see from the Preface to Luke, and it seems not improbable that the predominant tradition may have laid hold on the anointing of the feet as testifying to a higher degree of humility and reverence than that of the head. If, then, the original narrative of John spoke only in general terms of the anointing of Jesus, we may conceive that the elders might have taken the opportunity to correct what they deemed to be an erroneous report in Mark. Our present feeling would probably be that, where honour is intended by anointing, the head rather than the feet should be anointed. On the other hand, it was natural that the penitent, standing behind the Lord, should wipe away with her hair the tears that fell upon His feet, but less natural that it should be used to wipe away the ointment, which would simply have the effect of anointing her own hair.

It may be interesting to add a brief sketch of the history of opinion on this question. The treatment of Scripture by early Christian writers is, as a rule, uncritical. Difficulties are not felt. They are much more auxious to extract a useful moral from their text by means of some forced allegory, than to ascertain the precise meaning of the words as they were understood by the speaker and hearers, or to get a clear conception of the actual facts referred to. Hence they are often careless of distinctions, and, like children, apt to mistake resemblance for identity. It is only when there is some special call for the attention of the writer, as when he is engaged on a commentary or a harmony of the Gospels, that we can attach much weight to any critical judgment. This is seen in the references to the present question. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the woman who was still a sinner bringing the alabaster box of ointment, which she thought the best of her possessions, to anoint the feet of the Lord, and then wiping away with her hair the superfluous ointment, whilst she poured on His feet the libation of her tears. These things, he says, symbolize both the preaching of the gospel and the passion of the Lord (Pad. ii. 61, p. 205). Tertullian more distinctly identifies the two anointings in the words, 'Peccatrici femine etian corporis sui contactum permittit, lavanti lacrimis pedes ejus et crinibus detergenti et unguento sepulturam ipsius the end of the 2nd cent., in his Diatessaron,' which was for many years the only form of the Gospel known in Mesopotamia, separates the story in Lk from that in the other evangelists and shows that he distinguishes the sinner from Mary by placing the visit to Martha and Mary before the anointing. Victor of Capua, who published a Latin revised version of the Diatessaron some 300 years later, mixed up Luke's anointing with that which took place at Bethany, to suit the view which had then become popular in the Western Church! Origen is the first distinctly to grapple with the difficulties of the question. In his commentary on Mt (§ 77), after stating the points of agreement in the four accounts, he proceeds to argue against the prevailing view that the actor was in every case the same, on the ground (1) that according to Matthew and Mark it was the head of Jesus which was anointed with precious of internal, while, according to the other examplists.; His feet were anointed with myrrh(!); (2) that it is incredible that Mary the sister of Martha, who chose the better part and was beloved by Jesus, could be spoken of as a sinner; (3) that the sinner in Luke does not venture to approach the head of Jesus, but waters His feet with penitential tears, whereas there are no tears and no sinner in John. He then goes on to say that some will perhaps argue that the accor in each Gospel is different; but he thinks it enough to distinguish three different accors; and he adds further reasons for holding that the nameless woman in the first two Gospels is not the three different actors; and he adds further reasons for holding that the nameless woman in the first two Gospels is not the that the nameless woman in the first two Gospels is not the same as the sister of Martha, the supper being at a different time and a different place. He meets the objection that the disciples could not have repeated their complaint of the waste of so much valuable ointment, by making a distinction between the honest indignation of the others and the veiled covetousness of Judas; and concludes with an allegorical interpretation of the three anointings. Elsewhere he seems to accept the view that there were only two anointings (cf. Hom. in Ca 112 sciol Lucam de peccatrice, Mattheum vero et Johannem et Marcum non de peccatrice illa dixisse . . . culus nomen quoque Johannes inseruit, also on Ca 13 'si quid peccatrix habuit, ad pedes referendum est; si quid ca quæ non ent peccatrix, ad caput'). Chrysostom also makes only two anointings, but, strangely enough, he holds that one of these is narrated only by John, the other by the three Synoptists. Accordingly, he considers that the indignation of the disciples and the comforting words of the Lord have reference to the agent pure of strangely enough, he holds that one of these is narrated only by John, the other by the three Synoptists. Accordingly, he considers that the indignation of the disciples and the comforting words of the Lord have reference to the xipry you, of Luke, who is encouraged to come to Jesus by the thought that he did not disdain to eat in the house of a leper (Comm. in Matt. 80). In his 62nd homily on John he says that the sister of Martha is not in xppn is in the Martha is not in xppn is in the Martha is not in xppn is in the Martha is not in xppn is in the Martha is not in xppn is in the martha is not in xppn is in the martha is not in the end leaves it an open question: 'potest non eadcin esse, ne sibi contrarium evangelists dixisse videantur: potest etiam question meriti temporis diversitate dissolvi, ut adhuc illa peccatrix sit, jam ista perfection.' So Augustine, speaking of the anointing in Matthew (do Cons. Evang. 2. 154), says, 'lucas squamvis simile factum commemoret, nomenque conveniat ejus apud quem convivabatur dominus . . . tamen potius credibile est alium fuisse illum Simonem, non leprosum in cujus domo hoc in Bethania gerebatur. Nann nec Lucas in Bethania rem gestam dicit. . . . Nihil itaque aliud intellegendum arbitror nisi non quidem aliam fuisse mullerem ques peccatrix tunc accessit ad pedes Jesu et osculata est et lavit lacrimis . . sed eandem Mariam bis hoc fecisse' (so too Tract. in Joh. 49). Jerome, on the other hand, distinguishes between the two women (Comm. in Matt. 263), 'Nemo putet eandem esse que super caput effudit unguentum et que super pedes. Illa enim et lacrimis lavat et crinibus tergit et manifesto meretrix appellatur. De hac autem nihil tale scriptum est.' Gregory the Great finally decided the question for the Latin Church by identifying the peccatrix first with the sister of Martha, and then with the Magdalene § (Hom. 33 in Krang.), 'hane, quam Lucas peccatricem, Johannes Mariam nominat, illam esse testatur. Et quid per septem demonia nisi universa vitia designantur?' Hom. 8, 'venit unicam Magdalenam in suo officio asserentis,' and that he deprived the Church of her chief type of the penitent sinner; also that there would be no certain truth, if each, at his own caprice, might reject accepted tradition. Later Roman Catholics, however, have not been unanimous: Estius, Tillemont, and others denying the identity, while Maldonatus,' Lamy,' and the Bollandists! have argued with reason and moderation in its favour. Indeed, the reaction against the old view prevailed more in France than in England, going so far that, in a whole series of dioceses with Paris at their head, new editions of the Breviary were issued in the 17th cent. without those portions of the office of St. Mary Magdalene which referred to Lk 7 and to the sister of Lazarus, 5 Dupin, Mabillon, Bossuet, and Fleury are mentioned as favouring the newer view.

Meanwhile the Menology of the Greek Church assigns three

Meanwhile the Menology of the Greek Church assigns three distinct days for celebrating the memory of the sister of Martha, the Magdalene, and the alagrades. And Theophylact, writing in the 11th cent., says in his comment on Mt 26 that some hold that there were three, others that there were two only, who anointed the Lord; that Simon the leper was father of Lazarus, and that he is the man who showed the disciples a room ready furnished for the last supper. In his commentary on Mk 14 and Lk 7 he declares himself in favour of the view that there were three anointings—one by the apm of Lk, one by the sister of Lazarus is, days before the passover, one in the house of Simon the leper two days before the passover.

It has been already stated that the view most commonly entertained in the Reformed Churches has been that the sinner of Lk is distinct from the sister of Lazarus, and both distinct from the Magdalene. The two former are, however, confused by Grotius and by many of the recent German theologians, as Schleiermacher, Ewald, Bleck, Bau, Hilgenfeld, Weisse, Keim, as well as by the orthodox Hengstenberg. In the Anglican Church the medieval view was followed by Bishop Andrews, who speaks of 'Mary Magdalene anointing 'Christ three several times one after the other,' and being permitted to see two angels, one at the head the other at the feet where the body of Jesus had lain, because she had herself anointed His head and anointed His feet; by Donne, who identifies the sister of Lazarus with the Magdalene (Sermons, 25 and 80); by Jer. Taylor (iii. 248, Heb.), 'Mary Magdalene having been reproved onthen to His sacred head'; and in late years by Dr. Pusey. If Having thus examined the general question of Having thus examined the general question of the anointings of Jesus, it remains for us to consider more particularly the motive ascribed by our Lord Hunself for the anointing by the sister of Lazarus. This is given with slight variations: in Mt 2612 'In that she poured this ointment on my body, she did it to prepare me for burial' (πρός τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με), Mk 148 'She hath done what she could: she hath anointed my body aforehand for the burying' (προέλαβεν μυρίσαι το σωμά μου είς τον ένταφια εμών); Jn 127 'Suffer her to keep it against the day of my burying, or (marg.) 'Let her alone : it was that she might keep it' (does avrho I va els The meaning of the word ενταφιασμού μου τηρήση αὐτό; several MSS, including A, read ενταφιασμού μου τηρήση αὐτό; several MSS, including A, read ενταφιασμός is explained in Jn 19^{28, 29}, where we are told that Nicodemus brought a mixture of myrth and aloes about 100 pound weight, and wound the body in linen cloths with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury' (ἐνταφιάζειν). The general sense seems to be given most simply in Mark's words. 'She hath done what she could' is an answer to the assertion that she ought to have spent her money otherwise, viz. in distributing to the poor. We are to understand, apparently, that this was not the work for which she was fitted: she probably did not possess the practical business habits which would enable her to decide as to the best way of helping the poor. But wisdom is justified of all What she had, what the grace of her children.

¶ Dr. E. A. Abbott suggests that $\tilde{\text{may}} have been lost after $\tilde{\text{star}} and that the words are a reproach to Judas, 'or is it your wish that she should keep it for my embalming?' i.e. 'do you grudge it the living, that she may bestow it on the dead?'

God working in her enabled her to do, was to call forth generous emotion in others by being herself an example of the highest and noblest of all emotions, the impassioned devotion of a pure and loving heart to Him who is absolute Purity and Love. The genuine simplicity of a beautiful soul, however liable to misconception for the moment, yet in the end appeals more strongly to what is best in man, and is at the same time a more acceptable offering to God than any outward manifestation of human activity, however useful or charitable.

Then how are we to understand what follows: 'she hath anointed my body aforetime for the burying'? From the phrase in Jn, 'suffer her to keep it,' we gather that the spikenard had not been bought on purpose, but was applied to this use after being some time in her possession. Some have supposed that she had bought it for her personal adornment, but such a supposition is unworthy of Mary; and as our Lord associates it with the thought of death, it seems more probable that it had been purchased for the burial of her brother, and perhaps left unused from some faint hope that the coming of Christ might still render such a use superfluous. Compare Martha's words, 'Even now I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give it thee.' Destined for the tomb, the precious ointment now becomes a thankoffering to Him who called Lazarus from the tomb; but it is only in anticipation—was this Mary's own foreboding, or did she learn it first from the Lord?—of a mightier death to come. The words in Jn must, we think, be taken to mean, 'Allow her to have kept it for my burial,' i.e. 'do not find fault with her for doing so.'

History tells us nothing more of Mary. Her name is not mentioned among the women who were present at the crucifixion, or who brought spices to lay in the grave. This strange silence was, no doubt, one of the reasons for identifying her with the Magdalene. It seemed so natural that she who had been specially honoured and beloved by the Lord, who had been conspicuous beyond all others in doing honour to Him during His life, should have been also the last to watch by His cross and the first to whom He would appear on His resurrection. A late legend reports that Lazarus with his two sisters and Maximin, one of the Seventy, fled from Palestine in the persecution described in Ac 8 and took refuge in Massilia, and that Mary (confounded with the Magdalene) retired to a cave near Arles and died there.

v. MARY MAGDALENE (ἡ Μαγδαληνή) is probably named from the town of Magdala or Magdala (wh. see), now Medjdel, which is said to mean 'a tower.' It was situated at a short distance from Tiberias, and is mentioned (Mt 15³⁰) in connexion with the miracle of the seven loaves. An ancient watchtower still marks the site. According to Jewish authorities it was famous for its wealth, and for the moral corruption of its inhabitants (Edersheim, vol. i. p. 571). Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mt 27⁵⁰), following some of the rabbinical writers, gives a different derivation, according to which the name would mean a plaiter of hair, a phrase sometimes used of a woman of light character.

The first notice we have of the Magdalene is in I.k 82, where we read that certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities accompanied Jesus and the Twelve in their missionary journeys, and ministered to them of their substance. Among these are mentioned 'Mary that was called Magdalene, from whom seven

The question has been raised whether this possession implies moral as well as physical disease or infirmity. Those who affirm this have found in it a ground for upholding the identity of the Magdalene with the 'sinner' of Luke. Others hold that the phrase implies nothing more than that 'the wretchedness of despair, the divided consciousness, the preternatural frenzy, the longcontinued fits of silence, which we read of in other demoniacs, were exhibited here in their most aggravated form; that such a state is 'all but absolutely incompatible with the life implied in dμαρτωλός, and that to speak of 'seven demons' as equivalent to 'many sins' is 'to identify two things which are separated in the whole tenor of the NT by the clearest line of demarcation. But surely this is going too far. We are told of some who were 'vexed with unclean spirits,' and the parable speaks of an 'unclean spirit' taking with him 'seven other spirits more wicked than himself' and dwelling within a man. It would seem, therefore, that wickedness may be a sign or effect of possession. But this possibility goes a very little way towards proving what is wanted. If St. Luke knew that the Magdalene of ch. 8 was the same as the sinner of ch. 7, would he not have given some hint to this effect? Should we not have been told before, that the sinner had been under a Satanic influence, and had been delivered from this by the Saviour previously to her entrance into Simon's house? Then is it her entrance into Simon's house? Then is it likely that she who had been known as the 'sinner' would have been allowed to accompany the Lord and His disciples in their journeys? Would this have been in accordance with the oftrepeated principle that we have to 'provide things honest,' not only in the sight of God, but also 'of men'? Would it not have been putting an additional stumbling-block in the way of the weak, if one of notorious character were known to be habitually in the company of the new Prophet? There would seem to be at least as much ground for the identification of the Magdalene with the daughter of the Syro-phonician woman, proposed by Nicephorus (HE i. 33).

No further mention of the Magdalene is made till the crucifixion, where she appears with the other women who had accompanied Jesus from Galilee. James.' See above under 'Mary the mother of We confine ourselves here to her experience, apart from the others, which is recorded by John alone, excepting for the brief note in 'Mark 16" 'He appeared first to Mary Magdalene.' If we are to reconcile this account with what we read in the other Gospels, it would seem from a comparison of all the accounts that, after setting out for the tomb with the other women, she must have hurried on, found the stone rolled away, and hastened at once to tell Peter and John. returns with them, and waits outside after they have gone (Jn 20¹¹). While weeping there, she stoops and looks into the tomb, and sees two angels sitting, one at the head and the other at the deet, where the body of Jesus had lain. To their question, 'Why weepest thou?' she repeats what she had said to Peter and John, 'They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' Turning away had been been belief here. laid him.' Turning round, she sees behind her one whom she supposes to be the gardener, who also asks, 'Why weepest thou?' Whom seekest thou?' In answer, she begs him, if it is he who has borne Him hence, to tell her where He was laid, that she might take Him away. 'The one thought that fills her mind is still that . has been robbed of that task of reverential love on which she had set her heart. . . The utter stupor of grief is shown in her want of power to recognize at first either the voice or the form of the Lord. . . . At last her own name uttered by that voice, as she had heard it uttered, it may be, in the hour of her deepest misery, recalls her to consciousness; and then follows the cry of recognition, and the rush forward to cling to His feet. The title Rabboni, however, by which she addresses the risen Saviour, falls very far short of the address of Thomas, and shows that she had not yet realized the shares which had some cure. not yet realized the change which had come over her relation to Him, whom she had known as her earthly master and teacher. And therefore the first lesson which she receives is a warning against supposing that the familiarities of earth are any longer possible. A higher and closer communion will be open to her when He has ascended to the Father, but it will be that of spirit with spirit. She must cease to clasp His feet, must rise and carry to the disciples His message, 'I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God.' This is all that the Bible tells us of the Magdalene. Before going on to inquire what has been built up on this foundation by the later legends, it may be well to consider whether the facts as given above lend any probability to the mediæval belief that she was the same as the sinful woman belief that she was the same as the sinful woman or the sister of Lazarus. It may be granted that something of the same type of character is visible in them all. All show an impassioned devotion, a generosity of feeling, which lifts them far out of the common groove. But may it not be said that this is partly a national trait, Jewish history abounding in high deeds of female heroism, and is partly due to the overpowering spiritual influences of the time? Anyhow, the similarity was sufficient to suggest to the insimilarity was sufficient to suggest to the in-terested hearer or reader of the three stories, whose imagination was already at work to fill in the picture from the slight outline given in each case, that this result might be most easily obtained by combining them into one. She who had been possessed by seven demons and came from Magdala must have been a sinner: she brought spices to the tomb, she clasped the Lord's total beautiful and being the contract of the second seven as th feet, she was the most faithful and loving of all the women that followed Him from Galilee: must it not have been she who anointed His feet during His life, and whose faith and love had been specially commended by Him? And the same would apply to Mary of Bethany. She, too, ministered to Jesus of her substance, she fell at His feet, she anointed Him beforehand for His burial, she, too, was loving and beloved—she cannot have deserted her Lord in His last struggle, she cannot have left it to others to pay Him the last token of respect. It is she, and not another, who performed these pious offices under the name of Mary Magdalene. Yet the improbability is even greater on the other side. We have seen this already in the case of the sinful woman, and it is equally impossible that John should either have been ignorant of the identity of Mary of Bethany and the Magdalene, or knowing it should have given no hint of it to the reader. Nor can it be said that the characters are quite the same. The Magdalene could not be selected as a type of contemplation like the sister of Martha; and we can hardly believe that the latter, who had so lately witnessed the triumph over death in the raising of her brother, could have been so slow to believe in the rising again of Him whom she knew to be the Resurrection and the Life.

It may seem strange that while the general tendency was to combine the three of whom we have spoken into one, others were led to make two different Magdalenes, owing to the difficulty of reconciling the narratives of the crucifixion. Thus Eusebius (ad Marinum, ii. 7) says there may have been two Marys, each belonging to Magdala, one of whom is the subject of Matthew's narrative, the other of John's. The first goes to the tomb with the other Mary; they see the angel sitting on the stone; they receive his message for the disciples, and depart quickly in fear and great joy. As they are on their way Jesus meets them, and they come and hold Him by the feet, and worship Him. The second goes alone to the sepulchre, stands weeping outside, is forbidden to touch the feet of Jesus when He appears to her. Some identified the former, the rejoicing Magdalene, with the sister of Martha; the latter, the weeping Magdalene, with the sinner.

Nothing is really known to us of the subsequent history of the Magdalene. The Greek Church believed that she died at Ephesus, whither she had beneved that she died at Epnesus, whither she had followed St. John,* and that her relics were removed from thence to Constantinople by the Emperor Leo vi. The story, however, which took root in the West was very different. It was said that she belonged to a wealthy family possessed of great estates at Magdala and Bethany; that she belonged the admirable gifts to the state of the abused all her admirable gifts to tempt others to sin; that after the Ascension she remained at Bethany till the disciples were scattered by the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen. The two sisters and others were placed in a boat by their persecutors, and were providentially carried without oars or sails to Massilia, where, by their preaching and miracles, they converted the heathen, and Lazarus was made bishop, while Mary retired to the wilderness and lived a life of extreme asceticism for thirty years. Finally, she was carried up to heaven in the arms of ascending angels.

Apparently the earliest document which gives the legend is the Life by Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, who flourished at the beginning of the 9th cent. This was greatly amplified by Vincent of Beauvais in the 13th cent. The story was not known to Gregory the Great, or to Gregory of Tours in the 6th cent., as he mentions the death of the Magdalene at Ephesus (Mirac. i. 30), nor, if we may believe Launoi, t is there any allusion to it in the writings of Bernard or Peter of Cluny or Peter Damianus, all of whom took the Magdalene as the subject of panegyric. It is treated as unworthy of examination by the Bollandists, and is probably due to misapprehension arising from the great place occupied in the traditions of Provence by Marius, who defeated the Ambrons and Toutons in the bettle of Air the Ambrons and Teutons in the battle of Aix, B.C. 102. Marius was accompanied, as we learn from Plutarch, by a Syrian prophetess of the name of Martha, and it is suggested by Baring-Gould, after Gilles, that the connexion of these two names may have been the starting-point of the whole legend. At Les Baux, where Marius was encamped, there are some ancient sculptures on a limestone block, one, known as the Trémaié, containing three standing figures, which tradition holds to be the three Marys, but Gilles is of opinion that they represent Marius with his wife Julia and the prophetess Martha. The Trois Maries here are said to be Martha with her attendant Marcella and the Magdalene. It is curious that at another Trois Maries in the Camargue, the landing-place, according to the larged of the whole party from according to the legend, of the whole party from Palestine, the three Marys are said to be the mother of James, Salome, and the attendant Sara. As there is really only one or, at most, two Marys in either case, we naturally ask how the number three came in, and it may not be irrelevant to remember that the famous Fosse Mariana from Arles to Massilia were constructed by Marius in his third consulship, while he was preparing for his campaign against the Ambrons, and would no doubt be commemorated by inscriptions which might run something as follows: C. Marius C. F. cos III. fossas furiendus curavit; and these, as they got defaced with age, might easily be supposed to bear witness to Trois Maries. The tradition had pretty well established itself by the 11th cent., had pretty well established itself by the lith cent., though it was a matter of hot dispute whether Aix or Vezelay possessed the true relies of the Magdalene. Fortunately, in 1279 Charles the nephew of Louis IX. (who had himself made a pilgrimage to her cell at St. Baume) discovered her body in St. Maximin's C. urch at Aix, and since then the cult of the Magdalene has had hardly less vogue than that of the Virgin. The romantic character of her story and the feeling of a common frailty endeared her to all classes, and even reformers were loth to disturb a belief which on the whole worked for good. For an account of her place in art the reader is referred to Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. ii. p. 343 ff.

vi. Mary the Mother of Mark.—The only place in which she appears in the NT is Ac 12^{12} The only where we read that many were gathered together and praying in her house when Peter knocked at the door after his escape from prison. As Mark is called cousin (drespis) of Barnabas (Col 410), she would be aunt of the latter. Later writers believed that her house was situated on Mt. Zion, and that it was the place of meeting for the disciples from the Ascension to the day of Pentecost. It was said to have escaped the destruction of the city by Titus, and to have been used as a church at a later period (Epiphanius, de Pond. et Mens. c. 14; Cyril Jerus. Catech. 16).

vii. MARY SALUTED BY ST. PAUL.—Nothing is known of her except that her name appears after Priscilla, Aquila, and Epzenetus in the list of 24 persons to whom St. Paul sends greetings in the 16th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. She, like the other women (Tryphæna, Tryphosa, and Persis) mentioned in v. 12, is said to have 'laboured much' for the Church, and may possibly have held the position of deaconess or 'widow' at Rome. viii. See next article. J. B. MAYOR.

MARY (THE VIRGIN). — This subject may be considered under four heads: (A) the story of her life as it is given (1) in the NT, (2) in the Apocryphal Gospels and elsewhere; (B) the history of opinion respecting her; (C) her place in Liturgiology; (D) her place in Art.

A. 1. What we are told in the Bible about Mary falls naturally into two portions—that which pre-cedes, and that which follows the baptism of our Lord. (a) All that we know of the former is included in the earlier chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke. These agree in the main facts, that Jesus was 'conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,' that His mother was espoused to Joseph, that the birth took place at Bethlehem towards the end of the reign of Herod the Great, that Nazarcth was the subsequent home of the Holy Family, that previous intimation of the supernatural birth had been given through the instrumentality of angels, that Jesus was descended from David, as shown in the appended genealogies.

To these facts St. Matthewadds that the marriage of Joseph and Mary was carried out after the doubts of the former had been set at rest by an angelic vision; that wise men from the East, undet the guidance of a star, came to offer their gifts at the cradle of the infant Saviour; that the children at Bethlehem were massacred owing to Herod's jealousy, Jesus and His parents having previously taken refuge in Egypt, from whence they returned on the death of Herod, and settled at Nazareth in consequence of a divine warning. St. Luke adds the story of the birth of John, the Forerunner; the statement that Mary was already living at Nazareth when the angel Gabriel announced to her that she should be the mother of the Messiah; the visit of Mary to her cousin destined mother of the Lord; Mary's song of praise; the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem to be enrolled there as belonging to the family of David; the birth in the stable; the announcement to the shepherds; the circumcision; the purification in the temple; the blessing of Simeon and Anna; the return to Nazareth; the visit to the temple when Jesus was twelve years old; His questioning of the doctors; His answer to Mary's complaint ('Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing?, in the words, 'How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' and lastly, the general statement as to the Son's humility and the thoughtful pondering of the mother.

It is a significant fact that the story of the fancy is confined to these two Gospels. We Infancy is confined to these two Gospels. We may explain its omission in the Fourth Gospel by the consideration that this, being evidently supplementary to the others, often omits details which were assumed to be already familiar to the reader. But in the case of St. Mark we are forced to the conclusion, either that he was unacquainted with the details of our Lord's life previous to the preaching of John, or that, knowing them, he did not regard them as an essential part of the Gospel message. The general impression left by all the Gospels certainly is that during our Lord's life the secret of His miraculous birth had been communicated to very few. Thus we read in Mt 13⁵⁵ 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4²² 'Is not this Joseph's son?' Jn 6⁴² 'Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' And so in Jn 14 Philip says to Nathanael, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph'; and both the genealogies of our Lord are traced to David through Joseph 'the son of David.' + Nor have we any evidence that the mysterious truth was generally known during the apostolic age. allusion is made to it in the Acts or the Epistles, $ and the 'woman clothed with the sun' in Rev 12, though interpreted by some of the Virgin, is plainly intended to symbolize the Church. St. Paul, St.

*Resch thinks (Kindheitsevangelium, Leipzig, 1895) that both evangelists borrowed from the same source, the B.$\textit{Basic} \textit{Propulation} \textit{Noiser Throw} \textit{Noiser Noiser No

1 to true that Gal 4° when the runness of time was come God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law,' has been cited as such an allusion; but the phrase there used process is yourses may be merely an equivalent of yourses yourses found in Job 141 1514 254, Mt 11¹¹, Lk 722, or at most it may refer to the promise of Gn 3¹⁵.

Peter, and St. John are alike emphatic in insisting on the fact of the Incarnation as the central truth of the Christian religion, and alike silent as to the way in which it was brought about.

The ancient Syriac Gospel discovered at Mt. Sinai, and published in 1894, of which a translation Sinal, and published in 1894, of which a translation was published by Mrs. Lewis in 1896, has some remarkable variants in Mt 1¹⁶⁷. It runs thus: 'Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus who is called Christ'; again in v.²¹ the reading is 'she shall bear to thee a son'; and in v.²⁵ 'she bore to him a son.' The publication gave rise to much discussion in the Academy and elsewhere: among other theories it was succeeded that this might be other theories it was suggested that this might be an Ebionite revision of our (lospel; but this seemed inconsistent with the word 'Virgin' which appears in v. 16, as well as with vv. 18-20. Others supposed that the Syriac version represents an earlier form of the genealogy, which may have been taken from a Jewish register and incorporated in the Gospel. This view received a certain amount of support from some of the old Latin versions, which have Joseph cui desponsata virgo Maria genuit Jesum, where the use of genuit instead of peperit has been thought to betoken an earlier form, in which desponsata was followed by erat. † See, further, art. JESUS CHRIST in vol. ii. p. 644.

However this may be, there can be no doubt that the miraculous conception was denied by several of the early heretics, who either maintained (with Cerinthus) the naturalistic birth of the Lord, followed by the bestowal of supernatural powers through the descent of the Spirit at His baptism, or held (with Marcion) that He was without earthly parentage, but descended from heaven in the 15th year of Tiberius and showed Himself in the synagogue of Capernaum.

On the other hand, stress is laid on the supernatural birth of the Lord by Ignatius, who in opposing the phantom theory of the Docetæ uses such pliranes as και έκ Maplas και έκ θεοῦ, Eph. 7; ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς έκυοφορήθη ὑπὸ Maplas κατ' οἰκονομίαν έκ σπέρματος μέν Δαυείδ πνεύματος δε άγίου, ib. 18; ελαθεν τον άρχοντα τοῦ αίωνος τούτου ή παρθενία Μαρίας και ο τοκετός αυτής, όμοιως και ο θάνατος του Κυρίου, ib. 19: these, he says, are τρία μυστήρια κραυγής, three mysteries wrought in the silence of God, though destined to be proclaimed aloud. :

(b) Proceeding now to the second part of Mary's life, we find her, after the death of her husband (who is introduced for the last time in the visit to the temple), residing, as it would seem, with the Lord partly at Capernaum (Mt 4¹³ 9¹, Mk 2¹, Jn 1²⁴ 19¹²). We are not told that she accompanied our Lord in His missionary journeys, like Mary Magdalene and Susanna (Mk 15⁴⁰, Lk 8³). The first mention of her in this period is at the marriage at Cana in Galilee (Jn 2), where her direction to the servants, 'What-soever he saith unto you, do it,' seems to show that her relation to the bridegroom was such as to justify the exercise of authority on her part. Her previous appeal to her Son to provide for the deficiency of wine had drawn forth from Him the same sort of correction as her complaint at His disappearance on the occasion of the visit to the temple, ri euo rai gol, yours; 'Woman, what hast thou to do with me?' Though there was nothing of harshness in the appellation γύναι, as we may see from its use in the last tender commendation of His mother to the beloved disciple (Jn 1928), yet the choice of a word applying alike to all women is not without its significance, and the clause which follows undoubtedly contains a warning that it was not for her or for any human being to determine His course of action.* The next mention of Mary is in Mk 3²⁰⁻⁵⁷, where we are told that the people pressed upon Jesus to such an extent that He had not even time to eat; and that His friends hearing this, 'went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself.' Accordingly in the 31st verse we read that 'his mother and brethren came we read that 'his mother and brethren came where he was, and, standing without, sent unto him, calling him. . . And they say unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee. And he answereth them, and saith, Who is my mother and my brethren? And looking round on them which sat round about him (in Mt 12⁴⁰ 'stretching forth his hand towards his disciples'), he saith, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosever shall do the will of Cod the same is my brother and sister and God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.' Here, too, the same lesson is taught, viz. that the knowledge of Christ after the flesh conveys no special privilege, no right of interference or control, not even any exclusive or peculiar blessedness, for in Lk 11²⁷ the exclamation, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou didst suck,' calls forth the correction that His mother's true blessedness consisted, not in the fact of a physical connexion, but in those moral and spiritual qualifications which were open to all, 'Yea, rather (μενοῦν),† blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.' The next occasion on which we meet with Mary is at the foot of the Cross. She had come up with other women from Galilee to be present at the passover. As she stood watching the dying agony of her Son, she received His latest charge, entrusting her to the guardianship of the beloved disciple, who from that hour took her to his own home (Jn 1926). The only remaining notice of her in the NT is contained in Ac 114, where she is mentioned as continuing in prayer and supplication with the apostles and the other women and the brethren of the Lord.

2. The brief but exquisite sketch of our Lord's early years contained in the NT provided a natural stimulant to imagination and curiosity, and the craving for further particulars was supplied by the writers of the Apocryphal Gospels, sometimes with the ulterior aim of magnifying asceticism or incul-cating some special doctrine of their own. Hence in the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 16) these works are spoken of as 'poisonous apocryphal books in which the wicked heretics reproach the creation, marriage, the providential government of the world, etc. Their popularity, however, was so great, that Catholic writers found it necessary either to imitate or to revise them. We will give here a general sketch of the further story of the Infancy, derived from a comparison of these apocryphal sources, disregarding minor discrepancies.

* Blass (i.e. p. 238) quotes Nonnus' paraphrase τί μωί, γίνω, τὶ ενὶ ενίτη, as implying that τ must have been read instead of καί τα contemporary MS of the Fourth Gospel, and argues that we should replace τ in the text. Prof. Ramsay thinks that we may understand the existing text in the same general sense, 'how does that concern us' (i.e. p. 84). The objection to this is (1) the constant use of the phrase in the other sense: (2) the consensus of the ancient commentators; (3) the almost certainty that the other meaning would have been expressed by τί προι τίμωξι as in Mt 274, Jn 2122; (4) the inappropriateness of the supposed language in the mouth of Jesus under the actual circumstances. Surely it is every man's 'concern' to save his friend from inconvenience or discredit. And what, on this supposition, is the force of the words which follow 'mine hour has not yet come'? —words which give a natural reason for the τί μωὶ καὶ τοῦ; † TR reads μιτοῦγει with B²CD, but the γε is rightly dropped by WH, Nestle, et al.

The first development is concerned with the period preceding the betrothal of Mary. parents are said to have been Joachim of Nazareth and Anna of Bethlehem, both of the family of David. When they had been married twenty years without children, Joachim, going up to make his offering at the temple, was repelled as coming under the curse pronounced in Scripture against these who had not residue as the second to break the second to be a sec those who had not raised up seed to Israel. Being ashamed to return home, he retired to the wilder ness and fasted there forty days, and received an assurance that a child should be born to him. Meanwhile his wife was bewailing her barrenness and her husband's desertion, envying even the sparrows which had their nest in her garden. An angel comforted her by the news that Joachim was returning, and that she should bear him a child, whom she at once vowed to dedicate to the service of the temple. At the age of three, the child of promise was accordingly taken by her parents to the temple, where she charmed all the beholders by dancing on the steps of the altar. She remained in the temple, ministered to by angels, till she had completed her twelfth year, when the high priest was directed to summon all the widowers of Israel to bring each his rod to present before the altar, in order that it might be made known by a miraculous sign to whose care the Virgin was to be committed. When Joseph's rod was returned to him, a dove issued from it and hovered over his head: to him therefore Mary was entrusted in spite of his protests. Seven virgins were appointed to be her companions, and to work with her at a new veil for the temple, while Joseph left his home to follow his calling as a shipwright. One day Mary, going out to draw water, heard a voice saying, 'Hail! thou that art highly favoured.' Being alarmed at seeing no one, she left her vessel and returned to work at the veil, when an angel appeared and addressed her in the words, 'Fear not, Mary, thou hast found favour with God by thy vow of chastity, and shalt conceive by His word. . . . A virgin thou shalt conceive, a virgin bring forth, a virgin rear thy Son.' Shortly afterwards Mary appeared before the high priest with the veil and received his blessing. Then come the visit to Elisabeth, the return home, the meeting with Joseph, the quieting of his suspicions by a vision, a summons from the priests, directing both Mary and Joseph to attend at the temple and reply to the charge brought against them; the proof of their innocence by the ordeal of the water of bitterness (Nu 518).

In the apocryphal account of the visit to Bethlehem the following points are noticeable. Mary rides on an ass, and is accompanied by Joseph and two of his sons; as they approach Bethlehem they stop before a cave,* into which Joseph carried her. As soon as she entered it the darkness was lit up by a glory brighter than the sun, which continued as long as she remained there. Meanwhile Joseph had gone to seek for a midwife. As he went, he looked up and saw all movement brought to a sudden pause, both in heaven and earth. When the pause was over, he beheld a woman coming down from the mountain, who told him she was a midwife, and went with him to the cave, on which a bright cloud was resting. Going in they found Mary with her Child at her breast, but no other sign of her delivery. Salome, who had followed them, would not believe in the miraculous birth without further examination, + and was punished for her impiety by the withering of her hand, which was, however, restored on her repentance. On the third day after the birth, Mary moved from the cave to a stable, and placed the Child in a manger, where the ox and the ass worshipped Him, thus fulfilling the word of the prophet, 'the ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib.

The adoration of the Magi and the subsequent massacre of the Innocents are taken with little alteration from the Bible. But many fanciful additions are made in narrating the journey to Egypt. Wild beasts play around the infant Saviour; trees bend down their branches to offer their fruit to Mary; springs burst forth at her need; the idols fall from their bases to the earth; the journey is miraculously shortened; lepers and demoniacs and sick people of all sorts are healed by being sprinkled with the water in which Mary had washed her Child, or by handkerchiefs which He had touched. One of the most remarkable stories is that of the healing of a young man who had been turned by enchantment into a mule. His sisters having besought the Virgin's help, she placed her Son on the mule, and at her prayer He placed her Son on the mule, and at her prayer He restored the youth to his original shape. Another story relates to the two robbers who were afterwards crucified with Jesus. The one, called Titus, had with difficulty prevented his fellow from giving the alarm as the Holy Family passed by. Mary thanked him, and prayed that he might receive forgiveness of his sins; whereupon Jesus answered, 'After thirty years he shall be crucified on my right hand and shall precede Me to Paradise.' right hand, and shall precede Me to Paradise.'
At the end of the third year they returned from Egypt to Nazareth. It is unnecessary to relate the miracles, trivial or even malicious, said to have been wrought there by the child Jesus. Joseph died when Jesus was eighteen years of age.

No further particulars of interest are added to the life of Mary, as recorded in the Bible, till after the resurrection, when Jesus is said to have appeared to her, first of all, accompanied by the patriarchs and prophets whom He had released from Hades.† Two years later (other versions give 22 or 24 years) she was warned by an angel that her death was approaching, and the apostles were all miraculously conveyed from various parts of the earth to be present at her bedside. Jesus Himself received her soul, and after three days her body was carried up by angels to heaven. St. Thomas, who had come too late for her death, was privileged to behold her ascension, and to

In his note on Jn 19²⁷ Westcott says, 'Nothing is known with reasonable certainty of the later life of the mother of the Lord. Epiphanius was evidently unacquainted with any accepted tradition on the subject $(H \alpha r. 78)$. He leaves it in doubt whether she accompanied St. John to Asia Minor or not. † For the story of the death and Assumption, see the apocry phal treatises de Transitu Mariæ, ascribed to 8t. John and ta Melito. The earliest hint of such a belief among orthodox writers is to be found in Epiphanius (d. 403), who, while strongly censuring the heretical sect of the Collyridians for their worship of Mary (Panar. p. 1061), believes that some extraordinary mystery about her death is implied in the words of Rev (1214), 'there were given to her eagle's wings.' Melito's de Transitu was condemned as heretical in the decree de Libris Canonicis, attributed to Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494. The most recent statewas condemned as heretical in the decree ds Libris Canonicis, attributed to Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494. The most recent statement of the Roman Catholic belief on this point will be found in Wilhelm and Scannel, vol. ii. p. 220: 'Mary's corporeal assumption into heaven is so thoroughly implied in the notion of her personality as given by Bible and dogma, that the Church can dispense with strict historical evidence of the fact.' were converted into facts; and Nicephorus Callisti (†c. 1350), Hist. Eccl. ii. 3, relates that she lived with St. John at Jerusalem for eleven years after the death of the Lord, and died there in her 59th year. The site of the Tomb of the Virgin, just to the north of the Garden of Gethsemane, is not mentioned by any traveller of the first six centuries, and the later tradition that the church there was built by Helena is certainly false. See Quaresmius, ii. 240 ff.; Williams, Holy City, ii. 434 ff. From a passage in a synodical letter of the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431, Conc. iii. 573, Labbe) it appears that, according to another tradition, the mother of the Lord accompanied St. John to Ephesus, and was buried there.' See, further, art. 'Le lieu de la dormition de la Très Sainte Vierge,' by Père Séjourné in Revus Biblique, Jan. 1899, p. 141 ff. The traditional site of the Dormitio Marice in Jerusalem was made over to the Emperor of Germany in 1898.

For Jewish and Mohammedan traditions with regard to Mary, see Canon Meyrick's article 'Mary the Virgin,' in Smith's DB. The only point which need be mentioned here is the Jewish slander reported by Celsus,* to the effect that Jesus was the illegitimate son of Mary and a soldier Pandera. B. As early as the 2nd cent. we find Eve made a type of Mary, as Adam was of our Lord. As Eve had brought about the curse by listening to the Serpent, so Mary the blessing by listening to the Angel.† Still she shared man's fallen nature, and was guilty of actual sin. So Irenæus (iii. 16. 7), 'Dominus repellens ejus intempestivam festinationem dixit: Quid mihi et tibi est, mulier?' So Origen (Hom. in Luc. 17) interprets the prophecy of Simeon, 'A sword shall pierce through thine own soul also,' of the doubts felt by Mary, in common with the apostles, at the crucifixion: 'Si omnes peccaverunt et egent gloria Dei, justificati gratia ejus et redempti, utique et Maria illo 'empore scandalizata est'; and still more strongly Tertullian (de Carne Christi, 7), and Chrysostom, commenting on Mt 12"". It does not appear that we have any direct evidence of prayer being made, or worship offered, to Mary during the first four centuries,  except by the obscure sect of the Collyridians already mentioned, against whom Epiphanius lays down the rule, έν τιμή έστω Μαρία, ὁ δὲ Πατήρ καὶ Tlòs καὶ Αγιον Πνεῦμα προσκυνείσθω την Maplan μηδείς προσκυνείτω. cultus and invocation of the martyrs, and belief in their miraculous power, had been growing up as early as the 3rd cent.,* and the gradual paganiz-ing of the Church, which followed the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the empire, led, in many places, to the substitution of Christian saints for the old local divinities.† Indeed the continued use of the old temples and ceremonies and images under new names might seem to be countenanced by St. Paul's words in reference to the Athenian altar 'whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.' Then the worship of the Lares, the apotheosis of the dead, the almost blasphemous homage paid to the living emperor in the East, prepared the way for the worship of saints. The votaries of Demeter and Persephone and of other female deities found it easier to transfer their allegiance to the Christian Church, when they were permitted to make their vows there to Mary as the Mother of God and the Queen of Heaven; the while at the same time these titles were demanded by the more fanatical Christians, who claimed divine honours for the ideal and prototype of virginity, which they held to be the highest of all virtues. The movement in this direction was especially favoured by the reaction against the Nestorian heresy, condemned at the Council of Ephesus in A.D. 431—a reaction shown in the multiplication of pictures of the Virgin, and in a readiness to accept, as authentic, any supposed tradition or revelation which tended to her glory. On the other hand, the Divinity of Christ tended to obscure his Humanity. The loving sympathy of one who could be touched with the feeling of our infirmities was transferred to Mary, whose mediation with her Son, the stern and terrible Judge, was every day felt to be more necessary to weak and erring mortals. Add to this the chivalrous sentiments and the respect for woman among the northern nations of Europe, and we shall not be surprised at the subsequent developments of Mariolatry. The language of the Bible, especially in the Vulgate, was strained to support this: the name 'Mariam' itself received various interpretations, of which the most popular was Stella Maris: the promise to the seed of the woman in Gn 316 was transferred to the woman herself in accordance with the Vulgate mistranslation, 'ipsa conteret caput tuum': the greeting in Lk 1²⁸ χαῖρε κεχαριτωμέτη (Vulg. 'ave gratia plena') was a proof that Mary was herself a fountain of grace: her reply to the angel (οὐ γινώσκω ἄνδρα) is taken to be a vow: the words by which she was entrusted to the care of the beloved disciple, idoù à viss oou, describe her relation to all true members of the Church. She is the Bride of the Canticles, the Woman persecuted by the dragon in the Apocalypse, the Wisdom of whom Solomon speaks, whom the Lord possessed in the beginning as His daily delight, rejoicing always before Him. 1 'The fact that some ancient heretics actually did maintain the Holy Ghost to be a female (Iren. i. 38; Gospel of the Hebrews, ap. Orig. Comm. in Joan. ii. 6), only serves to show the reluctance with which mankind bade adieu to that sex as objects of worship.' Blunt, i.e. ch. 3.

3 This phrase, condemned by Coleridge (Eng. Div. i. 45), though accepted by most Anglican divines (e.g. Pearson, Creed, p. 177), is open to the objection contained in Augustine's words (de Fide et Symbolo, 9), 'nec nos ad negandam Christi matrem cogit quod ab so dictum est Quid mihi et tibi est mulier!... sed admonet potius ut intelligamus secundum Deum non habuisse matrem.'

tween man and God'), vied with one another in devising new phrases in her honour; and the glowing hyperboles of an earlier generation were fixed in the dogma or ritual of a later generation, which again quickly gathered to itself a new halo of sentiment, to be followed by a yet further advance both in theory and practice. We may consider this development under three heads: (1) the personal holiness of the Virgin; (2) her power and dignity; (3) the nature of the worthin due to her (3) the nature of the worship due to her.

(1) We have seen that Augustine thought Mary might be exempt from actual sin, though sharing the general corruption of man's nature. Pelagius and his disciple Julian denied this hereditary sinfulness.* Paschasius Radbertus (c. 830), in his controversy with Ratramnus, maintained that Mary was sanctified in the womb; and this was the doctrine of Bernard (b. 1091), who, however, protested strongly against the institution of the feast of the Conception by the Canons of Lyons, Dec. 8, 1140, as sanctioning the belief in the Immaculate Conception, which he regarded as superstitious and opposed to the tradition of the Church. Bernard was followed by the greatest schoolmen, including Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274); but about the year 1300 Duns Scotus maintained that, since it was as much in the power of God to blot out sin in the moment of conception as at a later period, it was more congruous to attribute to the Virgin the higher perfection. This view was adopted by the Franciscans and supported by the visions of St. Brigitta, while the older view was maintained by the Dominicans and supported by

(2) By the end of the 7th cent. the belief in wonderworking pictures, icons, and the honouring of these with osculation, lights, and incense, together with the invocation of the Virgin and other saints, had become so common in the Eastern Church, that Christians were regarded as idolaters by the Mohammedans. Leo the Isaurian, who became emperor in 716, tried to avert this charge by forbidding the use of images altogether; and his prohibition was confirmed by the Synod of Constantinople in 754. The chief opponents of the Iconoclasts were Germanus of Constantinople and John of Damascus, who, in their writings, and John of Damascus, who, in their writings, assign to Mary the highest place in heaven next to the Blessed Trinity, though they guard themselves against the imputation of deifying her, as the pagans did their Mater Deorum (see Damasc. Hom I. in Dorm. Maria, §§ 11, 15). John addresses her as 'the rest of the weary, confort of the correction beginn to the side. comfort of the sorrowful, healing to the sick, pardon to the sinful, a ready help to all.' In the 11th cent. Damiani speaks of her as "ilo.' solum rogans sed imperans, domina non ancilla. In the 12th cent. Bernard, in the 13th Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura, carry their adoration to a still higher pitch. Thomas is cited as saying that 'in Mary is all our hope of salvation,' and that she has obtained half the kingdom of God, 'ut ipsa sit Regina misericordia, ut Christus est Rex justitie': Bonaventura speaks of her as the 'porta cæli, quia nullus potest jam cælum intrare nisi per Mariam transeat tanquam per portam,' and to him are ascribed the contemporary adaptation of the Psalter and Te Deum to the worship of the Virgin, as a specimen of which may be quoted the versicles of the Aquinas and Bonaventura, carry their adoration men of which may be quoted the versicles of the latter—'All the earth doth worship Thee, Spouse of the Eternal Father'; 'Vouchsafe, O sweet Mary, to keep us now and ever without sin.' What is perhaps even more remarkable is that, in an early sermon of Wyclif's * (d. 1384), we read: 'It seems to me impossible that we should obtain the reward without the help of Mary. There is no sex or age, no rank or position, of any one in the whole human race, which has no need to call for the help of the Holy Virgin.'+

It must not be supposed, however, that there was no protest against the constantly advancing tide of Mariolatry. Beside the Nestorians and the Eastern Iconoclasts, who were to a certain extent supported by the Frankish Church under Charlemagne, there were various sects, Paulicians,: Cathari, and later the Waldenses and Moravians, which condemned the Invocation of Saints; and at least two eminent Churchmen in the 9th cent. wrote against it, viz. Agobard, archbishop of Lyons, and Claudius, bishop of Turin. Wyclif gradually came to the same conclusion, and some of his followers, e.g. Lord Cobham, were condemned to death for contradicting the teaching of the The desire Church as to the worship of saints. church as to the worship of saints. The desire for reform in the practice and teaching of the Church was strongly reinforced by the reaction from the mediæval system, which came in with the Renaissance: and by the end of the 15th cent. there were many signs that the old ideas as to the Virgin were becoming untenable. This way be This may be Virgin were becoming untenable. seen from the reference made to her in Dean Colet's Preceptes of Livinge, 'Byleve and trust in chryst Jesu. Worship hym and his moder Mary,' especially when viewed in the light of his favourite principle, 'Keep to the Bible and the Apostles' Creed, and let divines dispute about the rest'; as well as from the charge brought against him (1512), that he denied the worship of images. The opinion of Erasmus is known from the Encomium Murice and Peregrinatio, in which he ridicules pilgrimages to the shrine of St. Mary of Walsingham, the prayers offered to her, and generally the specula-tions of the schoolmen as to her virginity and sinlessness. Even Sir Thomas More condemns image-worship in his Utopia, and in a letter to Erasmus expresses his disgust at the Mariolatry which he witnessed at Coventry, where a Franciscan was preaching that 'whoever made daily use of the Psalter of the Blessed Virgin could never be damned,' while the parish priest, seeing that men became emboldened to crime through trust in their devotions to the Virgin, made a vain protest, which only drew on him the charge of impiety. In another letter to a monk in defence of Erasmus, More mentions that he had himself known of a band of assassins, who used to kneel before the Virgin, and then proceed 'piously to perpetrate their crime.' He adds that he does not say this 'to condemn those who occasionally salute the Holy Virgin, than which nothing is more beneficial. While all the Reformed Churches condemned the doctrine of Rome on this point, the Lutherans were less prominent in opposing it than the Swiss and the French, who often drew upon themselves persecution by their violence in destroying images. Berquin, the first Protestant martyr in France, was charged with asserting that it was wrong to invoke the Virgin Mary in place of the Holy Spirit, and to call her the source of all grace, or assign to her such titles as 'Our hope' and 'Our life,' which belong only to Christ. The doctrine life, which belong only to Christ.

of the Church of England is given in the 15th Art., Of Christ alone without sin, and in the 22nd, where it is said, 'The Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping, and Adoration, as well of Images as of Reliques, and also Invocation of Saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the word of God.' Both articles are unaltered from the form in which they were originally put forth in 1553, except that the phrase 'Romish doctrine' was substituted in 1562 for 'doctrine of the school-authors' in the earlier form.

Even the Council of Trent (1545-1563) gives evidence of this change of feeling in the guarded language used in Sess. xxv.: De invocatione, veneratione, et reliquiis Sanctorum et sacris imaginibus, where it is enjoined that 'the people be taught that the Saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers for men to God, and that it is good and useful to invoke them as suppliants, and to have recourse to their prayers for the sake of obtaining benefit from God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, who is our only Redeemer and Saviour.' followed by a warning against superstition in such worship, and the caution that no innovation should be made except with the approbation of the bishop. The Roman Catechism speaks more particularly of the Virgin: 'Rightly are we taught to pray to the most blessed Mother of God, ut nobis peccatoribus sua intercessione conciliaret Deum, bonaque tum ad hanc tum ad æternam vitam necessaria impetraret.

The check on superstition was, however, only temporary. Mainly owing to the efforts of the Jesuits, Mariolatry is probably now more pre-valent in the Church of Rome than at any former time, if we may judge from the Decree of 8th Dec. 1854, the enormous crowds of pilgrims who flock to Lourdes, and the popularity of such books as the Glories of Mary, brought out in 1784 by St. Alphonsus de Liguori, of which the English trans-Alphonsus de Liguori, or which the English translation is 'heartily commended to the faithful' by the late Cardinals Wiseman and Manning. Even Cardinal Newman does not shrink from using the phrase 'deification' in reference to the Romish doctrine of the Virgin and the Saints (Essay on Development, ch. 8).*

(3) As early as the 5th cent. Augustine gives a warning against the worship of saints in the words, 'Honorandi sunt propter imitationem, non adorandi propter religionem' (de Vera Religione, 55); 'Colimus martyres eo cultu dilectionis et societatis quo in hac vita coluntur sancti homines belei... illo cultu qui Græce "Latria" dicitur, cum sit quædam proprie divinitati debita servitus, nec colimus, nec colendum docemus nisi unum Deum' (c. Faustum, xx. 21). In the 2nd Council of Nicsea (786) it was decreed that the Cross of Christ, the Virgin, Angels, and Saints were entitled to religious reverence, τιμητική προσκύνησις, but not to divine worship, harpeia. Peter Lombard (Sent. III. Dist. 9. 1) uses the word 'dulia' for the former, but he says that there is a special dulia due to the humanity of Christ, 'est quædam dulia soli humanitati Christi exhibenda, non alii creature.' Thomas Aquinas gives this higher dulia the name of hyper-dulia, but transfers it to the worship of Mary, not to that of the humanity of Christ, which he identifies with latria (Summa, Pars. 3, Qu. 25). He cites Augustine for the distinguishing feature of latria: 'aliquid est quod soli Deo exhibetur, scilicet sacrificium'; and later writers have maintained that, as the Mass is never offered to the Virgin, her worship never oversteps the limit of dulia. If, however, we understand sacrificium, as Augustine does (Civ. Dei, x. c. 1, §§ 2, 3; c. 3, 4, 5, 6), in a spiritual sense of fervent love and devotion, it is difficult to see how the worship inculcated in such a book as the Glories of Mary differs from this; and Pusey quotes passages from Corn. a Lapide, Faber, and others, in which it is actually maintained that Mary is present and received in the Eucharist, and feeds the worshippers there with her own flesh.*

*See also W. Palmer, Letter to Dr. Wiseman; Burgon, Letters from Rome. In the latest scientific exposition of Roman footrine recommended by Card. Manning it is maintained that the Intercession of Mary is an ordinary and necessary means of salvation; and the dictum of certain theologians, that 'God grants no grace except on the intercession of Mary,' is defended (Wilhelm and Scannel, ii. pp. 238, 224).

C. By far the commonest form of devotion to the Virgin is the Avz Maria, consisting of two parts: the salutation—'Hail, Mary, full of grace. the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb'; and the prayer—'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for we signed and the hone of God. pray for us sinners, now, and at the hour of death.' The former part was first ordered to be used as a church formula by Odo, bishop of Paris, in 1196; the latter part first appears in the 15th cent., and was directed to be used daily at the seven canonical hours by Pius v. in 1568. The 'Angelus' (said to have been introduced in 1287) consists of three recitations of the Ave Maria at the sound of the Angelus bell, at morning, midday, and night, the first recitation on each occasion being introduced by the words, 'The Angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Ghost.' The 'Rosary' is the string of beads introduced by St. Dominic in 1210 to facilitate the repetition of 150 Ave Marias and 15 Pater Nosters. The name is also used for this particular kind of devotion. †

The oldest festival connected with the name of Mary is the Purification, tobserved on 2nd Feb., thus consecrating, as Bede observes, the old lustral month of the Romans to a higher purpose. It was probably instituted by Justinian in 542. Its name of 'Candlemas' was derived from the custom of consecrating candles and marching in procession with them on that day, in remembrance of the 'light to lighten the Gentiles.' The Annunciation ‡ (Lady Day), of which St. Bernard spoke as the 'radix omnium festorum,' was instituted about the end of the 6th cent. The pagan feast of the Hilaria Matris Deum was held on the same day (25th March). The Assumption (15th, Aug.), instituted by the emperor Maurice about the beginning of the 7th cent., was introduced into the West by Charlemagne. The Nativity § (8th Sept.) was probably instituted in Italy in the 10th cent. The Presentation (21st Nov.) commemorates the dedication of Mary by her parents in her 3rd year. This festival was known in the East in 1150, but not till 1375 in the West. We have already spoken of the Conception § (Dec. 8). The Visitation § (2nd July) was instituted in 1389 to commemorate the visit of Mary to Elisabeth. It may be worth while to mention two other festivals: that of Mount Carmel, instituted in 1587 to commemorate the appearance of the Virgin to the general of the Carnielites in the year 1251, when she is said to have presented him with a scapular of the order, telling him that whoever died wearing this would escape the flames of hell. The other is the Translation of the House of Loretto, instituted in 1669 to commemorate the miraculous removal to Italy in 1294 of the house at Nazareth in which the angel appeared to Mary.

can see reasons why the continued existence and prevalence of Mariolatry should have been permitted for the hardness of men's hearts' by Divine Providence. Tenderness, gentleness, reverence, sympathy;

enthusiastic devotion to high objects; a deepened sense of the gracious dignity of motherhood; joy in all beauty, whether of art or nature, as the outward manifestation of the Supreme Beauty; a kindly natural piety breathing trust and hope;

some faint reflexion of the modest meekness, the resigned submission, the pure unruffled calm of the maiden of Nazareth,—such we might anticipate would be some of the effects of the contemplation of so noble an ideal. And such, no doubt, have been its effects in thousands of simple believers to whom Mary has been the authorized representation of the Divine goodness. But even so, there are certain qualities of mind and character, such as veracity, justice, fairness, honesty, an open eye, robust common sense, large-minded considerateness, which are liable to fall into the background, when the feminine ideal, often coloured by medieval modes of thought, bulks so large in the foreground. And if the only acceptable worship is that in spirit and in truth, must we not expect that a worship, founded in mere human invention and the capricious movements of an unchastened piety, would give proof of its unsoundness by its fruits? We shall not therefore be surprised to find that, where the sovereignty of Mary has tended to eclipse the sovereignty of God, the idea of goodness has been exchanged for that of mere weak indulgence, while the thought of the All-Holy and All-Just has been first shrunk from

His mother the whole treasury of grace, what need is there to look beyond her? The repetition of a few prayers, the offering of a few candles, even the presence of a picture of the Virgin, acts as a cost of cherm to win her fermion of the triping acts as a

D. Development in opinion is illustrated by development in art. During the first five centuries there is nothing to show that the Virgin was in any way raised above other saints. She appears simply in scenes taken from Scripture, e.g. the Annunciation, the Adoration of the Magi, the Mother and Child (of frequent occurrence after the Nestorian controversy), or possibly as a single figure in the attitude of prayer. In an Adoration dated A.D. 435, Christ is seated alone on a throne with angels above Him, while His mother occupies a subordinate position on one side near two of the Magi. The nimbus is given to Christ, the angels, and king Herod, not to Mary.* It is not till the 6th cent. that we find evidence of pre-eminent dignity ascribed to her in the painting of an Ascension, contained in a Syriac MS dated 586, where she stands in the centre of the apostles beneath the ascending figure of Christ. In this picture she, as well as our Lord and the angels, has the nimbus, but the apostles are without it. With one remarkable exception, it is not till the With one remarkable exception, it is not the the state of the apper a position formerly reserved for Christ. The exception referred to is 'the mosaic of the appe of the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria, the work of Bishop Euphrasius, A.D. 535-543. She is throned and ninbed and supported by angels, holding her Son in her lap.' The climax is reached in the 12th cent., when we find the Virgin enthroned with Christ, as His equal, in a mosaic of the Church of St. Maria in Trastevère.

Mrs. Jameson, in her Legends of the Madonna, distinguishes between representations of real or supposed historical scenes, and purely ideal or devotional paintings. Among the latter may be noted those which exhibit the Virgin as Virgo Sapientia, Sponsa Dei, the Pieta (Madonna with dead Christ), Mater Dolorosa, Regina Cæli, Mater Misericordia, in which character she is sometimes represented as endeavouring to shield mankind from the wrath of her Son.

The most famous of the ancient portraits of the Virgin was that attributed to St. Luke, which was sent to Pulcheria from Jerusalem in 438. was subsequently regarded as a kind of palladium, and accompanied the emperor to the battlefield, till the capture of Constantinople in 1453.

From what has been said, it appears that no kind of justification for the worship of Mary is to be found in the Bible, or in the theory or practice of the Early Church. Indeed the silences no less than the utterances of Scripture might seem providentially ordered so as to forbid any such development in after-ages. It may be argued, however, that there is an a posteriori justification in history.

The idolatry of the Canaanites, against which the Mosaic law was primarily directed, was the deification of cruelty and vice, a true worship of The idolatry of Greece at its best was the deification of beauty and intellect, sometimes favourable to virtue, as we may see in Herodotus, but more frequently to vice, if we may trust the witness of Plato. The worship of the Virgin is the deification of beauty and goodness. Regarding this from the historical point of view, who can dispute the immense gain to humanity of the substitution of such worship for any pre-existing idolatry? Contrasting it even with some other forms of Christianity, say with the more rigid Calvinistic school, we sort of charm to win her favour, even for the vicious and criminal.* The sense of personal responsibility, of the inexorable claims of duty, of the heinousness of sin, has been perilously weakened by the fatal error which led to the separation of the spheres of mercy and justice, assigning the former to the Madonna, the latter to her Son. The God of love, the meek and lowly Saviour, are robbed of their highest prerogatives, while the Virgin and the Saints, whose perfection on earth consisted in conforming their wills to the Divine will, are too often represented in popular Catholicism as seeking to resist and control that will. That the above view of the dangers of Mariolatry is no mere delusion of the Protestant mind, but is shared more or less by many Anglicans who claim to adopt the Catholic position, as well as by some of highest authority among Roman Catholics themselves, is shown by Pusey's Eirenicon and Letter to Newman, and by Newman's reply to the former, in which he says (p. 108), 'Now at length coming to the statements . . . which offend you in works written in her (Mary's) honour, I will frankly say that I read some of them with grief and almost anger. . . . And if I hate those perverse sayings so much, how much more must she in proportion to her love of him?' Again he says (p. 119), 'They (these statements) seem to me like a bad dream. I could not have conceived them to be said. not to what authority to go for them, to Scripture, or to the Fathers, or to the decrees of Councils, or to the consent of schools, or to the tradition of the faithful, or to the Holy See, or to reason.' he refers to Gerson, and Petavius, and others, who condemn the 'prurience of innovation,' and the frivolous and sophistical reasonings 'in which so many indulge in order to assign any sort of grace they please, however unusual, to the Blessed Virgin.' The motive of this is, according to Petavius, a kind of idolatry, lurking, as Augustine says, nay, implanted in human hearts, which is greatly abhorrent from theology, that is, from the gravity of heavenly wisdom.

MASCHIL.—See PSALMS.

MASH (#$).—A son of Aram, Gn 10²³. The parallel passage 1 Ch 1¹⁷ substitutes Meshech; the LXX in both has Μόσοχ. A name corresponding with Mash is found in Assyrian inscriptions, especially the cylinder R^m of Assurbanipal, who, in describing his Arabian campaign, says he marched through the desert of Mash, 'a place of thirst and fainting, whither comes no bird of the heaven, neither do asses nor gazelles feed there' (S. A. Smith's edition, i. pp. 67, 68). Frd. Delitzsch (Paradies, 242, 243) interprets this to mean the Syrian desert; Glaser (Skizze, ii. 419), as 'the interior of Western Arabia'; and the word, according to Delitzsch, is foreign, and means 'wilderness.'

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH. MASHAL (לֹשֶׁכ), Maaσά).—1 Ch 6⁷⁴ [Heb. ω]. See MISHAL.

MASON.—In Syria masons both hew and build. In hewing they use the different kinds of hammers mentioned under art. HAMMER. In Ezr 37, 1 Ch 221, hewers (תֹּצְכִּים) are mentioned ; the word in Arab. VS is nahātin, those who smoothed the stones. Masons use several instruments in building—the plumb line, a line wound on a reel for laying the courses of stone, a long rod of wood about 6 ft. in length, and a very curious kind of trowel. The trowel is of iron, about a foot long, fully an inch broad in the widest part, and tapers to a point; it is about half an inch thick. It is used as a lever for putting the stone exactly into its place, as well as for spreading the mortar.

The masons of Lebanon seem still to be the skilled builders of Palestine and Syria, as they were in ancient times (as we read in 2 S 5 that Hiram, king of Tyre, sent masons [אָרָשָׁ אָרָה] to David to build him a house, for they travel all over Syria, Palestine, and the Hauran, building houses for the people, and forts for the government.

MASREKAH (קּקְרָקָה, Maσέκκα). — Mentioned is connexion with the list of 'the kings that reigned over the children of Israel,' Gn 36³¹. When one of these kings, named Hadad, died, Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead (v.³²=1 Ch 1⁴⁷). The locality has not been identified. The Onomasticon defines it thus: Μαρσικά πύλις βασιλείας Έδωμ περί την Γεβαληνήν. The name στις may κερί την Γεβαληνήν. The name signify 'place of Sorek (στς) vines' (Del. on Gn J. A. Selbie.

MASSA (NGC).—Name of a son of Ishmael (Gn 25^{14} [A Mason] = 1 Ch 1^{30} [B Marason, A Mason]).— The correct translation of Pr 311, where Lemuel is described as 'king of Massa,' is due to Hitzig (Zeller's Theol. Jahrb. 1844, 269-305), and it is probable that the sense of the words following the name 'Agur' in Pr 301 is similar, though they cannot be rendered with certainty. Delitzsch (Paradies, 301) called attention to the occurrence of the name Ma-as-'a-ai immediately before Taymæans and Sabreans in a list of States which brought presents to Tiglath-pileser II. (WAI iii. 10. 1, 38), and justly identified these people with the Ishmaelite tribe. He also (ib. 302) thought there might be a reference to them in a tablet published in WAI iv. 56. 1, and further edited by G. Smith (History of Assurbanipal, 296-298), and most recently by S. A. Smith (Keilschrifttexte Asurbanipals, ii. 36-38). In that tablet a certain Nebo-sum-esir, who has been told to send the king anything that he may hear about the Arabs, states that Akamaru, son of Amme'ta of Mash (Mash-a-ai), made a raid on the people of Nebaioth, and killed all the troops except one man, who is despatched to the king to give him personal information. It is more probable that a tribe of moderate size is referred to than a vast region like MASH; and the difference in spelling between this tablet and the former may be due to the popular pronunciation which is represented in the letters (S. A. Smith, p. 38). The scene de-scribed in the tablet resembles that of Job 1¹⁷ (as Delitzsch observes), and it is probable that we have in these chapters a specimen of the famous wisdom of the 'children of the East.' From none of these passages can any data be got for the localization of Massa, and the conjectures of Hitzig (repeated by him in his comm. on Pr 30) scarcely deserve mention. See, further, art. SIMEON (TRIBE). Such portions of chs. 30 and 31 as really come from Massa are probably translated; but the first verse of ch. 30, which is unintelligible, may be partly in the original dialect. Of the proper names, Lemuel or Lemoel might be Hebrew or Arabic (compare Lishemesh, Lidzbarsky, to be old Hebrew, while Agur is uncertain. On the other hand, the names given in Nebo-sum-esir's letter are very clearly old Arabic, and he certainly implies that the 'Mesh' as 'Arabic. implies that the 'Mash-'a-ai' are Arabs.

MASSAH (1755, i.e. 'proving,' 'trial'; (ό) πειρασμός, in Dt 338 πείρα).—The name given to the place, near Rephidim, at which, according to Ex 171-7, the Israelites 'tempted' J" (i.e. in the old sense of the Israelites 'tempted' J" (i.e. in the old sense of the word, tried Him, put Him to the proof), doubting (v.²) His power to save them in their thirst, and saying (v.²) 'Is J" among us, or not?' This incident at Massah is alluded to in Dt 616 'Ye shall not "tempt" J" (put J" to the proof), as ye "tempted" Him (put Him to the proof) at Massah' (cf. Driver), 92, and Ps 958 'Harden not your heart as at Meribah, as in the day of Massah in the wilderness when your fathers tempted (i.e. tried) me ness, when your fathers tempted (i.e. tried) me, tested me, but also saw my work (sc. of judgment). In Dt 33" the name is either played upon differently, or there is an allusion to a different version of the meident at Massah: 'Thy Thummim and thy Urim be for the man, thy godly one, whom thou didst prove at Massah, with whom (or, according to others, for whom) thou contendedst at the waters of Meribah.' The words have reference to the tribe of Levi; and the idea expressed by them may be that at Massah J" either 'proved' the tribe in Mosse' person, or (Dillm.) 'proved' Mosses himself, by observing how he would behave under the provocation of the people's complaints. However, this explanation is not perfectly satisfactory; and it becomes less so when the attempt is made to adjust the Meribah clause to it: so that the opinion cannot be excluded that the allusion is to some different account of what happened at 'Massah,' according to which the fidelity of the tribe was tested directly by J". The Arabs point to a rock called Hesy el-Hatṭātīn, in the arid N.W. part of the Wady Feiran, as the one struck by Mosses at 'Massah' (Palmer, Desert of Exodus, 159). See, further, REPHIDIM.

master.—See Lord. Like the Lat. magister from which it comes, 'master' was formerly used for 'teacher,' as Mal 2½ 'The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, the master and the scholar.' Cf. He 5½ Rhem. 'For whereas you ought to be maisters for your time, you neede to be taught againe your selves what be the elements of the beginning of the wordes of God.' Especially was it used for the head of a school (as it is still in use in the rural parts of Scotland), as Goldsmith, Des. Village, 196—

'There in his noisy mansion skilled to rule, The village master taught his little school.'

The village master taught his little school.' The Gr. διδάσκαλος, teacher, is in AV rendered 'master' in 2 Mac 1½, Ja 3½, and in all its occurrences in the Gospels, except Lk 2½ cotor' (RVm 'teacher') and Jn 3½ 'teacher.' But elsewhere it is trd 'teacher' in both AV and RV (Ac 13½, Ro 2½), 1 Co 12½, Eph 4½, 1 Ti 2½, 2 Ti 1½ 4¾, He 5½). So also ½aββεί, though it is transliterated 'Rabbi' in Mt 23½, 3½ 1½ 2½ 6½, and is trd 'Lord' in Mk 10½ (after TR, but edd. mostly ½aββουνεί, whence RV 'Rabboni'), is elsewhere rendered 'master' (Mt 26½, 4½, Mk 9½ 11½ 14½, Jn 4½ 9½ 11½); RV has Rabbi throughout. See RABBI.

Mastery is four times used for mod. 'victory': Ex 32¹⁸ 'It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery'; Dn 6²¹ 'the lions had the mastery of them'; 1 Co 9²⁶ 'Every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things' (δ ἀγωνιζδμενος, RV 'that striveth in the games'); 2 Ti 2⁵ 'If a man also strive for masteries' (δθλη; RV 'contend in the games'). Cf. Milton, PL ii. 899—

"For hot cold moint and dr. four champions faces."

'For hot, cold, moist, and dry, four champions flerce Strive here for mast'ry.'

Strive here for mast'ry.'

The verb to 'master' in the sense of 'control' occurs in Wis 12¹⁸ 'But thou, mastering thy power, judgest with equity' (δεστήων Ισχύον, RV 'being sovereign over thy strength'). RV has the word in the mod. sense of 'overcome' in Ac 19¹⁶ 'the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and mastered both of them.'

MASTICK $(\sigma\chi iros, ^{\bullet}$ lentiscus).—A diœcious tree, Pistacia Lentiscus, L., of the order Anacardiaceæ, of a spreading growth, 10 to 12 ft. high and broad. The leaves are persistent, with 3 to 5 pairs of oblong lanceolate to obovate, leathery, mucronu-late leaflets, 1 to 1½ in. long, on a winged rachis. The fruits are dry, globular obovate, somewhat flattened drupes, ½th of an in. in diameter, borne on short stiff panicles. It grows in thickets, in rocky places, along the coast and on hills to a height of 2500 feet, all around the Mediterranean. The gum is obtained from incisions in the bark, made in August. The juice exudes in the form of tears, which harden into spherical, flattened or irregular, pale-yellow masses, covered with a bloom, caused by their mutual attrition. They have a mild terebinthine odour and taste. Mastick is known in Arab. by the name mistaki. It is in universal use by women and girls as a chewing-gum, partly because of its pleasant taste and the agreeable odour it gives to the breath, and its reputed virtues as a preservative to the teeth and gums, and partly for the amusement of chewing it. It is also used as a temporary stopping for cavities in the teeth. It is an astringent, used to check discharges from the mucous membranes. A sweetmeat is made of it in Chio, and forms a considerable article of export. The tree is mentioned once only, in Apocrypha (Sus 34).

MATHELAS (A Ma $\theta\eta$) has, B Mae η) has, AV Matthelas), 1 Es θ^{19} = Maaseiah, Ezr 10^{18} . The LXX forms are due to confusion of C with θ or ϵ .

MATRED (1757, Ball compares the Arab. mitrad, 'a short spear').—The mother-in-law (?) of Hadar (Gn) or Hadad (Ch), one of the kings of Edom, Gn 36²⁰ (A Ματραίθ)=1 Ch 1²⁰ (A Ματραίδ). In Gn the LXX and Pesh. make Matred the son not the daughter of Me-zahab, which is accepted by Ball, who reads 12 instead of MT nz. Kittel is not indisposed to accept the same reading in Ch, thus making Matred a masculine name.

MATRITES (τρεπ=the Matrite; B Marrapei, A Marrapei and Marrapeiτ).—A family of the tribe of Benjamin to which Saul belonged (1 S 10²¹). The readings of the LXX point rather to a form τρο (Mattarite). Klostermann would substitute 'of the family of M.' for 'the son of a Benjamite' in 1 S 9¹.

J. F. STENNING.

MATTAN (150 'a gift'; more usually, with explicit addition of the divine name, in the form Mattaniah).—1. (Ματθάν Luc., Μαγθάν Β, Μαχάν Α; in Ch Ματθάν without variation). Priest of the temple of Baal in Jerusalem during the reign of Athaliah. He lost his life with the queen, when she was deposed (2 K 11¹⁸, 2 Ch 23¹⁷). Ahab, presumably at the instigation of his Phoenician wife Jezebel, built a temple for the worship of Baal in Samaria (1 K 16³²). Their daughter Athaliah was probably founder of this temple in Jerusalem. Possibly, therefore, Mattan was not a Judæan. The name is known as Phoenician (Gesenius, HWB)¹⁸).

2. (Naθάν B, Maθθάν Q^{mg}). Named only as the father of Shephatiah, a contemporary of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 38¹). W. B. STEVENSON.

MATTANAH (πρφ; LXX Marθaracir B, -rir A, -rer F*; Eus. Maθθareμ).—A station mentioned only Nu 21¹⁸⁻¹⁹. It was on the route from the Arnon to the Plains of Moab, and would therefore be to the E. of the Dead Sea and N. of the Arnon. No satisfactory identification has been made; but if the position assigned to it by Eusebius (Onom. p. 169 and p. 274, ed. Lagarde), 12 Roman miles to the E. of Medeba, be correct, the course taken by the Israelites must have been farther to the E. than is generally supposed.*

MATTATHIAS (Marrablas), the equivalent of the Heb. Mattithiah (כְּתְּהֶהוּ כְתְּהֶהוּ). 1. AV Matthias, a Jew, who had married a foreign wife in the days of Ezra (1 Es 93). In Ezr 103 the name is given as Mattattah, AV Mattathah (1982). See GENEA-LOGY. 2. One of the men who stood at the right hand of Ezra during the reading of the law (1 Es); in Neh 84 Mattithiah. See GENEALOGY. The father of the five Maccabæan brothers (1 Mac 21. 14. 16. 18. 14. 17. 18. 48. 49 14.19). See MACCABEES. 4. The son of Absalom, a captain in the army of Jonathan the Maccabean, who, together with Judas the son of Chalpi, stood by his commander during the flight of the Jews at the battle of Hazor, and helped to turn the fortunes of the day (1 Mac 11^m).

5. A son of Simon the high priest, who was murdered, together with his father and brother Judas, at a banquet at Dok, by Ptolemy the son of Abubus (1 Mac 16¹⁴⁻¹⁶). 6. One of three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas Maccabæus when he invaded Palestine in B.C. 161 (2 Mac 14¹⁹). Negotiations on the part of Nicanor are mentioned also in 1 Mac 7²⁷⁻³¹, but it is there stated that they were immediately broken off by Judas, who discovered that they were only a treacherous device for getting possession of his person. 7. The son of Amos in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk 3-). 8. The son of Semein (AV Semei) in the same genealogy (Lk 3.6). H. A. WHITE.

MATTENAI (125).—1. 2. Two of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10²⁸ (B Μαθανιά, A Μαθαναί, called in 1 Es 9²⁸ Mattanneus), v. ²⁷ (B Μαθανάν, A Μαθθαναί, combined in 1 Es 9²⁴ with the preceding Mattaniah into Mamnitanemus). 3. Chaucer, Persones Tale, § 8, 'But for your sinne ye been woxen thral and foul, and members of the feend, hate of aungels, sclaundre of holy chirche, and fode of the false serpent, perpetuel matere of the fyr of helle'; and Bacon's Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 57), 'The surest way to prevent Seditions, (if the Times doe beare it.) is to take away the Matter of them. For if there be Fuell prepared, it is hard to tell, whence the Spark shall come, that shall set it on fire.' In Ja 3's the same Gr. word (ελη) is tr4 'matter,' 'Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth,' but it is clear from previous versions that the Eng. word means here 'affair.' Coverdale's tr. is 'Beholde how great a thinge a lyttell fyre kyndleth'; the Gen. Bible has the same with 'matter' in the marg., and the Bishops place 'matter' in the text. RV renders 'Behold, how much wood is kindled by how small a fire!' marg. 'how great a forest is kindled'; this is very near Wyclif's 'Lo! hou miche fijr kyndlith hou greete a wode,' after Vulg. Ecce quantus ignis quan magnam sylvam incendit.

For the phrase 'Make matter' see under MAKE; and add this illustration from Tindale (Works, i. 169), 'Let this little flock be bold therefore: for if God be on our side, what matter maketh it who be against us?'

MATTHAN (Mαθθάν). — Grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary, Mt 1¹⁵, perhaps to be identified with Matthat, who occupies the same place in St. Luke's genealogy of our Lord (Lk 3²⁴).

MATTHANIAS.—1. (Α Ματθανίας, Β Ματάν), 1 Εα 9^{27} = ΜΑΤΤΑΝΙΑΗ, Ezr 10^{26} . 2. (Α Ματθανίας, Β Βεσκασπασμώς, Α V Mathanias), 1 Es 9^{31} = ΜΑΤΤΑΝΙΑΗ, Ezr 10^{20} .

MATTHAT (Mαθθάτ).—1. Grandfather of Joseph the husband of Mary, Lk 3²⁴, perhaps to be identified with Matthan, who occupies the same place in St. Matthew's genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1¹⁸). 2. Another ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3²⁶.

MATTHEW, APOSTLE (Mattaios, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. WH; $Mar\theta a \hat{i}$ or TR).—Matthew's place in the Apostolic list is not quite constant, varying between seventh and eighth, and so affecting the station assigned to Thomas (in the Synoptics; in Ac 113 Bartholomew). His position in Mk, Mt, and Lk, viz. seventh, must give his standing in the original apostolic circle, as reflected in St. Peter's original apostolic circle, as renected in St. Peter's mind. He is called in Mt 10³ 'the customs-officer' (δ τελώνης), and is thus identified with the Matthew of 9⁹ (cf. Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷), called while sitting 'at the toll-office' near Capernaum, on the Great West Road from Damascus to the Mediterranean. St. Mark styles this servant of the tetrarch Herod, 'Levi the son of Alphæus'; but that does not bar the identification. For there is analogy for even the identification. For there is analogy for even two Hebraic names, both outside (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, Ίωσηφ ὁ και Καϊάφας) and within the apostolic circle. And it is likely that, as with Simon Cephas, Matthew was the later name, given after his call. This fits its probable meaning, 'Jehovah's Matthew, then, was the name by which this apostle became known in Christian circles; and by it even St. Mark indicates him in his official list, while giving his call with strict historic fidelity. So Thomas is 'Judas Thomas' in Acta Thoma; and Bartholomew was perhaps Nathanael's usual Christian name. On the forms and meaning of the name Matthew see, further, Dalman, p. 142. Several things seem implied in this call of Several things seem implied in this call of Matthew. He must already have been familiar with Jesus and His gospel as preached in Capernaum (for there is no sign that he, like the first six apostles, had been an adherent of the Baptist); and the feast which he gave in honour of Jesus (Mk 2^{14ff}.) probably marked the new relationship. Finally, while we cannot date his call with pre-cision, Pharisaic suspicion was already awake; so that his call and consequent experience of his Master's ministry can hardly go back to the very earliest days (this bears on the next art.).

The only other facts related of Matthew on good authority concern him as evangelist. Eusebius (HE iii. 24) says that he, like John, wrote only Eusebius under the stress of necessity. 'For Matthew, after preaching to Hebrews, when about to go also to others, committed to writing in his native tongue the Gospel that bears his name; and so by his writing supplied, to those whom he was leaving, the loss of his presence.' The value of this tradition can be decided only after considering the Gospel itself. No historical use can be made of the artificial story in Sanhedr. 43s, that Matthew was condemned to death by a Jewish court (see Laible, Christ in the Talmud, ed. Stream, 71 ff.); especially in face of Heracleon's explicit denial of martyrdom in his case (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9). ences to him in apocryphal sources are specially doubtful on account of the easy confusion between Matthew and Matthias, to whom gnostic Paradoseis were attributed (e.g. Clem. Pæd. ii. 16). See, further, the following article.

i. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE OF AUTHORSHIP, ETC. -Referring the reader to the article GOSPELS for the outlines of the Synoptic problem, we have here to investigate the specific features and origin of the Gospel which bears the name of Matthew. Even were the title in our oldest authorities, 'According to Matthew' (κατά Μαθθαΐον), to be held original, it need not imply more than that this written Gospel contains the substance of the oral Gospel as taught by Matthew. Nor is the matter carried much further by the words of Papias (Eus. HE iii. 39), that Matthew, then, in Hebrew speech compiled the Logia; while they were interpreted by each man according to his ability.' For (1) it may be taken as proved that our Mt is not a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic; (2) it is improbable that the Logia or 'Oracles' of the Lord, giving all due latitude to the term logion, included anything like as much narrative as does our Mt; (3) tradition is apt to transform indirect into direct authorship. Matthew's connexion, then, even with the first collection of Christ's sayings (Logia) may have been simply that of their guarantor in the region in which they were reduced to writing, just as Mark's Gospel might have been called 'according to Peter,' or 'Peter's memoirs' (ἀπομνημονεύματα) to use the actual words of Justin. If it was a disciple of Matthew, corresponding to John Mark, who actually redacted the oral instruction in question, it would best fit what we know of the literary habits of the first generation; and the difference would be little more than formal.

The external evidence as to a written Gospel by Matthew resolves itself into the witness of Papias (c. 110-125); * for upon him later writers depend for all save traditions too vague to be trusted in Various views, however, are taken neaning. The only safe mode of such a case. of Papias' meaning. approach is through a careful study of his motive in referring to Matthew at all. Eusebius, to whom we owe our quotations, begins by saying that Papias compiled five books of 'Exposition of Savings of the Lord' (λογίων Κυριακῶν έξηγήσεως). He then challenges Irenæus' statement that Papias had been a hearer of John the apostle; and to prove his point quotes Papias' preface to his work. From this we gather that, in order to vouch for the truth of his expositions of the above Sayings (διαβεβαιούμενος ὑπερ αὐτῶν ἀλήθειαν), he subjoined to his own interpretations (ταῖς ἐρμηνείαις) a number of primitive traditions, carefully gathered from the Elders, and of which he had taken special note (δσα ποτέ παρά τῶν πρεσβυτέρων [i.e. men of the former, here the first, generation] καλῶς ξμαθον κ. καλῶς ξμνημόνευσα). He was anxious, that is, to show that his views of the Gospel, unlike those of many who were glib in giving their opinions on the subject, were formed under the influence of first-hand traditions, running back, as he believed, to the Lord Himself. These, moreover, were supplemented by the best sort of second-hand inquiry, made of companions of the first witnesses, i.e. certain apostles now dead, but also of two apostolic men, Aristion and John the Elder, personal disciples of the Lord still alive in his youth. From these sources he had got his best understanding of the Lord's deep sayings, namely, from oral tradition continued in living men, and not from books (i.e. probably written gospels, rather than

His whole interest, then, is in the true interpretation of certain sayings of the Lord, embodying the genuine Gospel. But he wishes also to make clear to his readers the source whence came the Logia or Sayings themselves on which he commented.† He has found, he seems to say, Matthew's collection of these Logia preferable to any other. For as an ordered body (σύνταξις) of the Lord's Sayings,—with which alone his comments had to do,—Mark's Gospel was not its equal. But, after all, Matthew had compiled these Sayings in Aramaic before Papias' own day; and at that time each man had had to interpret them as best he could, i.e. for the most part without the rare advantages to which l'apias could appeal in his own case.; In a word, his call to write his 'Expositions' lay in the absence of any written body

* A later date for Papias' work is too readily assumed. Eusebius (//Εiii. 87) reckons him in 'the first line of succession (διαδοχήν) from the apostles,' through whose writings the tradition of apostolic teaching lived on. He then names ignatius and Clement as cases, and proceeds at once to Papias. The next book opens with Trajan's latter years, later than which Eusedos not seem to place Papias' work; while Polycarp he names after Justin. after Justin.

† Euseb. does not necessarily give us the extracts in the order in which they came in Papias' preface. The statement, 'M., then, in Hebrew speech compiled the Logia: but as for their interpretation, each did as best he could,' may well have led up to the reference to his own 'interpretations.'

of authorized interpretations of the Logia in detail (avrd). So had it been at first, so was it still; while the need, in an age of wild speculation, was greater than ever.

Zahn and others find Papias' emphasis to lie on the Semitic form of Matthew's work. But then we should expect this to be brought out by a contrast, 'in Greek,' in the antithetical clause in the shence the quotation seems motived by Papias' main idea of right 'interpretation' (ἡρμἡνευσε follows immediately on συνεγράψατο). Further, for Papias' use of 'interpret,' his reference to his own 'interpretations' (ἡρμἡνευσε) outweighs his use of ἡρμῆνευτής in another context, where he is citing another's words. Finally, according to Zahn's view, Papias should go no to say λουν a Greek edition of the Aramaic Mt finally arose. But, to judge by Eus.'s allence, he did nothing of the kind. He knew a Greek Mt; he knew of Aramaic Logia current in Matthew's name; and he assumed the Greek Gospel to be a version of an original Aramaic writing by the apostle.

Thus, according to Papias' own personal belief, Matthew had indeed written down the Logia. But he had left no written interpretation of their meaning. The result was a divergence of views as to the Lord's teachings which l'apias deplores, and which he seeks to rectify by aid of traditions which had reached him from Matthew and other disciples of the Lord.

So far, then, external evidence to the connexion of Matthew with our Greek Gospel is slender. Papias implies, no doubt, that the apostle wrote, and that in Aramaic. But what he is asserting is neither the one nor the other, but rather the fact that the Matthæan Logia were at first left to chance interpretation. As to Papias' implication that Matthew actually wrote out in Aramaic the Savings of the Lord, its worth is doubtful. Against it stands the weighty witness of St. Luke (1ⁱⁿ), who seems to know of no narrative of the matters on which Christian faith had assured hold drawn up by an eye-witness. The force of this can hardly be turned by saying that his word διήγησις suggests narrative, rather than a collection of Sayings.* To say the least, St. Luke would surely have constructed his careful paragraph otherwise had he known of-much more intended to use-a writing by an apostle embodying Christ's own sayings.

The strange divergence of the Logian elements in Mt and Lk The strange divergence of the Logian elements in Mt and Lk respectively seems inconsistent with a common written basis. Thus, if one still suspects positive tradition to lie behind Papias' reference to Matthew as having written the Logia, it must be conceded that Lk at least had not access to it. And even as to our Mt, it seems easier to suppose that it incorporates the composite catechesis of a locality, than that it blends so much pure local tradition with the written Logia of Matthew (see iii. (2) etc. below). The meagreness of the historic setting of the Logia common to Mt and Lk may be gauged from Mt 113.35=Lk 718-35 1033-36. 22

Before leaving St. Luke, however, one may remark that he also uses much matter which, as found also in Mt, may well go back to the Apostle Matthew in some form; only, he seems to have found it for the most part already in its present historical setting (e.g. in I.k 9⁵¹-18¹⁴). This setting differs widely from that in which the like sayings occur in Mt. But no early work, such as Luke's 'special source,' would have departed far from a setting provided in an apostle's work. Hence the Apostle Matthew did not give the Logia such a setting: and it has to be seen whether even the Logia themselves as used by our first evangelist owed their exact form to an apostle at all, rather than to oral tradition starting from Matthew's teaching. For that Matthew had some hand in shaping the Logia in question seems certain from the mere fact that to him, quite an obscure apostle, tradition uniformly and in all circles assigns our first Gospel. On the other hand, the variety of Gospels which in the 2nd cent. claimed to represent the Apostle Matthew—our Mt and the two forms of the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews' -- along with the lack of any trace of a common Matthæan document in Aramaic or Greek, suggests that all that really belonged to the apostle was a type of oral teaching. In that case our Mt would be related to the apostle much as Mk is related to St. Peter; and the difference in their titles may simply mean that Mark was a wellknown apostolic disciple, whereas the name of the author of the Matthean Gospel was early forgotten. Then posterity, fixing instead on the ultimate source of its tradition, would call the work ' κατά Μαθθαϊον.'

(a) OT Quotations.—In this inquiry welcome aid would seem to offer itself in the phenomena of biblical quotation. This has two aspects—a formal and a material. The formal relates to the text used, whether Hebrew or Greek (or even that of the vernacular paraphrase or Targum accompanying the reading of the Hebrew OT in the synagogue); and, if Greek, to the local variety of LXX text implied. The material aspect concerns the mode of thought reflected in the formula of citation, and the degree to which the evangelist's purpose shines through his use of the words or even modifies what he remembers and writes.†

Formally, then, the quotations in passages peculiar to Mt diverge from the LXX far more than those in parts common to it with Mk or Lk or both. This is specially the case with quotations introduced by the evangelist himself in comments signalizing 'fulfilment' $(\pi\lambda\eta\rho\omega\theta\hat{\eta}\nu\alpha\iota)$ of prophecy. These are ten in number $(1^{23}\ 2^{15}\ 18\ 25\ 4^{156}\ 8^{17}\ 12^{18-21}$ 1385 215 279.); and of the words composing the citations nearly half do not occur in the LXX equivalents. The significance of this is indubitable, when we observe that in nineteen quotations common to Mt with at least one Synoptic, less than a sixth of the words diverge from the LXX. In other words, the homogeneity of our Mt, and so any claim to be a simple version of an Aramaic Mt. is at once disproved.

(b) Chapters 1-2.—Zahn maintains that the first verse of Mt is a title for the whole book, arguing that βίβλος γενέσεως cannot linguistically and by LXX usage mean 'genealogy' or even 'nativity,' but only 'history' or 'career.' But as Irenæus evidently thought otherwise (adv. Hær. III. xi. 11, cf. frag. 27, ap. Harvey, ii. 493, Dial. Tim. et Aq. [see below, p. 303], where γενέσεις = γενεαλογίας, fol. $93 r_0$ et v^0), one has only to prove the fitness of an introductory section, to which $v.^1$ may serve as opening. Thus it might refer to the nativity (cf. Lk 114) and its attendant circumstances, including the antecedents of the seed royal, arranged so as to indicate three great moments in Israel's fortunes climax in David, anti-climax in the Exile, and the moment of restored Davidic glory in Messiah. This would be paralleled, not only in the three prefatory chapters of Hosea, especially in the LXX (12 ἀρχη λόγου Κυρίου ἐν Ἱασῆε . . . 4¹ ἀκούσατε λόγον Κυρίου, viol Ἰσραήλ), but also in Mk 1¹, taken as the first verse of a prefatory account of the Forerunner's ministry

*The idea that this in either form was an enlarged edition of the 'Ur-Matthäus' rests only on the assumption that the Apostle Matthew was a Judater—an assumption improbable in the case of any of the primitive apostles, who saw the Gospel in its continuity with the prophets.

† In this section, as in some others, the 'Statistics and Observations' collected with scholarly care by Rev. Str J. C. Hawkins, in his Hora Synoptica (1899), have been of great service.

(cf. Hosea, above). Further, since 1¹⁸, 'Now the birth (γένεσιs) of the Christ* was on this wise,' seems to follow closely on the last clause of 1¹⁷, 'until the Christ, fourteen generations,' and 1¹⁷ sums up the gist of 1²⁻¹⁶, the whole of ch. 1 might easily be subsumed under 1¹. But it is better to take βίβλος γενίσεως as 'birth-roll,' and see in 1¹⁸ a fresh section; so also with ch. 2, which sets forth certain prophesied corollaries of the birth of Messiah (on the genealogy itself see below (\hbar), n. 302).

(c) The Sources.—(1) The Logia.—Here two things must be borne in mind. In early days the tradition of Jesus' Sayings 'did not remain merely personal reminiscence and communication, but served the Church as law and doctrine, and was accordingly put into the form of didactic pieces.' Again, this was done in a spirit and amid associations that prevented the rise of a binding letter':
and hence we must be ready to recognize among the Logia, along with the voice of the Church's Lord, echoes awakened in the Church's experience. These conditions have been stated, and applied to the forms in which the Logia meet us in Mt and Lk respectively, by Weizsäcker in particular, in his Apostolic Age (Eng. tr. ii. 32 ff.); and his views are largely utilized in what follows. The difference in style and standpoint between the Logia groups in Mt and Lk is due to the differing history of the Logian tradition in the apostolic Church. The preoccupation amid which our Mt's type of Logia took proximate shape was 'the secession of the Church from Judaism and its authorities. Thus did Jesus Himself oppose the Pharisaism and the scribes of His time.' So, too, the main lines of our first Gospel reflect the practical wants of the early days—the doctrines of righteousness, the disciples' vocation, the kingdom of God, the duties of the society, the false system of the Jews and Pharisees, the future of the kingdom of God.' These answer to chs. 5-7. 10. 13. 18. 23-25, sections in which the unity of the parts is didactic rather than historical, kindred matter having gravitated to each considerable nucleus by the exigencies of memoriter instruction. That our evangelist was already familiar with these sections as more or less connected wholes, is probable from the formula which he appends to each of them: καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους (728 191 261), οτ τὰς παραβολὰς τεύτας (1338), οτ διατάσσων τοῖς δώβεκα μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ (111). We take, then, these didactic sections of our Mt in order.

(a) The Sermon on the Mount, Mt 5-7.—Weizsacker subjects this sermon, 'a kind of catechism' set in the forefront of this Gospel, to an analysis which reveals its true nature as 'a kind of code, such as originated in and was designed for the Church. This transformation of Christ's teaching into forms adapted to the religious use of disciples was inevitable so long as the evangelic tradition was a matter of catechesis, with a view to edification. Indeed this fact witnesses to its vital hold on Christians at a time when the Spirit was every-thing and the letter little thought of, and so when fresh applications of a principle laid down by the Master could not in oral teaching be kept apart from the germinal saying which had given them birth in the Church's mind. The question, then, is here not so much one of the Lord's ipsissima verba, lying behind the Logia used in our Gospel, as touching the nucleus of a sermon formed out of such Logia which Mt expands.

Weizsäcker makes it consist of three sections originally independent, as is seen from Lk: viz. the new Christian law in contrast to the existent legal usage of the scribes (581-48); Christ's estimate of the plous usages then in honour (alma, prayers, flastings); and His reformation of them (61-18) and His exposition of the higher life in contrast to division of heart and care for the worldly life (613-14). Secondary to these, even as combined, he regards not only ch. 7—an appendix of seven short sections supplementing and partly repeating the foregoing (119, with its 'faise prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing,' being clearly a late touch)—but also the twofold introduction in 5-12-18-18. Now, that 513-18 is out of place one may justly infer from Lk 1424. Size 1125. But Lk also makes the Sermon open with beatitudes, though less than half Mt's number (which seems filled out with OT phrases), and otherwise contradicts Welzsäcker's analysis. For this among other reasons, the reconstruction of the Logian Sermon favoured by Weiss and Wendt (with some divergences) is to be preferred. Yet even so, one must not assume that the Sermon was known to Mt and Lk in the same reconsion. Thus, while it is probable that Lk's four beatitudes (apart from the parallel woes, a secondary feature) best represent the original apostolic Logian tradition (not necessarily as Matthew taught it), it is clear that Luke knew the Lord's Prayer in another form from Mt's, and that not as part of the Sermon at all.

Allowing, then, for the different history of the Logian tradition before it reached our Mt or Luke, we may regard the following as 'Matthæan' in substance:—Four beatitudes parallel to Lk (52.4.6.111); four revised readings of Mosaic morality as understood by the scribes—about murder, adultery, retaliation, hatred of enemies (52.2.2. (24).27.28-0.45-05); three corrections of the Jewish ideal of piety—alms, prayer, fasting (61-18); four dangers of the higher life—earthly-mindedness, insincerity, a divided heart, carefulness for things bodily—the remedy being absorption in the Father's kingdom (619-34); t some more miscellaneous counsels (71-27). These last, most of all, owe their combination to our evangelist, as they repeat a good deal; and in one case (712), the Golden Rule of duty towards one's neighbour, a verse comes more naturally in Lk (611), earlier in the Sermon. Yet the words on criticism and self-criticism (71-2), Lk 685.41, on fruit as the test of goodness (710-21), Lk 685.41, and the similitude which clinches the whole Sermon (724-21, Lk 645-46), and the similitude which clinches the whole Sermon for it really to have been spoken at one time: it expects far more of men's hearing capacity than Jesus ever demanded. But it may stand as representing the Matthæan didactic catechism for the citizen of the Father's kingdom, and as suggesting the processes of further accretion in later use, and of final compilation, which lie between it and Mt 5-7.

(8) The Disciple Discourse, ch. 10.—The action of local Church usage upon the tradition is also implied in the specific disciple-discourse. This in practical use must early have lost much of its original restrictions, as intended for the guidance of the Twelve in their first preaching by the side of their Master's own ministry (cf. Mk 313-13). Thus in Lk it refers to the conduct of a large circle of disciples who assisted Jesus in a similar way; and in either form it doubtless embodies rules taught in the churches for the guidance of all who acted as missionaries ('apostles' in the larger sense, for which 'evangelists' became a synonym). The words in Mt 1023 cannot have been used of the original temporary mission: 'When they persecute you in the one city, fiee to the other: for verily I say to you, ye shall not finish the cities of Israel before the Son of Man come.' This must rather represent an early stage

^{*} The diverse orders, 'Jesus Christ' (NCEKL al, Pap. Oxyr. (sec. iii.) ægypt. syr. sw. arm. æth. Or.) and 'Christ Jesus' (B), point to the originality of 'the Christ' (D 71, it. vg. syr. se. cm. lren.); cf. 1178.

^{*} Each of these sections admits of further analysis: note particularly the change from 'ye' to 'thou' (? of catechesis) in each case. We cannot, of course, by such rough tests distinguish the teaching as original and derivative. But certainly the Lord's Prayer did not come originally in the Sermon (see Lk 11^{11.5}). The backbone of Mt's form of this section consists of 61.5.18.

of the Church's echoed counsels to the Messianic missionaries in general, on the lines laid down by Jesus for His first disciples. Weizsäcker sees in Mt 10⁸⁻¹³⁽¹⁶⁾ the original tradition as to the apostolic mission, once current as an independent piece (cf. Mk 6⁷⁻¹³, Lk 9¹⁻⁶ 10²⁻¹¹), and here given in a form retaining the restricted scope of Christ's own earthly ministry—the form in which the Matthæan Logia were current in our evangelist's region. secondary formation follows in the section on persecution, which reflects the experience of the Apostolic age at least as late as St. Paul's trials before Roman courts at Cæsarea. Its originally detuched character is shown by its appearing in the eschatological discourse in Mk 139ff., Lk 2112ff., where Mt faintly echoes Mk. Here, however, Mt seems independent of Mk's form, having points in common with Lk's 'doublet' (12^{11t}), and being the more original in its basis (apart from the evangelist's own colouring). These two sections Weizsacker calls 'the fundamental law for the mission-ary activity of the Church.' He adds that they were naturally extended by analogous sayings, like Mt 1024-42 (many of which are clearly misplaced, see Lk 125-9.51-35 1425-27), either by Mt or in the traditional form under which he was wont to teach the Matthæan Logia.

(γ) The Parables of ch. 13.—As to these parables, where Mt's love of the number seven (cf. the double sevens of the genealogy) attracts our attention, it appears that all three evangelists possessed collections of parables, beginning with the fundamental parable, the Sower. To this main parable there were two types of sequel: one as in Mk and Lk, where it is combined with the simile of the Lamp, whereby Jesus explained to the disciples (in the actual course of events) the function of parable as a test of hearers' receptivity; the other, parable as a test of head of the state of th parables more or less related in thought. appear to come from different sources. The pendent parable (to the Sower) of the Wheat and Tares has a peculiar opening, ωνοιώθη ἡ βασ., which recurs in parables in 1823 222, and may point to the three having been once a didactic whole, representing a late stage of Logian teaching. On the other hand, the remaining five begin with όμοια έστιν ή βασ., probably the usual opening in parabolic collections.*

Weizsäcker's 'reflexions' deserve attention. Viewing the Wheat and Tares as a later supplement to the Sower, he says; 'From the very nature of this form of instruction, the discussion of one parable leads naturally to the invention of others; interpretations develop into fresh parabolic material.' Thus this parable reflects 'an experience from the life of the Church,' which may be the case also with the Drag-net and some others. But 'in any case the collection gives us an insight, not only into the way in which the tradition operated, but also into the method of editing passages for definite didactic purposes.' Its object is to set forth not so much distinct commands, as 'the fruits of the teaching received, the perfection and divine nature of the cause.' It is, in any case, characteristic of Mt's standpoint that his first special parables—the Tares and the Leavencarry us involuntarily into the primitive Church. They found their most direct use in the relations of that Church to the nation.'

(8) The Discourse in ch. 18.—In the discourse on e 'little ones' and fraternal treatment of all thè brethren, even the least, Weizsäcker thinks 1865. is an organic unity. 'The whole refers to the conduct of the disciples to each other: the sayings teach the nature of their communion,' even if some took shape rather later than others. It seems a proof of the general justice of these remarks that

*Weizsäcker thinks δλλην παραβολήν (18^{24, 51, 53}) and πάλιν (45, 47) original parts of special collections. But they rather show Mt's compiling hand. He also thinks that the reflexions in 18²⁴², coming in the middle of things, must be due to a source used. But against this must be set Mt's favourite formula in ν.²⁶³. He inserts them from Mk and practically where Mk has them. Then he returns to explain the Wheat and Tarcs, and adds other parables.

the parable of the Lost Sheep, which Lk gives as an apology for Jesus' own attitude to outcasts, came to Mt as a lesson for believers, in relation apparently to converts from among such 'little ones' of society. It had lost its original application and gained another in the Church's life. Moreover, already in 1856 Mt has made humility the note of the kingdom, in place of the spirit which thinks of 'greater' and 'lesser' among brethren. Each must be ready to sink all 'superiority,' to receive even a young child on the ground of Christ's name, and to avoid wounding the feelings of the humblest believer—one of no more account than a child (cf. Mk 9⁴¹.). Hence, however much our Mt may be influenced in the wording of 18^{1-3, 6, 27}. by Mk 9^{33-37, 69, 47}, yet his mind is already filled with a Logian piece of didactic which asserts itself both in idea and in phrasing, as well as in 18th as a whole: 'The intention of its original form' shines through; and 'the apostles are thought of as patterns for the Church.'

(e) The later Parables.—Similarly the three parables of 21.22.2214, centring in that of the Vineyard common to the Synoptics, define the Church's relations to Judaism. In the first two of these parables we get the phrase ή βασ. τοῦ θεοῦ, so rare in Mt, and perhaps a mark of the later stratum in its Logia.

In 12⁵⁰⁰ the phrase may be due to parallelism with iν πνεύματι θεοῦ in 2⁵⁰; and in 16⁵⁰ it seems to come from Mk 1.5⁵⁰. In 21^{51, 45}, however, we can only suppose that this Hellenistic or un-Hebraic expression (so Dalman, Die Worte Jew. 150) marks the secondary, rather than Matthean, element in the tradition reflected in Mt, to whose own usage η βασ. τῶν οὐρανῶν can by no means be exclusively traced.

The parable of the Marriage Feast is partly paralleled by Lk 14¹⁵⁻²⁴, and is an old Logian element which has undergone change in two lines of tradition. Mt seems to have it in a late form; for it has gained an appendix, on the Weddinggarment and the fewness of those who respond and are elect. And even the part parallel to Lk adds the feature of insult and death visited on the king's messengers, resulting in vengeance on the murderers and their city-surely an echo of the experiences and expectations of the later apostolic age, though not necessarily after, rather than just before A.D. 70 (cf. Mk 129.10, Lk 2016-18, Mt 2141-44 for the like as already foretold in prophecy). We shall return to the subject in discussing Mt's date. Meantime this impression of the absolute rejection of the national religious system is confirmed by the great anti-Pharisaic discourse in ch. 23-an excellent case of didactic compilation, the bulk at least of which our Mt found ready to his hand, though the seven distinct Woes may betray his schematism. We must now turn aside, for the moment, to consider the other chief factor of Mt, the narrative sections parallel to Mk.

(2) Mt's relation to Mk.—To begin with a simple case, namely one which involves no other connected source like the Logia, Christ's walking on the sea may be taken (Mt 14²²⁶, Mk 6⁴⁵⁶). Here we observe slight omissions—a0700 (followed by addition of αὐτόν), τὸ πέραν πρὸς Βηθσαιδάν, αὐτός; insertionsκατ' iδίαν, μαθηταί (to compensate for αυτούς in a clause omitted), ἀπὸ τοῦ φόβου ἔκραξαν in place of ἀνέπραξαν, [ό 'Ιησοῦς]; use of favourite forms of a word—τοὺς ἄχλους for τὸν ἄχλου, ἀνέβη for ἀπήλθεν; changes in construction—i.e. έως οδ ἀπολύση for έως . . . ἀπολύει, ὑπό τ. κυμάτων for ἐν τῷ ἐλαύνειν, τετάρτη φυλακή for περί τετ. φυλακήν, ήλθεν for έρχεται, περιπατών έπί τήν (cf. 29, only Mt) for έπί τής, λέγων for w. Aéyei—sometimes involving transposition of a word, like εταράχθησαν (λέγοντες, κ.τ.λ.) in 36; paraphrase-ήδη σταδίους πολλούς ἀπό γης ἀπείχεν for to μέσφ τ. θαλάσσης; omission of a clause—κ. ήθελεν παρελθεῖν αὐτούς, Μκ θ⁴⁸ο, πάντες γὰρ αὐτὸν είδον, ⁵⁰α. In the general result Mt's Greek is smoother

changes appear for the most part involuntary, due to memoriter rewriting of section by section after perusal, rather than to line for line copying.* This less mechanical conception of the process by which Mk passes into Mt is not only most likely, but helps to explain much elsewhere. In fact it secures the advantages claimed for the purely oral theory, without sacrificing what gives to the documentary theory its strength. The section affords other lessons. Peter's walking on the Peter's walking on the water (28-31) is an insertion from tradition,† and points to a factor which must be reckoned with throughout, e.g. in 2762-66 2811-15, as also in relation to the parables peculiar to Mt. And, finally, the description of the effect upon the disciples' minds is put in a different form from Mk-one reflecting less upon their slowness of heart and pointing more directly the moral of this Gospel (v. 23, cf. 16¹⁶ 27⁵⁴). The phrase full of adoration, 'Truly thou art Son of God,' is here anachronistic in view of 16¹⁵⁶, Mk 8²⁹. These various points might be illustrated from the next few sections. But space forbids: and so we turn to apply our principles to the parts where Logia and Mk may be thought to

(d) Setting of the Sermon on the Mount.—Mt 422-51 is crucial for the evangelist's methods. Is his relation to Mk here determined by other narrative material, oral or written, or simply by his own plan for the use of his didactic or Logian matter?

Historically arbitrary as the latter hypothesis would argue Mt's eclectic use of Mk to be, it is yet probably correct. For in fact all close study of Mt shows its historic interest to be quite subordinate to the interpretative, the setting forth in orderly fashion of the salient features of Messiah's activity and teaching. Here, then, Mt's prime care is to find a fit point of contact with the traditional narrative—of which Mk is the form before him-for the general Sermon on the kingdom. As it stood in the forefront of the Logian tradition, so should it stand in a full written Gospel as Mt conceived it. Starting from Mk 1²² (Mt 728.), he readapted Mk 313, where Jesus 'ascends the mountain' in order to associate with Himself an inner circle of disciples; assuming that such a call would imply a prior formal exposition of the nature of the new kingdom. And so far he may have followed tradition—a tradition, too, which knew of a discourse on a mountain. But, this identification once adopted, Mt carried out his use of Mk with great freedom.

The whole of Mk 8¹³ influences Mt 5¹. Not only does Jesus ascend 'the mountain,' though no special locality is in question; but the reference to disciples as coming to Him creates some obscurity touching the persons addressed in the Sermon. Mt has just referred to 'the crowds'; and at the end we hear of its effect, not on disciples, but on these same crowds. Hence, apart from the form in which the Sermon is cast (perhaps mainly that of current Logian catechesis; contrast Lk 6²⁰, where the disciples are first addressed, and then hearers in general. ²⁷), we have the blending of Mk's context with that which Mt has just created for himself. For with the hint supplied by Mt 5¹ in relation to Mk 8¹³, we can hardly fall to see in Mt 4²⁰ a mosaic of Marcan situations and expressions, generalized in order to set forth the earlier activity of Jesus in word and deed—the presupposition of 'the crowds' present at the Sermon. Similarly, the call of disciples had been hinted at by the typical cases borrowed from Mk in ¹⁸⁻²². The artificial nature of ⁸⁶⁶ is clear from the fact that no little lapse of time is implied in the going forth of Jesus' fune 'into the whole of Syria' and the gathering of crowds from Decapolis and Judea and beyond Jordan—features natural in Mk's later context (8', Lk &'1'), but not in Mt, if it were meant to be chronological. Similarly 4²⁹ is based on Mk 1²⁶ 6²⁶, with 1²⁵ for starting-point (just as 1²² is used at the end of the Sermon in 7²⁰); and 9²⁶ repeats the borrowing when Mt gets really parallel to Mk 6²⁶.

The fact that both in 423 and 24 there are echoes of more than one passage in Mk, suggests that our Mt was so familiar with the latter as to combine his phrases in memory without a full sense of their actual position in Mk's narrative. And this is confirmed by the fact that these verses appear quite in Mt's style. But in any case Mt's generalizing use of Mk seems clear (so 816 1530.81). and is illustrated by our next paragraph.

(e) Artificial grouping in 8-9.—In 5-7 Mt has been drawing on his prime Logian source. In 725 he returns to Mk (122) with εξεπλήσσοντο (οί ύχλοι) έπι τη διδαχή αὐτοῦ. Ϋν γάρ διβάσκων αὐτοὺς ὡς thus draws attention to the authority of Jesus' manner of teaching, and then proceeds to show how this Messianic mien extended to His action and attitude towards men. In fact the series of works and words of power which follow, fulfils the second part of the forecast in 428. Once more Once more we get the broad, vague background of δχλοι πολλοί (cf. 425); and then the cleansing of the leper (Mk 1405.) is introduced with an abrupt καὶ ίδού.

Thus he passes over the deliverance of the man with an unclean apirit (Mk 125-29), since he has already used the impression produced by it, y axon ($\phi_{pi,m}$ is Mt's own word $250, in his general description in 456. This omission was the easier that the story has much in common with the fuller Gadarene incident which he is about to use shortly ($\frac{1000}{2000} - Mk \frac{1000}{2000} - Mk \frac{1000}{2000}. But $\frac{1000}{2000} - Mk \frac{1000}{2000} - Mk \frac{10000}{2000} - Mk \frac{1000}{2000} - Mk \frac{10000}{2000} - Mk \f

Mt is not concerned with temporal sequence, but tries to preserve local conditions. Hence he goes on with something which had come to him connected with Capernaum (83, cf. Lk 71). In the healing of the centurion's servant (παῖs, Lk δοῦλοs) the interest centres in the dialogue; and the story may have come in the Logia just after the Sermon (as in Lk [or his special source, cf. 951ff.], who has already used Mk's material right up to the withdrawal with disciples to the mountain).

To Mt it had special value here as introducing the idea of authority ($\delta \text{cov}(a)$, which the centurion implicitly recognizes as on the side of Jesus ($\delta \text{?}$), Vv. 11. 12 are attached by logical affinity ($\delta \text{airca} \text{def} \text{ of single of Jesus ($\delta \text{?}$), Vv. 11. 12 are attached by logical affinity ($\delta \text{airca} \text{ airca} \text{ of single of Jesus ($\delta \text{ of Jesus ($\delta \

The next step is more obscure; but the link seems to be a similarity of occasion (to which reroμένης (16 = Mk 182), so he subjoins another evening scene (Mk 486 δψίας γεν., Jesus saith Διέλδωμεν είς το πέραν κ. αφέντες τον σχλον...). The motive of departure, too, comes from Mk's context,* ίδων δε ό 'Ι. δχλον περί αὐτον εκέλευσεν ἀπελθεῖν εἰς τὸ πέραν. The episode of the two aspirants to discipleship, which intervenes, needs some special reason for its position; it comes in very abruptly. It is otherwise placed in Lk (957ff.), at a later part of the ministry, and rightly. But this does not

* This is a crucial case of Mt's use of Mk. - 1 ms is a crucial case of Mt's use of Mk. For whereas the sing, δχλοι is Mt's regular form (88 to 1), Mt prefers δχλοι (25 times, δχλοι πολλοί δ, δχλος 19, generally parallel to Mk); and the foregoing context would suggest δχλοι (ci. v.¹) or at any rate τὸν δχλον. For whereas the hinder its having stood in local catechesis after the Sermon, as logically akin, viz. as affording a typical case of response to the Master's call to discipleship: and that Mt forces it in here suggests that it so stood. It illustrates the authority, even in isolation, that marked the Son of Man (esp. 22). From v.23 to the end of ch. 8 Mt follows Mk 51f., the only points calling for note being the softening down of the disciples' alarm and surprise in the storm (ολιγόπιστοι and ol δὶ ἄνθρωποι), the substitution of the more familiar Gadarene region for the obscure Gerasene (i.e. of Kersa, a village on the lake's edge), and the fresh reading of the demoniac incident by which Mt follows the plurals in the dialogue (e.g. Mk's παρεκάλεσαν αὐτον λέγοντες) to the ignoring of the sing of Mk's narrative. It is possible that this reading had already in oral tradition generated the δύο δαιμονιζόμενοι, and that Mt uses Mk in the light of the story as known to him orally. Yet Mt's general tendency to duality (cf. 203) is to be noted; particularly the clear case in 2127, where his narrative is warped by words of prophecy which he himself introduces with his own formula. The divergences from Mk seem to be quite in Mt's own style.* The words with which he returns to Mk 21st are still coloured by Mk 5, sal έμβαs eis πλοίον (Mk 518) διεπέρασεν † (ib. 21, the verse after which Mt resumes this section of Mk in 918). Capernaum is called την ίδιαν πόλιν in terms of 41d. Once more, in the healing of the paralytic, the note of authority is struck in both Gospels. 99 Mt seems to show that his aim is to present a series of typical scenes in their logical rather than strict historical connexion; for adopting Mk's παρίγων, appropriate to progress along the lake's margin, he uses it as a mere verb of motion by inserting excider, ignoring the teaching on the shore which comes in between. In the incident itself it is interesting that he substitutes 'Matthew' (with λεγόμενον, a favourite phrase), Levi's disciplename, for that by which he was known at the time of his call: i.e. his standpoint is less purely historical than Mk's. If in 914ff. Mt were not following Mk, he would hardly have inserted the defence against criticism at this point, but rather reserved it for the later section devoted to the topic (121ff.) For the very next paragraph shows that he is still dominated by the idea of the mighty deeds of Jesus. He goes back, that is, to Mk 521ff.: but having already used the link of circumstance in v.21, he uses one belonging to a later stage of the incident (v.25 tri autou hahoi pros) and compresses the whole.

^{*} That renewed reference was sometimes made, seems proved by Mt's reversion to Mk's κρικατεῖν ἐπὶ τῆς δαλάσσης, in 26, after writing automatically κρ. ἐπὶ τῆν θάλασσας, in 26, after writing automatically *κρ. ἐπὶ τῆν θάλασσας, in sown construction (cf. ἐπὶ τὰ ὑδατα in *). For a parallel, compare the freer parts of Codex Bezæ.

† As such it gives a good specimen of Mt's style when free to follow its own literary form. Note ἀποκριθεῖς είπεν [Mk 5 times, generally ἀποκ. λέγες; common in Lk, and in Mt 14-28 (34 times), where rewriting Mk, but rare in 3-13 (7 or 8 times), where reining Logia: hence not a Logian phrase: Jn ἀπεκρίθη], ἀπὸ τοῦ πλοίου(cf. 8½, Mk prefers ἐκ), καταποντίζεσθαι (Mt 18½)δλιγόπιστος (5¾ 16*), διστάζειν (251), and κύριε in later religious sense (cf. Lk). It shows also the easy way in which an insertion may blend with the Marcan context, ἐ. ε. ἀναβάντων αὐτῶν for ἀνέβη (πρὸς αὐτούς). Note πελεύειν (14½, «f. 9. 19), never in Mk, once only in Lk (18٤٠).

That Mt is here using Mk rather than a shorter source is That Mt is here using Mk rather than a shorter source is shown by (1) the mention of the duration of the woman's malady, (2) the coincidence in δπισθεν, (3) the rather otiose καὶ οἱ μαθτιαι αὐτοῦ in ν. ¹⁰ (seeing that they play no part in what follows in Mt due to Mk (νν. ^{31. 90}). (4) the fact that neither Mt nor Lk really adds any fresh matter, so that their deviations in form are to be put down to their style and alm. † Mt's ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν is a result of compression; and the other turns of phrase and additions are in Mt's special manner.

The last two incidents of the section are compilations of Mt completing the cycle of typical healings. They have distinct echoes of Mk, as also marks of Mt's own style; but possibly they

* Mt's ισχύειν reems due to Mk's ισχύεν, his ħλθες to Mk1s*; even μακράν ἀπ' αὐτῶν may gloss πρὸς τῷ ὅρει. As the case is a crucial one for the use of narratives assumed to exist in written Legia, one may refer also to the case of the demoniac boy (17¹⁴⁶, Nk9¹⁴⁶, Lk9²⁷⁸). What there seems to exclude such Logia as easing Mt's abbreviation of Mk, is the sudden emergence of τὸ δαμμόνιον (ν. 18), easily explained by his knowledge of Mk, but not a natural sequie of the description of the lad's symptoms in ν. 13. If this be no, then that section affords cases of nure transposition by Mt (1-5, cf. Mk 23); recurrent comment (16c); a favourite Mea (διά την λλιγονιστίκι, 3-3); and a favourite word, θεραπεύειν (M. 18).

(M. 18).

† The other case of this rare word, 1434, is also in Mk's wake.

† The προσ(ελθοῦσα)... τοῦ κρασπέδου common to Mt and Lk might seem to need a literary link. But both regularly prefer προσκλθεῦν for 'approach' (see Mt 335=Lk 534, cf. Lk 714); while the addition of τοῦ κρ. is a quite natural (cf. Mt 1429) explanatory touch, which may even come from oral tradition.

have also a traditional basis, particularly in the case of the dumb demoniac, 9821. For though Lk 11146 has the same in substance, yet the form differs, especially if we omit v.34 as a later gloss, as do ().L., Syr-Sin., Tat. (see 1224).

Another view is possible, namely, that Lk 1114. shows the story of the possessed mute in its right place, so introducing the dialogue with Pharisees as to exoreism originally in the Logia. In that case Mt may use the incident twice: first, among the works of power in 9, where the people's comment comes from Mk 2¹²; and next in 12²²², where the two incidents in 92⁷⁻³³ appear fused into one case as occasion of the people's wonder, which elicits the Pharisees' retort.

The cycle of typical Messianic deeds is now complete: and Mt wishes to present Jesus in the further aspect of authority shown in commissioning others to aid in gathering in the harvest of the Kingdom. In so doing he omits for the present (but see 1355%) a few verses in Mk, and takes the first words of his introduction to the Mission of the Twelve from Mk 66b, i.e. καὶ περιηγεν ο 'Ιηποῦς τès πόλεις πάσας κ. τὰς κώμας, διδάσκων, repeating also the bulk of 4²³, his earlier programme of Messianic ministry. Then he takes part of Mk 6³⁴ (where Mt omits half the verse) and generalizes the statement of Christ's compassionate perception of the people's shepherdless condition. In 9377. he probably employs the opening words of the Logia at this point (cf. Lk 102), and then follows Mk once more in 101, repeating words used already in 4236. 9356 (θεραπεύειν πάσαν νόσον κ. πάσαν μαλακίαν). The names of the Twelve are next given, without any interest in the circumstances of their original call (Mk 313ff.). Indeed it is assumed that they are already known.*

(f) Modifications in the Passion and Resurrection narratives .- Most will agree with Dr. Salmon that Mt 27 'copied the narrative as we find it in St. Mark, interpolating in it different passages founded on knowledge derived from some other A word or two on such a source, or rather source.' In the Institution of the Supper it is sources. likely that the slight differences in Mt are due mainly to local Eucharistic use, the cause of Lk's inversion of the Bread and Cup (so the Didaché). In the Crucifixion, on the other hand, the slight divergences are due to the subtle reaction of certain details of OT prophecy—now seen to be Messianic, since suffering was included in Messiah's lot. The influence of Ps 22 (whence came Jesus' great cry) is especially marked (as also in He 2^{lif.}; cf. ⁶⁻⁹). Thus— He 2111 ; cf. 6-9). Thus—

Ps 60 (68) 21 έδωκαν . . . χολήν, κ. είς την δίψαν μου επότισάν με έξος.

Then, after the casting of the lots, Mt adds-καὶ καθήμενοι έτήρουν αὐτὸν ἐκεῖ. $Cf. Ps 22 (21) ^{18}$ αὐτοὶ δὲ κατενόησαν καὶ ἐπεῖδόν με. tAnd once more-

Ps 229 ήλπισεν έπι Κύριον, ρυσάσθω αὐτὸν . . . δτι θέλει αὐτόν.

Such apologetic use of prophecy is yet more obvious in 817 1217ff, and it may have helped the evangelist to his own faith in Jesus' Messiahship; while the elaborative influence of the OT is seen in Mt's Beatitudes as compared with Lk's.

Probably the modifications of the Passion story

March 1900).
† Following on reference to the sufferer's deadly thirst, and the fact that many 'dogs' or wicked ones encompass him and plerce his hands and feet; while the next words are διεμερίσαντο τὰ ἰμάτιά μου ἐαυτοίς. P'ere Mk's language may already have been coloured by this Ps. as also in the use of κινούντες τὰς κεφαλάς; cf. Ps 22' πάντες οἱ θεωροῦντές με ἐξεμυκτήρισάν με, ἐλάλησαν ἐν χείλεσιν, ἐκίνησαν κεφαλήν.

were already part of Mt's way of telling it, before he sat down to write, and spontaneously reasserted themselves, sometimes more, sometimes less de-cisively, as he freely reproduced Mk. And this may afford us a fresh analogy for the way in which the general tradition of the Lord's ministry, already living in memory, modified the impressions left by his perusal of Mk.

A good instance of this is the Resurrection, where Mt's narrative is modified by the story of the Guard in the tradition known to him. the women come, not to anoint the body, but only 'to behold the tomb'; and the influence of Mk, if present at all, is very slight. There is no consciousness that the women entered the sepulchre, as in Mk; the fulfilment of Jesus' word in his resurrection is emphasized (καθώς είπεν, cf. 2768); and so the element of fear is overshadowed by joy. The great fear, which is the note of Mk, has been toned down in tradition by later feelings on the subject. The rather indistinct account of the promised Christophany to 'the eleven disciples' is part of the generalizing style of oral tradition, where the original facts are set in the light of their abiding bearing on the Church's life. The 'authority' bearing on the Church's life. The 'authority' which was largely veiled in Messiah's earthly ministry is now His chief note, shown in the extension of the Kingdom to the Gentiles, and in His abiding presence with His own during the days between the Resurrection and the Parousia (note silence as to Israel and the Law, in contrast to Mt 10^{5f.}).

(g) Eschatological Standpoint and Date.—Here the concluding Woes on the scribes and Pharisees lead up to the Last Things.

The blood of the Prophets will come on them. This is fuller than Lk of colour from Palestinian experiences, and of presage of the reckoning imminent. The addition of 'son of Barachiah' (not in Lk) quite possibly shows that Mt took certain words in v. 3 as referring to events early in

A.D. 68 (found in Jos. B.J IV. v. 4).

2337-20 Their house is deserted by the Divine presence till they repent. This implicit reference to the Parousia is here arbitrarily connected (against Lk 11495. 1334.) with the judgment on Jerusalem (see Charles, Eschatology, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian, p. 328).

241.2. Destruction of the temple (cf. Mk 131.

Ac (14)

248. Tokens of this and the Parousia.

The specification of the 'Parousia' (only in this chapter in the Gospels) and the phrase $\sigma \nu \nu r \ell \lambda \epsilon (a \tau_* \cdot a i \omega \nu \sigma_*, found only in Mt (cf. 13)^{28,40,49} 2.5²⁰), point to this being a special form in which this discourse was quoted in Mt's circle (see note below).$

244-8. The preliminary troubles * (ἀρχη ἀδίνων) Clearly Lk is not entirely dependent on Mk. Nor does Mt seem to be so in all parts of this discourse.

249-13. Trial (θλίψις) for Christians

Vv.10-12 are peculiar in form (see below on 21-24 for affinity with Did. 163-9; and in their light v.9 may also be recognized as not altogether dependent on Mk, 29 reforring to Jewish hatred, 20 to Gentile. What Mk has here, is partly in different order, and partly occurs in the Commission to the Twelve in Mt (101-22); cf. Lk 1211-12. Vv.9-12 seem very significant for Mt's date in virtue of their special phrasing (cf. the Christian section of Ascensio Isadæ, c. 55-03, or else 50-90 A.D.).

2414. The witness to the Gentiles.

In Mt's form, preaching 'in all the inhabited world' is, in contrast to Mk's 'unto all the Gentiles,' as 'witness to the Gentiles.' Here we probably get the idea of the Gospel in relation to the Gentiles current among Jews in S. Syria. In 10²³ we had the corresponding idea touching Israel: the two are combined in 10¹⁸. And then shall come the end' (in contrast to v.*), i.e. the συντάλεια or final climax—a unique clause in Mt and one going far to date the first Gospel at a period just before the final catastrophe of 'the holy city,' the crisis of whose fortunes is seen to be approaching, as appears from the nota bene in v. 13; cf. 10²⁸.

The forecast in 16 is still on the vague lines of consummate evil in Danlel (a reference made explicit by Mt), of which Caligula's purpose of setting up his image in the temple must have seemed the foreshadowing (cf. Mt's èν τότφ ἀγίφ, again making more explicit what is implied in Mk, δπου οὐ δεὐ). Lk's as showing that these were not yet in view in Mt and Mk; cf. also Lk 2123. (See further the article Abomination of Dissolation) Vv.1643 are in the main in terms of current Apocalyptic notions, including Dn 12¹; Lk 2125-34 again presents a somewhat more developed form of the tradition. The specifically Christian touches, e.g. 35. 34, parallel features found in two documents of c. 64-68 a.D. viz. Didaché 16, and the Christian section of the Ascensio Isaiw. The former, which echoes its own local tradition rather than the words of any of our Gospels, has, ἐν γὰρ ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις πληθυνθησυνταίοι ψυδοπροφήται καὶ οἱ φθορείτ, κ. στραφήσονται τὰ πρόβατα εἰς λίκους, κ. ἡ ἀγάτη στραφήσεται εἰς μίσος. αὐξανομένης γὰρ τῆς ἀνομίας (cf. Mt's) μισήσονοιν ἀλλήλου; κ. διώξουσι κ. παραφώσουνι (Mt's), καὶ τότε φανήσεται διασου αὐξανομένης δεσοῦ κ. ποιήσει σημετα κ. τέρατα. Here the false wonders are attributed summarily to a supreme Antiethrist; yet his action may include that of many subordinate agents, as in Aso. Isaiα (4), where Nero is expected to develop into or reappear as the incarnation of Berial, and along with Berlai's hosts of evil spirits to parody Beloved's (Messiah's) works of power.

2427.28. The Son of Man comes like the lightning.

Mt (Lk elsewhere, 1728.) repeats the warning against being led away by rumours of Messiah's having been seen in various retired places (cf. Apoc. Bar 4594)—so showing the topic of the hour when he wrote. The comparison of Messiah's Coming to lightning is found in Apoc. Bar 5594. cf. 7225. (Apoc. A. not long before 70), being suggested apparently by the imagery of Dn 713.

2420-31. The Coming of the Son of Man.

Here εὐθέως points to an early date for Mt, i.e. before A.D. 70. The signs of v. 22 are the conventional ones derived from prophecies like is 1810, 844, and appear in varying forms in the three Synoptics. V. 220 καὶ τότε φανήσεται το σημείον τ. νίοῦ τ. ἀνθρ. ἐν οὐρανῷ, κ. τότε κόψονται πόσαι αὶ ψυλαὶ τῆς γῆὶ is peculiar to Mt. The former half is akin to Did. 168 καὶ τότε φανήσεται τὰ σημεία τῆς ἀληθείας πρώτον σημείον έπτετάσεως ἐν οὐρανῷ. the latter comes from Zec 12¹⁰²⁶ (cf. Rev 17). In v. 220, where it is parallel to Mk and Lk, Mt has τοῦ οὐρανοῦ τις τὰ σημεία τῆς ἀληθείας πρώτον σημείον έπτετάσεως ἐν οὐρανοῦ (cf. Rev 17). In v. 220, where it is parallel to Mk and Lk, Mt has τοῦ οὐρανοῦ niệt τὰ τὰν μεφελῶν, as in Dn 131, whence all derive their language. In 31 Mt, as distinct from Mk, speaks of the angels sent forth, as Messiah's (ἀντοῦ); of their agency in gathering the elect (ἐπενναέρονσιν); and of the 'great trumpet' which summons those. This last Jewish trait appears not only in 1 Th 410, 10 15 ft. 16

Mt, like Lk, goes its own way after v.26, citing the Noschie Deluge for the way in which the Parousia will surprise men (cf. Lk 1726. 30), and intimating how it will separate neighbours (cf. Lk 1726.). Here the independence of Mt's tradition is specially evident. At v.25 the three are once more parallel in thought. But each ends the solemn call to vigilance in its own way. Mt being fullest. Its form seems to reflect the dangers of its day, viz. bad stowardship of the sacred charge of fellow-servants, and fellowship with the worldlings (v.49), men being thrown off guard by their Lord's long delay. This is just the state of things in the Christian section of Asc. Isais 8, where the faithless shepherds are spoken of 6. Such shall share the lot of the hypocrites, the term by which Pharisaic Jews were spoken of in the circle whose tradition Mt inherited (62.5 is 75 157 2218 28133.)—another link with the Didaché (81.2 Let not your fasts be μετά των ὑποκριτών). be μετά των υποκριτών

(h) The Genealogy.—This is of importance for our Evangelist's scope and method. As Zahn says (The Apostles' Creed, 126 ff., cf. Einleitung in das NT, ii. 271 ff.), this Gospel is 'a carefully arranged account of events of which a superficial

^{*}These reproduce in general conception the 12 divisions or elements in the Last Times as given in an Apocalypse embedded in Apoc. Bar (27-301), and dating c. 50-65 A.D., i.e. before the Jewish War. They are in this order—(1) The beginning of commotions; (2) slayings of the great ones; (3) the fall of many by death; (4) the sending of desolation (or 'the sword'); (5) famine; (6) earthquakes; [(7) terrors]; (8) portents and incursion of the Shedim or demons; (9) the fall of fire; (10) rapine and much oppression; (11) wickedness and unchastity; (12) confusion from the mingling together of all these. There follows a reference to 'the consummation of the times.' In our Gospels we find these elements of popular Jewish Messianic expectation, blended with features drawn from the experiences of the Palestinian Church in particular, viz. the appearance of pseudo-Messiahs, and persecutions. Mt's order keeps close to the above list, including (11) alluded to in v. 12 (Δνομία); while Lk's puts (6) before (5), as in another kindred place in Apoc. Bar (70°), and also alludes to (7)—(9). Charles (op. cit. 325 ff.) thinks that an independent apocaly pse (cf. Eus. IEE 111. v. 8) underlies Mt 24°-8.1-22 28-31. 34(.)

knowledge is for the most part assumed.' not the simple confession that Jesus is the promised Messiah. The point kept strictly in view from the first page to the last is much more apologetic, and, so far as it is unavoidable, polemic.' In spite of all so bitterly urged against Jesus' claim to be the Messiah, that claim is absolutely true. Thus, though the Jews scoff at His obscure origin, He fulfils the prophecy of the Messiah. It is from this point of view that we must read ch. 1 and, as Zahn well shows, much in ch. 2 likewise. Mt lavs before his readers a genealogy artificially constructed in terms of the throne-succession in the Davidic line, and not that of the actual progenitors of Joseph (as in Lk). But why, we ask, should he go out of his way to make certain additions, needless to a bare genealogy, including four women's names? Above all, why choose women whose characters are highly offensive to Jewish, and in three cases out of four to every human, feeling'? Zahn alleges 'the same apologetic purpose which governs his account of the Conception and Birth of Jesus'; and even argues that the well-known Jewish slander that Jesus was a son of shame (cf. Laible, Jesus Christ in the Talmud, p. 7 ff.), is itself presupposed by Mt's genealogy, just as 2811-15 presupposes the Jewish story that the disciples stole the body of Jesus. This is going too far, even were the direction followed the right one. But this is doubtful. There was another Jewish objection to be met. Granting Joseph's paternity,—which the Jews always assume in the Gospels,—was Joseph of Davidic descent? And further, was God likely to send Messiah as the son of a carpenter, even though of Davidic stock? To this twofold query Mt's genealogy is a reply; and to the latter phase of it the additions already alluded to are an implicit rebuke.* The God who chose from various brethren the younger son's line, and who over-ruled unlikely unions to continue the chosen seed, —this God of Israel ever worketh according to His own good pleasure, and His ways of sovereign elective freedom are often marvellous in men's eyes. Thus it is in the home of the humble, yet Davidic, carpenter Joseph, that Messiah Jesus has really been born. How, it is Mt's next step to show in 1186.

Since the discovery of the Sinaltic codex of the Old Syriac rersion of the Gospels, it has been argued that our text of Mt 11s is not original, but secondary. Not only is this refuted by study of the various forms in which divergence from our oldest Gr. MSS occurs in certain groups of authorities (see, e.g., Zhnis Kialetiung, ii. 291-298); but even the view that Mt used a source in which Joseph's full paternity was assumed, is itself unlikely. For the way in which Mt calls attention to the numerical symmetry of the three divisions in the pedigree, each fourteen ending with a great crisis in Israel's fortunes, suggests that he has himself so constructed it.† Further, the four-women cannot have stood in an earlier source, and yet here they seem integral. The pedigree is through and through didactic: and the fact that it was from the first compiled by the said of 1 Ch 1-3, shows that it was never other than in Greek, the language of our evangelist (cf. W. C. Allen, Expos. Tinnes, Dec. 1899). Hence it seems best to conclude that Mt did not use a pre-existing genealogy (see Generalogy of Justine Chilestine). A fresh witness for 11s has just come to light in the ancient basts of the Didelogue of Tarocher and Availa (traff of the lasts of the Didelogue of Tarocher and Availa (traff of the lasts of the Didelogue of Tarocher and Availa (traff of the lasts of the Integral of the complex of the content of the last of the content cf. also ii. 645b).

A fresh witness for 116 has just come to light in the ancient basis of the Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila (itself of the 5th cent. at least). This basis is carried back by its editor, F. C. Conybeare, to the Dial. Jusonia et Papinia, c. 125. The Christian cites Mt's genealogy, and gives 116 first in the form, 'laxis' δε τον 'lωσήφ, ψ μηστευθείσα Μαρία, έξ ης εγευνήθη 'Inσούο λεγ. Χ.; and next as 'laxis' δε είγενησεν τ. 'lωσήφ τον μνηστευσέμενον Μαρίαμ, έξ ης είγενηθη δ.Χ. ό νίδς τ. θεού. These passages seem to cast light on the real origin of the readings unsupported by our oldest Gr. MSS (for the evidence in full see art. Jesus Christer, vol. ii. p. 644). They are in fact explanatory glosses, such as the Dialogue presents us with in reply to the hostile gloss of the Jew, 'laxwiß έγεννησεν τ. 'lwσήφ, τὸν ἀνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ῆς ἐγενηθη 'lησοῦν ἀν. Χ., και 'lwσήφ ἐγέννησεν τὸν 'lησοῦν τὸν Ακγ. Χ., περὶ οῦ νῶν ὁ λόγος, φησίν, ἐγέννησεν ἐκ τῆς Μ. The Jews glossed τὸν ἀνδρα Μ. one way, in the teeth of the narrative; the Christians glossed it another, in harmony with the narrative. And this creet into some MSS. And this crept into some MSS.

Supplemental Notes.—This Dialogue quotes the parable of the Husbandmen in extense; and in so doing shows the way in which materials derived from similar sources tended to blend in which materials derived from similar sources tenued to beam in the memory of an early Christian. The case is the more instruc-tive that the writer has just quoted Issiah's parable-germ of Jehovah's vineyard (5¹²), to which the Gospel parable was probably meant to point back: and we see how Issiah's language affects the form at the beginning of Christ's parable. It runs proposity meant to point pack: and we see now isans a language affects the form at the beginning of Christ's parable. It runs ψποδόμησεν αὐτῷ τεἰχος καὶ πύργον κ. ἐποίησεν ἐν αὐτῷ ἀρονοκ, κ. ὑπολήνιον, omitting φραγμόν περιέθηκεν and changing the position of ληνὸν (Mt) or ὑπολήνιον (Mk), as well as uniting the two—which were in fact both integral—to a wine-press. Here the writer quotes freely, but is quite possessed by his sources, of which Mt counts for most. Thus he reproduces almost every syllable and letter of the triple tradition, while the result is a wonderfully eelectic composition, produced not mechanically, but by the subtle tricks of memory. We may be prepared, then, for the recurrence of similar phenomena in Mt.

The Fayyûm papyrus fragment parallel to Mt 263. sat., Mk 142. sat., is too scanty and mutilated to justify much inference. But it omits a verse common to Mt and Mt, while it combines features of both (ἐν ταύτη τῆ νυκτί with Mt, τὰ πρόβ. διαπορη., καὶ εἰ πάντες ο[ὑκ ἐγω], δὶς κοκ[κύξει], with Mk). It may, then, represent oral tradition; but more likely a free memoriter use of Mt and Mk in some manual of catechesis or edification like the Oxyrhynchus Logia.

Here ωσαύτως is to be noted as pointing to a series of detached sayings rather than a gospel.

iii. CONCLUSIONS.—On the whole, then, the following results emerge as the most probable.
(1) The order of narration common to the latter parts of Mt and Mk in particular, the closeness of which is made the more striking by the deviation of their earlier parts, points to the use by Mt of the Petrine memoirs written by Mk. (2) Conversely, the notable deviation of Mt and Lk in the order of the Discourses and Sayings (Logia element) common to them, combined with their textual variations, goes strongly against common use of a Logia document, as distinct from an oral Greek tradition which reached them in detached portions and in somewhat different forms.* (3) The Logia familiar to Mt, who had long taught them catechetically, -so that their vocabulary and his own were virtually one and the same,-reflected in epitome the whole experience of church life in certain Palestinian apostolic circles. They were rooted in the memories of the germinal Christian society, the apostles who had companied with their Master. But they contained also echoes of the first missionary commission as repeated for the guidance of others in the early days of l'alestinian evangelization; of the persecution that had been their lot all along; of the forms in which the Master's principles of fellowship among brethren took actual shape as the life became more organ-ized; and not least of the terms in which the polemic against their religious environment of Pharisaic Judaism was conducted in ever-growing volume and detail. That is, these Logia, far more than the Lukan, are memorials of the life of the Palestinian Church as well as of its Messiah. (4) The Matthæan Logia have as their nucleus the common apostolic didactic tradition, which took shape in the early Jerusalem days under the lead of Peter-a tradition which passed into Mk in

* Lk probably had in his 'special source' a mixed gospel embodying the bulk of his Logian element as it now stands in our Lk.

Similarly the enigmatic, 'He shall be called a Nazarene,' seems an implicit reply to criticism. The flinging at Jesus of the epithet 'Nazarene'—a term of contempt on lofty lips—really fulfils the substance of 'the propheta' as a whole, touching Messish's humble and even despised lot (e.g. as the faithful 'Servant of Jehovah,' Is 5318.).
† This will be the more convincing if even some of the other numerical arrangements which Sir J. Hawkins suggests as intended by Mt, hold good (Hora Synopt. 181 ff.). We cannot, however, see that the number of the 'formula' verses, [28 11 1328 191 267, is intentional. They are far apart, and no attention is drawn to their number any more than in the case of the recurring formulæ in Jg 16-1631.

its later Petrine form. At some stage which we cannot now trace they took on the special impress of the Apostle Matthew,* probably in a ministry of which Galilee, rather than Judæa, was the scene. In this form they passed, as Jewish unrest became more acute, to the neighbouring parts of Syria, in the person of our evangelist among others, still receiving fresh elements in the course of oral teaching.† And it was at this stage that they took written shape, as the main constituent in the mixed gospel composed with the aid of the Marcan memoirs of Peter. The freedom with which the writer has accommodated Mk's narrative to massed Logian discourses, suggests that these discourses already existed orally much in this massed form, and were not then first thrown into it by Mt. That Mk should early reach S. Syria is the more probable that St. Peter was evidently held in high honour there, witness the special references to Peter in 1428 15.5 1618 1724 1821; cf. 102, First, Simon who is called Peter. Indeed it seems likely that Peter had left a strong oral tradition behind him in those parts, so that Mt knew the substance of Mk before it came into his hands. This may help to explain certain phenomena in his use of it. (5) The fact that the Matthean cycle of Logia was taken up into our Mt, gave it its distinctive status and acceptance; and the actual facts of its origin were soon forgotten-probably never known outside a narrow circle. Thus the indirect sense in which Matthew was its author and guarantor dropped out of tradition, and Papias could simply take for granted that the Gospel κατὰ Μαθθαῖον was from the apostle's pen. (6) The actual conditions giving its author the stimulus to compose his artistic and reflective Gospel, must be gauged from the perspective in which he places the central Figure. He is set forth as the full blossoming of Israel's prophetic ideal of the King ruling in righteousness, and in wondrous gentleness too. The picture is the implicit corrective of the false Messianic ideal which had made the nation as a whole reject Jesus, and had a ready led it yet further astray in the path of earthly force. Thus, as we have seen, the urgency of the warnings against going after false Messiahs on the felt approach of the great national crisis (conceived on the lines of Daniel's prophecy of Jerusalem's last trial and in terms of current apocalyptic based thereon), points to the actual crisis of 68-70 as to the specific occasion which gave it birth. It is an appeal to waverers of all sorts to trust the true King, whose reign is of heaven, and depends on the action of God, not of men; and not to become involved in the current of the false national ideal. It is meant to do the same work as the Epistle to the Hebrews, only in another fashion and at a rather later date. `And, like it, it is at once apologetic and polemical: it is a dissuasive in the form of a positive presentation. Jesus is God's Messiah in spite of all superficial appearances, and that by realizing the essence of Moses and the Prophets. It is hard to see which of the alternative dates, shortly before or after A.D. 70, makes the Gospel the more pertinent as a book for the times-and so satisfies the law of all early Christian writings. On the whole, Mt 24 adheres so closely to Mk's standpoint, in contrast to Luke's modifications and omissions, after 70notably in counsels practical before 70, but not after $(e.g.\ ^{15b.\ 16a.\ ^{20}},\ esp.\ \mu\eta\delta\dot{\epsilon}\ \sigma\alpha\beta\beta4\tau\psi,\ ^{23})$ —that c.68-69 seems the best date.

Similarly, the Epistle of James echoes in its own way not a few of the precepts of the great Sermon, esp. those on Swearing (otherwise peculiar to Mt) and on Censoriousness towards brethren (= towards 'Law,' 4", perhaps that of Mt 7", Lk 63"), 'This kind of expansive and explanatory activity of the Christian 'scribe instructed in the kingdom of heaven' seems taken for granted in 1352; cf. 252 for the catechist.

In 24136 ἐν τόπφ ἀγίφ follows Dn's forecast of Temple-desecra-tion and not the facts of 70. Some, however, doubt whether Mt 2219 can have been written before 70, since it implies use of the 2519 can have been written before 70, since it implies use of the triune baptismal name. But, if a similar clause be an original part of Diduchė 7, its evidence may be cited. For the work as a whole, and not the Two Ways only, seems to be implied by the Christian interpolation in Ascensio Leafa, which perhaps falls before Nero's death (i.e. c. 65-68). Hence there is nothing decisive against c. 62-79 A.D.; while the statement in 279, that field is called the Field of Blood until this day, and casual references to 'the holy city' and the temple-worship, are more natural at that date than after the utter ruin and change of 70. So with the reference to 'going over the cities of Israel,' 1023. Perhaps, then, 2265, 75 are additions after 70: contrast Lk 142.

(7) The evangelist writes, however, with a sort of detachment hard to imagine in one living in Palestine about 70. Thus it is best, and most in keeping with the Greek form and with internal evidence, to locate him in S. Syria, say Phœnicia (4^{24a} 15^{21ff} alongside Mk 1²⁸ 7^{24ff}, cf. Ac 11¹⁹ 15³). That the author was a Jew, is clear from the text and manner of his special OT quotations, which so colour his work. But his was a spiritual Israel, new while old, inclusive not exclusive, conceived on prophetic lines after the manner of Peter and the Apocalypse of Johnwith the latter of which its affinities are most Jesus of Nazareth is really the Christ, marked. since in His person, teaching, work, and even His tragic end, all has been as prophecy had inti-mated. While as to the scope of Messiah's Ecclesia, the elect Israel, it was but a little thing that God should through Him raise up Jacob: the nations, too, were to be His inheritance, by the incorporation into the Kingdom of all who were of faith [cf. Kübel (as below), Introductory Remarks, trans. in Bibl. World, i. 194 ff., 263 ff.].

(8) All theories of Mt must be both problematic and complex. Zahn's theory of an 'apologetic' Aramaic * Gospel by the Apostle Matthew, c. 62 A.D., turned into Greek, c. 85, is too simple for the phenomena. The prevalent 'two document' hypothesis, with the use of special oral traditions, comes far nearer But it may be doubted whether the the truth. second or Logian document is needed to account for Mt's divergences from Mk; and whether the differences as well as similarities of the Logian element in Mt and Lk are not best explained by a common Gr. Logian type of catechesis t behind both. In favour of such a 'one document' hypothesis may be alleged the Logian quotations in the Didaché, perhaps also in the first Ep. of Clement and the Oxyrhynchan fragment, as seeming to reflect local cate-chesis rather than either Mt or Lk. It would be some time before a written gospel superseded traditional local usage as the prime factor in forming the Logian equipment of Christians. It is in Ignatius, then, that we seem first to have good evidence of Mt as an influence at work (e.g. ad Eph. 10²). But not even then did oral tradition cease to operate. To its reaction on the written text we owe in large part early secondary readings, such as those mis-named 'Western': and from it, especially in its later stages, come those Logia known as Agrapha.

Text.—In checking the witness of the MSS and VSS, we have, besides the fragments of Tatian's Diatessaron (in Hamlyn Hill, The Earliest Life of Christ, pp. 883-377), which are common to the four Gospels, a special aid in the 3rd cent. papyrus of Mt 11-20 (Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, 1, pp. 4-7). This supports not only the usual reading in 114, but also the 'Neutral' type of text resting on MB.

*We can merely note the weighty witness of Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1888) against the directly Aramalc antecedents of our Gospel-material. The Hebralsms of our Gospels he traces chiefly to LXX influence on their writers.

† The absence of all historical trace of such a revered writing as an Ur-Matthaus would have been, is rendered doubly inexplicable if it be granted that it was ever current in Greek. Here is the one strong point of Zahn's theory over against the 'two document' theory of Weiss and others.

ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—There is a special treatise by Gla, Die Originalsprache des Mt. Paderborn, 1887. But the most authoritative discussion in relation to the whole subject of the Semitic basis of the Synoptics is that in Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, Bd. 1., Leipzig, 1898. There, as also in Zahn's Einleitung in d. NT, Bd. II., will be found the earlier history of the subject.

Jess. Rd. 1., Leipzig, 1898. There, as also in Zahn's Einleitung in d. NT, Bd. II., will be found the earlier history of the subject.

Relation to the Gospel of the Hebers.—Hilgenfeld, NT extra Curon. receptum?, 1834; Nicholson, Gospel according to the Hebersea (1879); Handmann, Hebraferevangelium (1888), in TU v. 3 (with good Goschichte der Kritik): Resch, Agrapha (1889), in TU v. 4, p. 822 fl.; Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, il. 642 fl.; Harnack, Chronologie, Bd. 1. 625 fl. Hilgenfeld's thesis, that in the original Nazarene Heb. Ec. [=the Heb. Matt., i.e. Palas' Logia] is to be sought the Archimedean point of the whole Gospel problem, has met with little support (yet see McGiffert's note on Eusebius, ili. 37). It is largely another case of ignotium per ignotius. Thus Nicholson falls back on the rather effete view that Mt wrote both in Greek and Hebrew (=the Heb. Ec.). Handmann and Resch agree in denying the identity of the Heb. Ec. with the supposed Hebrew Matt. The former makes it asceond source of our Synoptics, alongside 'Ur-Markus,' and perhaps even what Paplas meant by the Logia; the latter emphasizes its apocryphal features (even in its original form), and makes it dependent on our Matthew. Harnack, here in principle agreeing with Zahn, takes a middle position, making to originally a sort of cousin of our Matthe. each being an enlarged edition of the Matthean Logia. Only Harnack differs from Zahn in making both recensions of about the same date (not long after 70). Finally, J. Armitage Robinson, in Expos. 5th Ser. v. (1897) 194-200, discusses three of the fragments of the Heb. Er. in such a way as to traverse the main conclusion of these two scholars. these two scholars.

COMMENTARIES.—Patristic and Mediaval: Origen (in Greek for 1828.—223, in Latin to 27), Chrysostom (91 Homilies, ed. Field, 3 vols. 1839), Hilary of Poitiers ted. MATTHIAS (Maτθlas [Tisch. Treg. WH Maθθlas], abbreviated from Maτταθlas, the Gr. form of פַּמִּרְיָה 'gift of J"'; cf. the name Theodorus).—The disciple selected along with Barsabbas, after the Ascension, from those followers of Christ who were deemed qualified for appointment to the apostleship vacant through the death of Judas (Ac 115-28). The procedure was adopted on the initiative of St. Peter, who applied Ps 1098 to the circumstances; and the selection appears to have been made by the assembled Christian brotherhood.* The general qualification required was to have 'companied with us (the apostles) all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us.' Barsabbas and Matthias had also, presumably, special graces of character and gifts of teaching and administration. After prayer, addressed probably to Christ, t and a solemn appeal to the lot, Matthias was elected.

This is the sole instance of the lot being employed in the history of the Apostolic Church, and it occurs significantly between the Ascension and Pentecost, when the disciples were 'orphans' (Jn 1418). Stier (Words of the Apostles, in loc.) regards this election as premature and unwarranted, the outcome of St. Peter's officious impetuosity. 'The lot fell: not the Lord chose.' He holds that St. Paul was the true successor of Judas, chosen, like the other apostles, by the Lord Himself. It may be granted that the appointment of Matthias stands on a somewhat lower level than that of the original Twelve and of St. Paul; but, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, the procedure was a legitimate exercise of human wisdom in dependence upon divine guidance; and St. Luke, the 'beloved' friend of St. Paul, appears to endorse the election (representing, doubtless, the general opinion of the Apostolic Church); for after speaking of the eleven apostles (Ac 126) he

The historical character of Matthias' election has been impugned by Zeller (Acts of Apost., Eng. tr. i. 168) on account of (1) the assumption that the apostles remained in Jerusalem; (2) the close connexion of the narrative with Pentecost. But the departure of the apostles to Galilee after the Resurrection did not preclude their early return to Jerusalem; and the second objection can have weight only with those who reject entirely the supernatural in primitive Church history.

According to Eus. (HE i. 12, ii. 1) and Epiphan. (H α r. i. 22), Matthias was one of the 'Seventy' (Lk 101). Hilgenfeld identifies him with Natha-

*So Beng., Stier, Mey., Alf., Baumg., etc. on the ground that the subj. in v.32 must be the same as in vv.34. Some (Mosh. Ham. Jacobson, etc.), assign the selection to the apostles, taking the subj. from v.17.

†So Beng., Ols., Baumg., Alf., Words., Hows., and most commentators, on the ground that the choice of apostles is always referred to Christ (Lik 642.) In 670 1516. Ac 121, the same Greek word being used. Meyer, Holtz., Zöck, refer 122 to God (Ac 422 158).

‡ The lot, presumably, would be taken in the usual way, the names of the two men being written on tablets, and shaken in a vessel, and he whose tablet first leapt out being regarded as divinely designated (Lv 162. Nu 2642. Pr 1623). So late as 1731 the Moravians decided by lot the question whether they should retain their own organization, or be incorporated with the Lutherans (Glosg, in Icc.). Wesley also had a predilection for sortliege (Southey, Life of Wesley, 1. 186, 187). Mosh. (Comm. Sec. 1. 14) and others (Gagneius, doubtfully, Salmeron) maintain, chiefly on the ground of ¿öwavi instead of ¿öwavi in v.26. that the election was by ballot. But this view harmonizes neither with Jewish usage nor with the context (*show of these two the one whom Thou hast chosen '); and while avrois in v.26 is the correct reading, the rendering 'for them' is legitimate.

11 it is noteworthy that the ancient Syriac translation of Eus. substitutes Tolmat and the ancient Armenian version Barrolmat (Bartholomew) for Muthéas (when referring to him as one of the Seventy), embodying probably a very early local tradition that Matthias bore this additional name. See Nestle in Expos. Times, ix, 588 (Sept. 1898). This Tolmai or Bartholomew may have been a brother or other relative of Bartholomew may have been a brother or other relative of Bartholomew may have been a brother or other relative of Bartholomew may have been a brother or other relative of Bartholomew may have b nael, owing to the two names having nearly the same meaning.* A tradition preserved by Niceph. Call. (HE ii. 40) represents Matthias as labouring in Ethiopia; and in the apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias † (assigned to the 2nd cent.), Matthias evangelizes the Ethiopian man-eaters, from whom he is delivered by St. Andrew. See ANDREW. Another ancient tradition assigns to Matthias Jerusalem as scene of ministry and place of burial (Pseudo-Hipp. in Combesis, Auct. Nov.).

The Gnosticism of Basilides, or of his followers, was professedly based on the παραδόσεις of Matthias, which the Basilidians held to embody instruction secretly received by Matthias from our Lord (Philosophoumena, vii. 20). This work is probably identical with a Gospel of Matthias referred to by Origen (Hom. in Luc. i.) and by Eus. (HE iii. 25), who includes it among spurious works cited by heretics under names of the apostles.;

in Syria is of different shapes, but the most common has a long arm for breaking up the ground, and a radition originated in a confusion excasioned by a possible early anticipation of the double later identification (1) of Bartholomew with Nathanael, and (2) of Nathanael with Matthias—a confusion which might lead to Matthias being identified with a Bartholomew.

*John Lightfoot had previously (Com. on Ac. in loc.) regarded this identification as tenable, but preferred on the whole to identify Nathanael with the Apostle Bartholomew.

† So the oldest MS, which Tisch, follows; some later MSS substitute Matthew for Matthias. Lipsius, however (Apocr. Apos. iii. 258), regards these Ethiopian traditions as really referring to Mathew.

W. Carslaw. MAUL. — In Pr 2518 the Arab. Version gives mikma at for maul (702). It is a stick for striking a person on the head as a mark of disgrace, but it may also mean a club. Clubs are always carried by the shepherds of Lebanon, slung from the wrist by a thong or cord. The head of the club is round and heavy, and is sometimes studded with iron spikes. The common name for it in Lebanon is spikes. The common name for it in Levelium and dabûs; in Egypt, nabût. In Jer 51²⁰ the Heb. 120 is tr: in RV 'battle-axe,' and in the marg. 'maul.' In the Arab. VS it is fûs, an axe, not wallike 120 in sound. W. CARSLAW.

MAUZZIM.—The text of the AV of Dn 1128 contains the title 'the God of forces': the marg. has 'Heb. Mauzzim, or Gods protectors.' The same Heb. word בְּעֵנִים occurs in the beginning of the next verse. Our marg, note may be traced to Theodotion's rendering, hear many be traced to Inter-ded to the state of the state of the does not repeat in v. . The Vulg. is more con-sistent: 'Deum autem Maozim . . . et faciet ut muniat Maozim.' The LXX has no trace of this inclination to find a proper name here: in v.38 the present reading is $\tilde{\epsilon}\theta\nu\eta$ loxupd, and in v. $\delta \chi \tilde{\nu} \rho \omega \mu a$ loxupd; but Jerome, in his Commentary on Daniel, states that its rendering in v. $\delta u u u$ was deum fortissimum [Is $\tilde{\epsilon}\theta\nu\eta$, a corruption of $\theta\epsilon \delta v$?]. Aquila has $\theta\epsilon \delta v$ loxuu. The Rhemish Version follows the Medium (1) Το Rhemish Version follows the Vulg.: 'But he shall worship the god Maozim.... And he shall do this to fortify Maozim,' etc. Luther's Bible is under the same influence, 'seinen the same in the same Gott Mäuzim . . . stärken Mäuzim,' as is also the Authorized Dutch Version, but not quite to the same extent, 'den god Mauzzim . . . vastigheden der sterkten.' The Pesh. has 'strong god . . . strong fortress.'

It is now universally agreed that Mauzzim is not a proper name. Hitzig proposed to divide the word into two, reading o; wo (which at Is 23' is the designation of Tyre), and taking o; wo seems unnecessary. 'The god of fortresses,' v. ", and 'the strongest fortresses,' v. ", of our RV are an adequate rendering. The only remaining dispute is as to who was meant by 'the god of fortresses.' is as to who was meant by 'the god of fortresses.' Livy (xli. 20) states that Antiochus Epiphanes—whose deeds Daniel here depicts—began to build a splendid temple at Antioch in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus. Hence it has been inferred that this is 'the god of fortresses.' Again, 2 Mac 62 informs us that he re-dedicated the temple at Jerusalem to Jupiter Olympius. And this has given rise to the conjecture that the Olympian Jupiter is the one referred to. With equal reason might the same verse induce us to fix on Jupiter Hospitalis. A yet more doubtful conjecture is that Mars was intended. And, on all grounds, Layard's suggestion must be put aside. He was inclined towards the Assyrian Venus, who is represented as 'standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower or mural coronet.' Perhaps the choice, if a choice must be made, lies between Jupiter Capitolinus and Zeòr Holuevs, 'the gnardian of the city,' the family god of the Seleucids, to whom there was an altar on the Acropolis at Athens, whose claims are strenuously maintained by G. Hoffmann and Behrmann. In point of fact the evidence is not sufficient to justify a of fact the evidence is not sufficient to justify a

As curiosities of exegesis may be mentioned the view of Sir Isaac Newton and others, that the Mauzzim of Dn 11²⁸ are protectors or guardians, the verse being a prediction that the doctrine of guardian angels should be introduced by the Roman Antichrist, and Pfeiffer's view that 'the idol of the Mass' is intended. J. TAYLOR.

MAW (Anglo-Sax. maga, the stomach).—This old name for the stomach is used in Dt 18³ as the tr. of 772 in its only occurrence. RV uses the same word in Jer 51³⁴ for AV 'belly' as tr. of 1772 in its only occurrence also. The tr. in Dt 18³ is from Tindale, who uses the word also in his exposition of Mt 7¹⁵ 'Your prayer is but pattering without all affection; your singing is but roaring to stretch out your maws (as do your other gestures and rising at midnight), to make the meat sink to the bottom of the stomach, that he may have perfect digestion, and be ready to devour afresh against the next refection'; and Coverdale uses it in translating 1 K 2234, 'A certayne man bended his bowe harde, and shott the kynge of Israel betwene the mawe and the longes.' MAZITIAS (A Maţırlas, B Zeirlas), 1 Es 9¹⁶ = MATTITHIAH, Ezr 10⁴⁵.

MAZZAROTH (מְּרָהוֹית).—This word occurs only in Job 38²², and seems early to have been regarded by commentators as being connected with the mine (mnzzālūth) of 2 K 23°, as is indicated also by the LXX, which has Maζουρώθ in both passages. In the AVm Mazzārūth is rendered by 'the twelve signs,' and in the RV by 'the signs of the Zodiac,' both of which may be regarded as the true significations of the word. Ges., who proposes the latter rendering, and suggests its identity with mazzāloth ('lodgings'), compares the Chaldee mazzāloth would therefore be the plural of the Hebrew equivalent of this Chaldee form, given in late Jewish works as קול (mazzāl), which was used to denote not only the single signs and the planets, but also their influence on the fate of men (Selden, de Dis Syr., Synt. i c. 1). If the etymology of Mazzāroth (= mazzāloth) be, as Ges. suggests, the Mazzārôth (=mazzālôth) be, as Ges. suggests, the same as that of the Arab. manzil, 'lodging-place,' the root would be nāzal, one of the meanings of which is 'to descend,' i.e. 'to alight at a place in order to sojourn there.' Another etymology, however, has been revived by Jensen, who compares Mazzārôth (=mazzālôth) with the Assyr. manzalti.*

'(I) the planet Jupiter approach,' etc. etc., etc., ident ina same ina manzalit-tunu izzazzini parakke-tunu inamnaru, dajdu inamnaru, tuni in the heavens in their station remain parakke-hanu dahdu inammaru,

'the gods in the heavens in their station remain,
their shrines will see plenty.' (WAI iii. 50, 35-36).

This comparison, however, is not without its difficulties, as the Assyr. word is for manzazti, from nazāzu, 'to stand,' whence also manzazu, 'station,' 'resting-place.' This, of course, would disconnect mazzāroth and mazzāloth from the late singular form mazzal.* Other renderings of mazzāroth Other renderings of mazzāroth that may be noted are the Syriac (Peshitta) agalta, 'the wain,' or 'the great bear'; 'Lucifer, the morning star' (Procopius of Gaza); 'stars' generally, and 'a northern constellation' (Aben Ezra and R. Levi ben Gershon), etc.

The Babylonian names of the twelve signs of the Zodiac are given in vol. i. p. 192 (footnote), and the inhabitants of that country were accustomed to observe them and to note the dates when the moon and the planets entered them, for the purpose of forecasting events, drawing up horoscopes, etc. These people were therefore wont to see Mazzaroth 'led forth in their season,' and the passage in Job where this word occurs would seem to point to the author of the book being as well acquainted as they with the wonders of the starry heavens. MBADOW.—This purely English word (Anglo-Saxon, Madu, Madewe) occurs in the AV only in Gn 41^{2.18} and Jg 20²⁵.

1. In Gn 41^{2.18} ing (LXX $d\chi\epsilon$), the word trd

'meadow' is of Egyptian (demotic $a\chi u$) origin (cf. Jerome on Is 19'; Wiedemann, Sammlung die Bücher Mose's, p. 18; Ebers, Egypten und die Bücher Mose's, p. 338), and believed to mean the reed-grass (so RV) which in Lower Egypt borders the Nile and its branches, together with the marsh-lands, during floods.† As suggested, also, in the art. MEADOW in Smith's DB, the word may denote the pasturage afforded by the growing crops during high Nile. But the pasturage of cattle was carried on extensively in Lower Egypt under the Old Empire. In modern Egypt cattle are fed in cultivated clover fields for there are but few partural meadows of fields, for there are but few natural meadows of wild grass; but in ancient Egypt it was otherwise. As we know from numerous Egyptian tablets, cattle were fed on the stretches of marshy land in the Delta, whether beds of old rivers or watercourses, or such extensive shallows as that of Lake Menzaleh, now covered by brackish water, but once forming to a large extent one of the most productive tracts in Egypt.: The dream of Pharaoh, therefore, in which the fat cattle were seen to feed in the reed-grass by the river side was the natural suggestion to the mind during sleep of a custom which he may often have witnessed.

2. Jg 20²³ (MT ς ς ς ς ς ; Β Μαρααγάβε, Α δυσμῶν τῆς Γαβαά; Vulg. ab occidentali urbis parte; AV It is worthy of note that the Assyr. intermediate form mazzarti has not yet been found, and that, if found, it would be singular, like manzalit. On the other hand, the plural, if regular, would be manzalit. On the other hand, the plural, if regular, would be manzalit. (I or r changing back to z before a vowel), and ought to have been borrowed by the Hebrews, not as mazzaroth or mazzaloth, but as mazzaroth. Both Heb. forms, therefore, if borrowed from Assyr., must have come from the Assyr. singular without regard to the original root of the word.

† 171% occurs also in Job 811 (LXX másupec; AV, RV 'rush,' RVm 'papyrus'), and should be restored in Hos 1315 (מַיִּחָשׁ for D'ng (Oxf. Heb. Lex.), or read יווני מיני (Wellb. and Nowack)). 'Meadows' is introduced by RV also in Is 197 (AV 'paper

readows: is introduced by RV also in is 19' (AV 'paper reeds'). The Heb. is $n n_1 = a \cdot a \cdot a_1 = 1$. LXX (so also Syr.) has $a_2 = a \cdot a_2 = 1$. It is just possible that they may have read or misread nink for $n n_2 = 1$. The LXX reads $a_2 = a_2 = 1$ also in Sir 40¹⁶ (AV 'weed,' RV 'sedge'). The recently recovered Heb. text has $n n n_2 = 1$. which is prob. a corruption (see König in Expos. Times, Aug. 1899, p. 613 f.).

'meadows of Gibeah,' RVm 'meadow of Geba,' RV Maareh-geba). Much uncertainty attaches to the recorrect tru of this passage. By alteration of the vowel-points adopted in MT, the word signifies a cave' (πητρ). So Studer, following the Peshitta. This is a probable enough translation, as the position of Gibeah (which is the correct reading, not Geba), high up amongst the hills of Central Palestine, puts the idea of meadows in connexion therewith out of the question. On the other hand, caves amongst the limestone rocks are not infrequent in Palestine. Of Gibeah (Tuleil el-Fûl) Tristram says: 'Dreary and desolate, scarce any ruins, save a confused mass of stones, which form a sort of cairn on the top [of the hill]. As we recall also the hideous deed of the men of Gibeah,

Gibeah.' See MAAREH-GEBA. E. HULL.

MEAH.—See HAMMEAH.

MEAL.—1. A repast, the portion of food eaten at one time. The word is used only in the compound 'Mealtime' (Ru 2¹⁴), where it is the tr. of 574n ng, literally 'the time of eating.' See FOOD in

vol. ii. p. 41 f.

2. The substance of grain ground but not sifted. Our English word is from the Anglo-Saxon melu, which is connected with the Gothic malan, 'to grind.' The word is used as the tr. of ngg kemah, which signifies meal in general, sometimes used with the genitive of the kind of grain from which it is made, as of the 12 th ephah presented by the husband for his wife in the Jealousy Offering, Nu 515. In this case, the homely nature of the material is supposed to typify the humiliation of the woman accused. When used to represent fine flour it is combined with no as in Gn 18°.

Three scales of this fine meal (probably about 4 pecks) were used by Sarah to make cakes for the angelic visitors at Mamre. The mention of the same quantity, drespon of a rola, in the parable of the leaven, Mt 13²⁸, Lk 13²¹, seems to show that this was the ordinary quantity to prepare at one time. Kemah and soleth are sometimes contrasted, as in the account of Solomon's daily provision, which consisted of 60 kors (=622½ bushels) of meal and 30 kors of soleth (1 K 42). Meal was the breadstuff used by the poor. The widow of Zarephath had only a handful of kemah in her meal-tub, 1 K 1712. It was with kemah that Elisha healed the poisonous pottage, 2 K 44. Meal was brought as part of the tribute to David on his because king part of the tribute to David on his becoming king in Hebron, 1 Ch 12*.

In the prophetic writings 'meal' is used in several figures. The humbling of the Daughter of Babylon was to be shown by her being reduced to the work of grinding meal as a sign of servitude, Is 472. Hosea represents the unprofitableness of the evil works of Israel as sowing the wind, reaping the whirlwind whose bud (תְּבֶּי) makes no meal (Hos 87). There is a peculiar force here in the assonance 'én lō zémah běli ya'dseh kémah. For other particulars see BREAD and FOOD.

In the RV the word occurs very much more frequently in connexion with the minhāh or meal offering, Lv 2^{1st} and many other passages. This is called 'meat offering' in the AV. See OFFERING and SACRIFICE.

The Israelites seem to have employed mills from a very early period, but it is remarkable that they were apparently unknown in Egypt until a com-paratively late time. There is no word which unequivocally signifies 'mill' in the language of the Old or Middle Empire, as far as we know.

Their grain seems to have been pounded or brayed. The word kemb occurs in a list of offerings at Denderal as a kind of flour. In Ethiopic k'amihi is used for 'pulse.' The word ke-me is used for meal in several cuneiform texts (see Strassmaier, Inschr. v. Nabonidus, Leipzig, 1889).

A. MACALISTER. MEAL-OFFERING is the rendering substituted by the OT revision for AV 'meat-offering' (τιρ.). The American Revisers further record their preference for 'meal-offering' in Jer 14¹² 17²⁶ 33¹⁸ 41⁵. In these passages our RV reads 'oblation' with 'meal-offering' in the margin. For details see general article SACRIFICE.

MEAN.—The verb to 'mean' (from Anglo-Sax. maenan to intend, tell, and connected with 'mind,' the root being man to think) signifies sometimes to intend, purpose: Gn 50³⁰ 'But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good'; Is 3³⁵ 'What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces, and grind the faces of the poor?'; 10⁷ 'Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so'; Ac 21¹³ 'What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart?'; Ac 27³ 'We launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia'; 2 Co 8¹³ 'For I mean not that other men be eased and ye burdened.' Cf. Shaka. Merry 'Wives, V. ii. 15, 'No man means evil but the devil, and we shall know him by his horns.'

The subst. meaning, which in Dn 818, 1 Co 1411 signifies 'understanding,' 'sense,' as in its modern use, expresses 'purpose,' 'intention,' in 1 Mac 154 'My meaning also being to go through the country'

'My meaning also being to go through the country' (βούλομαι δὲ ἐκβῆναι κατὰ τὴν χώραν; RV 'I am minded to land in the country'). Cf. Jer 44²⁵ Cov. 'Purposly have ye set up youre owne good meanynges, and hastely have ye fulfilled youre owne intente'; Hall, Works ii. 103, 'Good meanings have oft-times proved injurious.'

The subst. 'mean' (from Old Fr. meien, moien; Lat. medius) signified originally something that was in the middle. Thus 'lymme's Calvin's Genesis (1578), p. 678 '[Moses] was a meane betweene the Patriarches and the Apostles'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 334, 'He that punissheth whyle he is angry, shall never kepe that meane which is betwene to moche and to lyttell'; Barlowe, Dialoge, 103, 'God loved the people so entyerly, that of theym he chose bysshoppes, preistes, and deacons, to offer speciall sacrifices for the clensynge of theyr synnes, and to be as meanes betwene of theyr synnes, and to be as meanes betwene hym and them'; and Knox, Works, iii. 98, 'Is he who discendit from heaven and vouchsaffit to be conversant with synneris, commanding all soir vexit and seik to cum unto him (who, hanging upon the Cross, prayit first for his enemyis), becum now so untractable, that he will not heir us without a person to be a meane? From this arose easily the sense of instrument, which is often sing, 'a mean' in the king of that day there in AV itself it is always plu., 'means.' Thus Lever, Sermons, 79, 'Of God surely thou hast received it, by what messenger or means so ever thou came unto it,' and Knox, Works, iii. 299, The instrumente and meane wherwith Christe Jesus used to remove and put awaye the horrible Jesus used to remove and put awaye the horrible feare and anguysshe of his Disciples, is his only worde'; and in AV, Wis 8¹³ 'By the means of her I shall obtain immortality' (RV 'because of her'); 2 Co 1¹¹ 'the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons' (RV 'by means of many'); Rev 13¹⁴ 'by the means of those miracles' (RV 'by reason of the signs'). This word is sometimes also an adj., of which we have such examples in AV as in the mean while. 1 K 18²⁶ In 4³¹ Ro 9¹⁵. in AV as in the mean while, 1 K 18⁴⁵ Jn 4³¹, Ro 2¹⁵; in the mean time, 1 Mac 11⁴¹, Lk 12¹; and in the mean season, 1 Mac 11¹⁴ 15¹⁵. There is another adj. 'mean,' which is traced and is possibly connected with Lat. communis, though Skeat counts that very doubtful. This word was early confused with the distinct Anglo-Sax. word macne, 'false,' 'wicked,' with the sax. word mache, 'laise, 'wicked, with the result, that from signifying merely peasant-born, of common origin, it came to express 'low-minded,' 'base' (the word 'base' has a parallel history, see BASE), and again 'niggardly,' 'penurious.' In AV the word is used only in the sense of 'low-born,' 'common': Pr 2229 'Seest thou a man diligent in his business! he shall stand before men before the shall not stand before men men' (urb.) kings; he shall not stand before mean men' ('ut' ישבים, lit. 'before obscure persons' as AVm and RVm); Is 2º 'And the mean man is bowed down, and the great man humbleth himself,' Heb. σγκ opp. to ψκ, so 5¹⁵ 31⁸; Ac 21³⁰ 'a citizen of no mean city' (οὐκ dσήμου πόλεως). Cf. Pref. to AV 1611, 'If any man conceit, that this is the lot and portion of the meaner sort onely, and that Princes portion of the meaner sort onery, and that Frinces are priviledged by their high estate, he is deceived'; Elyot, Governour, i. 25, 'It is expedient and also nedefull that under the capitall governour be sondry meane authorities'; Knox, Hist. 392, 'When scarcely could be found ten in a Country that rightly knew God, it had been foolishnesse to have graved either of the Nobilitie or of the to have craved, either of the Nobilitie or of the

The adv. meanly is found in 2 Mac 15²⁸ 'If I have done well and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto.' The meaning is 'moderately' ($\mu\epsilon\tau\rho l\omega s$). Cf. Spenser, Mother Hubberds Tale, 297—

'The Husbandman was meanly well content Triall to make of his endevourment'; and Shaks. Com. of Errors, I. i. 59-

'Thy wife, not meanly proud of two such hoys,

MEASURES.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT (Anglo-Sax. mete, perhaps from mete to measure, but more probably connected with Lat. mandere to chew) is in AV food in general, not, as now, flesh food only. Thus 2 Es 12⁵¹ 'But I remained still in the field seven days, as the angel commanded me; and did eat only in those days of the flowers of the field, and had my meat (esca) of the herbs. The 'meat-offering' contained no of the herbs.' The 'meat-offering' contained no flesh, but was composed of meal and oil. Fuller, Holy State, 185, says, 'A rich man told a poore man that he walked to get a stomach for his meat: And I, said the poore man, walk to get meat for my stomach'; cf. Adams on 2 P 1' 'He feeds the ravens, and the young lions seek their meat at him.' In their Preface the AV translators say of the Scripture, 'It is not a pot of manna, or a cruse of oyl, which were for memory onely. or for a meals meat or two, but as it were onely, or for a meals meat or two, but as it were a shower of heavenly bread, sufficient for a whole host, be it never so great.' So Hall, Works, i. 806, 'There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, so deare bought as this broth of Jacob.' As the word signifies whatever is eaten, it may be applied to flesh, as in Fuller, Holy Warre, 212, 'Where he giveth away the meat he selleth the sauce'; so in Gn 274.7.31 of the venison Esau prepared for Isaac, and 279.14 of the goat's flesh which Rebekah prepared.

cocurs some ten times in the Apocr., also in Fr 236 'neither desire thou his dainty meats,' where the Heb. is simply 'his dainties,' as RV; Ac 15²⁹ 'meats offered to idols,' where the Gr. is 'offerings to idols' (εἰδωλόθυτα, RV 'things sacrificed to idols'); and in Mk 7¹⁹, I Co 6¹³δω, I Ti 4³, He 9¹⁰ 13⁹, where the Gr. is always βρώματα, things to eat. Cf. Rhem. N.T. Preface, 'When we are litle ones, let us not covet the meates of the elder sort,' and the Rhem. tr. of Lk 9¹² 'Dimisse the multitudes, that going into townes and villages here about, they may have lodging, and finde meates,' Jn 4⁸ 'For his Disciples were gone into the citie to bie meates.

MEDAN (170).—Name of a son of Abraham and Keturah, Gn 25² (B Maða μ , A Maða ν)=1 Ch 1²² (B Maða μ , A Maða ν). The word is probably to be identified with Madan, the god of some Arab tribe, best known through the proper name 'Abd-Al-Madān,' worshipper of Al-Madān'; the tribe or family called Banā 'Abd-Al-Madān was proverbial for various sorts of excellence in the earliest Arabic known to us (Kāmil of Al-Mubarrad, i. 56, 72). Unlike most of the names of the Arabic deities, the word appears to have an appropriate etymology, and to mean simply 'object of worship'; and with this sense the employment of the article accords, as well as the alternative vocaliza-tion, Al-Mudān (Sakt Al-Zand of Abu'l-Alā, ed. Boulak, i. 47). The occurrence of the name of this god in a context in which we expect the name of a tribe, implies that the word was used as a national tribe, implies that the work was used as a national name also; and the word Kais is precisely parallel to Madān as being used for both a nation and a god, and as taking the article in the latter application. The seat of the worship of Al-Madān appears to have been Yemen (Tāj Ai-Arūs, s.v.), whereas the descendants of Keturah appear to be far away from S. Arabia, but this may be due to the migrafrom S. Arabia; but this may be due to the migra-tion of a tribe; and indeed the word occurs as a geographical name in N. Arabia (Yākūt and Al-Bekri). D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

MEDEBA (מִירְבָּא 'gently flowing waters,' Nu 21²⁰, Jos 13^{9. 16}, 1 Ch 19⁷, Is 15²).—A town in the Mishor,* east of Jordan, about 1½ hour S. of

* Mishor (השרים Dt 310 445, Jos 139 16.17.21 208, Jer 488.21; translated by AV 'plain,' or 'plain country,' by RV 'plain,' m. 'tableland') is the name given to one of the divisions of Eastern Palestine, comprising the country between Heshbon and the Arnon, assigned to Reuben. It is a treeless plateau

Heshbon on the Roman road from that place to Kerak. It originally belonged to Moab, but was taken from them by Sihon, who was in his turn dispossessed by the children of Israel (Nu 21²⁴⁻²⁸). It was assigned to Reuben (Jos 13⁹⁻¹⁶, where v.⁹ should be translated 'all the tableland—Medeba to Dibon,' and v.¹⁶ 'all the tableland as far as Medeba'). The Syrians who came to assist the children of Ammon vitabed at Medeba and force the dren of Ammon pitched at Medeba, and, from the account of Joab's battle with them, it would seem that the city was then in the hands of the children of Ammon (1 Ch 19⁶⁻¹⁸). Since David's time (2 S 8²) Moab must have regained possession of the city and territory around, for, according to the Moabite Stone (line 8), Omri took possession of [the land of] Mehedeba, and Israel dwelt therein during his Mehedeba, and Israel dwelt therein during his days and half his son's days, forty years; but Mesha recovered the territory, and rebuilt the cities which had been held by Omri and his son Ahab. Medeba is (perhaps) named in line 30, but the stone is here defaced, and the reading not quite certain. Joram's attempt in company with Jehoshaphat to recover these cities (2 K 3) was but partially successful, and the Moabites remained in them unchallenged until the prosperous mained in them unchallenged until the prosperous reign of Jeroboam II., when they were driven to the south of the Arnon. Medeba is mentioned as belonging to Moab in Is 152, but not in Jer 48an omission which is the more remarkable, as the list of Moabite cities in Jer is more full than that in Isaiah. Where by comparison with Isaiah we might expect to find it, occurs Madmen (Jer might expect to find it, occurs Maamen (Jer 48"), a name occurring only in that verse. See Madmen. The LXX renderings are Jos 13° Δαιδαβάν Β°, Μαιδαβάν Β°, Μαιδαβά Β°, Μαιδαβά Α. The word is omitted in v. 16. 1 Ch 197 Μαιδαβά Β, Μηδαβά Α, Βαιδαβά Β. The text of Nu 21°0 is uncertain; for the last clause LXX has $\pi \hat{v} \hat{\rho} \in \pi^1$ Μωάβ, Pesh. κητητη. The η of $\pi \nu$, which has been marked with point by the Mass retes in retreated by the point. a point by the Massoretes, is not regarded by the LXX, and neither they nor Pesh. read Medeba. In Is 15¹ τῆς Μωαβείτιδος (B) represents the Medeba of MT.

In Maccabæan times John, the eldest son of Mattathias, was killed by a robber clan which lived at Medeba. The name of this clan was Jambri or Ambri. How Jonathan avenged the death of his brother is related in 1 Mac 0³⁸⁻⁴² and Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2, 4. John Hyrcanus laid siege to Medeba, and took it with difficulty (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1). Alexander Jannæus afterwards took it along with others from the Arabians, and Hyrcanus II. promised to restore them to Aretas (ib. XIII. xv. 4, xiv. i 4)

The city appears to have been a flourishing Christian centre during the Byzantine period. It was the seat of a bishopric, and was represented at the Council of Chalcedon. After remaining desolate for centuries it was occupied in 1880 by a colony of Christians from Kerak, and some Latin fathers have established a mission there. In digging for foundations of houses many ancient remains have been brought to light. Besides the large pool with solid walls mentioned by several travellers, the remains of gates, towers, and four churches, besides some beautiful mosaics, have been discovered. An interesting account of a visit to these ruins is contained in PEFSt for July 1895, and Père Séjourné has written a full article on Medeba in the Revue Biblique for Oct. 1892. A remarkable mosaic map of Christian Palestine and Egypt has also been discovered, a description of which appears in PEFSt for July 1897, being affording pasture for flocks, and at one time suited for the culture of the vine (Is 16^9). The number and extent of the ruins in this district show that it was once thickly inhabited. The Bedawin in their black tents are now the chief inhabitants; see G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 585, 548.

MEDES (τρ, Μήδοι).—In Gn 102 Madai is a son of Japheth, and is associated with Gomer and Javan. The Assyr. form of the name is Mada, but when we first meet with it in the annals of Shalmaneser II. (c. B.C. 840) it is written Amada. Hadad-nirari III. (c. B.C. 800) overthrew Khanaziruka, king of the Mata, who inhabited Matiène, S.W. of the Caspian; W. of the Mata was Parsuas of Lake Urumiyeh. It is doubtful whether we should identify Mata and Mada as variant forms of the same name, or regard the Mata as a division of the Madâ; at all events, Hadad - nirari III.
also employs the name Madâ, and it is the only form of the name henceforth found in the cunei-Median states E. of Zagruti or the Zagros, sending one of his generals against 'the Medes at the rising of the sun' (B.C. 743); and Sargon in B.C. 713 subdued a number of Median chieftains, one of whom was the chief of Partakanu. Esarhaddon divides Partakanu into the two provinces of Partakka and Partakka, and describes it as 'remote.' In the early part of his reign Assyria was threatened by a combined attack on the part of the Medes, Kimmerians, Saparda (Sepharad), and 'Kaztarit, king of Karu-Kassi'; but the Assyr. king carried the war into the enemy's country, and the defeat of the Median 'city-lords' in the far east relieved him of all danger from the Median tribes. A portion of the Kimmerians, however, took possession of the old kingdom of Ellipi, north of Elam, where a new power arose, with its capital in Ecbatana (Pers. Hangmatana). In the cuneiform inscriptions the Kimmerians are called Umman Manda or nomad 'Barbarians' (Goiim in OT), and the resemblance of Manda to Mada caused the two words to be confused together by the classical writers.

The Medes, like the Kimmerians, belonged to the Iranian branch of the Aryan race, the Persians being a kindred tribe, which pushed farther south towards the Persian Gulf. According to Herodotus (vii. 62, i. 101), they were called Arians by their neighbours, and were divided into six tribes: the Busæ, Paretakeni (Assyr. Partakanu), Struchates, Arizanti, Budii, and Magi. The Magi, however, seem rather to have been a priestly caste. The Assyr. inscriptions show that the Medes obeyed no central authority, but were divided, like the Greeks, into a number of small states, each under the rule of its own 'city-lord.' Consequently the classical belief in a 'Median empire' was groundless, and was really due to the confusion between the names Mada and Manda.

A recently discovered inscription of Nabonidos has informed us that the destruction of Nineveh (B.C. 606) was brought about by the Manda, not by the Madá or Medes. We have also learned from the cuneiform texts that it was the Manda who devastated Mesopotamia, destroying Harran and its temple of the Moon-god; that Astyages (Istuvigu in cuneiform) was king of the Manda, and that the revolt of Cyrus was against the Manda, and not against the Medes. Medes may have been included among the Manda or 'Barbarians,' but the term was primarily applied to the northern hordes who-had swarmed across the Caucasus into W. Asia, and were called Kimmerians (see GOMER) and Scythians by the Greeks. The kingdom of Ecbatana was founded by these

The 'Median' kings of Herodotus and Ctesias are alike artificial creations. Herodotus makes the Median monarchy begin with Dêiokes, B.C. 710, at a time when the Assyr. empire was at the height of its power, and Sargon was punishing the 'city-lords' of the Medes. Deiokes is the Daiukku of the Assyr. inscriptions, a vassal-chief under the king of the Manna (Minni), who was carried cap-tive to Hamath by Sargon in B.C. 715. Phraortes, who is said to have succeeded Dêiokes, is Fra-wartish, who carried on wars against the Persians and the Assyrians, and called himself Xathrites (Kaztarit). His successor Cyaxares may be Kaztarit, or he may have been a genuine king of Ecbatana, and the actual predecessor of Astyages. At all events Astyages was a king of the Manda, and his conquest by his rebel vassal Cyrus took place in B.C. 549. On Arphaxad king of the Medes (Jth 11), see ARPHAXAD.

ably comes from a Persian source, and the chronological arrangement of it is even more artificial than that of the list of Herodotus. Lenormant seems to have been right in suggesting that two of the kings in it, Artæus and Astibaras, are the kings of Ellipi, Rita (Dalta) and Ispabara, who were contemporaries of Sargon and Sennacherib.

After the capture of Samaria by Sargon in B.C. After the capture of Samaria by Sargon in B.C. 722, some of the Israelites were transported to the cities of the Medes' (2 K 17⁶ 18¹¹). This probably took place after Sargon's campaign against the Medes (B.C. 713), when he penetrated as far as the distant land of Bikni. Isaiah (13¹⁷ 21³) calls on the Medes and Elamites to overthrow Babylon (cf. Jer 25²³); and Jeremiah (51^{11, 26}) speaks of the 'kings' of the Medes combining with Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz to destroy the Bab. empire. At this time it would seem, therefore. At this time it would seem, therefore, that the Medes were still governed by a number of different chiefs. In Elam we must see Anzan, the ancestral kingdom of Cyrus, which an Assyr. tablet states was equivalent to 'Elam'; the invasion of Babylonia, referred to by Jeremiah, may have been one which took place in the reign of Nergal-sharezer, not that of Cyrus. Cyrus, however, united the Medes and Persians under his sway; Gobryas, the governor of Kurdistan, whom he made the first governor of Babylonia after its conquest, was a Mede, according to the classical writers; and Mazares and Harpagos, who conquered Ionia for Cyrus, were both of Medic descent. Hence the Ionian Greeks spoke of 'Medes' rather than of 'Persians.' Gomates, who retrieved to be Bardes (Smerdis), the son of Cyrus, and usurped the throne of Cambyses, was a Magian, and therefore also of Median origin; and, in the troubles which followed his murder, Media endeavoured to secure her independence under Frawartish or Phraortes. Frawartish, however, was at length defeated in a pitched battle, and, after being taken prisoner near Rhages, was impaled at Echatana. After the destruction of the Persian empire, Media was divided into Media Atropatene (so named from the satrap Atropates), which corresponded with the modern Azerbijan, and included the Parsuas of the Assyr. monuments, and Media Magna to the south and east of it. Here were Ecbatana (now Hamadan), and Bagistana (now Behistun) in the ancient territory of Ellipi. Bagistana is probably the place called Bit-ili or Bethel by Sargon. Media had thus come to extend widely beyond its limits in the Assyr. age, when the Medes inhabited little more than Matiênê and the district to the E. of it, and S. of the Caspian, in which Raga or Rhages (now Ra) was situated. They were, in fact, mountaineers, and hence had the reputation of being brave and war-like, delighting in arms, in brilliant clothing, and in carrying off booty from their more settled neighbours. From the Persian monuments we gather that they let the beard grow, and wore caps, long robes with full sleeves, and shoes. Their religion was a form of Zoroastrian fire-worship, and they left the bodies of the dead to be devoured by wild beasts or birds of prey. (See J. V. Prašek, Medien und das Haus des Kyaxares, 1890).

INTRODUCTION.—1. Meaning and use of the term 'Mediator.'—The word 'mediator' (Gr. μεσίτης) is found only in NT, namely at Gal 31^{12,23}, 1 Ti 2⁵, He 8⁶ 9¹⁵ 12²⁴.* The verbal form (μεσίτεύω) occurs once, in He 6¹⁷. The derivation from the adjective μέσσε 'in the middle' merely suggests the idea of one who is found in the midst, or who enters or one who is found in the midst, or who enters into the middle. But usage gives a more specific meaning to the term. Thus we always find it standing for a person who in some way intervenes between two. This intervention is of two kinds: (1) in order to bring about a reconciliation where there has been division or enmity the thought in Job, and in St. Paul's use of the word; (2) quite apart from any notion of a previous quarrel, with the idea of drawing two together into a compact or covenant—the meaning in Hebrews in each of the three cases where it occurs. Moses was regarded as a mediator in a general sense, as coming between God and Israel, both to shield the people from the Divine severity, and to introduce God's law to their notice and effect their union with Him as a covenant people. The first of these ideas appears in Dt 5, where, while the word 'mediator' is not used, the idea is suggested by a cognate adverbial form (dra μέσον, Heb. [3]). Philo uses the word 'mediator' (μεσίτης) for Moses in the same connexion (Vit. Moys. iii. 19). Elsewhere Philo refers to speech as a 'mediator and intercessor' (de Somn. i. 22).

Josephus writes of Agrippa being a mediator between the people of Ilium (Ant. XVI. ii. 2).

2. The idea of mediation in religion.—While the word 'mediator' is rarely met with, the idea consistency in the idea consistency in the idea. tained in it is one of the most vital and influential thoughts in religion. Nearly every religion bears witness to it. Both priesthood and prophecy rest upon the conception of mediation—priesthood in the selection of certain men for approach to God and the reconciliation of the people with Him by means of sacrifice; prophecy in the sending of Divine messengers who are to deliver to the people the oracles they have received from heaven. The idea emerges in the lowest grades of civilization under the form of the medicine man, the rainmaker, the sorcerer, whose function, however, is rather to coerce than to conciliate inimical powers. While the purification of religion eliminates degraded, distorted, and superstitious forms of mediation, it does not destroy the essential idea, which is found more clearly and forcibly expressed in Christianity than in any other type of religion. So prominent and characteristic is the idea that we might define Christianity in the abstract as Theism plus Mediation—understanding the latter term to include all that is taught concerning the person and mission of Christ, for it is this idea that most distinguishes the religion of the NT from pure Theism. But Butler pointed out that the specially Christian idea of 'the appointment of a Mediator, and the redemption of the world by him, was analogous to many things in the constitution and course of nature' (Analogy, pt. ii. ch. v.).

i. MEDIATION IN PAGANISM.—Space will not permit of more than the briefest notice of this branch of the subject; and yet it is impossible to do justice to the great biblical doctrine of mediation without giving at least some attention to its position in the light of comparative religion.

1. Savage notions of mediation.—It has been pointed out that as in course of time the individual faculties in men were seen to be differentiated, some were held to be specially gifted with occult powers. These men came to be regarded with awe; they were not as other men. To them it was given to penetrate the unseen world, read the secrets of futurity, influence the supernatural powers with which primitive man in a dim way felt himself to be surrounded. In so low a race as the Australian aborigines, the medicine men are credited with the power of controlling all occult influences. This mysterious power is claimed among the Andaman Okopaids and the Peaimen of Guiana. In Melanesia it is known as mana, and is said to be imparted by cannibalism. This mana is conveyed by the medicine man to the charms he uses. A similar power was recognized among the N. American Indians. In the lowest condition, while the medicine man uses charms and spells, he does not invoke spirits. A higher stage is attained when he calls in the aid of ghosts, the totem animal belonging to an intermediate condition. In some savage communities demoniacal possession is supposed to confer priestly or mediatorial powers. Thus we learn from Tylor (Prim. Cult. ii. p. 121) that among the Patagonians persons afflicted with St. Vitus' dance were selected as magicians, and that among the Liberian tribes the Shamans brought up children liable to convulsions for the profession of magic (see King, The Supernatural, bk. ii. ch. iv.). The medium of modern spiritualism may be compared with the medicine man who has dealings with ghosts, the special gift with which the medium is credited leading him to be consulted by others as though he were a kind of mediator between ordinary mortals and the spirit world.

2. Civilized pagan notions of mediation. — All religions that contain a priesthood with functions not shared by the main body of the community predicate some form of mediation in connexion with that office. The priest sacrifices to, or intercedes with, the god to whom he is attached, on behalf of the people. But the two greatest faiths of the East have peculiar relations to this subject. The distinction between the priesthood and the laity is more pronounced and rigorous in Hinduism than it is in any other religion the world has ever known. This is owing to the institution of caste. Of the four great classes recognized in the Hindu system, Brāhmans, soldiers, agriculturists, and servants, the first consists of priests, and an important part of the Veda, the Brāhmanahs, is devoted to the ritual they are required to follow. Inasmuch as the observance of this ritual is regarded with favour by the gods, all classes of society benefit by the Divine com-placency thus secured; but the hopeless inferiority of the other castes destroys one important element in the mediatorial idea, the community of nature between the priest and the people which is essential to the NT idea of mediation set out in the Epistle to the Hebrews. On the other hand, the Brāhmanahs contain the idea of gods sacrificing, and so bring in the notion of mediation from another point of view. Thus in the Tandya-brāhmanahs it is stated that 'the Lord of creatures (prajā-pati) offered himself a sacrifice for the gods.'

The same idea emerges in the sacrifice of 'the primeval male.' Thus it is stated in the sāta-patha-brāhmanah, 'He who, knowing this, sacrifices with the Purusha-Medha, the sacrifice of the primeval male, becomes everything.' Monier-Williams regarded this as a witness to 'the original institution of sacrifice,' and 'typical of the one great voluntary sacrifice,' etc. (Hinduism, p. 36). On the other hand, it must be observed that the oldest Hindu sacrifices are not piacular, but simply consist of food offered to the gods. The idea of expiation came later, and with it the notion of mediation. But about the time of the rise of Buddhism, i.e. c. 500 B.C., the development of Hindu philosophy removed all belief in vicarious sacrifice and mediation from the mind of the speculative Brahman by developing a system of Pantheism. If man is one with God, there can be no room for mediation between man and God. And yet, again, the evolution of gods as forms or manifestations of Brahm introduces another form of mediation, the merits of an inferior god availing with one above him, that god's merits with one still higher, and so on in the ascending scale up to the highest. When we turn to Buddhism it would seem reasonable to regard the Buddha himself as a mediator, since he is seen sacrificing himself for others, even for animals. In former states of existence, it is said, he often gave himself as a substituted victim in place of doves and other innocent creatures, to satisfy hawks and beasts of prey. Then, having freed himself from the five great passions, he will help others to a like freedom by his teaching. Still, there are two features of Buddhism that render it inherently inconsistent with the idea of mediation. One is its protest against the Hindu caste system. Holding the equality of all men, it teaches that every one must suffer the consequences of his own deeds, either in the present life or in a future condition, and repudiates the possibility of a transference of responsibility or of an atoning sacrifice. The other feature is its virtual denial of God. But in practice the Buddha is deified, and then the Buddhist monk becomes a sort of priest, so that the notion of mediation comes round again from another quarter.

We may look for antecedents to the biblical doctrine of mediation in the religion of ancient Egypt, which was associated with a richly developed hierarchical system, the priests enjoying high rank above the common people, and occupying themselves with elaborate sacrificial performances; in the religion of Babylon, which, owing to the very early connexion between the Babylonians and Palestine (evidenced by the Tel el-Amarna tablets), must have been known in the latter country in primitive times; and in the Semitic religions of Canaan and Phœnicia, where, though, as Robertson Smith showed, the primitive notion of sacrifice suggested a common feast with the god, a communion, the piacular idea appeared later. Thus the prophets of Baal, in the time of Elijah, act as mediators, performing sacrificial functions on behalf of king and people.

ii. MEDIATION IN THE OLD TESTAMENT. — Mediation appears in various forms during the course of the OT history, in the specific regula-tions of the law, and in the teachings of the

1. Mediation in OT history.—In the oldest parts of the patriarchal history (JE) the head of the household officiates as the family priest, sacrificing and entering into covenants on behalf of his people, e.g. Abraham (Gn 12⁷⁻⁸ 15⁹⁻²¹), Isaac (Gn 25²²⁻²⁵), Jacob (Gn 33¹⁵⁻³⁰). It is to be observed that the later narrative (P) does not describe patriarchal altars and sacrifices. Although the earlier narrative in its written form is assigned to the period of the monarchy, this primitive style of religious observances speaks for its own antiquity, and for the probability that traditions embodying old customs are here preserved. Two incidents in particular, connected with the patriarchal narratives, bear especially on ancient views of mediation. Melchizedek, king of Salem, is introduced as a priest of God Most High (Gn 14¹⁸). He blesses Abraham, and receives a tenth of the spoil after the battle of the kings. This kingly priesthood of Melchizedek laid hold of the Jewish imagination, and reappeared in the Messianic ideal of Ps 110, to be recognized and elaborately discussed in its application to Jesus Christ by the author of He $(6^{20}-7)$. Then Abraham's pleading for the cities of the plain shows us the patriarch as a typical mediator. In this wonderful picture of earnest prayer we see mediation in the form of intercession. No sacrifice is offered, but the patriarch pleads on behalf of the doomed cities with singular persistence, and yet with profound humility. The promise of deliverance if a sufficient number of righteous men can be found, introduces another element of mediation, what we might call the passive mediation of the goodness of one, on account of which favour is shown to others,—in this case corresponding to our Lord's idea of His disciples as the salt of the earth (Mt 5¹²). Moses appears as a mediator in various relations. First, as the deliverer of his people he comes from Jehovah with a mandate to Pharaoli (Ex 3). This is an instance of the descending mediation, in which the mediator comes from God with a divine message. In the same way Moses appears as the lawgiver, receiving the law from Jehovah and giving it to the people. Kuenen maintains that the tradition about Moses as a lawgiver shows that, even if not a single one of his laws are extant, he was prominent as a revealer of God's will (Religion of Israel, i. 273). Moses appears repeatedly as the prophet through whom God communicates with Israel. Thus it is said (in the JE narrative), 'And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend' (Ex 33¹¹, see also Nu 12⁶⁻⁸). Then Moses also appears most conspicuously as the mediator in the other form of mediatorial work, the ascending mediation, representing the people to God in intercession. A striking instance of this mediation occurs in relation to the molten calf, when Moses beseeches God on behalf of the people (Ex 327-14), and even expresses a willingness to be himself blotted out of God's book if only the people may be forgiven their sin (Ex 32³²), appealing to the favour he has found with God as a ground for pleading the cause of the people he represents (Ex 33¹³, see Schultz, OT Theol. i. 138). A special form of mediation comes in with the idea of the theocratic king, who is both the representative of Jehovah to Israel and the representative of the people before God. David officiates in priestly apparel,—'girded with a linen ephod,' offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and blessing the people in the name of Jehovah (2 S 6¹⁴⁻¹⁸). A mediating position between God and the people appears in the Messianic Psalms, 2, 21, 72, 45 (where perhaps the king is called 'Elohim'), 110. The Chronicler, reflecting on the history from the Greek period, regards David's throne as divine; it is 'the throne of Jehovah' (1 Ch 293). Thus a preparation is made for regarding the Messiah of the nuture as a Mediator standing between God and future as a Mediator, standing between God and man, exalted above the common human standpoint, and brought near to God, but with a view

2. Priestly mediation.—The conception of a priesthood separate from the rest of the community implies mediatorial functions on the part of the priests for the benefit of the laity. In itself the idea of priesthood may be regarded absolutely, the priest being the man who has a right of approach to God, and on whom devolves the duty of protein to God, and on wholm devolves the duty of sacrificing, etc., quite apart from any consideration for others. In this sense Israel as a whole nation is 'holy' (Lv 11⁴⁰ 19², Nu 15⁴⁰), and is named a 'kingdom of priests' (Ex 19^{3, 5}). Similarly in late poetry the nation as a whole is said to consist of 'propheta' (Ps 105'). But this is exceptional. As a rule, the function of the priest is vicarious and mediatorial. In early times, however, this was not confined to any family or tribe. Gideon (Jg 6¹⁹⁻³⁴), Samuel (1 S 16²), and Elijah (1 K 18²⁰⁵.) performed the priestly function of offering sacrifices, and, in a mediatorial way, for the benefit of the people. When a priestly order was first recognized people. When a priestly order was hist recognized this was not necessarily of one tribe or family, as in the later system. Thus David made priests of his own sons and of the chief men of the kingdom (2 S 818 RV).* Zabud the son of the prophet Nathan is also described as a priest (1 K 48). In the oldest stratum of the law, the 'Book of the Covenant,' it is assumed that the Israelite offers his own as side or in the content of the law. his own sacrifices in primitive patriarchal style. Thus, in the directions Moses is to give to the children of Israel, we read, 'If thou make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stones, 'etc., and 'neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar' (Ex 20^{25,26}), where no priestly order is referred to. In the story of Micah (Jg 17. 18, assigned to JE) a certain Levite appears as a priest, but in a most primitive fashion, consecrated or installed by Micah in his own house, and serving as a domestic chaplain. The whole narrative reveals a condition of superstitious faith in the mediatorial efficacy of the mere presence of a priest. In the narrative of Eli and his sons (1 S 1. 211-3, assigned by Budde to E2 and by Kittel to SS, i.e. an Ephraimite history of Samuel and Saul compiled from various sources about the time of Hosea) we have a recognized priesthood at Shiloh, so completely accepted that the priests are resorted to in spite of their tyrannical and immoral behaviour. In Dt the priesthood of the Levites is regulated by law, and a complete system of priestly mediation by means of sacrifices, etc., elaborated. Jeremiah (!) enforces this by dwelling on the importance of the priesthood (Jer 33¹⁸⁻²⁸). Ezekiel, in pronouncing the degradation of the Levites who had been the priests of the various high places, and confining the priesthood to the house of Zadok, i.e. the Jerusalem order, concentrated the media-torial work in this body. Ezra's great reform carried Ezekiel's ideas out in practice, and advanced them still further in the development of the hierarchy. After the Exile, P and the complete Pentateuch established the mediatorial functions of the sons of Aaron, with the high priest at their head (Nu 3^{10.38} 4^{15.19.30} 17³ 18¹). Now the priesthood becomes the official representative of the people before God, only the priest being permitted to approach Jehovah. This approach depends on ceremonial purity; and the priest must be free from bodily blemish (Lv 21¹⁸⁵); but his function, unlike that of the prophet, does not depend on personal worth. As the mediator between Israel and Jehovah, the priest expiates guilt by prayer and sacrifice, and secures blessings for the people. Aaron the high priest is to 'bear the iniquity of the holy things which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts' (Ex 28²⁸)—a regulation which Schultz interprets as meaning that his surrender to God is a compensation for whatever duties towards God the actual Israel has unwittingly failed to perform. Similarly, the priests eat the flesh of the sin-offering 'to bear the iniquity of the congregation, and to make atonement for them' (Lv 10¹⁷).

The specific mediatorial functions of the priests and of the high priest are kept quite distinct. While apparently the high priest, being a fortioria priest, is at liberty to undertake any sacerdotal function if he chooses to do so, he cannot delegate the specific duties of his own office to any members of the ordinary priesthood, nor may any of them usurp his functions. For the purpose of representing the people before God, the priests are permitted a nearer approach than is allowed to the laity, they only being allowed to enter 'the sacred place, they only being allowed to enter 'the sacred place,' i.e. the first and larger portion of the sanctuary, while the high priest, and he only, can enter the inner chamber, 'the most sacred place.' The priests perform a multitude of services for the benefit of the community; but the chief of these is sacrificing, and it is at the altar that they appear most conspicuously as mediators between God and man. The old custom of private sacrific-ing by individuals is now entirely abandoned, and all sacrifices must be presented by the priests. The first act, indeed, still rests with the lay worshipper. It is he who procures the victim, brings it up to the temple, and in some cases kills it. Then it is taken over by the priests and their officers. In the case of the zebah (AV 'peace-offering,' RVm 'thank-offering'), the priests lay part, chiefly the fat, on the altar, and the rest is eaten, partly by the offerers, partly by the priests, so that the idea of communion is still preserved. The 'olah (' burnt-offering') being wholly consumed on the altar, and representing complete surrender to God, though not directly aimed at effecting an atonement, points in that way more effectually. The rite would express any intense feeling, as of gratitude, devotion, or the craving for propitation (Lv 14). The hattāth ('sin-offering,' Lv 4. 5. 6²⁴⁻³⁰, Nu 15²²) and the 'āshām (AV 'trespass-offering,' RV 'guilt-offering,' Lv 5-7. 14. 19) were directly aimed at the removal of uncleanness and atonement for breaches of Divine commands. In the case of the sin-offering, while the offerer brought the victim, the priests were to kill it, sprinkle part of the blood before the veil, and pour out the rest at the base of the altar of burnt-offering. The fat was to be burnt on that altar and the rest burnt 'without the camp, in a clean place, where the ashes were poured out.' There was this difference in the case of the trespass-offering, that the rest of the flesh was to be eaten by the priests in a sacred place (Lv 76).

In the daily service of the temple two lambs were offered as burnt-offerings—one in the morning, the other in the evening. The sin- and trespass-offerings were more occasional, as offences called for them, and of a more private character. It is in relation to these offerings that the priest stands more especially as a mediator between the offender and Jehovah, whose wrath he has occasioned, in whose eye he is unclean, though perhaps owing to some unintentional or ignorant act. But on the great Day of Atonement the daily sacrifice was supplemented with other burnt-offerings, and also a sin-offering, which in this case was of a public character, for the faults of the people generally. In these matters the priest mediates in the Godward action, presenting the people's sacrifices, and seeking the Divine grace; but at times he also acts as mediator from God to the people, when he pronounces people clean, as in the cure of lepers. See, further, arts. PRIESTS AND LEVITES, and SAC-RIFICE.

The high priest appears still more specifically as the mediator between the whole nation and Jehovah. This is suggested by the fact that when clothed with the ephod he bears the names of the twelve tribes on his heart and shoulders as their representative before God. On the Day of Atonement he enters the most sacred place and sprinkles blood on the mercy-seat, thus bringing the vital part of the sacrifice into the Divine Presence to make atonement for the sins of the nation. Whether the idea embodied in this ceremony was that expressed by the primary meaning of kipper, as a covering over of sin, or a covering or the offender from the wrath of God (Cave, Schultz); or whether, neglecting the primary signification, it was suggestive of a ransom or an atoning payment (Bennett, Smend),—in either case the action that secured pardon was performed by the high priest on behalf of the people. [For details of the laws and processes here referred to, see ATONEMENT (DAY OF)].

3. Prophetic mediation.—Side by side with the differentiation of the priest from the rest of the community grows up the corresponding differentiation of the prophet, who also has assigned to him specific mediatorial functions. While the priest comes between God and man chiefly at the altar, and for the offering of sacrifice, i.e. in ascending mediation, the prophet represents the descending mediation, speaking for God, and revealing the Divine will. This specific prophetic function has been acknowledged in other nations besides Israel. Thus among the Greeks from the earliest times prophecy was hereditary in many families—among the Jannidæ, the Clytiadæ, the Telliadæ, etc. In later ages there were two classes of soothsayers, -in one the enlightenment not being acquired by art or study (ἄτεχνον καὶ ἀδίδακτον γένος), the soul being either illuminated awake or thrown into a trance or ecstasy; in the other, the faculty being obtained by study, as an art (τὸ τεχνικὸν γένος). See Schömann, Griechisches Alterthum⁴, vol. i. Plato distinguishes between the μάντις, who has direct communication with God, and the προφήτηs, who merely interprets (Timœus, 71 ff.). In Israel necromancy was sharply distinguished from prophecy, and considered wicked, as inconsistent with faith Soothsayers are not to be sought after in God. (Dt 18^{off.}), nevertheless they are credited with real power. The witch of Endor summons the shade of Samuel, and thus obtains information for Saul (1 S 28^{3st.}—a late narrative, but so lifelike as to point to a historical tradition). Then the true prophets are marked off from lying prophets, who, however, might be inspired by an evil spirit from Jehovah (e.g. 1 K 22^{3st.}). The prophets who cry, 'Peace, beace,' to flatter the people, are mere tricksters. Still, in early times, the higher prophets were not above doing in their Divine power what soothsayers aimed at by sorcery (e.g. 1 S 9^{7st}. 10^{2st}.). But it is in the loftier functions of prophecy that its mediatorial power is developed. The prophet may have been trained in one of the brotherhoods of the 'sons of the prophets,' in which case he corresponds to the second class of the Greek prophets; but he may have been called without any such preparation, and quite apart from professional associations, as in the case of Amos the herdman (Am 7¹⁴). Yet in any case he must have a Divine call and commission (e.g. Is 6). Then he comes forth with a Divine message, frequently asserted in the phrase 'Thus saith the Lord.' Such a man mediates in the region of revelation. Prophets also mediate with God on behalf of Israel. Thus Jeremiah intercedes in prayer for Jerusalem (Jer 32^{16g.}), and Ezekiel for his people (Ezk 13^{11g.}). But prophetic mediation of the ascending kind is most explicitly described in the classical passage Is 53. Whoever the 'servant of the Lord' may represent,—whether Israel, the spiritual Israel, the ideal Israel, Jeremiah, Zerubbabel, the Messiah, or some unknown prophet or martyr,—it is equally clear that the passage assigns to him lofty mediatorial functions in giving his life as an offering for sins.

4. Mediation in the Wisdom Literature. - The 4. Methation in the Wissom Literature.—The famous passage in Job where, according to AV, the sufferer exclaims, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' etc. (Job 19^{22–27}), fornierly appealed to as an OT anticipation of the mediation of Jesus Christ, cannot be so employed on any principle of sound exegesis. The 'redeemer' is the god (2×1), i.e. the next of kin whose duty it is to serve as the exercise of blood, and the context shows that this can avenger of blood; and the context shows that this can only be God, who is described as the great Deliverer in an earlier passage (5¹²⁻²¹); see Davidson, 'Job,' in Camb. Bible, 143 ff., 291 ff. We must look for this doctrine of mediation in a totally different quarter. It emerges in the personification of Wisdom. That is seen in a purely imaginative and metaphorical form in the Bk. of Proverbs, where Wisdom appears exhorting her son to receive her words (c.g. Pr 1²⁰⁵.). Thus Wisdom says what, if it appeared in the Prophets, would assume the form of a message from God. Wisdom is now the prophetic mediator. In the Books of Wisdom and Sirach the personifi-cation is carried still further, and yet it must be regarded as wholly ideal. Philo consummates the process in his doctrine of the Logos, repeatedly described in personal language, and even mentioned as τον δεύτερον θεόν (in a fragment preserved by Eusebius; see Drummond, Philo, ii. p. 197). He is OT theophanies and revelations. And yet it is a mistake to regard Philo's Logos as an actual person. Strong as his language is in this direction, it is only the language of allegory, and in the exact interpretation of it we cannot take the Logos to be other than the Divine Reason, or, when regarded more objectively, God's ideas and plans concerning the universe (see Leg. Allegor. 1. 19). Still less can we admit that Philo identities the Logos with the Messiah. Any Messianic mediation is entirely foreign to his philosophy. See, further, art. Logos,

5. The mediation of angels.—Closely associated with this subject, the Wisdom mediation, is that of angels—the one representing the trend of Alexandrian Jewish thought, and the other the speculations of the Jerusalem Rabbis. In both cases the same cause is behind. Both Alexandrian and Palestinian Judaism were profoundly influenced in their conceptions of the Divine nature by the dread of anthropomorphism, and by the consequent tendency to widen the interval between God and man. The result is an immense enlargement of the necessity for mediation. God does not come into direct contact with man and the universe; creation is carried out by means of angels; the law is given by angels; the OT theophanies are angel appearances. Preparation is made for these ideas in the OT itself, where we have not merely angels communicating between earth and heaven, as on Jacob's ladder (Gn 22¹²), but one—'the angel of Jehovah' (J; e.g. Gn 16^{7a}), or 'the angel of God' (E; e.g. Gn 21^{17a})—in direct dealings with men. But the mediation of angels is all in one direction—the descending. The OT nowhere teaches the intercessory mediation of angels (see ANGEL).

intercessory mediation of angels (see ANGEL).

iii. MEDIATION IN THE NT.—The doctrine of mediation in the NT is wholly centred in Jesus Christ. Intercessory prayer is recognized as a means of securing blessing when offered by Christians on behalf of their brethren (e.g. 1 Th 5¹⁶), 2 Th 3¹, Ja 5¹⁶); but this is quite secondary to the mediation of Christ, and may be regarded as dependent on it, since Christian prayer is in the name of Christ (e.g. Jn 15¹⁶). Similarly, gifts of healing being limited to certain persons, the exercise of them on behalf of others may be regarded as a kind of mediation; but here, too, the power is through Christ and exerted in His name, as that of the real Mediator (e.g. Ac 3⁸ 9⁴⁴).

1. Christ as Mediator. — The very Messianic conception essentially involves the idea of mediation. From the thought of God coming to deliver Israel and judge the oppressors in His own Person, in a theophany, the later Jews came to look for deliverance and judgment in the advent of the Messiah, who was to execute the Divine will and realize the blessings of Divine grace for Israel. At first regarded as an exalted king of the line of David restoring the throne of his ancestor, the Messiah came in course of time to be invested with superhuman powers. In the Psalms of Solomon the hope is very vivid. Sinless himself, he will come as a king both to purify and to liberate Israel (Ps. Sol 17^{251, 28, 47} 18^{6, 18}). As the son of David, he will feed Israel like a shepherd (17^{5, 25}). A Jewish Sibyl hopes for the Holy Ruler who will come to his everlasting kingdom. In the Apocalypse of Enoch the Messiah is the righteous one who reveals all the treasures of that which is hidden (38² 53³ 46³). He will come to be both Ruler and Judge (45³ 46³⁶). There is some doubt as to the date of these passages. But Charles has successfully vindicated the pre-Christian origin of the greater part of the Messianic references (see The Book of Enoch, Append. B, pp. 312–317). In all this we have only the kingly rank and influence. There is no indication of the priestly sacrifice of mediation.

In the Synoptic Gospels we have accounts of the realization of the essential elements of these expectations, though with a complete conversion of them into spiritual facts and a great elevation of them in character and aim. In Mt's account of the angel's announcement to Joseph, Mary's child is to be called Jesus because 'it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 121), and the prophecy about Immanuel in Isaiah is applied to Him (1221). Thus, since in Him God's presence on earth will be realized, He will be the connecting link between God and man, and by being this accomplish salvation. In Lk's account of the Annunciation it is promised that He shall be 'great,' 'called the Son of the Most High,' and receive 'the throne of his father David.' Here the Messiahship is distinctly affirmed of Him, and this is connected with a Divine Sonship. We cannot take the latter attribute in its full Christian import—it is used as a title of the Messiah by Caiaphas (according to Mt 262 and Mk 1421), perhaps traceable ultimately to Ps 27. Still it intimates at least a very close connexion with God, and so helps the idea of the mediation of Christ. The life of Christ opens out in the Gospels in accordance with these anticipations, though doubtless not as they would be interpreted by Jews of the first century. In particular, the following facts may be noticed as indicative of our Lord's mediatorial character and work. (a) His teaching.

As a teacher, Jesus Christ realized the idea of prophetic mediation in the highest degree. The originality, the lofty tone, the spiritual force, the self-evidencing truthfulness of His utterances proclaim their Divine origin, and show the speaker to be the medium through which the will of God is revealed on earth. (β) His works. Here also Jesus realizes a form of the descending mediation, bringing down Divine power to effect the cure of disease, etc. Thus He claims to work His miracles disease, etc. Thus he claims to work his miracles by 'the finger of God' (Lk 11^{20}). (γ) His prayers. Jesus carries on the mediation of intercession (e.g. Jn 17). (δ) His death. As we are concerned only with the facts of the history at this point, and should not import the subsequent reflexions springing from apostolic teaching and later speculations, we must not yet bring in any 'doctrine of the atonement.' But, merely contemplating the historical situation, we have in it a vivid picture of mediation. Starting with our Lord's self-evi-dencing Messiahship in His life, teaching, and work, we see Him facing death and enduring the horrors of the Passion and the Cross, when He might easily have avoided them. Had He remained in Galilee, or had He continued in retirement such as for a time He sought at Cæsarea, in Peræa, and at Ephraim, still more had He abandoned Palestine and gone to Alexandria or Athens, where His teaching would have been welcomed, at all events superficially, for its novelty, He might have eluded the pursuit of His enemies. But any such course would have shattered His aims as the Redeemer of Israel and the Founder of the kingdom of heaven. Accordingly, Jesus is seen sacrificing His life for no personal object, but wholly on behalf of His people; and this we may accept as a fact of history quite independent of specific apostolic teaching and later theological speculation.

2. The teaching of Jesus on mediation.—a. The teaching in the Synoptics.—The descending mediation of one who comes from God is not only apparent throughout our Lord's life on earth; it is distinctly claimed by Him in His utterances about His own mission. Thus it is implied in His acceptance of the Messianic title (Mk 820), and His prophetic statements concerning His future action in His second advent (Mk 8³⁸). He has come now on behalf of God to establish the kingdom of heaven; He will come in the future with the glory of His Father and the holy angels to judge the world. Then He is the revealer of God, and no one can know the Father but he to whom the Son is willing to reveal Him (Mt 11²⁷). In the parable of the Vineyard He is the Son sent by the owner to collect the revenue—a mediator in the form of an agent (Mt 21³⁷). When declaring that He will own before His Father every one who confesses him on earth, and deny before His Father every one who denies Him on earth, He approaches the other form of mediation in which His words and actions are efficacious with God on our hehalf (Mt 10²²). There are two passages in the Synoptic narratives that connect this mediation with the death of Christ. The first is the declaration that He came 'to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁶). The following points should be observed:—(1) This phrase must be approached from the context, where we find our Lord is teaching the duty of humble service by His own example, as coming to minister and not to be ministered unto, so that the primary intention of the passage is not to teach any specific doctrine con-cerning His mediatorial work, and therefore must not be pressed as though that were its aim. Still He could not have spoken these words without meaning that some such work was to be accomplished by Him. (2) The expression 'give his life' (δοῦναι την ψυχην αὐτοῦ) cannot mean spend His life in service, but must signify surrender it in death as all parallels show (e.g. Mk 3⁴ 8³⁵, Lk 9³⁶ 12²⁰, Jn 10¹¹ 13³⁷ 15¹³). (3) This is voluntary ('give'—not 'lose' His life as in Mk 8³⁵), and emphatically the surrender of His own life (airoi) in distinction from the familiar Jewish notion of the giving some payment or the offering some sacrifice distinct from the person performing the act. (4) The life of Christ thus surrendered is given as a ransom (λύτρον). The Greek word occurs in LXX as a translation of several Heb. terms (τημ Lv 25^{24. 51}; της Nu 3^{45. 51}; της Ex 21³⁰; της Nu 3^{46. 51}; ψης Ex 21³⁰; της Nu 3^{46. 51}; και αραγμετό to effect liberation or to release from penalty. It also appears in the LXX as a rendering of the Heb. 75, which means literally a covering, i.e. a propitiatory gift (Ex 21.3012, Nu 35.3117, Pr 6.35 138), but is restricted by usage to a gift offered as an equivalent for a life that is claimed, the wergild' (Driver, Deut. 425 f.). This Ritschl, Lehre v. der Rechtfertigung u. Vers. ii. p. 68 ff.), is not so appropriate as the primary meaning of the word, since, though the LXX writers give it in place of the Heb. word for 'atonement,' there is no evidence that the meaning 'atonement' was ever given to the Greek word. Its usage follows its derivation, and wherever it ta usage follows its derivation, and wherever it can be tested gives the idea of that which effects release by being paid for that purpose (so Wendt, Lehre Jesu, p. 512 ff.). (5) This ransom is to effect the liberation of many. It is for (dert) many. The exact sense of this word will depend on the meaning given to $\lambda i \tau \rho o \nu$. If this could mean 'atonement,' the Gr. dert would = 'instead of'; but if it means' transom' deed wout = 'in exchange. but if it means 'ransom,' drrl must = 'in exchange for'; i.e. Christ pays His life as the price in exchange for which many are given up or set at liberty. Two further points are left undetermined. First, as to what that is from which the many are set free. The close analogy of the ideas of the passage would suggest death, or we may say a state of slavery (see Lk 415 deliverance to the state of slavery (see Lk 4.15 deliverance to the captives... to set at liberty'), especially that of sin (cf. Jn 8^{23, 24}). Second, as to the person to whom payment is made. The widest differences of opinion have prevailed on this point, patristic opinion being for the devil (Origen, Gregory of Nyssa), scholastic and later for God (Anselm). Considering that the purpose of the logion is not to expound the doctrine of the atonement but to enforce an example of service, it is probable that both of these points are left out of account, so that the teaching goes no further than the idea of deliverance at the cost of Christ's life voluntarily

The other passage in which Jesus Christ ascribes a mediatorial character to His death occurs in the institution of the Lord's Supper. The Eucharist itself reveals Christ as a mediator, the elements representing His body and blood as the media through which His people are nourished with Divine life. Lk reports Christ as saying of the bread, 'This is my body which is given for you' (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδύμενον, Lk 2219), and St. Paul the shorter phrase, 'which is for you' (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν—κλώμενον being omitted from the best MSS, 1 Co 1124), words which describe the giving of His body on behalf of or for the benefit of His people. And a specific connexion with His death occurs in the words about the cup. (1) In all four accounts the blood of Christ is connected with the New Covenant (Mk 1424, Mt 2628, Lk 2220, 1 Co 1125), and in the three accounts of the Gospels it is said to be 'shed'

(excurrence). This must point to death. The connexion of the blood with a covenant is based on a familiar Jewish idea—that of confirming a cove-nant by a sacrifice, the blood of which is thrown on the parties to it. Thus in the sealing of the covenant of the law victims are sacrificed, and Moses sprinkles (literally 'throws') half the blood on the altar and half on the people (Ex 24⁶⁻⁸), as though to express the union of Jehovah and Israel in the covenant by means of the blood, the sacrificed life of the victim, shared by both. This rite, ficed life of the victim, shared by both. being familiar to Jews who knew the law, must words concerning the cup and His blood. He teaches that His blood, i.e. His sacrificed life, confirms the New Covenne (Jer 31^{nif.}), making it effectual and binding. (2) In one of the four accounts it is added that this shedding of our Lord's blood is 'for remission of sins' (els άφεσιν άμαρτιῶν, Mt 26²⁸). Jesus had claimed the right to forgive sins much earlier in His ministry (Mk 26ff. Now for the first and only time He connects this with His death. The second evangelist uses just the same phrase of John's baptism of repentance (βάπτισμα μετανοίας els άφεσιν αμαρτιών), where the language does not determine whether it is baptism, or repentance, or the two together that are con-nected with forgiveness. Further, in neither case does the language declare that the result is certainly attained, the preposition (els) indicating the end aimed at, not the result reached. But in the case of its association with Christ other teachings and the whole tenor of His work indicate that it is effectual, that the end is reached—a result which John's baptism. The baptism of John pointed towards what Jesus Christ actually effected. Now the connexion of this forgiveness with the shedding of His blood draws our thoughts again to the Jewish sacrificial system, where animals were slain and their blood poured out as atoning offerings. Thus the blood of the sin-offering was placed on the altar (Lv 4¹⁸). Jews hearing Christ's words must have understood Him to mean that He was to die as a sacrifice for sin. Wendt considers this to die as a sacrifice for sin. Wendt considers this phrase to be an addition of the evangelist, but springing out of the consciousness of the Church as a true interpretation of the significance of the Lord's Supper (Lehre Jesu, p. 521). Though a Pauline thought, it is in Mt, not Lk.

b. The teaching in the Fourth Gospel.—This introduces both aspects of our Lord's mediatorial work more clearly than the Supervise but have introduces both aspects of our Lord's mediatorial work more clearly than the Synoptics, but here it is not so easy to discriminate between Christ's original teaching and the form in which it is cast by the writer. Jesus comes claiming Divine Sonship and union with His Father (Jn 10°°), and dispensing the Water of Life (4¹⁴ 7²⁷). He is the Bread of Life (6²⁶⁻²⁶), the Light of the world (8¹²), the Good Shepherd (10¹¹), the True Vine (15¹⁻⁷); in all these aspects He is the medium for bringing to us the life and blessedness that God confers. Then, on the other hand, He also appears as the Mediator through whom men attain to God. He is the Door of the sheepfold (10°), the only Way to the Father (14°), and to see Him is to see the Father (14°). Further, He intercedes on behalf of His disciples (17°). He teaches that the raising of Lazarus was in answer to His prayer (11⁴¹). In regard to His death, Jesus does not here use the sacrificial language found in the Synoptics, but He describes it as voluntarily accepted, for He has authority to lay down His life and to take it again (10¹⁸), and also as being on behalf of His people. He is the Good Shepherd laying down His life for (bπtp, 'on behalf of '—John never uses deri, 'instead of,' in this connexion) His sheep (10¹¹). The metaphor in its connexion suggests the shepherd facing the wolves in defence of his flock; and the first historical application of it may be found in the scene in the garden, where Jesus, instead of escaping,—like the hireling who 'fleeth' when he sees the wolf coming (10¹²),—came forward and surrendered, with the stipulation that His disciples should not be touched (18¹⁻²). But it is not possible to see the full meaning of our Lord's words realized in this incident or in any external event. His solemn reference to His authority to lay down His life, combined with the assertion that He does so for the benefit of His people, points to a deeper purpose, though one that is not here at all explained. Wendt holds that Jesus was pointing to His whole saving work, which would be ruined if He deserted His people and relinquished His task; and also that Jesus thus set His disciples a reat example, and in doing that died for their benefit—a somewhat gratuitous limitation where nothing but the great purpose is defined. Wendt nothing but the great purpose is defined. Wendt points out that as the author himself is more explicit on the relation of the death of Christ to the forgiveness of sins (1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰), and ascribes to John the Baptist sayings on the subject (Jn 120.26), the reticence of Christ is an indication that so far our Lord's teaching has been correctly rendered

3. The teaching of the apostles on mediation.—a.
The speeches in Acts.—In St. Peter's speeches redemption is offered through Jesus Christ, who is described as God's servant (δ παῖs), a title reminding us of Is 53 (e.g. Ac 3^{13. 26}), and therefore as bringing His gift of redemption in obedience to the will of God. The name 'Son of God' is not here given to Him; but He is called 'Lord' (κύριο), though in distinction from Jehovah in an OT passage applied to Him (Ac 2²⁴). The primary point to be made out is that He is the Messiah. In treating of this, St. Peter has to encounter the fact of our Lord's St. Peter has to encounter the fact of our Lord's crucifixion. He does not here connect it with the mediatorial work by introducing any doctrine of the Atonement. He has to face the great objection arising in Jewish minds from the fact that He who is affirmed to be the Christ had been executed in ignominy. This he does (1) by correcting popular conceptions of the Messiahship, in calling attention to other titles than that of the victorious king, viz. that of Prophet (Ac 3²¹), and that of God's servant (3¹³ 4²¹); (2) by pointing to predictions of the death of the Christ (e.g. Ac 2²³), so that this should have been expected; (3) by appearing as a witness of the Resurrection, and appealing to the like testimony of the other apostles. This was the clinching proof that death had not annulled the Messianic claims of Jesus, since He had received the greatest mark of God's recogni-Having thus met the reproach of the Cross and also given the positive proof of the Messiah; ship of Jesus afforded by the Resurrection, St. Peter proceeds to urge His claims (2³⁶); to lay the charge of their guilt against His murderers (314); and to invite them to repentance with the promise of future 'seasons of refreshing' in the return of Christ (3^{19, 20}), but also with the gospel declarations that God had raised up His servant to be a means of blessing to the people in turning them from their sins (3²⁸), that in Him and in Him alone is salvation (4^{11.12}). He was described earlier as the 'Prince' or 'Author of life' (τὸν δὲ ἀρχηγὸν τῆς ζωῆς, 3¹⁵), and later as exalted by God to be 'a Prince and a Saviour.' Thus these speeches disjunctly and a Saviour.' tinctly set forth the idea of the descending mediation with the presentation of Jesus Christ as the Divinely-appointed intermediary through whom salvation is brought to men. They do not set forth any doctrine on the Godward aspect of mediation, they have been of the title the contract of though the choice of the title 'the Servant,' pointing to Is 53, brings in the germ of it for reflecting minds.

b. St. Paul and 1 Peter.—When we come to St. Paul's Epistles we reach a fuller expression of the Christian doctrine of mediation in both its aspects. He is the first NT writer to use the term mediator (μεσίτης), viz. where he says the law 'was ordained through angels by the hand of a mediator,' and adds, 'now a mediator is not of one; but God is one' (Gal 319.30). Winer states that the number of interpretations of this passage mount up to 250 or 300. Origen and commentators who have followed him are plainly wrong in underwho have followed him are plainly wrong in understanding Christ to be the mediator St. Paul here mentions. Undoubtedly he means Moses, who received the law, according to the rabbinical doctrine, not directly from God, but through the angels, and communicated it to the people (see Lv 26⁴⁸ LXX). Lightfoot's view of the second part of the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of received in the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of received in the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of received in the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of received in the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of received in the passage is as follows: 'The very idea of the passage is as follows: 'Th mediation implies two persons at least, between whom the mediation is carried on. The law, then, is of the nature of a contract between two parties, God on the one hand, and the Jewish people on the other. It is only valid so long as both parties fulfil the terms.' But it is different with God's promise. God is one, and no other person is promise. God is one, and no other person is concerned with the promise; therefore it is absolute and unconditional (Lightfoot, Gal. in loc.). This interpretation is substantially that of Schleiermacher, Winer, Herrmann; it is supported by Lipsius (Hand-Com. in loc.). Hausrath treats the 'of one' (èrés) as neuter (in spite of the ets), and takes it not numerically, but quantitatively, as signifying that the mediator is not a unit, but admits two distinctions of will—a diffi-cult and improbable position. If, then, we follow Lightfoot here, we not only see that the passage has no direct reference to Christ's mediation, but that it even excludes this from view for the time being by contrasting God's direct promise in the Gospel with the mediation of Moses in the law. Still it is only one form of mediation that is thus ex-cluded, for the idea of mediation is prominent in the apostle's writings. In 1 Ti 21s Jesus Christ is distinctly called a mediator between God and men. Both aspects of mediation are set forth in St. Paul's writings. (1) Christ is the Mediator in bringing Divine grace to man. St. Paul carefully distinguishes the Son from the Father. The Father sends His Son to effect redemption (e.g. Gal 4⁴, Ro 8³). Throughout, St. Paul teaches that this blessing originates in the love of God, who therefore does not require to be rendered gracious by the offices of a mediator, but, on the contrary, out of His own grace provides the mediator (e.g. Ro 3²⁴ ²⁵ 5⁵). To effect the great purpose of redemption, Christ communicates to us the knowledge of God (2 Co 4⁶), the grace of God (Ro 5¹⁵), remission of sins together with 'the righteousness of God' (Ro 3²², l'h 3⁹), God's free gift of eternal life which is 'in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Ro 6²⁵), and all the blessings of the Christian general St and all the blessings of the Christian gospel. St. Paul, writing out of his own experience, describes the Christian life as a condition of union with Jesus Christ (e.g. Ph 2²¹). (2) Christ is also the Jesus Christ (e.g. Ph 2ⁿ). (2) Unrist is also one Mediator in bringing about reconciliation with God. There is a point where these two kinds of mediation coincide or work together. Thus St. Paul writes of 'God reconciling us to Himself through Christ' (2 Co 5¹⁸), and describes God as thus reconciling the world to Himself, with the addition 'not reckoning unto them their trespasses (v.19). This clause suggests that, while the passage as a whole points to the overcoming of man's enmity to God, there was also the removal of God's charge of guilt against man, and therefore a certain Godward aspect of the mediation, although even this originated with God. That the Greek word for 'reconcile' has this twofold bearing is suggested by other instances of the use of it, e.g. Ro 510, where the 'reconciled' (καταλλαyerres) appear as those restored to the Divine favour and not merely turned from their own enmity, and 1 Co 711, where the wife's being reconciled to her husband includes a kindly reception on cued to ner nuscand includes a kindly reception on his part. St. Paul sets out his ideas on this subject very explicitly in Ro 3³¹⁻³⁶, in which passage the following points may be noted: (a) The redemption originated in God who 'set forth publicly' (προέθετο, proposuit; Vulg., Sanday-Headlam, though RVm follows Pesh. and Origen with the meaning 'purposed'), showed His right-eousness in regard to His previous forbearance, and now acts as 'the Justifier.' (β) It is mediated by Christ. The redemption is 'in Christ Jesus.' by Christ. The redemption is 'in Christ Jesus.' God set Him forth to effect this end. It is enjoyed through faith in Him. (γ) This is accomplished by Christ becoming a 'propitiation,' and by means of 'His blood.' The word rendered 'propitiation' ($\lambda \alpha \sigma \tau \eta \rho \omega \sigma$) is literally 'a place or vehicle of propitiation' (Sanday-Headlam), and is used in LXX and He 95 for the lid of the ark, the 'mercy-seat.': but, it cannot be so amployed bare 'mercy-seat'; but it cannot be so employed here. Either it is a neuter adjective, or a masc. accus. Either it is a neuter adjective, or a masc. accusadjective used predicatively of Christ (Sanday-Headlam). As a neuter it is often taken to be equivalent to a 'propitiatory sacrifice' (Luther, Thol., Phil., Delitzsch, Ritschl, Lipsius, etc.). or indefinitely as a 'means of propitiation' (Hofmann, Weiss, etc.). 'Whichever interpretation we accept shows that the ordinary pagan thought of propitiating an offended divinity cannot be intended; besides, it is to be observed that the word that the word in LXX or NT in the middle ίλασκομαι is never used in LXX or NT in the middle form, as with the classics, for propitiating God, but always in the passive, for God's being gracious. Therefore we must understand the propitiation, even if sacrificial, as a means by which God acts graciously to man. Then the statement that this is by means of Christ's blood, points to the death of Christ as a sacrifice; but with the distinctive thought that His life was given, that the value of this life, surrendered in death, might be the propitiation, or means of bringing God's grace to man. Elsewhere St. Paul emphasizes the importance of the death of Christ in this connexion. The message he preaches is 'the word of the cross' (1 Co 1^{19}), 'Christ died for $(\dot{v}\pi\dot{e}\rho)$ our sins' (1 Co 15^3). This, St. Paul gives as part of what he had 'received from the Lord,' adding that it was 'according to the Scriptures.' Here we have two sources of the apostle's doctrine of the atonement-tradition of apostle's doctrine of the atonement—tradition of Christ's teaching (e.g. 1 Co 11²⁵, and such a logion as Mk 10²⁵), and inferences from Scripture (e.g. Is 53^{26,10}, cf. Lk 24^{26,17}; Ac 9^{23,26}). St. Paul writes of Christ as dying 'on behalf of' (irrép) and 'concerning' (repi, the LXX word for sinofferings) our sins; but he never uses the expression 'instead of' (drri), dying in our stead. He says that Christ was 'made to be sin on, our behalf' (2 Co 5²¹⁾ a powerful avpression for being behalf' (2 Co 5²¹), a powerful expression for being treated as a sinner, and so 'a curse for us' (Gal 3¹³). He does not explain how it comes about that this suffering and sacrificial death of Christ effect our redemption. He seems to have the analogy of the Jewish sacrifices in mind, though he does not directly cite it (as the author of He) in explanation of his doctrine. He also points to the obedience of Christ as a ground of justification (Ro 5¹⁹). It is impossible to read St. Paul's words on this subject without seeing that he very closely connects the death of Christ with the salvation of souls, that he regards this death as sacrificial-i.e. as an offering to God-while at the same time he never regards it as inducing God's grace, but, on the contrary, treats it as springing from the love of God to mankind. St. Paul does not confine his teaching on the mediatorial work of Christ to His death. The Resurrection is also for our benefit; our Lord was both 'delivered for our trespasses' and 'raised for our justification' (Ro 420). In His risen life He is 'the first-fruits of them that are asleep' (1 Co 1520). Lastly, His intercession, now carried on in heaven, is an important part of His work as Mediator (Ro 820). In St. Paul's later Epistles the more advanced Christology necessarily affects the doctrine of mediation. In Colossians we seem to have a Christian alternative to the Jewish doctrine of the mediation of angels in the administration of the universe, and perhaps to Philo's specific teaching concerning the Logos as the mediator of creation, for there we read concerning Christ that 'in him were all things created' (Col 116), and the mediator of providential government, for 'in him all things consist' (v.17). Referring to his teaching on the death of Christ who had 'made peace through the blood of his cross,' St. Paul enlarges the application of it to a future 'reconciliation of all things . . . whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens' (v.20), thus representing Christ as the great mediator and peacemaker for the whole universe.

1 P closely follows the Pauline teaching. Christ redeems us with His 'blood as of a lamb without blemish' (1¹⁹), this reference to the lamb making the shedding of the blood evidently sacrificial. Similarly St. Peter writes of His bearing our sins in His body upon the tree (2²⁴), and suffering 'for sins once, the righteous for (ὑπέρ, on behalf of) the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (3¹⁸). The only addition to the Pauline thought is the greater stress laid on the sufferings of Christ—while St. Paul usually confines our attention to His death. The idea of bringing us to God suggests reconciliation, and Christ, through His sufferings, coming as the Mediator who effects this reconciliation. In one mysterious passage the source of which, or subject alluded to, cannot be traced, St. Peter enlarges the idea of the mediation of Christ in an entirely new direction, assigning part of its operation to the state of the dead; for such is the simplest and most generally accepted interpretation of the statement that 'he went and preached unto the spirits in prison' (3^{19, 20}). That this was only a brief episode, confined to the time between the death and the resurrection of Christ, is suggested by other passages in the Epistle indicating that He was raised from the dead (1³), and that He passed into the heavens, there to exercise exalted powers of government (3²²).

c. Epistle to the Hebrews.—The main topic of Hebrews is to exhibit the mediatorial status and functions of Jesus Christ in contrast with the various forms of mediation recognized in Judaism. The Epistle opens with a contrast of the unity and exalted character of the new revelation in a Son with the broken and varied nature of the OT revelation by means of prophets. Christ there appears as the agent of creation, the sustainer of all things, who has also made purification for sins (11-3). Then, taking up the contents of this revelation, it proceeds to work out the contrast in several regions. the law; the writer contrasts the higher status of the Son, who is honoured with Divine titles, though addressed by God as another person to whom is committed the government of His king-law (14 0). Here Leavis a regard (14 0). dom (14-218). Here Jesus is named 'the Apostle and High Priest of our confession,' in contrast with Moses, who was only a servant in God's house, while Christ is both the Builder of the house and the Son set over it (3¹⁻⁶). The idea of our Lord's High-priesthood thus introduced is enlarged. He has passed into the heavens, and therefore we are encouraged to draw near with boldness to the throne of grace (418). This leads on to specific teaching concerning our Lord's priestly office. Two general considerations arise—the priesthood is of Divine appointment; yet it requires human sympathies on the part of the priest. Both of these conditions are fulfilled in Carist's priesthood. In taking the two together we see that His office is related both to God and to man, so that He stands in the intermediate position of a priestly mediator (51-10). A reference to Melchizedek in Ps 110 leads to a comparison of the Messianic priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek,' with the priesthood of Aaron to the advantage of the former, since Abraham, the ancestor of Levi, did homage to Melchizedek, and since the priest of the Melchizedek order is declared by the Psalmist to be perpetual. After alluding to the sacrifices—a subject to be developed later—the writer returns to the idea of Sonship as the crowning proof of the superiority of Christ as a priest (ch. 7). Then he passes to a fresh consideration. It must be admitted that Christ is not a priest under the law, and therefore not in accordance with the OT covenant. But a new covenant is introduced—that predicted by Jeremial, concerning the law written in the heart. It is under this covenant that Christ's priesthood is exercised. It is through Him that the covenant itself is brought into effect. Here we come to another instance of the use of the word 'mediator' in the NT: Christ is described as the 'Mediator' in the NT: Unrist is described as the 'Mediator' of this new and better covenant, 'that is, the Agent by whom it is established' (Bruce, Hebrews, p. 296). This use of the word is parallel to St. Paul's in Gal 3^{19.30}, where the apostle applies it to Moses as the agent through whom the covenant of the law was introduced. In both 'cases we have only the descending mediation, the mediator representing and executing God's will among men. But senting and executing God's will among men. But though the author does not use the title for the other aspect of mediation, he is most explicit in teaching the truth that represents in effect the Godward side of mediation. This is implied in the priestly work of Christ. Like the Levitical priests, Christ approaches God on our behalf; but with these important differences, that He not only effects much more than Aaron effected for Israel, but also brings His people directly into the Divine Presence. Subsequently the argument proceeds to develop the idea of the sacrifice of Christ in contrast with the Jewish sacrifices, and here it directly deals with the Godward aspect of mediation. Christ offers the sacrifice of Himself to God (914). Later, contrasting this sacrifice of Christ's with the Jewish rites, the author quotes Ps 40, where God says He has no pleasure in burntofferings and sacrifices for sin, and where the Psalmist promises instead of such oblations the offer of his own service to do the will of God. That of Hebrews and applied to Christ as the essence of His sacrifice. By this will, i.e. by Christ thus doing God's will, we are sanctified. But such obedience involves dying, it is carried out to the 'becoming obedient unto death'; and thus it is offered as a 'sacrifice for sins.' This is so effectual that it needs to be offered but once, while the Jewish sacrifices were repeated (He 10¹⁻¹⁹). Here we have most distinctly set forth the Godward aspect of mediation. It is impossible to understand the writer's doctrine of Christ's sacrifice merely as God sacrificing Himself in the person of His Son in the sense of giving Himself to us, for he distinctly says that the sacrifice is offered by Christ 'unto God' $(\tau \hat{\varphi} \ \theta \epsilon \hat{\varphi}, \ 9^{14})$. The efficacy of this is widespread. It is to cleanse the conscience from dead works to serve the living God (914), for 'the redemption of transgressions' (v.15), 'to put away $\sin^2(v.^{20})$, a 'sacrifice for $\sin^2(i\pi k\rho a\mu a\rho \tau i\hat{\omega}\nu$, 10^{12}), and so leading to 'remission of sins' (10^{18}). At the same time it is for the confirmation of the new covenant. The author connects the death of Christ with this result in two ways: reading the word for covenant ($\delta ia\theta h\kappa\eta$) in the classical Gr. sense as a will [but see Westcott, ad loc.], he argues that for the will to take effect there must be death (9^{17}); then, returning to the idea of covenant, he compares the blood of Christ to that of the sacrifice which confirms a covenant (Ex 24^{2-8}).

d. St. John.—(a) The Johannine theology as represented in the Fourth Gospel and the Epistles.

—The Prologue to the Gospel introduces the Logos as the mediator of creation and revelation, the title probably coming from Philo and Stoic usage, but the idea from Hebrew conceptions of the 'Memra' [see John, vol. ii. p. 685]. God's revelation in nature (Jn 1¹⁻⁵), in prophecy (vv. ⁶⁻⁸), in consciousness (vv. ⁹⁻¹⁰), and in the incarnation (vv. 11-15), is in every case mediated by the Logos, who is a Divine Being, in intimate relations with God, and Himself essentially God, yet with a certain personal distinction from God (1). God gives eternal life to the world through Christ (316). To have the Son is to have the life, and not to have the Son is not to have the life (1 Jn 513). It is through Him that we receive the knowledge of truth and God (v. 20). Other ideas of the same character are contained in St. John's accounts of the teachings of Christ, referred to above. Then the apostle distinctly sets out the other aspect of mediation, in the atonement for sin offered by our Lord. Christ was 'manifested to take away sins' Lord. Christ was 'manifested to take away sins (or 'bear sins,' RVm; Gr. Iva τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἀρη, 1 Jn 36). Compare St. John's report of John the Baptist's words about 'the Lamb of God which taketh away (RVm 'beareth,' Gr. αΙρων) the sin of the world' (Jn 126). More specifically St. John describes Jesus Christ as 'an advocate' (παράκλητον) with the Father (1 Jn 21), i.e. as a pleader who mediates on our behalf and represents our who mediates on our behalf, and represents our case to God; and as a 'propitiation for our sins' (Racy to strip repl raps a paperior shades, 2°). It is to be observed that the word rendered 'propitiation' is not the same as that employed by St. Paul in Ro 325 (ἰλαστήριον), and signifies distinctly either an act of propitiation, or, in Alexandrine usage, a means of propitiating (e.g. Nu 5⁸, Lv 25⁹). In 2 Mac 3²² παεῖσθαι Ιλασμόν is used of a priest making a propitiatory sacrifice (see Thayer-Grimm). Accordingly St. John seems to mean that Christ is the propitiatory sacrifice. He had said earlier the propitiatory sacrifice. He had said earlier that 'the blood of Jesus His Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1 Jn 17); where, as usual, the word blood, written by a Jew with reference to cleansing from sin, must refer to a sacrificial idea. Thus by His death Christ becomes the sacrifice which removes the guilt of sin, and secures forgiveness for the penitent. In common with other NT writers, St. John does not explain the rationale of the process.

(β) The idea of mediation in the Apocatypse.— Both aspects of mediation are here presented to us. On the one hand, Jesus has come from God with truth and grace, and will come again to execute judgment. He is the Logos, 'The Word of God' (ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, 19¹³), and so the source of revelation. He is the 'Living One' (ὁ ζῶν, 4º ¹⁰ 10⁰), and therefore the source of life. He appears as the mediator of creation, like the Logos in the Gospel, for He is 'the beginning of the creation of God' (ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως τοῦ θεοῦ, 3¹⁴). Beyschlag understands this to mean the first being created (NT Theol. ii. 381); but most interpreters regard the ἀρχὴ as independent of creation, its determining principle (so Weiss, Gebhardt, Lechler, Bousset, Briggs, Stevens, etc.). Further, he holds the keys of Hades and of death (1¹²), i.e. determines who shall enter and who shall leave the region of the dead. He sits on the throne with God (3²¹ 7¹⁷ 12⁸), and will be the assessor of God in the judgment (6^{16,17}). In all these respects God acts through Him. On the other hand, we see in Christ the Godward aspect of mediation in which He represents us to God. As in Hebrews, though less explicitly, Christ is both priest and sacrifice. The opening description of Him as 'clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about at the breasts with a golden girdle' (1¹³), plainly points to priestly robes. But He is also the sacrifice. The most characteristic designation of our Lord in this book is 'the Lamb of God,' a title which occurs 29 times: He 'loosed (RV \lambda \text{trapri}, following best MSS, instead of 'washed,' \lambda \text{trapri}, aV) us from our sins by his blood' (1⁵); the saints 'have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb' (7¹⁴). Such language in a book that has many features of Judaism cannot but contain a sacrificial allusion. At the same time, here and elsewhere in NT, while the explanation of ideas of 'blood' and 'sacrifice' must take account of the OT, the advance of the Christian revelation to higher and more spiritual conceptions of religion forbids us to limit the meaning to Jewish ideas. The spiritual essence of sacrifice, the surrender of will, is the specially Christian thought.

Conclusion.—All through the Bible the idea of mediation in both its aspects is continually appearing. In the OT we find it distributed among a number of persons and functions—in the patriarch, the king, the prophet, the priest, the sacrifice, the 'servant of the Lord.' In the NT all these distinctions are merged in the sole mediation of Jesus Christ, both aspects of which are seen in His life and teaching, and in the apostolic writ-ings. Our Lord appears throughout as one sent by God to reveal Divine truth, to execute the Divine will, to bring deliverance to mankind from sin and ruin, to confer the gift of eternal life, and to establish the kingdom of heaven on earth. On the other hand, His action, to some extent His treaching, more explicitly the apostolic teaching (represented by St. Paul, St. Peter, St. John, and Ep. to Heb.), present Him as the Mediator with God on behalf of mankind, making intercession in His prayers on earth and in His heavenly life. after the resurrection, but chiefly giving His life as a ransom, shedding His blood for the remission of sin, acting as a means of propitiation, doing God's will, and dying as the perfecting of obedience to please God for the benefit of mankind, confirming the new covenant by His death. The images of 'blood' and 'sacrifice' are drawn from the OT, and can be understood only when their origin and allusion are recognized. At the same time, since our Lord liberated religion from the external and material limitations of Judaism, this process must be acknowledged with regard to the priestly and sacrificial functions. The revelation of the Father-hood of God necessarily modifies the idea of intercession and priestly mediation. The revelation of cession and priestly mediation. The revelation of His spirituality, and of the spiritual character of religion, carries with it freedom from material conceptions of sacrifice. The OT priest killed animals and sprinkled actual blood. Christ gave His life on the cross; but the reference to His blood has no such material connexion. We must take it metaphorically for His life surrandered in take it metaphorically for His life surrendered in death. Similarly, since He was not, like the Jewish sacrifices, an oblation laid by a priest on an altar, His sacrifice must be interpreted spiritually, and its reality found in the spiritual act of giving Himself to God in death.

Explanatory theories, as that the ransom was paid to Satan (Origen, Gregory of Nyssa), that the atonement was offered to the rights of God, whose suzerainty had been outraged (Anselm), that it was for the satisfaction of law and abstract justice (Protestant theologians, especially), that it consisted in our Lord's repenting on our behalf (M'Leod Campbell), etc., do not come within the scope of this inquiry, as they appear only in later speculations; and though all of them appeal to the Bible for the justification of their positions, none of them can claim to be results of pure exegesis, or even contents of strictly biblical theology.

MEDICINE.—Compared with other countries in the same latitude, Palestine is, and probably was in Bible days, a fairly healthy land. It has few sluggish streams, and most of its valleys are windswept; except in some few localities malarious diseases are not very rife, and owing to its want of harbours, and consequently of maritime com-merce, imported epidemics are not as common as they are in Egypt, which in the Old Testament is regarded as very much more unhealthy (cf. Dt 7¹⁸ 28⁶⁰, Am 4¹⁰). In addition to these natural advantages, if at any time the sanitary legislation of the Priestly Code were strictly observed, this must have been instrumental in preventing and checking the spread of disease. Under the social system set forth in the law, if it could have been carried out, there would not have been any very poor class, subject to the diseases fostered by destitution; and it is probable that until a comparatively late period there was no permanent overcrowding in the larger towns. It is difficult to estimate the density of the population in ancient times, but, considering the frequent checks it received from wars internal and external, it is not probable that even in the most prosperous days it ever exceeded 300 to the square mile. (The numbers in 1 Ch 21⁵ or 2 S 24⁹ are obviously unreliable). The conditions of life contemplated in the Priestly Code are those of a community of agricultural freeholders; and the social and moral enactments of the law provide for the maintenance of a healthy discipline, and for the repression of excesses injurious to health.

Health, the state in which the bodily functions are perfectly discharged, is, according to Sirach, the greatest of earthly blessings (30^{14, 18}). The word occurs 15 times in the OT (AV), but in different connotations. It is used twice as the tr. of objet shālom, referring to material prosperity (Gn 4329, 2 S 209), but here it is replaced by 'well' in the RV. Thrice in Ps 'health' in the old sense of welfare is the rendering of nat yesha'āh (4211 435 672; in the first two places RVm substitutes 'help'). Four times της wo places KVm substitutes 'neip'). Four times της 'arakāh (prop. the new flesh that forms on a wound), is tr. 'health,' but 'healing' is better (so RV, as in Is 58°, and RVm in Jer 30¹⁷ 33°). In Pr 3° 'health' in the ordinary sense of the word is the tr. of marg riph'ath; but in Pr 42° 12¹⁸ 13¹ 16² and Jer 8¹⁵, in which 'health' is used metaphorically, the Heb. is κτης marpé' (in the last ref. RV renders 'healing'). In the NT 'health' occurs twice: Ac 27^{34} , where it is the tr. of $\sigma\omega\tau\eta\rho la$, and is better rendered in RV 'safety'; and $3\,\mathrm{Jn}$, in the sense of bodily welfare, to 'be in health' being the tr. of bysalves.

The blessing of health was regarded as a reward of service (Is 58³), or withheld on account of sin (Jer 8^{15, 22}). In both OT and NT the popular belief (Jer 8^{10. 23}). In both Of and NI the popular bener is referred to, that diseases are penal in their origin, inflicted by God on account of sin either personal or parental (Jn 9²); and coming sometimes directly from Him (Ex 4¹¹, Dt 32³⁰), or from Satan when permitted (Job 2⁷), or by the agencies of other spirits, as those of dumbness (Mk 9¹⁷) or foulness (Mk 9²⁶). Diseases might also be caused by envy on the part of others (Joh 5²) and the power of on the part of others (Job 5²), and the power of the evil eye is referred to in 1 S 18⁹ as well as in the Talmud (Shabbath 67, Pesachim 112, etc.). They might also come as consequences of gluttony, of drunkenness, of vicious or self-indulgent practices (Sir 37^{30, 31}), but even in these cases they were regarded as coming by God's direct interposition. Therefore healing was a divine token of forgiveness: God was the physician of His people (Ex 1526), and it was their duty to look to Him for relief; hence Asa's sin in seeking to the physicians (2 Ch 162).

Physicians. — The medical knowledge of the biblical peoples was small in amount and crude in character. In Egypt there were schools of medicine in the 15th cent. B.C. (Papyrus Ebers i, ciii); but there are no traces of any system of medical education in Palestine in Bible times, and allusions to physicians are few. Egyptian physicians, who are called Joseph's servants, embalmed Jacob (Gn 50²). These were probably hr-hbu, the class of priests whom the Greeks called paraschistes and taricheuta, whose long misunderstood relations have been cleared up by Revillout (Æg. Zeitschr. 1879, 1880). The existence of physicians in the days of the compilation of the Book of Judgments (Ex 2119) has been inferred from the order that the assailant of his neighbour is to cause him to be thoroughly healed. The wh rōphê', of Jer 82, was a healer of wounds, a bandager (cf. Ec 33). While in Asa's time to seek the physician was to depart from God, Sirach in later days regards him as God's servant, 'for from the Most High cometh healing' (382). At the same time repentance and a memorial offering on the part of the sick man are to precede the visit of the physician, who is to be priest as well as healer (v. 14). In the newly discovered Heb. the passage in v. 15, which, in the Greek, seems to speak slightingly of him, says, 'He that sinneth against God will behave arro-

In early Egypt also the physicians were priests, and Papyrus Ebers gives several formulæ to be used as prayers while compounding medicaments. (for later Egyptian physicians see Herod. ii. 84). The Hebrew priests had charge of certain branches of public health, e.g. leprosy, but it was to the prophets that those requiring medical aid chiefly applied: Nathan (2 S 12¹⁴), Ahijah (1 K 14²), Elijah (1 K 17¹⁸), Elisha (2 K 4²²), and Isaiah (2 K 20⁷) are examples. In post-biblical times Jewish physicians were famous throughout the East, and the sayings of many of these are preserved in the the sayings of many of these are preserved in the Talmud and other rabbinical writings. According to Sanhedrin 17b there was a physician in every town, and there was also in the temple a physician for the priests (Shekalim 5. 1, 2). At the same for the priests (Shekalim 5. 1, 2). At the same time it was not unlawful to employ a Gentile, even to perform circumcision, if no qualified Jew was available (Menahoth 42a); but Gentile medicine was to be taken with caution, as it might contain blood. At first these physicians and surgeons were mostly priests possessed of a certain amount of traditional and empirical knowledge, as, for example, in connexion with the diagnosis of leprosy. Doubtless many of them were, like Job's friends, אָל מָשְל Job 13', that is, having the same relation to real physicians as that which an insignificant idol bears to the true God. Men of this kind probably gave rise to the proverb in Kiddushin 4. 14, that the best of physicians was deserving of hell. In the NT we have Luke, 'the beloved physician' (Col 414), in whose writings the influence of a medical training has been recognized by Lagarde (Psalterium juxta Heb. Hieron. 165), Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke, 1882); see also Blass, Philol. of the Gospels, 1898. The refer-ence to physicians in Mk 5²¹ is not very appreciative (cf. with Lk 80).

Until a comparatively late period, the objections to touching the dead, and the ceremonial unclean-Jewish physicians from obtaining any practical acquaintance with the interior of the human body, as dissection was regarded as dishonouring the dead (Chullin 11b). The famous Rabbi Ishmael (A.D. 100), of whose anatomical knowledge many stories are told, broke down this prejudice to some degree, and obtained the body of a condemned criminal for anatomical purposes (Bechorth 45a); see also Nazir 32b, for stories of Theudas recognizing bones. Something of the structure of animals must have been known from the priestly experiences in sacrifices, in which the operator had the opportunity of inspecting the viscera of the slain beasts. The method employed in the slaughter of the animals whose carcases were used as food, in order to drain the body of its blood, must also have given to the shehet (butcher) and to the shomer (inspector), whose duty is to certify the meat as kisher or clean, a certain amount of empirical knowledge of the anatomy and pathology of animals (Chullin 9a). In the Sepher Zabahi of Rabbi Meir Cohen (Leghorn, 1832) the ritual for this examination is given at length, and from it the stringency of the rules for the recognition of clean flesh can be estimated. This code is of considerable antiquity, and must have been of great benefit to the public health (Buxtorf, Syn. Jud.

There are very few biblical references to the facts of anatomy or physiology. 'The blood is the life,' and therefore tabooed as food (Gn 94, Lv 17¹¹). This in itself was an important sanitary precaution, considering the highly metabolic nature of blood, which is of all the materials in the body the most likely to carry the microbes of disease, as well as parasites of larger size. In Job 10¹⁰ and Ps 139^{15, 16} the current notion of embryology, which was one of epigenesis, is set forth; but the details were considered as beyond human knowledge (Ec 11⁵); see also Nidda 25. In Aruch the embryo is said to appear at first like a grasshopper. W, tr. 'navel,' appears in Pr 3⁵ as the seat of health, perhaps as being the mid-point of the body, but the word is perhaps a slip for της flesh,' in contradistinction to bones, as LXX reads it (τὰ σώματί σου). The heart (wh. see) was, to the Jews, as to all the peoples of antiquity, the seat of emotion, thought, and wisdom: the reins or kidneys (wh. see) were the seats of feeling, passion, and determination: the bowels (wh. see) were supposed to be the organs of affection and sympathy (see Job 30-7). In Zohar (Bemidbar 128) there is a remarkable account of the anatomy of the brain.

There were many proverbial sayings current among the Jews referring to physicians. Our Lord quotes one of these: 'Physician, heal thyself' (Lk 42). A similar saying, אינות הוא אינות אינו occurs in Jalkut on Bereshith 38, and in Midrash Rubbah (Beresh. 23). The same idea is expressed in a saying ascribed to R. Levi (Midrash on Lv 5):

'It is a shame on the country whose surgeon is gouty and whose oculist is blind.' See Burckhardt's Arab. Prov. No. 404. A proverb, the parallel of our Lord's parable of the Mote and the Beam, occurs in Baba Bathra 15b, 'Say not, Take Beam, occurs in Baba Bathra 15b, 'Say not, Take the straw out of thine eye, when thou hast a stick in thine own.' Another of His sayings, 'They that are whole have no need of a physician; but they that are sick,' is nearly alike in sense to a sentence in Baba Kamma 46b, 'They who suffer pain should seek the physician.' Other medical pain should seek the physician. Other medical proverbs are, 'God determines the healing before the disease' (Megillah 13); 'A wise man will not live in a town where there is no physician' (Sanhedrin 17b); and, on the other hand, 'Do not live in a town of which the chief officer is a physician' (Pesachim 113. 1); 'Honour the physician before thou hast need of him' (Tanhuma, see also Sir 381 Hobbert version) Hebrew version).

Visitation of the sick, although not enjoined in the Mosaic books, is urged as a duty in the Talmud (Shabbath 127 B), and several paragraphs in the Shulhan Aruch (Jûre De ah 335 ff.) are devoted to this subject. Several cases are excepted, such as ophthalmic or abdominal diseases, and headache, Rabbi Johanan says, 'He who visits the sick lengthens his life, and he who refrains shortens it' (Nedarim 39). Our Lord's enforcement of this duty in Mt 25.25.25 is noteworthy.

Of the general terms referring to disease in the Bible the word in commonest use is aick. This occurs 38 times in OT and 50 in NT. In the former it is usually the tr. of the halfah, but in Lv 15²³ (cf. 20¹⁸) it represents my davah, in the sense of temporary periodic sickness: a cognate word (m) in Is 1³ is tr. 'faint,' and another (m) in Ps 41³ 'languishing' (subst.). In 2 S 12¹⁸ the word is wig 'anash (in imperf. Niph.). The ptcp. pass. Qal is used in Job 34⁶ of an arrow wound, but tr. 'desperate' in Is 17¹¹, 'incurable' in Jer 30¹², and 'desperately wicked' in Jer 17². 'Sick' in Is 1³ is 'pp' loholl, the word 'pp being usually tr. 'disease.' In Jer 14¹⁸ ('sick with famine') it is natura tahilla'im, lit. 'sicknesses' (cf. RVm). This word is tr. 'diseases' in Ps 103³ and 2 Ch 21¹⁸. 'Sickness' in OT is in 12 cases the rendering of hole. former it is usually the tr. of and halah, but in Ly in OT is in 12 cases the rendering of hôts, and thrice of hop mahdlah, Ex 23. 1 K 8. 2 Ch 6. Sicknesses in the plural occurs in the OT only in Dt 28 (חַלְיִם) 29 (מַלְיִם).

Disease occurs 10 times in OT, 8 times as the rendering of holt; once in Ps 41° in the phrase 'an evil disease' (AV, RV; Heb. אָרָע בְּלְּאָל, RVm 'some wicked thing'), and once as tr. of mahdlah in 2 Ch 21° 'Diseased' represents nahloth (Niph. ptcp. of חֹיְחָיִ) in Ezk 34° ", and halah (Qal) in I K 15° and 2 Ch 16°. 'Diseases' in the plural is the tr. of tahdla'm in 2 Ch 21° and Ps 103°, of mahdlah and F 103° of mahdlah and Ps 103°, in Ex 152, of myo madveh in Dt 715 and 280, and of mahaldyim in 2 Ch 242.

Infirmity is used thrice in the OT, each time in a different sense, and representing a different word, dāvāh in Lv 12° (in infin. con. with suffix mm, referring to periodic sickness; hālāh (in infin. Piel) in Ps 7710, in the sense of infirmity from sickness; and mahaleh in Pr 1814, in the sense of weakness in general. Plague is used sometimes as the name of a specific epidemic and sometimes in the sense of sickness in general, and is the tr. of the sense of sickness in general, and is the tr. of maggēphāh, makkāh, mega'. In other places it refers to other forms of affliction or to the judgments of God (1 K 8³⁷, Rv 16²¹). See PLAGUE.

The RV has changed 'sick' in Pr 23²⁸ into 'hurt,' and in Mic 6¹³ 'will I make thee sick in smiting thee' has been altered to 'I have smitten thee with a grievous wound.' 'Loathsome disease' in Pa 28²⁸ hee heen properly altered into 'hurning' in Ps 387 has been properly altered into 'burning,' as the reference is to the heat of fever. 'Pining sickness' n'n in Hezekiah's prayer, Is 3812, has been also altered into 'from the loom.' Literally it means 'from the thrums' whereby the web is fastened to the weaver's beam, the idea being that as the web is cut off from the loom, so his life was separated from its surroundings. The 'evil disease' of Ps 418 is rendered in RVm 'some wicked

The words for 'sickness' are often qualified by some expression or phrase. 'Sickness unto death' of 2 Ch 32³¹, 1 K 14¹, and Is 38¹ is contrasted with 'sickness and recovery,' Is 39¹. R. Hanina ben Dosa used to say of his patients, 'This one is sick unto death, this will recover' (Berachoth 5. 5). 'Sore [sickness]' is the tr. of hāzāk, 'violent,' in 1 K 17¹¹. The prefix in 'sore diseases' of 2 Ch 21¹¹² is the tr. of ra. An 'evil disease' in Ps 41³ is literally a 'thing ("") of Belial.' The diseases of Egypt are referred to as especially severe in Ex 15²², Dt 7¹² 28²¹ 28²⁰. 'Incurable disease' used literally in 2 Ch 21¹¹² is a phrase used figuratively in Job 34°, Jer 15¹³, Mic 1². 'Sickness of long continuance' is mentioned in Dt 28²⁰.

Figurative expressions referring to disease are

Figurative expressions referring to disease are not uncommon. It is a 'scourge' in Job 922; a 'pestilence walking in darkness,' Ps 916. The 'pestilence walking in darkness,' Ps 91°. The Jewish idea of disease and death being inflicted by a special angel is referred to in 28 24¹⁶, 1 Ch 21^{12-13.27}, 2 K 19²⁶, Rev 6°. In the second of these passages he appears with a sword in his hand. Diseases are also spuken of as God's arrows, Dt 32^{24.18}, Job 6°, Ps 6°4° 91° 144°, La 3¹³, Zec 91° etc. The Arabian proverb says that the pestilence is God's arrow which always hits its mark.

'diseases' and 'diseased' 15 times, and 'infirmities' 19 times. These are tr. of various words: dσθέτεια, meaning primarily weakness and usually tr. 'in-tirmities,' sometimes 'sick' as in Ac 28' (έχοντες ασθενείας); μαλακία, meaning softness or effeminacy, as well as sickness, is used in Mt 4²² 9³⁵ 10¹, probably referring to wasting chronic diseases, and contrasted in some passages with roos, which indicates more acute violent seizures. Homer (Od. xv. 408) compares the hateful sickness (rovos) falling on wretched mortals with the visitation of the gentle shafts of Artemis and Apollo, whereby the old are slain; and Hesiod assigns the origin of diseases of this kind to the box of Pandors (Op. et Di. i. 101). $rb\sigma\eta\mu\alpha$ occurs in Jn 54. The unfaithful use of ordinances is said to cause those who Jerome on this passage says, 'There are three causes from which infirmities arise, either from temptation as Job and Tobiah, from sin as Asaph the king and those referred to here by the apostle, or from some intemperance as Timothy, etc. Chrysostom interprets this as referring to bodily ailments, great diseases, and premature deaths. The reference is, however, possibly to mental and spiritual weakness, as in Xenophon (Econom. iv. 17: και αι ψυχαι πολύ άρρωστότεραι γίγνονται). Hippocrates uses the word for disease either of mind or body. In Mt 14²⁸ του κακῶς έχοντας is used for those that were sick; and in Ro 15¹ ἀσθετήματα means weaknesses or infirmities of conscience, as in Aristotle (de Gener. Animal. i. 18, where it is used as the parallel of appworthua).

Some sicknesses, such as leprosy, rendered the patients unclean, and caused their exclusion from cities (see LEPROSY); but in general the sick were treated at home. In later times hospitals were established, generally near the city gates. These were called בתי חמשיח, and were like the Kaati of the present day.

In the earlier days of Jewish medicine it is probable that bleeding, the universal panacea in the dominant classical medical schools, was not used, on account of the tribal belief concerning the blood. In this the Jews were in accord with Pythagoras and Erasistratus. It has been thought that they were acquainted with the use of leeches from the words of Agur (Pr 3015); but if 'horseleech' is the correct rendering (cf. HORSELEECH, ad fin.), this only implies their knowledge of the bloodthirsty habits of the leech, and does not refer to its medicinal use. Targ. on Ps 12 paraphrases on this point Aboda Zara 13b. In later days, however, the Jewish physicians conformed to the universal practice.

two kinds, either so very general that they are indefinite, or concrete in connexion with individual cases. The former class for the most part consists cases. The former class for the most part consists of names alone which are as vague as the folknames of disease usually are. Several of these disease-names are grouped together in Dt 28²² as forming a class, which, on account of being sudden, severe, epidemic, and often fatal, appear as if judgments directly from God. Most of these are febrile diseases, and although it is not possible precisely to identify the disease expressed by each name, yet, from the experience which residents in name, yet, from the experience which residents in the East have acquired of the most prevalent forms of disease, it is most probable that the diseases referred to are malarial fevers of different kinds with, perhaps, tropical typhoid, and Mediterranean fever.

The first name on the list is nonw shahepheth, from a root signifying 'leanness or wasting,' hence it is rendered 'consumption' both in RV and AV (LXX dwopla). This may be phthisis, but, from the connexion in which it occurs, is more likely a febrile disease of long duration and attended with vection of the time of Medicard and attended with wasting, something of the type of Mediterranean or Malta fever, which may last for months, and whose most prominent characteristics are the weakness, anemia, and wasting with which it is accompanied. The same word occurs in Lv 26¹⁶. In both RV and AV the word 'consumption' is used in Is 10²² as the tr. of pays killayon, The meaning a wasting or destruction in general. The RV, however, distinguishes in Is 10²² and 28²² between this and kalah, translating the latter as 'consummation,' whereas the two are confounded in the AV. In neither case, however, does it seem to be a specific disease. Phthisis is not a characteristic disease either in Syria or in Egypt, although it does occasionally occur in the former country. See Tobler, Med. Topographie von Jerus. 42, and Wittman, p. 92.

The three names that follow in Dt are now kaddahath, 'fever' (RV and AV; LXX πυρετός); not dalleketh, 'inflammation' (LXX ρέγος, 'aguè'); and τητο hurhar (AV 'extreme burning'; RV 'fiery heat'; LXX ἐρεθισμός, 'irritation'). That these three describe different kinds of fever is plain, as three descrite different kinds of fever is plain, as all three words imply burning or heat. The kaddahath is called in AV of Lv 26¹⁶ 'burning ague,' and is said to 'consume the eyes and make the soul to pine away' (LXX calls this disease trepos, 'jaundice'). It may be the malarial fever which occurs in the Jordan Valley and the Lebanon calleys in Largeslam and in the Shapkalah on valleys, in Jerusalem and in the Shephelah, as well as around the Sea of Galilee. This disease is occasionally accompanied by jaundice. ruper 6s was the disease of the nobleman's son at Capernaum (Jn 4³⁰) and of Simon's mother-in-law (Lk 4³⁰ a great fever') at the same place (see Hippocr. Epidem. iii.). The word in Mt 8¹⁴ and Mk 1³⁰ is πυρέσσουσα. Dalleketh was considered by some Jewish writers as a burning fever, but by the LXX as an intermittent fever. It may possibly have been some form of ague, which often occurs in the same localities as the other forms of malarial fever, perhaps indeed typhoid, which is now, and probably was in former times, one of the commonest fevers in Palestine. Typhus was probably rare, and is so still except in crowded places. Burckhardt mentions its occurrence under the name of putrid fever at Djiddah (Arabia, i. 495), but says that most of the fevers elsewhere are intermitting in type, ii. 290. For typhus in Palestine see Rafalowitsch in Ausland, 1847, p. 1084. Harhur must be something characterized by irritation and heat, such as erysipelas, only that this is not at all common as an epidemic, indeed is not very common in Palestine. It might be one of the exanthemata. The Hebrew name refers to its heat, the Greek to the local irritation caused by it. Of all these fevers the Rabbinic physicians recognized four stages: incubation, beginning, recognized four stages: incubation, beginning, augmentation, and decline or convalescence. For erysipelas in Egypt see Pruner, p. 118; see also Brayer, Neuf années à Constantinople, p. 46.

Following these in the Dt passage MT has any hereb, 'sword'; but probably we should read any (as in margin of AV, RV) = 'drought,' either a disease attended with dryness, or else simply drought of the earth. The latter is more probable, as it is followed by the words shiddāphôn and yērāķôn, tr. here as in Am 4° and Hag 21° by 'blasting and mildew,' penal destruction of the fruits of the earth. For any as a disease see Zec 111°. It is tr. 'a sword' both in AV and RV; but from the effects given in the pasthe fruits of the earth. For an as a disease see Zec 1117. It is tr. 'a sword' both in AV and RV; but from the effects given in the passage, wasting of the arm and shrivelling of the eye, it is plainly such a condition as the wasting paralysis described below under diseases of the nervous system (but see Nowack, Comm. ad loc.).

Two other words are used to describe wasting diseases. Man chastened by God for his injustive diseases. Man chastened by God for his iniquity has his attractiveness consumed (npp māṣāh, 'melt away') as by a moth (Ps 39¹¹ [Heb. ¹²]). The same condition is named ppp (mākak, 'fester') in Zec 14¹². This disease is threatened against the enemies of Jerusalem, and is to consume their flesh, their eyes, and their tongues. This is the 'pining away' to which sinful Israel is condemned (Lv 26°, Ez 24° 33°), and the same term is applied to festering wounds in Ps 38°, where it is associated with burning pain in the loins, weakness, violent action of the heart, etc. Much of the description is plainly figurative of mental and spiritual disquiet; but the imagery might well be taken from an attack of confluent smallpox, with its disfiguring and blinding effects, causing the repulsion even of lovers and friends. There is little reason to doubt the antiquity of smallpox. This disease is threatened against the enemies of is little reason to doubt the antiquity of smallpox. Philo in his life of Moses (ed. Turnebus, 622 A.B.) describes the sixth plague of Egypt as beginning with a red eruption whose spots became swollen and pustular, appearing as if they had been boiled with the sudden heat. The sufferers were worn down with anguish from these inflammations and ulcers. 'For to one looking upon one of these cases in which the pustules, confluent into a mass, were spread over the body and limbs, it appeared as if they formed a continuous ulcer from head to foot.' Mas'udi (in the Meadows of Gold, ed. Meynard, iii.) states that in A.D. 370 smallpox broke out among the Arabs for the first time, but that the disease had been known among the Jews before that time. (See also Hirsch, Sydenham Soc. Tr. i. 125).

The word אָלֶה (kālāh, 'to come to an end,' 'to vanish away') is used in Ps 719 of strength failing in old age, and in Job 1927 3321 of flesh becoming emaciated through illness (see Comm. ad loc.).

Pestilence or plague is also used as descriptive of a violent disease, extremely fatal, and sent as a punishment on large masses of people. Pestilence is the tr. of not deber. 'Plague,' as far as it refers is the tr. of the accer. Plague, as far as it refers to these epidemics, is the rendering of several words: representation in Nu 14³⁷ 16^{42, 40, 40} 25^{52, 52} 18 26¹ 31¹⁸, 1 Ch 21²³, 2 Ch 21¹⁴, Ps 106^{29, 20}, Zec 14¹²; remakkāh, in Lv 26²¹, Nu 11²⁸, Dt 28²⁰; nu negah, in Nu 16^{43, 47}, Jos 22¹⁷; it is yn negah, in Ex 11¹, 1 S 6⁴, Ps 91¹⁰. The fear of this deber was used as an argument by Moses to Pharaoh to induce him to let Israel go (Ex 914). With this disease God threatens rebellious Israel repeatedly, Nu 1412, Dt 2821; and there were at least four outbreaks during the wanderings in the wilderness, just as in later years it has appeared among the hordes of Mohammedan pilgrims on their way to Meeca. At Kibroth-hattaavah (Nu 11²⁸) it broke out suddenly while the Israelites were consuming the quails; it is quite conceivable that these birds may have come from some plague-stricken Arabian district and conveyed the infection, as rats, oxen, deer, and others animals have done in later times (see Rocher, Chinese Imp. Cust. Gaz. Med. Rep. 15).

There was a second outbreak after the rebellion of Korah (Nu 16th), stayed by the intercession of Aaron; and a third to punish the discontent consequent on the evil report of the spies (Nu 147). Here it is called maggephäh. The fourth epidemic followed the iniquity of Baal-peor, and probably the infection was communicated by the Moabites (Nu 25^{a,p,18}). The judgment which followed David's sin of numbering the people was of the same nature (2 S 24¹⁸, 1 Ch 21¹²; Jos. Ant. VII. xiii. 3). Plague was threatened on account of the sin of Jehoram (2 Ch 21¹⁴). It is called 'noisome' in Pa 21¹⁴ (see (2 Ch 21¹⁴). It is called 'noisome' in Ps 91³ (אָרָּיִה חִי חִי חִ, and characterized as walking in darkness (v. 6), as its attacks often begin at night. It was often threatened by the prophets, especially Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Habakkuk, and appears to have broken out in Jerusalem during the siege (Jer 21°), and also among the fugitives from Jerusalem to Egypt (Jer 4217). The destruction of the army of Sennacherib was most probably effected by a sudden outburst of this disease (2 K 1925), and it is noteworthy that presumably about the same time, or at least shortly after it, Hezekiah was seized with an illness, supposed to be mortal, in the course of which a 'boil' developed which may well have been the bubo of the plague (Is 381). The destroying angel is mentioned as inflicting the plague in 2 S 24¹⁷, 1 Ch 21¹⁵, 16, and 2 K 19²⁵, 2 Ch 32²¹ (cf. Jos. Ant. X. i. 5).

The bubonic plague has been from time im-ne buoone piague has been from time immemorial the periodic scourge of Bible lands. It is mentioned in the oldest medical literature (Hippoc. Aph. iv. 52, Epid. iii. 55). Ruffus mentions a visitation of plague in Syria about B.C. 300; and the dreadful epidemic in the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 544, is graphically recorded by the historians as leaving whole districts deportulated. Its outbreaks are suided in the reign of the state of the st depopulated. Its outbreaks are sudden, it spreads rapidly, and simultaneously affects large bodies of people. At its onset it is remarkably fatal: in the last visitation in this country (1664-1669) 4000 died in London within the first week, and during the in London within the first week, and during the period of the epidemic 70,000 died in that city, about 1 in 5 of the population. It has a short incubation period; 'in highly malignant epidemics the disease may show itself within three or four hours of exposure to infection' (Manson, Trop. Diseases, 156; see also cases cited by Pruner, p. 396). The bubo or glandular swelling in the groin or axilla often develops within a few hours. Death generally ensues (in more than 60 per cent. of those attacked) within the first three days (Colvill). In the type called pestis siderans, death often occurs within twelve to twenty-four hours. In one village, out of 534 inhabitants 311 died within three days (see Hirsch, op. cit. i. 495, and Allbutt's Syst. of Med. i. 917).

There are in the Levitical code no sanitary pre-cautions given to prevent its spreading. This is probably due to the belief that it was a divine judgment supernaturally inflicted, and to be stayed only by prayer and repentance. Had the Israelites kept themselves, as they were bidden, from intercourse with their neighbours, it is probable that they would have remained tolerably free from it, as it is not endemic anywhere in Palestine, and is always propagated along trade routes. In this respect it was really a punishment for breaches of their law. In Taanith 3. 4, the inhabitants of a district visited by a plague are directed to fast, and to blow trumpets, while their neighbours are to fast without blowing trumpets. Baba Kamma recommends staying at home and fleeing the society of others in time of plague (60. 2).

Emerods. - In the account of the Philistine plague, after the capture of the ark (1 S 56-12) it is said that the people of Ashdod and the other cities were smitten with emerods (AV). The word is מַנָּיִם öphālim, for which Kěrê substitutes and těhôrim (the latter is used in the text in 1 S 611.17). These words mean 'swellings or rounded eminences.' Aquila renders φαγεδαίνης έλκος; LXX B has in 1 S 56 εξέξεσεν αυτοίς εls τας ναθς [A έδρας; cf. BA in v.º και ἐπάταξεν els τὰς ἔδρας αὐτῶν, and Vulg. in secretiori parte natium, v.º]. From comparison with Ps 7806, where God is said to have smitten His enemies on the hinder part (RV 'backwards'), it was supposed that the tumours were on the buttocks, and they were therefore identified with hæmorrhoids. There is, however, nothing in the narrative to bear out this exegesis, and RV translates 'tumours.' The disease was epidemic. in-The disease was epidemic, infectious, often fatal; was attended with tumours somewhere about the lower part of the abdomen, and these were so definite that they could be represented by models. It is certain, therefore, that it was no kind of hæmorrhoid, and the probability is great that this also was the plague whose buboes were the tumours. This view is advocated by Hitzig (Urgesch. d. Philist. 201) and Wellhausen (Samuel, 64), and it satisfies all the conditions, this being of all the diseases of the East the most likely to have set in with the fatal suddenness described in the text. The same word occurs in Dt 2817, and from the analogy of the Syriac word used in the passage, كىدەز, which is that the reference may be to dysenteric tumours (Comm. on Deut. 1895, xx and 310); but there are very seldom any tumours in dysentery, while tenesmus and evacuations of blood are common in the plague. The images of the emerods are called in Vulg. quinque anos aureos.

Disorders involving the digestive organs mentioned in the Bible are either due to malaria or are the results of intemperance. The case of the father of Publius was one of acute dysentery. The disease is called in AV Ac 288 bloody flux; in Gr. πυρετὸς καὶ δυσεττερία. Sir W. Aitken gives Malta as one of the six districts in which this disease is most prevalent and most fatal (ii. 841). The presence of hæmorrhage snows that the distance was of the ulcerative or gangrenous type, instance was of the ulcerative or gangrenous form. The ence of hæmorrhage shows that the disease in this either of which is a most dangerous form. The germs of this disease are water-borne, so it is common in awampy, moist localities, as by riversides. In Egypt its mortality is said by Griesinger to be about 36 per cent.

The description of the disease of which Jehoram died (2 Ch 2119), which began at a period of a general epidemic, lasted two years, and was incurable, as in its course the bowels were shed or fell out, tallies with the condition met with in some forms of chronic dysentery with sloughing of the intestine, one of the most hopeless and intractable forms of disease which the physician has to treat' (Aitken, ii. 859). Dutrouleau records an example of this kind in which about 13 inches of the mucous and submucous coats of the colon were evacuated. In certain forms, also, there is a diphtheritic exudation on the mucous membrane, which may be detached in larger or smaller masses. In Papyrus Ebers xlii there is an account of a disease of this kind, with swelling of the abdomen, and pain, pale face, aching head, the abdomen hot to the touch, and with a discharge of a black or white material. This was called the shn disease.

Digestive and other disorders from intemperance are graphically enumerated in Pr 23²⁰; interjectional cries of distress, accident, redness of eyes, strange visions, bitings as sharp as those of the serpent. In Is 19¹⁴ the drunkard is represented as staggering or falling in his vomit; in Is 288 they defile all that they touch (see Jer 25²⁷), being ultimately drugged to sleep (Jer 51^{39, 57}). Disease is also associated with riotous eaters of flesh (Pr 2320).

Disorders of the Liver. The Heb. physicians regarded many diseases as due to an alteration in the bile, and in this respect they agreed with the dogmatic school of Humoralists, such as Plato and Praxagoras. This is expressed in Buba Kamma 92, Baba mezia 107, Chagigah 26. There is an allusion to this belief in Job 16¹³, where the patriarch complains that the disease, God's arrow, had compassed him about, and poured out his gall upon the ground. The gall in La 3° and Dt 291° is, however, not the bile, but a poisonous plant. Celsius regards rõsh here as perhaps a poppy. See, further, art. GALL. In La 211 the same expression is used of the קבר or liver, the pouring out of which is regarded as a fatal condition. Hence the dissolute fool is punished by a dart striking through his liver, Pr 723. Of the true functions of the liver the Jewish physicians were as ignorant as were the Egyptians. In Papprus Ebrs xxxvi, c, ciii, it is said that the vessels brought air as well as blood to the organ.

The πυκναι dσθένειαι of Timothy (1 Ti 523) were probably digestive troubles, flatulent atonic dyspepsia, whose most urgent symptoms are tempor-arily relieved by alcohol. This disease seemed to have produced in him a disposition to slackness, concerning which St. Paul repeatedly warns him (1 Ti 4¹³⁻¹⁶). In such cases, however, while alcohol allays the morbid functional sensibility, it does not really remove the cause of the disease.

Mental emotions of a lowering nature, such as grief or anxiety, produce important physical effects on the alimentary canal, checking certain secretions; hence in Ps 693 the dryness of the throat in such cases is mentioned. In Is 16¹¹ and Jer 4¹⁹ 31²⁰ there are references to the suddenly arising flatulent distension of the colon, which is often to be noticed under the same conditions. These borborygmi are referred to the heart in Jer

The effects of the water in the jealousy ordeal (Nu 5¹⁷) may here be referred to. The 'bitter water which causeth the curse' consisted of holy water, consecrated by the priest, into which dust from the floor of the sanctuary was put, and with which the curses pronounced against unfaithful-ness written out by the priest were washed off the parchment on which they had been written. This is a kind of ordeal of which examples are not uncommon in primitive religions. The meaning of the dust is given by R. Menahem in Siphre x., that as the dust is regarded as defiling the holy place, so the suspicion of unfaithfulness defiles the person suspected. In the same place the priest is recommended to write the curses out on tablets, not on paper, but on prepared skins, and not with gum or copperas, but with black ink. The ordeal was a direct appeal to God, and the water was supposed, in cases of guilt, to cause wasting of the buttock (dislocation of the right thigh, Jos. Ant. III. xi. 6) and swelling of the abdonen, possibly ovarian dropsy; see Dillmann, in loc.

The effects of eating that on which prophetic writings were inscribed as a preparation for discharging the prophetic office are referred to in Ezk 3', Rev 10'. This is also an action of which examples are known in several folk-religions (see Lane, Modern Egyptians, i. 347), and even in British folk-lore. Our Lord promised His disciples protection if they were subjected to the ordeal of poisonous drinks (Mk 16¹⁸).

The heart, mentioned more frequently (716 times in OT and 105 in NT) in Scripture than any other of the bodily organs, on account of its sup-posed connexion with the intellectual as well as the moral and spiritual life, was, as far as its physiological action is concerned, so little known that there are few references to physical disease affecting it (see HEART, vol. ii. 317). The pericardium or caul over the heart is mentioned in Hos 13⁶. 'A sound heart is the life of the flesh' (Pr 14²⁰), which is parallel to Juvenal's mens sana in corpore sano (x. 356), may have a physical as well as a psychological reference. The curious proverb, 'A wise man's heart is at his right hand, but a fool's heart at his left' (Ec 10³), has its parallel in the ancient Egyptian aphorism,' The breath of life passes to the right side, the breath of death to the left' (Pap. Ebers c).

fainting, is described in several instances. Jacob's heart fainted at the news of Joseph's exaltation in Egypt (Gn 45²⁸). Eli had a sudden attack of syncope, leading to a fatal fall, from the shock of the news that the Philistines had taken the ark (1 S 4¹²⁶). Saul fainted with hunger and fear on the reception of Samuel's message through the witch of Endor (1 S 2820). Daniel also fainted and was sick for several days on receiving Gabriel's message (8"). See FAINT, vol. i. 826. Heart palpitation is given in Pap. Ebers xlv as a symptom of the 'i' disease or chlorosis.

'A broken heart' is mentioned 11 times in Scripture, but always in its metaphorical sense of repentance and sorrow for sin. The condition literally expressed by the term has acquired a special interest on account of Dr. Stroud's hypothesis that rupture of the heart was the condition to which our Lord's death was due (see Stroud, Physical Causes of the Death of Christ, 1847, also Bennett's Diseases of the Bible, p. 117).

Although it is only in Daniel that the functions of the nervous centres are recognized (see 110 228 43-7.10 71-13), yet diseases affecting this system are often mentioned :-

Paralysis or Palsy.—These words are used to express loss of the power of motion, a common symptom in diseases of the central nervous system.

This condition is usually serious, often intractable, and is generally fairly rapid in its onset, but slow in disappearing. In the NT there are several accounts of the miraculous cures of paralysis by our Lord, as in Mt 424; here as in Ac 87 these are recorded in general terms. In the case of the man at Capernaum, borne of four, whose friends let him down through the tiling into the presence of Christ, Matthew (9°) uses the word παραλυτικόs, as also does Mark (2°). Luke (5¹8) uses the term παραλελυμένος. The man seems to have suffered from paraplegia, i.e. complete loss of power in his lower limbs. The prognosis in this disease, due as it generally is to an organic change in the spinal cord from myelitis, is generally unfavourable, and even in the best cases progress is slow.

Our Lord calls this man 'son,' which may be intended as a mark of age; but both this and the conjecture that the paralysis was a judgment on him for immorality, on account of our Lord's having prefaced his cure by declaring the for-giveness of his sins, are deductions not warranted by the very slender data from which they are drawn.

The example of Æneas, healed by St. Peter (Ac 923), that of a man eight years bedridden, was probably one of the same kind.

The centurion's servant (Mt 8°) was 'grievously tormented' (δεινῶι βασανιζύμενοι). This is descriptive of the pain which he suffered, as the phrase is used in classical Greek of torture to extort confession (see the case of Gylippus in Thucyd. vii. 86, and the Argive in viii. 29). It was probably an acute case, possibly of spinal meningitis. Bennett conjectures 'progressive paralysis with muscular spasms involving the respiratory movements' (p. 92), but the former seems to fit the description better, as in it the 'torment' is the more grievous.

The man with the withered hand (Mt 129-13, Mk 31-5, Lk 65-10) was probably a sufferer in his early years from anterior poliomyclitis, causing infantile paralysis. In such a case the bones as well as the muscles atrophy, and the limb becomes reduced to a mere stick. To the same category probably belonged the lame man healed by Peter and John at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple (Ac 3*), although this may have been congenital want of develop-ment of the lower limbs; but from the narrative it would appear that the limbs were well formed, although for forty years deprived of strength. Cases like these were probably included in the general term 'withered' $(\xi\eta\rho\sigma l)$, applied to a group of the expectant waiters at the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5*). The word is used of shrivelled parts (as in Æsch. Orestes, 387), or of a generally wasted frame (Electra, 239). The man who is called δ ἀσθετῶν (Jn 57) was probably thus affected. The thirty-eight years' duration of the case is against its having been an example of locomotor ataxia.

Moreover, the diseased condition to which locomotor ataxia is generally due was probably unknown at that time. He was able to move himself, although slowly, for he says, 'while I am coming,' meaning by his unaided exertion (ib.). There appears to be an OT reference to this condition under the name hôreb, elsewhere translated 'drought,' and in this passage (Zec 1117) tr. 'the sword' (i.e. hereb); but the context shows that it is really the diseased condition of hemiplegic shrivelling in this wasting disease that is referred to—'his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened.' See above, p. 324°.

was a case of the condition technically known as brachial monoplegia, probably due to a sudden hæmorrhage affecting a certain area of the posterior central convolution of the brain or of the part of the corona radiata or genu of the internal capsule connected with that area. Decaisne has collected and analyzed a large number of cases of this kind. When the sudden supervention of the paralysis depends on a clot plugging the vessels which nourish this area, it may prove only a temporary paralysis, as in the case of Jerobosm

(v. 6).

The word 'palsy' is a corruption of the French paralysie, and came into use in English at any rate about the year 1500, for it is used in the English tr. of Mandeville's Travels.

The case of Nabal (1 S 2526) seems to have been a typical example of an apoplectic seizure, a condition closely allied to paralysis, in that it is usually produced by hamorrhage or effusion of serum on or into the brain. When in the disturbed condition of brain which followed his drunken bout the churl was excited to passion by the story of his wife's generosity, some vessel probably gave way in his brain, and he became comatose (v. " 'as a stone'), lingering in that state for ten days until he died. The death of Alcimus (1 Mac 98) was a typical case of apoplexy (see Jos. Ant. XII. x. 6).

The arteries of the brain in a man addicted to drink, and in other conditions of weakness or senile decay, are liable to atheromatous disease, which diminishes their resisting power; and if in this condition the heart's action be increased in force, as by a fit of passion, rupture of one of these vessels is not unlikely to occur. It has even been conjectured that the sudden deaths of Uzzah (2 S 67) and of Ananias and Sapphira (Ac 55-10) may have been apoplectic in their nature also. The great surgeon John Hunter died suddenly of an apoplectic attack, the result of severe mental emotion.

There are several terms used to describe varying forms of abnormal psychical conditions, of insanity and allied mental diseases. The state of trance or deep profound sleep is described in connexion with the tradition of the making of Eve (Gn 221). A similar sleep fell on Abraham (1512), and Saul in the cave (1 S 26¹²). In this last case it was the profound sleep of exhaustion; the phrase 'deep sleep from the Lord' is merely a Hebrew superlative. Sisera's deep sleep of fatigue was of the same nature (Jg 4²¹), and other examples are those of Jonah (16), and our Lord in the boat during the storm (Mt 824, Mk 428). The ecstatic condition of the prophet described by Balaam (Nu 242-4) was a condition of mental exaltation believed to be due to possession by the Divine Spirit, a state in which individual will becomes paralyzed, and the person becomes subject to more or less violent anotion by suggestion. Hence prophets were called [not necessarily disrespectfully, see vol. ii. p. 5646 note *] 'mad fellows' (2 K 911), and Isaiah speaks of the false prophets as those that peep and speaks of the false prophets as those that peep and mutter (8¹⁹). See also the use of the word $\mu_i\text{?p}$ mishuggā or 'raving,' for the utterances of prophets (Jer 29²⁸, Hos 9⁷). Saul is a singular study in mental pathology; naturally a shy, self-conscious man (1 S 9⁵⁻⁸ 10²²), easily exalted into the condition of ecstasy (10¹⁶), and by his exaltation puffed up to tyrannical self-satisfaction (15^{12, 13}), then filled with an irresistible impulse towards, homicide (18¹¹), turning even against his own son homicide (18¹¹), turning even against his own son (20²⁰⁻²³); but liable, under conditions suggesting it, to return to the ecstatic state (1924), then falling into despondency (28²⁰), and dying by suicide (31³). To such a one of weak judgment, violent passions, and great susceptibility, the influence of music is a powerful agency to calm and soothe. The cause of his madness is ascribed to an evil spirit from God (18¹⁰), and the raving consequent on it is called 'prophesying' in AV and RV (*210., imperf. Hithpael of nābā'). His case is a typical one of recurrent paroxysmal mania rather than of melan-cholia. Perhaps it was the object-lesson of Saul's insanity which prompted David to feign madness before Achish (1 S 21¹³), the lunatic being a sacred person in the eyes of the Oriental (Stanley's Lect. ii. 52). The symptoms he imitated were change of behaviour, raging to and fro, as they tried to hold him with their hands, like a man in acute mania. He scratched or made marks on the doors (wn; but the LXX and Vulgate have ετυμπάνιζεν and impingabat, as if the Heb. were ηνη 'and he beat on'), and he defiled his beard by letting his saliva fall upon it. This in itself showed loss of all self-respect, as to spit on the beard of an enemy would be a deadly insult (see Dt 25°, Job 30°). The malingering was so successful that the king regarded him as genuinely affected with pure or 'frenzy.' Madness was one of the plagues threatened for disobedience to the law (Dt 282).

Another striking instance of insanity is presented by the (!Haggadic) story of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 4). Puffed up by an overweening self-conceit, he was smitten with mania, cherishing the delusion that he was a beast, and so was driven from his throne until his recovery at the end of seven years. Instances of a monomania in which the chief delusion is that one is an animal have been often recorded, and most alienist physicians of experience have met with such cases. Virgil (Ecl. vi. 48) describes the daughters of Proetus as believing themselves to be cattle, and while each of them collo timuisset aratrum, et sepe in levi quassisset cornua fronte, they filled the fields with counterfeit lowings. From monomaniacs of this kind have probably arisen the legends of lycan-thropy or were-wolves (see Hertz, Der Werwolf, 1862). There is no need to invoke totemism to account for them, nor to believe with some of the Rabbins that Nebuchadnezzar was miraculously transformed into an ox. According to Ader (p. 32) the Gadarene demoniacs were of this kind.

Epilepsy is mentioned in Mt 17¹⁵ (RV) as the cause of the convulsive seizures of the boy described there and in Lk 9³⁶. The account of the fit, beginning with a cry, followed by his falling down and becoming convulsed, foaming at the mouth, grinding his teeth, bruising himself sorely, sometimes falling into the fire and sometimes into the water, is exactly in accord with a typical epileptic fit. He had been subject to these from childhood; about one-fourth of epileptics have their first fit within the first decade of life, 12 per cent. within the first three years. The 'pining away' mentioned in Mk 9³⁶ is characteristic of one form of the disease, in which the fits are frequently recurring. The record of the last attack, in which he 'wallowed foaming,' is very graphic. The verb used to describe the attack in Mt is σεληνιάζομαι, literally 'to be moon-struck,' but thereby is meant epilepsy, not lunacy as in AV. The connexion between epilepsy and the phases of the moon was believed in down to a comparatively late period. Vicary, the surgeon to Henry VIII., writing in Sunstroke in Ps 1216, coupled with moonstroke, is also mentioned in Is 4910. It was the cause of the death of the Shunammite's son, stricken in the harvest field (2 K 419), and of Manasseh, Judith's husband, as he stood overseeing the binders of sheaves in the field (Jth 83). In the former case the child was suddenly affected with sharp pain in his head, and, on being carried to his mother, lay on her knees till noon, and then died. There are several diseases which are confounded under the name of heat-stroke or sun-stroke,—sun-syncope, sun-traumatism, sometimes meningitis; but this seems to have been a genuine example of siriasis. This disease has been described by Sambon (Brit. Med. Journ. 1898, March 19, p. 744) as a rapidly fatal, febrile condition, beginning with high temperature, violent pains in the head, and passing rapidly into coma, death taking place 'within a few hours or even minutes of the onset of insensibility' (Manson, 210). The Shunammite's child was laid, after his death, on the prophet's bed until his mother had brought Elisha back from Mount Carmel. By the time Gehazi arrived the body had become cold; and the subsequent restoration to life was plainly miraculous, as the mere stretching of the prophet

The case of Jonah, on the other hand, was one of heat syncope; he fainted from the heat, and suffered the severe headache which always supervenes in such cases after the recovery of consciousness. In these cases, unlike true siriasis, the temperature of the body falls, and the surface feels cold and appears pale; 'usually after a short time the patient gradually recovers, very likely with a splitting headache and a feeling of intense prostration' (Manson, 202). It was in this condition that the prophet said 'it is better for me to die than to live' (Jon 48).

on the body could not have brought back the life. Syria is one of the countries in which this disease

Dropsy.—In Lk 14² the cure of a case of dropsy is recorded. The patient had been able to enter into the house of one of the rulers of the Pharisees at Jerusalem, where Jesus was being entertained. The man is called υδρωπικός, the word used by the Greek physicians for dropsy in general. The disease may have been a universal anasarca, due to disease of the kidneys or heart, or else abdominal dropsy, usually dependent on disease of the liver. In all cases this is a dangerous symptom, and it usually indicates a comparatively large amount of organic disease. In Shabbath 33. 1, dropsy is said to be the punishment of transgression. It is common in Jerusalem; see Macgowan in Jewish Intelligence, 1842, p. 319.

Pulmonary disease, as such, is not referred to in Scripture. It is said of the widow's son at Zarephath that his sickness was so sore there was no breath left in him (1 K 17); but this simply means that he died. The modern Jewish authorities, in their directions for the slaughter of animals for purposes of food, regard the state of the lungs as of the utmost importance, and minute instructions are given for the recognition of pathological conditions which rendered the carcase unfit for food.

The nature of the disease from which Asa suffered in his feet is not mentioned (1 K 15-2, 2 Ch 1611). The former writer says that it affected him in his old age, the latter in the 39th year of his reign; and adds that he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians. This may have been suggested by the king's name (c), which probably means 'healer.' Josephus apparently knows nothing of the disease, and describes Asa as dying happily after he had attained a long and blessed old age (Ant. VIII. xii. 6). The Rabbinical belief was that the malady was gout (Sota 10a, Sanhedrin). Rashi has conjectured from the wording of v.12 that the disease mounted to his head. Others have supposed that this infliction was a punishment because he had not exempted the children of the wise from the labour of carrying away the stones of Ramah (1 K 15-22). There is no clue in the passage to the nature of the disease. Hippocrates says truly that gout, although it may be long and laborious, yet is seldom mortal (peri Pathōn, ed. Kuhn, 407). As Asa's disease began in old age, it may have been a case of senile gangrene. Gout is very rare among natives of Palestine. Kamphausen suggests that it may have been articular leprosy (see Riehm's HWB, art. 'Krankheiten').

A few references to surgical disease and accident occur in the Bible. Among primitive peoples, as a rule, surgery preceded medicine, as the conditions of their life expose the body to violence. The following are cases of surgical disease:—

The woman bound by the spirit of infirmity, and unable to lift herself (Lk 13¹¹⁻¹⁷), was yet able to attend the synagogue. This was probably a case of senile kyphosis, due to chronic osteitis of the vertebræ, a condition not infrequent among aged women whose lives have been spent in agricultural labour: in these the vertebræ become gradually distorted and modified to the new position, so that by nothing short of miracle can the spine be straightened without violence. Why this deformity was regarded as of specially Satanic origin is not apparent, but some Rabbinic authorities regard every disease which produces distortion as due to demons.

Crook-backedness rendered a man unfit for the priesthood. This condition, called [3] In Lv 21²⁰ (LXX κυρτότ), differs from the last in that it occurs in the young, and is due to caries of the vertebræ. It must have been fairly common in Egypt, as the present writer has found a considerable number of spinal curvatures of this kind in collections of Egyptian bones. The Jerus. Targ. renders gibbén, 'very dark coloured,' but this meaning is improbable.

In a metonymic or metaphorical sense the bones in many poetical passages stand for the whole human frame as affected by mental emotion. Rottenness or caries $(27, r\bar{a}k\bar{a}b)$ of the bones is compared with envy $(Pr \ 14^{50})$, with a wife that causes shame $(Pr \ 12^4)$, and with the emotion of terror (Hab 3^{16}): LXX, however, puts $\sigma \eta_5$, $\sigma \kappa \omega \lambda \eta_5$, and $\tau \rho 5 \mu \sigma$ respectively for caries in these three places, but there is no suggestion of worms in the Hebrew. The bones are said to shake with fear (Job 4^{14}) or with grief (Jer 23^9). The bones are burnt with heat in Job's disease (30^{30}) , with grief (Ps 10^{23} , La 1^{13}), with the fire of suppressed emotion (Jer 20^9). They are said to wax old (Ps 32^9), to be pierced (Job 30^{17}), vexed (Ps 6^4), out of joint (Ps 22^{14}), consumed (Ps 31^{10}), or broken (La 3^4). A bandage (לְּהָבֶּי) for broken bones is mentioned in Ezk 30²¹; cf. use in same verse of verb בּּהָּיּ, bind up.

Fracture of the skull without immediate insensibility, showing the absence of compression of the brain, was produced by the fall of the millstone on the head of Abimelech (Jg 953). In the case of Eutychus the fall produced fatal compression and most probably a broken neck (Ac 20°). Goliath is said to have fallen on his face when struck by the slingstone, as if his fall was due to flexor spasm (1 S 1720). Ahaziah died ultimately of the injuries sustained from his fall through the lattice (2 K 12). It is difficult to understand the parenthetic account of Judas' suicide in Ac 116; see art. JUDAS ISCARIOT.

913), due to a fall from his nurse's arms, seems to have been some kind of injury which produced bone disease, for when he hastened to meet David on his return he did not delay to 'dress' his feet (1924). LXX tr. πρη by εθεράπευσεν. Both these words, however, may simply mean 'to wash,' parallel to the trimming of his beard in the context. In spite of his friendship for Mephibosheth, it was proverbial that the lame were among the hated of David's soul (2 S 5°). This curious passage appears to be corrupt (see Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. 199; Smith, Comm. on Sam. [1899], 288). Lameness incapacitated a descendant of Aaron from the priesthood (Lv 2118), but did not prevent the access of such into the temple, for many lame persons were healed by Christ there (Mt 21¹⁴; for other lame men healed see Mt 11⁸ 15²¹, Lk 7²²; they are called 'halt' in Mt 18⁸, Mk 9⁶⁶, Lk 14²¹, Lg 25⁸⁶, Lg 25⁸⁶, Lk 14²¹, Lg 25⁸⁶, n 53. See HALT in vol. ii. p. 288). Jacob's lameness has been referred to in connexion with the sinew that shrank (see FOOD, vol. ii. p. 39). The Jewish butchers now extract the great sciatic nerve as the gid. See Meir's Sepher Zabahi, 63.

Of congenital malformations the giant with six fingers and six toes on each side is the most remarkable (2 S 2120, 1 Ch 206). Persons with such markable (2 S 21^ω, 1 Ch 20^ω). Persons with such superfluous parts were disqualified for the priesthood, Lv 21¹⁸, where ying may mean 'having members of unequal length' (LXX renders it ωτότμητοι, 'crop-eared'). απι Lv 21¹⁸, tr. 'flatnosed' (LXX κολοβύριν, 'snub-nosed'), may refer to the deformity in hare-lip (RVm 'slit-nose'). Dwarfishness also disqualified a son of Aaron from the priesthood (Lv 21[∞]): this, however, has by some been supposed to refer to emaciation from some been supposed to refer to emaciation from

Skin diseases, using the term in the widest sense, were and still are common in the East. They are frequently referred to in their relation to leprosy and the allied conditions, which are carefully described on account of their causing the uncleanness of the sufferers from it. See LEPROSY. The words referring to these diseases are baldness (treated of in vol. i. p. 234 f.), itch, scab, scurvy, blemishes, wen, blains, boils, botch, scall, and spot :-Itch (στη heres, LXX κτήφη), Dt 287, is probably the parasitic disease of this name now known to be due to a small mite, Sarcoptes scabiei, which burrows in the skin. In some cases, when neglected, it spreads over the whole body, which becomes covered with a rough crust adhering to becomes covered with a rough crust adhering to the surface. It is very easily communicated from person to person, and cannot be healed unless the parasite be destroyed. It disqualified its victims from the priesthood (Lv 21²⁰). The Heb. word is derived from a root which means to scratch, hence the Vulgate us s prurigo. It is not at all uncommon in Syria at the present day.

Scurry (RV), scab (AV) (Dt 28²⁷ μg gārāb) is the ψώρα ἀγρία of LXX, scabies of the Vulgate.

In Lv 2120 it is called 'scurvy' in AV. disease has nothing to do with the true scurvy, but is also an itchy disease in which a thick crust forms on the skin; it is most rebellious to treat-ment, and technically known as favus. It is commonest on the head, where it is called 'scald head,' and is due to a fungus, the Achorion Schonleinii. This is the garabu of WAI ii. 44. 13. It sometimes spreads over the entire body, and, in neglected, exaggerated cases, covers the entire face as with a mask. Sometimes it causes ulceration of the subjacent skin, and Alibert describes it as, in some cases, affecting even the cranial bones. It also is not uncommon in Syria.

Seab in Lv 21²⁰ is the tr. of not yallcpheth, meaning 'an itching,' 'scab' (LXX λειχήν). It is probably another form of the disease just described. The infliction of this scab on the head is described in Is 317 by the verb πεψ sippah (LXX ταπεινώσει);

see Giffin 70a.

The scall or scurf of the head and beard of Lv 13³⁰ is pop nethek, probably tinea tonsurans or ther parasitic disease of somewhat similar character; pna, the freckled spot of Lv 1339, may be psoriasis, a non-contagious scaly eruption. See LEPROSY, p. 96.

an inflamed or ulcerated spot. The same word is used to describe Job's malady (Job 27), the boils of the Egyptian plague (Ex 9³⁴), and Hezekiah's boil (2 K 20⁷=Is 38²¹). It is probably a general term for a sore swelling of the skin. Those in Ex 9¹⁰ are distinguished from the others because explained by the Talm. as πιω or μιωμα, pustules containing fluid (LXX ξλκη, φλυκτίδες ἀναξέουσαι). If, as already surmised, this disease was smallpox, this character would distinguish the containing fluid (LXX ξλκη, φλυκτίδες ἀναξέουσαι). this character would distinguish it from the others; and if the last example was a plague spot, it would account for its reputedly fatal character. The botch of Dt 28²⁵ especially affected the knees and legs (see Pruner's Krankheiten des Orients, 167). Job's disease, however, was not a fatal one, and instead of a single tumour he was covered with sore spots from head to foot, and these were attended with an intolerable itching. Egyptian word shn means an abscess, and is used in Pap. Ebers xxxviii. It was common in that in Pap. Ebers xxxvIII. It was common in that country, and is therefore called the botch of Egypt (Dt 282). It is called in Coptic shash, and possibly the 'aba'bū'bth may be connected with a Coptic root meaning to be rounded or to boil up. In Papyrus Ebers cv it is said, 'If thou findest a swelling that is connected with the beginning of uhetu it is as a bean, a sore boil on his skin, not very large, containing pus; say thou, He has hunhunt which suppurates. I shall treat this disease; make thou a remedy that shall remove the swelling and set free the matter.' A poultice is recommended of wax, suet, bean-flour, and certain plants. For the peculiare Ægypti malum see Lucretius, vi. 1113, and Pliny, xxvi. 5.

(ξλκει πονηρφ), whose itching he endeavoured to allay by scraping himself with the rough but soft edge of a piece of unglazed earthenware. The disease distigured his face (27), so that he could not easily be recognized by his friends; his pains led him to groan continually without relief (324), and he felt as though burnt by a fiery poison (64), and he felt as though burnt by a fiery poison (6°), shattering his nervous system (3°°); the loathsome sores made his breath fœtid (19¹¹), and were infested with maggots (7°). He was so helpless that he required aid to rise, and he sat among the ashes (2°; LXX ἐπὶ τῆς κοπρίας, 'on a dunghill') to mitigate the itching. See Carey, 178; Magnus, 311. 161; Keil, Archāol. ii. 94. The malady is called (18¹²) ngược 'the firstborn of death,' and it has been supposed to have been elephantiasis (Kimchi), leprosy (Origen), smallpox (Shapter, 169), guinea-worm, which is credited, but falsely, by one writer with being called Job's disease in Bokhara (but see Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, ii. 181, where no mention is made of Job), malignant pustule, or frambœsia (see Pruner, 174), etc. The characters given, however, agree better with those of the Biskra button or Oriental sore, endemic along the southern shore of the Mediterranean and in Mesopotamia. This begins in the form of papular spots, which ulcerate and become covered with crusts, under which are itchy, burning sores, slow in granulation and often multiple: as many as forty have been found on one patient. It is forty have been found on one patient. probably due to a parasite, is communicable by inoculation, and very intractable even under modern treatment. It is sometimes called 'Aleppo sore or 'Bagdad sore.'

Lazarus in Lk 1620 was probably afflicted, like many of his class, with old varicose ulcers of the leg. Burckhardt says that sores on the legs are very common at Djiddah (i. 448).

Spot in Job 11¹⁵, Ca 4⁷, Dt 32⁵, blemish in Lv 21¹⁷, Dn 1⁴, are apparently general terms for any skin disease. Wen in Lv 22²², used as the name of a disease of cattle, means a gall or sup-

Among affections of the skin may be considered the bloody sweat of our Lord in the garden (Lk 224). The passage (on the question of whose genuineness see Westcott-Hort) says that His sweat was ώτει θρύμβοι αίματος καταβαίνοντες έπι τὴν γῆν. Theophylact, Michaelis, Olshausen, and others take this to mean that His sweat dropped, as clots of blood drop from a wound. The word is frequently used to express a mean conώσεί is frequently used to express a mere comparison, as in Mt 28³ λευκὸν ώσει χιών. There are no modern trustworthy cases of genuine bloody sweat; and although in some older writings com-There are parable instances are quoted, none of them are properly authenticated. Tissot (Traité des Nerfs, 279) records one such, and others are given in connexion with legends of stigmatization, etc., as in the cases of Catharine of Raconizio (1446), and Stephano Quinzani in Soncino (1467). Bleeding took place from the stigmatic wounds in the case of Louise Lateau in 1870 (see also Schenck, Obs. Med. iii. 458, for ancient examples, and refs. in med. III. 430, 101 ancient examples, and 1615. In art. 'Stigmatization,' Encyc. Brit. xxii. 550). It is significant that the word used is θρύμβοι, 'clots,' not σταγών used of blood drops by Æschylus (Agam. 1122), or σταλαγμόν used both of blood (Eurip. Ion. 351, 1003) and sweat (Hippoc. Aph. 1261). Bourrut and Burot have described a redcoloured sweat in a hystero-epileptic, but the conditions were equivocal.

Poisonous serpents are mentioned in Nu 216, Dt 32³³, Job 2014. 16, Is 118 14²⁹ 59⁵, Jer 8¹⁷, Mt 3⁷ 12³⁴ 23³³, Mk 16¹⁸, Lk 3⁷ 10¹⁹, Ac 28³⁻⁶. The fiery serpents of the plague in the wilderness are not called flying: that word is imported into their description from Is 1429 and 306. There are several poisonous serpents in the Desert of the Exodus, the sand viper Echis carinata, and the horned viper Cerastes Ægyptiacus and Hasselquistii, which are sometimes found in great numbers in favourable localities, and whose bites are burning and often fatal (see Strabo, xvi. 2. 30). Naia Haje, the asp, has also been found there. One or other of these was most likely the fiery serpent, the brazen model of which miraculously healed the bitten people. Küchenmeister (Sydenham Soc. Tr. i. 391) suggested that these fiery serpents were guinea-worms, Filaria Medinensis, parasitic worms which burrow under the skin and set up local inflammation: these are not uncommon in this region, and he supposes that they are the same as the δρακόντια μερά of Plutarch (Symposiakon viii., Question 9), which are said by Agatharchides of Cnidus to eat away the flesh of the peoples near the Red Sea (see for other refs. Bennett, Diseases of Bible, 134). The story of Moses and the serpents given by Josephus (Ant. II. x. 2) is interesting in this connexion. Scorpion bites are not very common and rarely fatal in Palestine, but are common and often fatal

The disease of Herod Agrippa I., recorded in Ac 12^{11st}, was a sudden and fatal seizure of some abdominal complaint, accompanied with intense agony, and in some way connected with worms. Sir J. R. Bennett has surmised that it was acute peritonitis set up by the perforation of the lowel by an intestinal worm. This is a rare but not an impossible condition. The term employed is σκωληκόβρωτος, used here, as also in Theophrastus de Causis Plantarum, v. 10), to signify 'eaten of worms.' Vulg. has a vermibus erosus. The mis-(de Causis Plantarum, v. 10), to signify 'eaten or worms.' Vulg. has a vermibus erosus. The mistaken idea that it was a case of phthiriasis has no support in the passage, and still less from the narrative in Josephus, which does not mention worms, but says that Herod was seized with a violent abdominal pain which lasted for five days (Eusebius says four) and proved fatal (XIX. viii. 2). The death of Pheretime (Herod. iv. 205) took place not from this disease, but from some exhausting disorder with superficial ulceration; the eval or maggots which were fatal to her were probably blow-fly larvæ. Antiochus Epiphanes, fatally injured by a fall, had probably compound fractures in which blow-flies laid their eggs and maggots were hatched. In former times cases of this sort were not rare when the injuries were neglected

The third Egyp. plague was one of insects which are called kinnām (LXX σκνῖφει); and as the root probably means 'to pierce or cut into,' it is likely that they were mosquitoes or sand-fleas, or some pest of that nature, which would be a much more serious plague in the East than one of lice. It was only the priests, Herodotus tells us, that were defiled by these (ii. 37). RVm renders 'sand-flies or fleas.' The argument that they must have been lice, because coming from the dust, is not been lice, because coming from the dust, is not of much force, for sand-fleas live in the same material, and lice are not generated in dust any more than gnats. It is therefore improbable that this plague was phthiriasis.

Anong the causes of ceremonial impurity were certain discharges (Lv 152-15), some natural (Dt 2310), others probably the result of evil practices. How far the diseases consequent on vice were known among the ancients is a doubtful point. The passages in Ps 107^{17, 18}, Pr 2¹⁸ 5¹¹⁻²² 7^{22, 25} (see tract Zebaim, and Maimonides' commentary thereon) seem to refer to such, but this group of diseases was not known in Europe until A.D. 1495.

Blindness was, and is, one of the commonest afflictions of the natives of Palestine; the bleareyes, often crusted round with dried secretion, and fly-infested, make some of the most sickening sights in a Syrian village crowd. The words 'blindness' or 'blind' occur 87 times in the Bible; Al times in a metaphorical sense, and 39 in reference to literal want of sight. The OT uses the words 'blind' or 'blindness' 35 times: in 28 the word is my (Pi. 'to blind') or 'ivvēr (adj.), 19 times literal, 9 figurative; in 3 it is 'ivvēron or 'avvereth, 'blindness' always literal in 9 it is annuagantiche. hteral, 9 figurative; in 3 it is swaron or awereth, 'blindness,' always literal; in 2 it is pupp sanverin, 'a dazzling,' Gn 1911, 2 K 618; once it is pupp 'to hide' (sc. my eyes, 1 S 128, but the text here is probably corrupt, cf. the LXX). In Is 298 RV has 'be blind,' where AV has 'cry' as tr. of ye. In the NT, in which 'blind' or 'blindness' is used 52 times, 36 literally and 16 metaphorically, the word is well for (verbal) and 16 metaphorically. the word is τυφλός or (verbal) τυφλόω.

places where the word is πώρωσι οτ πωρόω RV has replaced 'blindness' or 'blinded' by 'hardening' or 'hardened' (Ro 11^{7, 28}, 2 Co 3¹⁴, Eph 4¹⁸); cf. confusion in MSS between πηροῦν and πωροῦν in Job 17⁷. Apparently but two forms of blindness were recognized: (1) that due to the prevalent ophthal-mia. It is a highly infectious disease, and is aggravated by sand, sun-glare, and dirt, so that it almost always leaves the organs damaged, and often renders them useless, causing opacity of the cornea or closure of the pupil; (2) that due to age: Eli at the age of 98 was blind, his eyes waxed dim (1 S 3²). David's eyes were 'set' at an earlier age (1 K 4¹⁵). Ahijah was blind from age (1 K 14⁴). Isaac was also blind (Gn 27¹); and it is noted of Moses that in spite of his age his eye was not dim. Like other plagues, blind-ness was believed to be a visitation from God, and for the priesthood (Lv 21¹⁰); but by law compassion for the blind was enacted (Lv 19¹⁴), and offences against them were accursed (Dt 27¹⁸). The minor form of ophthalmia caused redness of the lids and loss of the eyelashes. Leah was thus 'tender' or weak-eyed (Gn 29¹⁷). Blindness from birth arises from ophthalmia neonatorum, which is often severe enough to cause permanent opacity of the cornes. Sometimes ophthalmia accompanies malarial fever (Lv 2616). Smiting with blindness as a punishment occurred in the case of Elymas (Ac 1311). This was only temporary, and may have been hypnotic. The Syrian soldiers seeking Elisha were also affected, probably in the same way (2 K 6¹⁸). It was also probably subjugation to His overmastering power, that caused the inhibition of the angry manifestations of the Nazarenes towards our Lord (Lk 4^{20}).

Of the blind men cured by our Lord the cases of interest were (1) the man congenitally blind (Jn 91), and (2) the man whose progress in vision was gradual (Mk 82). Probably the latter also was blind from birth, and the intermediate stage was that before he had learned to interpret the new sensation, although, on the other hand, the use of the word αποκατεστάθη would seem to imply that he had at one time possessed sight which was restored to him. Cases are on record of men to whom sight was suddenly given by operation, being unable to understand visual appearances being unable to understand visual appearance until verified by touch (see discussion of this in Locke's Essay, ii. 9. 8). Our Lord in His miracles used different methods to restore sight, all of them inadequate without His divine power, but doubt-less suited to the condition of faith on the person healed; a word, a touch, anointing with saliva, with clay, or testing his faith by sending him to wash his eyes. Maimonides refers to the use of fasting spittle as an application to sore eyes, but

The blindness of St. Paul (Ac 9st.) was doubtless a temporary amaurosis, such as that which has been caused by injudiciously looking at the sun. The 'scales' which fell from his eyes were probably not material, but vision was restored as if scales had fallen; the word used is word, for which weakness of eye, which may have been the 'thorn in the flesh' which rendered his bodily presence weak (see Gal 418). Tobit's blindness from the tritation of the sparrow's dung (To 2¹⁰) was cured by the gall of the fish caught by his son (11^{4x}). Pliny recommends the bile of Callionymus Lyra as a cure for blindness (xxxii. 24). There is a reference to eye-salve in Rev 3¹⁸. Magical means for curing eye diseases are referred to in Rawlinson, WAI ii. 47. Many eye-washes are mentioned in Papyrus Ebers lv ff.

powers of nature in old age, in Ec 12, has been commented upon by many authors, and the details are carefully reviewed by Sir J. R. Bennett (op. cit. p. 106). The Rabbins recognized 903 modes of death; and, commenting on Ps 90, said that death at 70 is old age, at 80 is strength (Mocal Katan 28. 1). On account of the impurity of a dead body the older Jewish physicians did not a dead body, the older Jewish physicians did not make post-mortem examinations (Aboda Zara 29; Baba Bathra 1551), but at a later date these were permitted (see Willstädler in Allg. Zeitung des Judenthums, viii. 568). Burial with or without the external application of antiseptics was the common method.

The process of child-birth is mentioned in Scripture: (a) in individual cases, (β) in legislative enactments, and (γ) in metaphor. Leaving on one enactments, and (γ) in metaphor. Leaving on one side the narrative of the birth of Eve (see Midrash Rabbah on Nu 14, where Adam is described as androgynous), there are details of a number of births, most of which are illustrations of the primal curse of Gn 3¹⁵. Two of these are cases of twins (Gn 25²¹⁶ and 38²⁶). The latter was a case of spontaneous evolution with perineal laceration, probably fatal to the mother (although a Rabbinic tradition in Zohar hadash says that she lived long after); Rachel's was a case of fatal dystocia, probably on account of some delicacy or unhealthiness of long standing (3126); and Phinehas wife was an example of premature labour (Jos. Ant. v. xi. 4),

The cases of Sarah, Manoah's wife, Hannah, the Shunammite, and Elizabeth, are instances of uniparæ at a late period. Barrenness was regarded as a divine judgment (Gn 20¹⁸ 30³), and was a cause of much unhappiness (Gn 30¹, Pr 30¹⁸), for the removal of which the forked root of the mandrake was used as a charm (Gn 30¹⁸). A multitude of children was believed to be a signal proof of the favour of God (1 S 2⁸, Ps 113⁹ 127³ 128³). Here miscarrying was regarded also as a sign of God's displeasure (Hos 914). The attendants on childbed were women, 1779 (Gn 3517, Ex 118), of whom two were enough for the Israelitish women in Egypt, indicating a small number in a circumscribed locality. Midrash Rabbah credits Puah with being the inventor of artificial respiration by insufflation. The mother was placed in a kneeling posture, leaning on some one's knees (Gn 30³) or on a labour-stool. There is some obscurity as to the nature of the purpe of Ex 1¹⁶. Sa'adya and the Targ. believe it to have been a seat on which the mid-wife made the patient to kneel, others a bathingtub. Ibn Ganach considers it a name for the uterus, others believe that the dual refers to the two sexes of the children which they were to see and note (see Dillmann-Ryssel on this passage, pp. 14, 15). Difficult labour from weakness of the mother is mentioned metaphorically in 2 K 19³. According to the law of Lv 12²²⁷ the mother was regarded as unclean or taboo for 7 days, until the date of circumcision in case of a male, or for 14 days if the child was a female. After this there was a second period of separation, during which she was not permitted to appear in the temple. This period for the mother of a boy was 33 days, of a girl 66 days, after which the offering for purification was made. The difference of period in the case of the two sexes was due to the belief that the lochia lasted longer after the birth of a female child. Nursing was continued for 2 or 3 years (2 Mac 7"), and the child was taken by a relative to wean (1 K 1120).

The legislation for the catamenia and for menorrhagia was characterized by a rigid system of purification, and the cleansing of everything that was defiled thereby (Lv 15^{19f.}). The sufferer from this disease in Mt 9²⁰, Mk 5²⁵, and Lk 8⁴³ had suffered many things of many physicians and only grew worse; so much was this condition considered as beyond treatment that it was recommended to treat it magically and by amulet (Baba Shab. 110, Gittin 69). According to the early legend, the votive figure at Banfas, supposed to be that of Christ, was put up by her (v. Dobschütz, Christusbilder, p. 197). Amulets of the lapis resurrectionis were used to prevent miscarriage (Shabb. 66). To this day, charms, usually in the form of verses or incantations from the Bible, are used in the interval between birth and circumcision to keep away Lilith: these are called myrp (Shebuoth 15, Chullin 77, Shabbath 57, Sanhedrin 90). Caesarean section (implied in the expression pri sn') is mentioned in Sanhedrin 45. There is a description of a newborn infant given in Ezk 16⁴ with undivided umbilical cord, unwashed and undressed. Salt was rubbed on the skin of infants to make it firm, and to remove the vernix caseosa.

In the prophetic writings labour pains, pangs, and travail are frequent images, representing (1) the affrighting of God's enemies, Ps 48°, Is 13° etc.; (2) God's declaration of judgment, Is 42¹¹; (3) the sorrows of God's people under chastisement, Is 26¹¹; (4) claim of spiritual parentage, Gal 4¹º etc.

Infantile diseases seem to have been exception-

Infantile diseases seem to have been exceptionally severe in Palestine, and at the present day mortality in the early years of life is exceptionally high. The Rabbinical writers speak of the high or pain, or pain of bringing up children, and in Bereshith Rabbah it is written that it is easier to rear a forest of young olive-trees than one child. Biblical references to sick children are not a few: Bathsheba's infant (2 S 12¹⁵), the Shunammite's son (2 K 4), the widow's son at Zarephath (1 K 17). Christ healed many children, among whom were the fever-stricken son of the nobleman of Capernaum (Jn 4¹⁶), and Jairus' daughter (Mt 9¹⁶, Mk 5²², Lk 8¹), who was 12 years old. No particulars are given of their diseases.

Several general references to sicknesses whose characters are not specified occur. We do not know the maladies of Abijah (1 K 141); Benhadad (2 K 87), whose disease was not mortal, but who was too weak to struggle with Hazael; Elisha (2 K 1314), Joash ('afflicted with great diseases,' 2 Ch 2425), Lazarus of Bethany (Jn 111), Dorcas (Ac 937), Epaphroditus (Ph 237), or Trophimus (2 Ti 425).

Similarly, the metaphorical allusions to sickness are numerous, as typical of the weakness brought on by sin and neglect of God's commandments. This moral sickness is especially compared to the severe pains in the back from fever and exposure: anguish in loins (Is 21°), pains in loins (Nah 21°), smitten in loins (Dt 331°), disease in loins (Ps 38°), affliction laid on loins (Ps 66°1), breaking of loins (Ezk 23°1); see for other images Is 1°, Ps 55°, Jer 4°1°.

There are very few references to methods of treatment in the Bible. External applications, such as bathing or washing (2 K 5¹⁰); diet (Lk 8²⁵); the application of saliva (Jn 9⁶; see Maimon. on Shabb. 21); anointing with oil (Ja 5¹⁴); binding of sores and mollifying them with ointment (Is 1⁶); pouring in oil and wine (Lk 10³⁴); Hezekiah's plaster of figs prescribed by Isaiah (Is 38²¹); animal heat by contact (1 K 17¹², 2 K 4³⁴), especially with those failing from old age (1 K 1²). Claudius Hermippus is said to have prolonged his life to 115 years by breathing the breath of young girls.

Of actual medicines few are mentioned; possibly the balm of Gilead was one, Gn 37²⁵, 43¹¹, Jer 8²² 46¹¹ 51⁸ (from this last passage it appears to have been used as a local sedative, Ezk 27¹⁷). This material was probably the resin of Pistacia lentis- cus, the mastic tree; as the plant now called Baim of Gilead (Balsamodendron Gileadense) is a native of Somali-land and S. Arabia, and it is doubtful it it ever extended as far north as Palestine. The ¬s may, however, have been the resin of Balanites Egyptiaca, still used as an application to sores. See, further, art. BALM. Mandrakes (dúdā'ım) were used as a stimulant to conception, the forked root as a charm, and the sweetish fruit as a medi-The plant is Mandragora officinalis (for ancient views on this see Deusing, de Mandragora, Groningen, 1659; Celsius, Hierobot. s.v. 'Dudaim'). Of other plants, mint, anise, and cummin, mentioned under FOOD (vol. ii. p. 38b), are used as carminatives. The last was used for the wound in circumcision, Shabbath 133b. Myrrh, lign-aloes, onycha, stacte, frankincense, spikenard, are odorous materials, but scarcely remedial; salt was used for hardening the skin and as a preservative; nitre, native sodic carbonate, not saltpetre (Pr 25²⁰, Jer 2²²), was used as a cleansing agent to remove the fatty secretions of the skin. The caper-berry the fatty secretions of the skin. The caper-berry (Capparis spinosa) had a considerable reputation as an approdisiae (Ec 12). Narcotics were used to abate pain (Baba mezia 83b). The wine given to our Lord at His crucifixion was probably for this

As in Egypt, the most of the remedies in common use were dietary: meal, milk, vinegar, wine, water, almonds, figs, raisins, pomegranates, honey, dibs, and butter, made up a large part of the Egyptian as of the Jewish pharmacopeia. Some few remedies were of a less agreeable nature, such as the heart, liver, and gall of Tobiah's fish (To 6'). The Talmud adds to this list radishes, mustard, ginger, dog's dung, wormwood, calamus, cinnamon, ladanum, galbanum, storax; and of poisons, hemah (supposed to be some hemlock-like plant), rosh (probably poppy), and bashah or aconite. Many of the medicines given in the Egyptian medical writings, and almost all in the Babylonian and Assyrian plant lists, cannot be identified.

The art of the apothecary is mentioned in Ex 30²⁵⁻³⁶ 37²⁹, as well as in Ec 10¹. The pri was, however, rather a maker of perfumes (2 Ch 16¹⁴) than a compounder of medicines. They seem to have formed a kind of guild (see Neh 3⁵). RV has replaced the word by 'perfumer' except in Neh, 1 Ch, and Sir 38⁸ and 49¹. Probably, as in Egypt, the physician compounded his own medicines. In Pap. Ebers there is an invocation given to be used by the physician when thus engaged: 'May Isis heal me as she healed Horus from all pain which his brother Set hath inflicted on him when he slew his father Osiris. Oh Isis! great wonder-worker, heal me and set me free from all evil, destructive, and demoniacal inflictions, from fatal diseases and uncleanness of every kind which befall me,' etc.

It is probable that charms of this kind were in use among the later Jews. Neck-chains like serpents, such as those mentioned in Is 320, protected against diseases produced by envy and the evil eye (see Berachoth 55, Shabbath 57, Chullin 77, Shebuoth 17, and Elworthy's Evil Eye, 1898). The own of Is 320 and the own or ear-rings of Gn 354 are supposed to have been charms.

The Levitical code contains a large number of Hygienic enactments with regard to food, sanitation, and the recognition of infectious diseases. It prescribes as sources of food, animals of the herbivorous and ruminant group, excludes all birds which live upon animal food, and permits the use of all true fishes; and, among invertebrates, permits only the use of locusts. Of food-animals, the fat and the blood are prohibited; and special rules were laid down for the slaughter and inspection of the animals, that the meat may be clean from the taint of infectious disease. Among fruits, those produced by trees in the first three years of their life are 'uncircumcised' and not to be eaten; that of the fourth year is 'devoted'; and that of the fifth and later years may be used as food (Lv 1926). The provision of the periodic cleaning out and destruction of leaven, that even the breadstuffs may be kept wholesome, is also an important law for the maintenance of a pure food (Ex 1219 137,

The agricultural sanitary laws forbid the mixture of seeds in a field at the same time, the sowing of crops in a vineyard, the cross grafting of fruit-trees, the cross-breeding and even the yoking together of dissimilar cattle, and enforces the complete rest of man and beast on the Sabbath days, as well as on the great religious and national festivals (Ex 2312). To ensure the perfect purification of garments, no mixture of linen and woollen materials was permitted (Lv 19¹⁹, Dt 22¹¹), as they cannot be so thoroughly or easily cleansed as pure garments of one material (see Kilayim). Such compound fabrics, however, might, according to Nidda, be used as shrouds.

In domestic sanitation the covering with earth of excreta and of blood are prescribed, and the expansion of these rules in the Mishna (Baba Kamma) forbids dung heaps, and gardens requiring manure within the city, and intramural interments. The fires of the valley of Hinnom perhaps consumed the city offal (but see Robinson, BRP i. 274). Houses were built with parapets to present excidents (Dt 298) and present asserted of vent accidents (Dt 22°), and persons suspected of having infectious diseases in the stage of incubation were isolated (Lv 134). Those who had to touch corpses or things unclean were themselves rendered unclean, and had to wash their clothes (Nu 1911).

In the Talmudic code of uncleanness there were five or, according to some, six grades recognized. Decomposition, death, or leprosy, or certain other diseases, were the central causes of all impurity, and hence were called 'fathers of fathers of un-cleanness.' That which was affected by these That which was affected by these became the 'father of uncleanness,' and could not be purified: for example, a corpse, or carcase except such as was killed in the proper way, certain issues, a leprous man, an idol, the water of purification (Nu 19), the propitiatory parts of sacrificed animals. Whatever was defiled by contact with these was the first son of uncleanness, to be cleansed by sacrifice, by a period of isolation and a process of purification by water or fire; what-ever was defiled by contact with a first son of uncleanness was a second son of uncleanness, to be purified by seven days' isolation and washing; and whatever was rendered impure by one of these was a third son, to be purified by a day's isolation and washing of the clothes and person. By these lustrations and by the careful isolation of cases of suspected contagious disease, the chances of the propagation of infection were much diminished.

Of surgical instruments a flint knife called the was used for circumcision (see vol. i. p. 443), but later, steel knives, מַשְּׁלְּמֹת, called also מָבִין, were used (Chullin). An awl or you was used for boring the servant's ear (Ex 216). Other knives called pigton 'izmel, kesilta' are mentioned in different Talmudic tracts-Kelim 13. 1; Shabbath 130; Moed Katan

Of surgical operations, circumcision has been already dealt with. The exclusion of eunuchs from the service of God under the theocracy was probably a protest against either of these operations referred to in Dt 23¹ as performed among heathen nations in the service of their gods (see Driver, Deut. p. 259). Under the kingdom, however, they became important officials as Samuel predicted, 1 S 8¹⁵ (AV and RVm), 1 K 22⁹, 2 K 8⁵ 9²³ 24¹²⁻¹⁵, Jer 29² 34¹⁹ 38⁷ 41¹⁶, and no spiritual disability attached to their state, Is 56^4 ; see out Lord's words in Mt 19^{12} , and also Ac 8^{276} .

MEEKNESS must not be considered alone, but in connexion with the group of virtues of which it is one, and which are especially characteristic of the Christian temper. Meekness goes along with poverty of spirit, humility, mercy, etc., Mt $5^{2.1}$. $(\pi\rho\bar{q}os, \pi\rho\bar{q}Jr\eta s)$; but in the best uncials both in LXX and NT, $\pi\rho\bar{a}Os$, $\pi\rho\bar{a}Dr\eta s$). The grace is found in similar company in the Epistles, 'With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love' (Eph 4^2 , Col 3^{12} , Gal 5^{23}). This association best illustrates the meaning of the word; it connotes gentleness, kindness, forbearance, and is the direct opposite of a proud, harsh, unforgiving spirit. The high place given to this virtue in the beatitudes (Mt 5^{3-12}), which represent the higher Christian law, in connexion with the group of virtues of which 53-12), which represent the higher Christian law, its special prominence in the character as well as in the teaching of the Lord Jesus ('I am meek and lowly in heart,' Mt 1122), its frequent mention in the Epistles (Gal 61, Tit 32, 1 Ti 611, 2 Ti 224, Ja 121 313, 170, 1 P 34 13), all indicate the determining influence assigned to this class of virtues in the NT ideal of character. The insistence upon the duty of forgiveness (Mt 614. 1833, Eph 432) is another striking illustration. Our Lord prayed for His murderers (Lk 23%). His meekness deeply impressed His followers (2 Co 10¹, 1 P 255). The Lord's servant' must possess the same spirit (2 Ti 2³⁴L; cf. what is said of Moses in Nu 12³, that he was meek [43] above all men upon earth). Row justly calls attention to the fact that Christianity transfers supremacy from the stronger to the milder virtues (Bampton Lect. p. 154). The result in the growth of the spirit of sympathy and love in the world amply justifies the change. The improvement would have been still greater if Christians had better understood and followed the Christian ideal as set forth in passages like Mt 5^{39f.}, Ro 12^{19f.} Too often they have preferred the heathen worship of the stronger virtues to the Christian ideal. Hence the slow fulfilment of proplecies like the one in Is 24.

The NT teaching on this subject, while going beyond the OT teaching, is rooted in it (see Ps 9¹³ 10¹² 22²⁶ 72⁴ 76⁹ 82³ 147⁶, Is 11⁴ 61¹). The Heb. word ('w, 'y, 'y,') * denotes, first of all, a distressed, helpless state in the literal sense, and then acquires a moral meaning, just as there is a close connexion between literal and spiritual poverty (cf. Mt 5³ and Lk 6²⁰). The Christian beatitude (Mt 5⁵) almost literally translates Ps 37¹¹. It is no less striking a fact that the possession of the earth is promised to the meek in both passages.

* See Rahlfs, '19 und '11' in den Psalmen; and cf. Driver, Par. Psalt. 445f. (s.v. 'humble'), 451 f. (s.v. (1) 'poor').

MEET (Anglo-Sax. gemet 'suitable,' from metan to measure, whence Eng. 'mete,' thus 'according to the proper measure or standard'). The Heb. and Gr. words rendered 'meet' in AV are numerous, but the meaning is either 'fit' or 'fitting.' 1.

Fit, suitable, 2 K 10³ 'Look even out the best and meetest of your master's sons, and set him on his father's throne'; Wis 13¹¹ 'He hath sawn down a tree meet for the purpose'; Mt 3³ 'Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance' (TR καρπου εξίους τῆς μετανοίας, edd. καρπου εξίους, RV 'fruit worthy of repentance'); I co 15⁵ 'I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle' (ἰκανοί); Col 1¹¹ 'Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light' (τῷ πατρὶ καικώναντι ἡμᾶς). Cf. Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 79, 'It is not in the mete place.' So Tindale's tr. of Nu 1²² 'whatsoever was mete for the warre' (so 1²² 'all that were able to warre,' and 1²² 'what soever was apte for warre'), and of Mt 10² 's 'He that lovith hys father or mother more then me, is not mete for me.' Also 1 S 14¹² Cov., 'And where Saul sawe a man that was stronge and mete for warre, he toke him to him'; Hall, Works, ii. 30, 'Piety and diligence must keepe meet changes with each other; neither doth God lesse accept of our returne to Nazareth, then our going up to Jerusalem'; and Shaks. Lear, I. ii. 200—

'Let me, if not by birth, have lands by wit, All with me's meet that I can fashion fit.'

2. Fitting, proper, as 2 Mac 9¹² 'It is meet to be subject unto God' (δίκαιον, RV 'It is right'); Mt 15²⁸ 'It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to east it to dogs' (οὐκ ξοτιν καλύν). Cf. Shaks. Rich. II. V. iii. 118—

'No word like "pardon," for kings' mouths so meet.'

MEGIDDO (της, της) Megiddon in Zeo 1211; Mayeδδώ or Mayeδδών, Mayδώ in 1 K 915 A [om. in B]) was an old Canaanite capital (Jos 1221, B om.) situated in Issachar but assigned to Manasseh (Jos 1711, 1 Ch 726). The Can. inhabitants were, however, 'put to tribute' and not driven out (Jos 1712. 13, Jg 127. 28). The town was in the district from which Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, drew supplies for the royal household (1 K 412), and Solomon restored the fortifications (1 K 915), which were of very ancient date (Inser. of Thothmes III.). According to 2 K 927 Ahaziah died at M.; but elsewhere (2 Ch 222) it is said that he was found in Samaria, taken to Jehu, and slain. Barak fought Sisera 'in Taanach by the waters of M.,' and the Canaanites were swept away by the suddenly swollen Kishon (Jg 512-21). Pharaoh-necho, whilst on the march from Egypt to Carchemish and the Euphrates, defeated and slew Josiah 'in the valley' or 'plain' of M. (2 K 2322. 20, 2 Ch 3522, 1 Es 125); and the 'mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley (LXX plain) of Megiddon' may refer to the same event (Zec 1211). Possibly this was the battle at Magdolum mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 159). M. is frequently mentioned in close connexion with Taanach (Jos 1221 1711, Jg 513, 1 K 412, 1 Ch 726), which was certainly at Ta'annuk—a small village, on a large isolated mound, or Tell, near the edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and about 6½ m. N.W. of Jenin. M. was taken by Thothmes III. after a great battle, in which he defeated the confederated kings and princes of Palestine. Leaving his camp at Aruna (a place identified by Maspero with Umne el-Fahm, but which is more probably Ararah) in which he expected to be attacked, and in seven hours reached the south side of M. (RP, 1st ser. ii. 35-47). The town is noticed in the 'Travels of an Egyptian,' apparently in connexion with the Jordan (ib. ii. 112); but Max Müller has shown (Asien w. Europa, 195) that Jordan is probably an error for Kishon. M. is also mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions. At Armageddon (RV Har-magedon), that is, 'the fortified city or mountain of M.,' according to Rev 16¹⁶, the final conflict between the hosts of good and evil will take place; see ii. 304f.

About 41 m. N.W. of Taanach are two ancient sites. One, Tell el-Mutasellim, is at the end of a spur that runs out from the ridge of Carmel into the plain, and is a conspicuous feature in the land. scape. This is Megiddo. The other, close to it, is Lejjun, the Roman Legio, which took the place of Legionis, to the great plain of Esdraelon, which is called by Jerome 'the plain of Megiddo.'
Lejiun is identified with Megiddo by Robinson (BEP) ii. 329), Dillm. (on Jos 12ⁿ), Moore (Judge; 45, 47), G. A. Smith (HGHL 386 f.), Buhl (GAP 209). Moore (p. 47) thinks Tell el-Mutasellim may have been the citadel of Megiddo. The ruins of Legio cover a wide area on both sides of a perennial stream, which is one of the principal feeders of the Kishon, and sometimes called its head (PEF Mem. ii. 39). This stream is apparently 'the waters of Megiddo.' Legio was a centre from which Euse bius and Jerome measured the distances of other places, and probably a military station. It occupied an important position on the road from Bethshean and Jezreel to the coast, and guarded the northern end of the pass over the ridge of Carmel, which forms the easiest line of communication between the plain of Sharon and that of Esdraelon. Through this pass ran the great road from Egypt to the north, along which invading armies have marched from the time of Thothmes III. to that of Napoleon. It was apparently during the passage of the defile that Josiah's hillmen attacked the army of Necho, hoping to obtain an easy victory over soldiers trained on the plains of Egypt. A large ruined khan shows that, even in the Middle Ages, commerce followed the same route. There would seem to be a trace of the name Megiddo in the Arab name of the Kishon, Nahr el-Mukutta'. (See Smith, HGHL 386, 387, whose view, however, is strongly opposed by Moore, Judges, 158). Conder (PEF Mem. ii. 90-99) identifies Megiddo with Mujeddo in the Jordan Valley near Bethshean. This site has in its favour similarity of name, and a doubtful reference in the description of the journey of an Egyptian traveller in the 14th cent. B.C. It is, however, far removed from the Kishon; is a long way from any road by which an army would march from Egypt to Carchemish and the Euphrates; the flight of Ahaziah would not have been towards Bethshean, whence Jehu had come; and the expression 'Taanach by the waters of M.' cannot apply to any site beyond the limits of Esdraelon. (See the criticism of G. A. Smith, p. 387f.).

MEGILLOTH .- See TEXT OF OT.

MEHETABEL, AV Mehetabeel (לְּפְּסְיִקְיּ – לְּבְּיְכְּיִיםְ 'God benefits').—1. The grandfather or ancestor of Shemaiah, the son of Delaiah, the false prophet, who was hired by Tobiah and Sanballat against Nehemiah (Neh 6¹º). 2. The wife of Hadar or Hadad, king of Edom (Gn 36²º, 1 Ch 1²º).

MEHIDA (κητη).—The eponym of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel, Ext 2⁶² (Μαουδά) = Neh 7⁵⁴ (Μεειδά), called in 1 Es 5⁵² Meeda.

MEHIR (ΥΙΦ).—A Judahite, 1 Ch 411 (LXX Μαχείρ).

MEHOLATHITE (ὑρμφῦ; in 1 S B omits, 2 S B ὁ Μωουλαθεί, A ὁ Μοουλαθείτητ).—Probably an inhabitant of Abel-meholah, the birthplace of Elisha, which is usually placed in the Jordan Valley, 10 miles S. of Beth-shean (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 581 n.), in accordance with the identification of Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 2227, 35). Conder (SWP Memoirs, p. 221) identifies it with Moore (Judges, p. 212) rejects both these conjectures (cf. Buhl, Geogr. p. 206 n.). Possibly we should look for Abel-meholah or Meholah on the east of Jordan, in which case Barzillai, the father of Adriel, who is described as an inhabitant of this place (1 S 1819, 2 S 218), is to be identified with the wealthy Gileadite of that name (2 S 1727). In favour of this view is the close connexion which existed between the house of Saul and the inhabitants of the trans-Jordanic country.

Mατιλ).—A Cainite, Gn 418 (J), corresponding to Mahalalel of P's genealogy (Gn 5125.). Dillmann remarks that the name may mean 'destroyed of God,' or (Jewish-Aramaic) 'smitten of God' (so Holzinger), or 'God gives (to me) life' (so Budde [Urgeschichte, 128], who points ὑκιπιρ οr ὑκιπιρ; cf.

Philo's interpretation, ἀπὸ ζωῆς θεοῦ).

Ball (in SBOT) agrees with Hommel (PSBA, March 1893) in holding not only that the two lists of the antediluvian patriarchs are identical, but that the Heb. names are either adaptations or translations of the Babylonian as found in Berosus and cuneiform sources. Ball considers that the form γρίτο of Gn 5^{12π} is more original than either become or wind [the Kere yeigh he calls 'a triumph of absurdity'], as is shown by Berosus' Meydλapos, a phonetic improvement of Meλdλapos = AmelAruru, 'Aruru's man' (Hommel), 'and 'b being sometimes confused. See, further, Nestle, Mar 1899, p. 353.

J. A. Selbie.

MEHUMAN (κριπρ).—One of the seven eunuchs in attendance upon king Ahasuerus (Est 110, LXX 'Αμάν). The name has been explained from the Persian Mehhum-van, 'belonging to the great Hum' (cf. Berth.-Ryss.); the former has perhaps been assimilated to the Aram. South = faithful. H. A. White.

ME-JARKON (μρτρ. τρ).—An unknown place in the neighbourhood of Joppa, Jos 19⁴⁶. The text is doubtful, the following Rakkon (μρτ) being in any case almost certainly due to dittography from the second part of Me-jarkon, while the latter name itself is not beyond suspicion. The LXX reads και ἀπὸ θαλάσσης Ἱερακῶν δριον πλησίον Ἱζππης, which Dillm. points out implies a reading ἡ μρτρι πισ. ε. 'and westward, Jarkon the boundary over against Joppa.'

J. A. Selbe.

MEKONAH (π; τρ ; BA om., κα. a mg inf Maχrά).— A town noticed, with Ziklag, as inhabited after the Captivity, Neh 11^{cs}. The site has not been identified.

MELATIAH (מְלְּמָהְ 'J" hath delivered,' Μαλτίας, but #A om.), a Gibeonite, who, with the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah, repaired a portion of the walls of Jerus. in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 37).

MELCHI (Μελχί TR, but Μελχεί Tisch. Treg. WH).—1. 2. Two ancestors of our Lord bear this name in St Luke's genealogy (3^{24, 28}).

MELCHIAS (B Μελχείας, A -χίας).—1. 1 Es 926=

MALCHIJAH, Ezr 10^{25} . 2. 1 Es 9^{32} = MALCHIJAH, Ezr 10^{31} . 3. 1 Es 9^{44} = MALCHIJAH, Neh 8^4 .

MELCHIEL (ΒΜελχειήλ, ΑΜελχιήλ; Vulg. om.).— The father of Charmis, one of the three governors of Bethulia, Jth 6¹⁵ (cf. the name 'κ', η, Malchiel).

MELCHIZEDEK (ρτυτο), Μελχισεδέκ).—King of Salem and priest of the Most High God, who, after Abram's defeat of Chedorlaomer and his Bab. allies, met the patriarch on his return, offered him bread and wine, blessed him, and received tithes from him of the spoil (Gn 14¹⁷⁻²⁰). Salem is Jerusalem, which appears already in the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) as one of the most important cities of Canaan, and is called Uru-salim. An Assyr. lexical tablet (WAI ii. 393) states that uru is the equivalent of the Assyr. alu, 'city'; and in the hieroglyphic inscriptions of the Egyp. kings Ramses II. and Ramses III. (19th and 20th dynasties) Jerus. is called simply Shalam or Salem. Several of the Tel el-Amarna tablets are letters written to the Pharaoh by Ebed-tob (or, as read by Hommel, Abdi-khiba), the king of Uru-Salim, who begs for help against his enemies. He tells the Pharaoh that he was not like the other Egyptian governors in Palestine, nor had he received his crown by inheritance from his father or mother; it had been conferred on him by 'the Mighty King.'* In another letter he speaks of 'the city of the mountain of Uru-Salim, by name Bit-Ninip,' becoming disaffected; and we may perhaps infer from this that the 'Most High God' of Jeruinfer from this that the 'Most High God' of Jerusalem was identified with Ninip, the warrior Sungod of Babylonia. In a letter from Phœnicia we hear of a second Bit-Ninip in the N. of Palestine. 'The Mighty King' is distinguished from the 'great king' of Egypt; and in one passage Ebedtob declares that, although the Pharaoh sends no troops, 'the arm of the Mighty King shall reach the lands of Naharaim and Babylonia.' Ebed-toh would therefore appear to have been a Ebed-tob would therefore appear to have been a priest-king, and thus to offer a striking parallel to priest-king, and thus to offer a striking parallel to Melchizedek. Moreover, Ebed-tob's words, that he had received his royal dignity neither from his 'father' nor from his 'mother,' are a curious commentary on He 7⁸. As Uru-Salim probably (but see Jerusalem, vol. ii. p. 584*; ZA, 1891, p. 263; JBL xi. (1892) p. 105) signifies 'the city of the god Salim,' the god of peace and safety (Heb. shallon) (though the Babylonians seem to have interpreted the name the 'city of alliance,' the action of M. in welcoming the peaceful return of Abram is easily explained. The offering of the estat or tithe to the priests and temples was a longestablished Bab. custom, and the formula used by M. in blessing the patriarch is met with in Aram. inscriptions found in Egypt. (See a series of papers on 'Melchizedek' by Sayce, Driver, Hommel, and others in the Expos. Times, vols. vii. and viii., and MELEA (Μελεά TR, but Μελεά Tisch. Treg.

WH).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3³¹.

MELECH (α/כ) 'king'; cf. Nabatæan (α/כ), the name of several kings in 1st cent. B.C.-1st cent. A.D. [Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 116]).—The name of a grandson of Merib-baal (Mephibosheth), 1 Ch 8²⁶ (Β Μελχήλ, Α Μαλώφ) 9⁴¹ (Β Μαλάχ, Α Μαλώχ).

* Acc. to Hommel (Expos. Times, viii. 95), the 'Mighty King' is in Abdi-khibe's letter the king of the Hittites, but he considers it probable that this was an applied reference, the original sense of sarru dannu ('mighty king') having been a religious one, parallel to the phys 'x ('Most High God') of Gn 1418.

Siegfried-Stade compare, further, the names Μάλχος (Jn 1810) and Μάλιχος (Jos. Ant. XIV. v. 2).

J. A. SELBIE. MELITA (Μελίτη; but B*, the Arm. VS, a Greek corrector of the Philoxenian Syr., the Bohairic, some good MSS of Vulg., and other authorities read Μελιτήνη, a natural and probably very early error in transcription).—The island upon which St. Paul was shipwrecked (Ac 281).
The ship had drifted thither from Cauda, a small island off the coast of Crete (Ac 27¹⁶). The violent wind Euraquilo (which see), the 'Gregalia' or 'Levanter,' blowing from E.N.E., would have drifted the vessel to the Syrtis (which see) had not its course been changed. St. Luke gives a partial account of the steps taken with this object; but, writing as a landsman, he omits the one essential point, viz. the setting of storm-sails, without which 'way' could not have been kept on the ship, and she would have drifted straight on the Syrtis. It has been shown that a ship of the kind in question, close-hauled on the starboard tack, before an E.N.E. gale, would make a course about W. by N. This would bring her to Malta within about the time stated (v. 27) to have elapsed. It could not possibly have carried her to the Dalmatian coast. This fact, as well as the fact that the party proceeded from Melita to Rome by Syracuse and Rhegium, is conclusive against the claim of Melita in the Adriatic, in spite of the identification of our Melita with the latter island by Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de Admin. Imper. 36, apparently the only express allusion to the question in early literature; he gives no reasons). The mention of Adria (which see) proves nothing. Malta was recognized as marking the point where the Tyrrhenian Sea ceases and the Adriatic (in the wider sense) begins (Procop. l. 372).

Adriatic (in the wider sense) begins (Procop. I. 372). To Malta, then, the apostle and his fellow-voyagers quite indisputably came. At night the watch were convinced that 'land was getting near' (προσάγειν — προσαχείν is an attempt to replace a curious phrase by an explanatory one, Ac 2727). As the soundings confirmed this, they threw anchors out from the stern (to avoid the risk of 'swinging' on to a lee shore), and 'prayed for day.' The dawn revealed a hay, with a shelving bit of beach. Upon this they decide to run the vessel. Simultaneously they cut the cables, let the 'rudders' taneously they cut the cables, let the 'rudders' down (they had been braced up for safety), hoist the foresail, thus getting way on to enable them to steer, and head for the beach. What happened next is in dispute. The beach is not coextensive with the bay. There is a beach at the head of it, and apparently at one or two other points at the foot of the cliffs. But before they reach the beach they meet unexpectedly a τόπος διθάλασσος, and the ship grounds in water too deep for wading. Accordingly swimmers were bidden to save them-selves, the rest make use of boards, spars, etc., and all are saved. The natives * receive the party kindly, and light a fire. As St. Paul warms him-self, a snake, roused by the heat, darts at him from a faggot he has piled on the fire, and hangs by its teeth on to his hand. The apostle shakes off the animal into the fire, and, to the amazement of the antives, suffers no injury. Escorted to the house of Publius (which see), the poros t or Princeps of the island, St. Paul heals his father of dysentery. This miracle is followed by others. The party are honourably treated, and after three months proceed to Italy by a ship which has wintered at the island.

* Β. ρ.βαρω. The language was probably Punic (Bilingual Punic and Gr. insc. CIG 5753). The modern Maltese is a corrupt Arabic with words from Italian, etc.

Malta lies 60 miles from Pachynum (Cape Passaro), the southern headland of Sicily, and nearly 200 from Cape Bon, the nearest point of Africa, in lat. 35° 53′ N., long. 14° 30′ E. It is separated by a channel of geologically recent formation, 41 miles wide, from the Isle of Gozo on the west. The length of Malta is 17 miles, its on the west. The length of Malta is 17 miles, its greatest breadth 9, its circumference 60, its area 95 square miles. Its population is very dense, 2000 per (productive) square mile. The Greeks seem to have colonized it at an early date. It is said (Diod. v. xii.) that the older inhabitants were Phænician. It was long held by Carthage; in B.C. 218 it was taken by the Romans, under whom it became part of the province of Sicily (Cicero, in Verr. II. iv. 18, 46). In A.D. 399 it became part of the Eastern Empire; Belisarius recovered it in 533 from the Vandals; but in 870 it passed under the power of the Abbasside Caliphs. In 1000 it was required by the Normans to Sicily 1090 it was reunited by the Normans to Sicily. In 1530 Charles v. gave it to the Knights of St. John, who had just lost Rhodes. The Turks attempted to seize it in 1551, 1563, and 1565, but were gallantly repulsed. On the last occasion, one of the great sieges of history, the Turks lost 30,000 men out of 40,000, and the 9000 defenders were reduced to 600. In 1798 the island was seized by Bonaparte; but the harsh rule of the French led the inhabitants to revolt, and in 1800 the island was taken by the English, to whom it was confirmed by the Treaty of Paris in 1814.

The narrative of the Acts, summarized above, fits well with the topography of 'St. Paul's Bay,' some 8 miles in a direct line from Valetta, and hardly 5 from the old capital, Melita, now Medina, Notabile, or Città-Vecchia. The tradition identifying the bay is of great antiquity (see below), and its correctness is practically certain. In 1530 tradition coupled the events with the east side of the bay, where stood the old church of S. Paulo ad mare, and the Ayin tal Razzul (fons Apostoli), and where Quintinus (1533) identifies the 'locus bimaris' with the 'Chersonesus' of Ptolemy (Koura Head) projecting into the sea. This can hardly be correct, as the ship would more probably, as Smith and all modern investigators assume, be stranded on the west side of the bay; it may be noticed, moreover, that the oldest map (reproduced below) shows the serpents, etc., on the west side, opposite the islet of Selmun, though the church of St. Paul is shown on the E. side. If the modern view is correct, the 'locus bimaris' will be a spit of mud projecting under the sea with deep water on either side—possibly, as Ramsay, etc., suggest, between the islet of Selmun and the Venetian map soon after 1530. The church on the left of the bay is St. Paul ad mare. Città-Vecchia is beyond the letter M at the corner.

Three points require final consideration: (1) The title and position of 'Publius.' If Malta was by this time enfranchized, the πρῶτος may have been a semi-official position corresponding to that of the princeps colonic at Pisæ (see Woolsey, quoted by Hackett, in loc.). Otherwise he might be the legate of the proprætor of Sicily (Cioero, in Verr.
IV. xviii.). Tradition, supported by excavations, puts the Rom. governor's house at Città-Vecchia. But Playfair mentions the ruins of an important house, now covered up for protection, apparently near the Church of St. Paul ad mare, certainly on the east side of St. Paul's Bay.

(2) Malta has now no venomous snakes; but the increase of population and cultivation may well have killed them out. Venomous snakes, again, do not hang on after biting. The smooth snake (Coronella lavis) is said to do so (Tristram), but it is not venomous. But to peasant-folk all

(3) A question of more far-reaching interest is the history of the local tradition, which modern research so remarkably confirms, of the site of St. Paul's shipwreck. Apart from the variation above mentioned as to the side of the bay, the general accuracy of the tradition is remarkable. How did it originate? Have we here a unique instance of of St. Paul, or the happy conjecture of a later date, which fixed upon a likely spot near at hand to the capital? The matter cannot be settled with our present knowledge. All one can say is, that the tradition was clearly old when the first maps of Malta were made (after 1530). Before that time no writer appears to allude to the place; lut Quintinus (see above) and Fazelli (about 1555) both take its identity for granted. The Church of St. Paul ad mare was rebuilt in 1610 by the Grand Master Vignacourt, who also built the neighbouring Torre di S. Paulo. The statue of St. Paul which crowns the isle of Selmun is modern (1845).

The first known bishop of Malta (the Episcopate of Publius is assumed in the Roman Martyrology with no known evidence) is Acacius, at the Council of Chalcedon in 451. But Caruana claims the existence of Christian monograms and inscriptions as early as the 2nd cent. This makes it just credible that there may have been a continuous Caristian tradition in Malta since St. Paul's days. But if the gospel were reintroduced at a later date, the mention of Melita (Ac 281) would lead to the establishment of some local tradition. Città-Vecchia abounds with sites traditionally associated with St. Paul, including the cave where he lodged during his sojourn. And the foundation of a Church of St. Paul ad mare in the neighbourhood of the capital, the original centre of tradition, would be natural.

Literature.—The ancient commentaries on the Acts contain nothing bearing on the question. Occumenius in his summary of St. Paul's journeys (Migne, Pat. Gr. cxviii. 312 D) does not mention Melita by name. The ancient map reproduced above was published at Venice by 'D. B.' Another by Battista Agnese (Ven. 1554) is similar in treatment, but marks 'Cala de S. Paulo' at Koura Head. A similar map was published at Rome in 1551. Other maps published (at Rome and Nürnberg) in 1565 have also been consulted. Quintinus' Descriptio Melita' (1533) is printed in P. Burmann's Thesaurus, xv. 110. Fazelli, de rebus Siculis, ed. by D. Vito e Statella (Catan. 1749), 1, 16, 27 (sensible refutation of Dalmatian theory. MELONS (press, 'abattihim, mémores, pepones).— The cognate name bottikh in Arab. = melon, with the testimony of the ancient VSS, leaves no reason to doubt the identity of the fruit mentioned (Nu 115) along with cucumbers, leeks, onions, and garlic. The term in Arab. is generic. It includes all the varieties of cucurbitaceous fruits known as water-melons, bottikh akhdar='green melon,' and cantelopes or nuskmelons, bottikh as far='yellow melon.' Melons of excellent quality (under the name of battikh or bittikh) are still produced in Egypt, and their succulent pulp was remembered with great regret by the Israelites in the burning sands of the Desert of the Wandering. Had their faith or their knowledge been greater, they needed not to sin by their impatient expressions of longing, for Palestine and Syria produce melons no less renowned for their excellence than those of Egypt. The water-melons of Jaffa are specially prized for their luscious pulp. Those of Hems and Lattakia, where the fruit is called jabas, are also of very fine where the fruit is called jaous, are also of very line quality. Melon patches are to be seen everywhere, often on the driest of hillsides. The vine has the power of extracting moisture from a soil which appears entirely parched and barren. The fruit is very cheap, and forms an important part of the diet of the poorer classes, but is equally enjoyed by the rich in Bible lands. During the season long trains of camels and donkeys transport melons from place to place, and boat-loads are constantly entering the seaports.

MELZAR (τυζτη Dn 1^{11, 16}).—The LXX ('Αβιεσδρί), Theodotion ('Αμελσάδ or 'Αμερσάρ), the Vulg. (Malasar), all regard it as a proper name, and have been followed in this by our AV and other modern versions. This is now universally admitted to be a mistake. The article precedes the noun, and the two together must be rendered 'the steward (RV), or 'the supplearer' (Kautzsch's AT), or 'the overseer' (Nowack's Handkommentar). The last is best. It expresses fairly well the functions with which the man in question was charged. prince of the eunuchs bade him superintend the diet, training, and conduct of Daniel and his three faithful companions, until the time when they should be fit to enter on the king's service. It has been well said that he thus combined the duties of the παιδαγωγός and τροφεύς, and attention has been called to the inscription on the Bellino cylinder which mentions the son of one 'who was governor over the young men educated in my [the king of Assyria's] palace.' This was hardly the cupbearer's work. And the title steward leads our thought to the superintendence of property rather

The derivation of the word melzas has been very variously given. Hitzig, in his Commentary, compared with it Μολοσσός, Laconian Μολοσσόρ, and connected this with κολοσσός. Halevy compares μυλωθρός, 'miller': Grätz, coming a little nearer the meaning, μελέτωρ. The Pers. mul-ser, 'keeper of the cellar,' has met with much favour, but the of the cellar,' has met with much favour, but the duties of that official do not square with those assigned to ham-melzar. Lenormant thought of the Assyr. amil ussur, 'treasurer.' Other suggested Assyr. origins are mul, 'a star,' and Mulal-Assur. But the most probable is that of Frd. Delitzsch and Schrader, who point out the frequent interchange of 'and in Semitic, and hold that our word may be the same as the Assyr. massaru, 'guardian,' from the root wil. Schrader compares massar babi, 'gatekeeper.' As to the l, Delitzsch points to Bábauaur, from Diz. In the Pesh, and points to βάλσαμον, from αγλ. In the Pesh. and Arab. of the two Daniel passages we find the n, MEMPHIS, the capital of Egypt, is, in the Heb. text, only once (Hos 96) written correctly 72 Moph. In the other passages (Is 1918, Jer 216 441 4614 19, Ezk 3013. 16) it is corrupted to 71 Noph. EV is correct and in agreement with the ancient versions in rendering Moph, 'Memphis'; Noph, which likewise all ancient versions render 'Memphis,' is merely transliterated. The name Memphis was in ancient transiterated. The name Memphis was in ancient Egyp. Men-nofer (= later Men-nufe), i.e. 'the good (or fine) abode.' Plutarch's translations (de Iside et Osiride, 20), δρμος άγαθῶν, 'landing-place of the good,' and 'tomb of the good god' (i.e. Osiris), are erroneous, betraying little knowledge of Egyptian. erroneous, betraying ittle knowledge of Egyptian. The vernacular shortening was Menneft, Menfe, in the Coptic period Menbe, Membe, Memfe, but more frequently Mefe (Arab. Māfe, more commonly Menf). These shortened forms passed over into many languages: Assyrian, Mempi, Mimpi; Greek-Latin, Memphis (hence Targumic Mēphis), etc. The Latin, Memphis (hence Targumic Mephis), etc. The Heb. renders the most abridged form Meph(e). The corruption Noph is, perhaps, due to an attempt at taking τρ for τρ, and, subsequently, shortening this.—The sacred name of Memphis, preferred especially in the religious texts of the Egyptians, was Ha(t)-ka-ptah, 'the abode (or temple) of the likeness of god Ptah,' whence the designation of all Egypt as Ai-γυ-πτοι, E-gy-pt, seems to have arisen. seems to have arisen.

Memphis was one of the most ancient cities of Egypt, at least near it was the earliest residence of those Pharaohs who ruled over both Upper and Lower Egypt. Herodotus (ii. 99) reports that the earliest historical king Menes (before 3000 B.C., an accurate determination of the date will never be found) built M. after winning the ground from the Nile by an immense dyke, still existing in Heroof M., and completely changing the course of the river (?). Menes, Herodotus says, built the temple of Hephæstus (i.e. Ptah). This tradition is now supported by hieroglyphic inscriptions as old at the 14th cent. B.C., claiming indeed king Mena, Meni, as founder of that most ancient and most inverted to the Hall ke at the or 'sanctuary. important temple, the Ha(t)-ka-ptah or 'sanctuary of Ptah.' Diodorus attributes the foundation of M. to a king Uchoreus, a name admitting of no certain identification. The name Memphis originated from a new suburb which grew up to the west of the original city, around the pyramid of king Pepi (Apopi) I. of Dynasty 6 (c. 2700 B.C.?), that pyramid being called Mennofer, 'good abode' (see above).

We can observe that before this time the city, or at least a large part of it, was shifted repeatedly over a space of several miles. Most kings liked to build a new palace, and around it their 'own city.'

Consequently it might be disputed if this changing series of cities and suburbs can properly be called Memphis. But if the name is not old, and the situation was as unstable as that of many Oriental cities, the religious centre, the temple of Ptah,

The city extended on the western bank of the Nile over an area of 150 stadia (more than 17 miles) from N. to S., according to Diodorus. From E. to W. the diameter cannot have been more than 3 miles. The names of several quarters are known: the quarter of Sokari(s) (now Sakkara), near the desert in the west, touching the necropolis, a part of which was called Ko-kome ('of the black bull'). The 'White wall' was the chief part of the city, with the citadel, always occupied by a strong garrison. Another quarter was Makhatoui, the balance of both countries. Ankh-toui, toui, 'the balance of both countries.' Ankh-toui, 'the life of both countries,' in the E. was on the bank of the Nile, a quarter rich in temples, but also in pleasure-places, a temple of the Syrian goddess Astarte combining both functions. This part was inhabited by a mixed population. The classical writers (above all Herodotus, about 450 B.C., and Strabo, 24 B.C.) give very impressive descriptions of the several large temples, especially of the old 'sanctuary of Ptah-Hephæstus,' remarkable for immense statues (75 feet) standing before it. Almost every king had built here; the largest part of the various constructions seems to have been due to the greatest builder of ancient Egypt, Ramses II., the Sesostris of the Greeks. Canals crossed the city; an artificial lake was in the western part.

The chief local god of Memphis was Ptah, the former of the world, whose high priest had therefore the name 'the great workman.' Other divinities were, e.g., the lion-headed goddess Sokhmet, the Egyp. Asclepius Imouthes (I-m-hotep), Nefer-Atum, etc. The western suburb had its own local god Sokari, a hawk sitting in a kind of sledge, later assimilated to Osiris, the god of the dead. The Serapeum, described by Strabo (p. 807), was in this quarter. The worship of Apis (Hap), the sacred animal of Osiris-Sokaris—according to popular belief the incarnation of this god himself—had its own temple opposite the great temple of Ptah. The Apis was a black bull with certain white spots and other marks—the description of which, by the classical writers, e.g. Herod. ii. 153, does not agree with the monumental evidence. Also the cow, which had been mother of an Apis, was adored in a special temple. Sometimes all Egypt was searched for a new Apis for a long time. The discovery, the bringing to Memphis, and the solemn enthronization were public festivals of the highest rank, immense sums being frequently contributed by the kings for the celebration. Likewisethedeath of the Apiswas followed by public mourning and a splendid burial in the large crypt at Sakkara. Mariette found there, in 1859, sixty-four embalmed bodies of sacred bulls and cows. The goddess Isis had a remarkable temple, finished by king Amasis (c. 550 B.C.)

Memphis owed its importance chiefly to its situation near the southern angle of the Delta, where the Libyan mountain-ridge in the W. almost meets with the Arabian mountains in the E. It thus commanded all Egypt, just as Cairo does at present. Dynasties 3, 4, 6, 7, 8 are reported to have been Memphitic. The city continued to be the unrivalled metropolis down to Dynasty 18 (beginning about 1650 B.C.) Dynasties from Upper Egypt, as, e.g., 11 and 12 (from Thebes), could not disregard it; also the foreign invaders, called Hyksos or 'shepherd kings,' seem to have resided here. Only during Dyn. 18 to 20 (to c. 1100 B.C.) Thebes, as residence of the kings, rivalled successfully Memphis for splendid buildings. Yet M. continued to be the most populous city, and became again the residence of the Pharaohs until the end of Egypt's independence (525 B.C.), although it was frequently ravaged by war, e.g. when the Ethiopian conqueror P(i)'ankhi (about 750) took it by storm. It experienced the woes threatened by the prophets of Israel repeatedly at the hands of the Assyrians under Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal, last and worst in 525 B.C. at the hands of the Persian king Cambyses. Under the Persian rule it was the stronghold of a powerful Persian garrison, and proved to be the key of Egypt in the various rebellions against the Persians, suffering especially from the Persian king Ochus after the last my nom the reisian king ochus after the last revolution. The foundation of Alexandria made M. the second city of Egypt, but the Ptolemies and the governors of the Roman and Byzantine lords used it as a second capital. The deathblow was dealt to it by the Arch connected and the few seconds. dealt to it by the Arab conquest and the founda-tion of Old Cairo (Fostat) in 638 A.D. The Arabs employed the stones of the ruins (which are described by Abulfeda in the 14th cent. as still being very extensive) for building up the new city, and, later, Cairo. Therefore the present site does not indicate the former size (marked by Kum el-Azizyeh in the N., Bedrashen in the S.) and splen-That the poor modern village of Mitrahineh occupies the centre of M. and the site of the celebrated temple of Hephæstus, is indicated only by the fallen stone colossus of Ramses II. (originally 43 feet high). Mariette's excavations produced only insignificant fragments of this temple, and showed that the destruction of the whole city has been very complete. But the immense necropolis at the west of M., on the borders of the Libyan desert, still extends from Abu-Rosh in the N. to Dashur in the S. The gigantic royal tombs, the pyramids, attract numerous visitors from the whole world. Usually, only the most remarkable group of pyramids (those of Khufu, Khafrē, and Menkarē of Dyn. 4 [in Herodotus, Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus]) at Gizeh are visited; about 50 other pyramids of smaller size or still more dilapidated are less known (those at Sakkara, belonging to Dyn. 6, and of Dashur of Dyn. 4, being most remarkable). The immense sphinx at Gizeh (prob. a work of Khofre-Chephren, although recently some scholars place it in Dyn. 12), and many private tombs, the latter much destroyed, contribute to make the site of ancient M. still remarkable.

These men, who formed the king's council, are represented both as astrologers ('wise men, who knew the times') and as authorities on all questions of law and custom. When Ahasuerus consulted his counsellors with regard to the conduct of Vashti in refusing to come to the banquet at his bidding, Memucan was the first to speak. He represented that the queen's example was likely to be followed by all the princesses of Media and Persia, and recommended that she should be deposed from her royal dignity, and that a decree should forthwith be published enjoining upon all wives to give due honour to their own husbands. This advice pleased the king, and was at once carried into effect (Est 113-22).

the latter form being the same as is found Ac 131). -The history of Menahem is recorded 2 K 15¹³⁻²² He is there called 'son of Gadi' (Heb. '71, LXX l'abbel). Gadi is most likely the name of his father, but it is possible that 'son of Gadi' may mean that he was a member of the tribe of Gad, many of whom had become regular soldiers in consequence of the harrying of the East Jordan land in the long course of the Syrian wars (see 2 K 15²⁸, and cf. Stade, Gesch. des V. Isr. i. 576). During the six months' reign of Zechariah, the last king of the house of Jehu, Menahem seems to have been one of the foremost generals; and when Shallum conspired against and murdered Zecharial, Menahem was in command at Tirzah, once the capital of the northern kingdom and still an important military post. Menaliem did not acquiesce in Shallum's usurpation. He marched from Tirzah to Samaria, defeated and slew his rival, and mounted the throne. According to the MT of v. 16 his next move was against Tiphsah, which refused to admit him. He took it by storm, slaughtered the inhabitants, and treated the unhappy women with the atrocious cruelty too common in those days. In several particulars the text of this sixteenth verse is corrupt, and there can be little doubt that it is so in respect of the town-name. The only city of this name mentioned in the Bible is the well-known Thapsacus, on the Euphrates (1 K 424 [Heb 54]). Rawlinson's suggestion (Speaker's Comm. in loc.) that an expedition thither by Menahem would be the natural sequel to Jeroboam II.'s occupation of Hamath, is condemned by the fact that Menahem's position at home was too insecure for him to venture far afield. On the other hand, we need not assume the existence of a Tiphsah in the land of Israel, unmentioned in any other passage. The LXX, which has Θαρσειλά in v.¹⁴, here reads Θερσά (A Θαιρά). It is not difficult to believe that in those disturbed times, when no one knew who would ulti-mately come out at the top, Tirzah closed its gates behind Menahem as soon as he marched out against Shallum, and was therefore visited with bloody vengeance when he forced them open again. On this view we should read area instead of norm, and omit מפרעה as a clerical error. The other alternative is to adopt Thenius conjecture, and, with the minimum of alteration, read man for nors; the town thus named, Tappuah, being on the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh, Jos 16⁸ 17^{7.8} (cf. Benzinger, Konigs, in Marti's Handkomm.). A keen sense of the evil and misery of these days of internal strife is best gained from such writings as Hos 77 84, Is 919-21.

It was in the short and troubled reign of Menahem that the Assyrian invader first set foot in the Holy Land. 'There came against the land Pul the king of Assyria' (2 K 15¹⁹). Schrader (COT² i. 222, 230) has shown that this Pul, the II Jpos of the Ptolemaic Canon, and Tiglath-pileser III. of the cuneiform records, are identical, that probably 'when he became ruler he exchanged the name Palu, which belonged to him as a subject, ... for the other name Tuklat-abal-isarra. Yet the earlier and original name was perhaps the most popular one. It was that under which he first became known to the Israelites.' The books of Hosea and Isaiah exhibit a deep and abiding division between an Egyptian and an Assyrian party in Israel. It is possible that at this crisis the king and his faction actually solicited the interposition of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser's own account would look as though he came unsolicited, sweeping Israel, along with the other states of Western Syria, into his net In III R 9, No. 3, lines 50-57, he enumerates 'the tribute of Kushtashpi of Kumnuch, Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Samaria (Mi-ni-hi-im-mi Sa-mi-ri-na-ai), Hiram of Tyre,' and many other petty kings (see Winckler, Keilinsch. Textbuch, pp. 17, 18; cf. Schrader. COT' i. 284). In any case, Menahem succeeded in inducing Tiglath-pileser to accept him as a vassal, and it may well have been his policy on this occasion that evoked the prophet's reproaches, Hos 5¹³ (cf. 7¹¹) 8⁹ 10⁶ (cf. 12⁴) 14³.

The method by which Menahem met his suzerain's demand for money has thrown light on the economic condition of the kingdom. 'Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver that his hand might be with him. . . And Menahem exacted the money of Israel, even of all the mighty men of wealth. of each man fifty shekels of silver' (2 K 15^{19.50}). That is to say, there were 60,000 'men of means' in the land.

The mention of Menahem on Tiglath-pileser's list of tributaries enables us to fix his date with a fair degree of precision, and compels us to correct the number of years assigned to him in v. 17. The Assyrian list is of the year B.C. 738. Pekah, who succeeded Menahem's son, Pekahiah, after the latter had reigned two years, occupied the throne in 734. The Assyrian invasion must have occurred not very long after Menahem had seized the reins; otherwise he would not have been so eager to utilize it for the confirmation of his authority. Hence the dates given for Menahem in the art. Chronology, vol. i. p. 401 of this Dictionary, are more probable than Wellhausen's (IJG² p. 80) view that Menahem seized the kingdom in 745, or even than that of Kautzsch (Hist., of OT Lit., Eng. trans., p. 185), who gives 743-737. Three or four years, not ten years, must have been the extent of And that was quite long enough. He his reign. was a military adventurer, who reigned for him-self, not for his people, and did nothing to heal the sores of the land. The prophecies of Hosea present us with an all too vivid picture of the drunkenness, debauchery, injustice, oppression, superstition, as well as of the confused and fluctuating politics of the time. And if it is unsafe to fix on individual traits as belonging specifically to Menahem's reign, we are at all events quite justified in forming our general idea of the character of the reign from the dark picture which the prophet paints. Menahem seems to have died a natural death. He was the last king of Israel who was succeeded on the throne by his son.

One of the best sketches of Menahem and his rule is that given by Kittel (Hist. of the Hebreves. ii. 332-337), although it is difficult to understand the reason for the assertion (p. 332), 'Of the few kings of the kingdom of Ephraim who died a natural death, Jeroboam II. is the last.' Benzinger (Konige, 167, 168) is excellent; and Stade (Gesch. d.s V. Isr. i. 576) is still worth reading. See also his discussion of the text of v. 16, ZAW, 1886, p. 160.

MENE MENE TEKEL UPHARSIN (২ρε κ:Σ κ:Σ Τουπ: Theod. Μανή, θεκέλ, φαρές; LXX tr. in Dn 5¹³ Τρίθμηται, κατελογίσθη, ἐξῆρται).—The words of the famous handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's fenst (Dn 5²⁵). The construction of the enigma in this chapter is similar to that in ch. 2: by performing one part of it Daniel certifies the correctness of his performance of the other part. Here, by deciphering what no one else can read, he gains credit for his explanation and application of the words. The author does not state wherein lay the difficulty of reading the words on the wall, and none of the many guesses on this subject made in ancient and modern times is worthy of attention. ('learly, however, the writing must have been, in the author's intention, of a kind with which the king and his wise men were familiar, though in this particular case they were unable to read it. It requires no flight of the imagination to conceive such a case. The CIS contains numerous specimens of Phænician and Neo-Punic texts, which, owing to careless writing or ignorant transcription, still baffle the ingenuity of decipherers; and the same is the case sometimes with Greek cursive. Yet these alphabets are not more liable to become unintelligible than that Aramaic cursive which was probably in 'Daniel's' mind, and of which we have specimens in the Blacassian papyri. When such texts are read, those who are familiar with both script and language can easily see whether the readings are right or wrong. The test of Daniel's ability, though not equal to that given in ch. 2, was therefore still considerable.

Daniel's interpretation and application of the words occupy vv. 25-25, where it is noticeable that the readings differ slightly from those given in v.25 Mėnė appears only once, and the singular pėrės is substituted for the plural parsin. The texts of Theodotion and Jerome bring v. is into agreement with vv. 25. 29, in the opinion of many critics (cf. Peters in JBL xv. 116) rightly. The general principle of Daniel's interpretation is to render each word twice (as Hitzig observes). This appears that the specific the strength with the specific that word which is each word twice (as Hitzig observes). This appears most clearly in the case of the last word, which is made to mean 'thy kingdom is broken up and given to Media and Persia,' a rendering which suits parsin if interpreted (1) as 'fragments' (Ewald and others) or 'they break' (Hitzig and others); (2) as 'the Persias.' The Persias, according to the writer, stands for Media and Persia, just as with the Arabs 'the Euphrateses' [dual] means the Tigris and the Euphrates, 'the Basras' [dual] means Basra and Kufa (Vennier, Grammaire Arabs, § 288). The second word means 'weighed' (from tkl) and 'thou art light' (from kll). The (from tk!) and 'thou art light' (from k!!). The first word is apparently made to mean 'counted' and 'handed over' (השלכה), the second sense being perhaps given it on the authority of Is 6512 (where for maps the Targ. has now, a synonym of obre). Hitzig suggests that the second sense of měnē, 'completed,' is got from the similar mělê, 'full.' The grammar of the second word suffers somewhat in this interpretation, since אחת should be חקיל in the first sense.

It might seem that this explanation of the words must be certainly right, since either the whole narrative is the author's invention, or, if it be historical, Daniel's explanation was found satisfactory by those likely to know. There is, however, a third possibility, viz. that an actual inscription found on the walls of the palace at Babylon, or at any rate found somewhere, was worked by the author of Daniel into this dramatic scene, and arbitrarily explained. Somewhat similarly Epiphanius (adv. Hær. xix. 4) produces the saying of the Arabic prophet Elxai and interprets it quite wrongly; it was left to M. A. Levy to interpret the words correctly in 1858 (ZDMG xii. 712). In the case of the words in Daniel there is something in favour of such a supposition. Besides the grammatical difficulty in the case of the second word, the uncertainty as to signification in the case of the first, and its actual repetition, make the principle of rendering each word twice resemble the artifice of an interpreter rather than what was actually intended by the author of the inscription. actually intended by the author of the inscription. But if that principle be abandoned, the words 'counted, weighed, and fragments' are not sufficient to justify the gloss; for the word 'weighed' by no means implies that the weight is deficient, any more than 'counted' implies that the number is complete. Moreover, if the author was composing a suitable death-warrant for Babylon, it is probable that he would have given a sentence which would be clear, or a quotation which would be appropriate. But if he is not the author of the inscription, these difficulties may

A suggestion for a fresh rendering of the words in Dn was made by Clermont-Ganneau in the Journal Asiatique for 1886 (Sér. viii. vol. i. 36; translated in Hebraica, 1887), which was followed up by T. Nöldeke (ZA i. 414-418), G. Hoffmann (ib. ii. 45-48), P. Haupt (John Hopkins Univ. Circ. No. 58, p. 104), Bevan (Dan. 106 f.), and J. D. Prince Journ. of the American Oriental Society, xv. clxxxii-clxxxix). He regarded the words in the text as the names of wrights, 'a Mina, a Mina, a Shekel, and [two] Peras.' The word peras is used in Jewish writings for 'a half,' especially 'a half mina.' This discovery seemed to shed some light on the difficulty of reading the words, which could all be represented by ideographs; though it is not clear why the wise men of Babylon should have been puzzled by such common signs. It also seemed to give an explanation of tekel which did not violate grammar (though this is not certain). Otherwise this discovery seems to give little help. For, besides the improbable character of the sum (which would be like £1, ls., some £1), how came it to be connected with the fall of Babylon? Clerniont-Ganneau therefore practically abandoned his discovery as soon as made, and offered a variety of renderings, of which 'Mina by Mina weigh the Peras' may be given as an example. Haupt, who adopted the rendering 'there have Sheld and Parassa. been counted a Mina, a Shekel, and Perases,' thought these weights stood symbolically for Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and the Medes and Persians. But it is incredible that this, if correct, and the second the author of Day, and for a possible beautiful description. could have escaped the author of Dn 2; and for a death-warrant it is by no means dramatic.

We are driven back therefore to Daniel's explanation of the first two words as verbs, which, if we had the inscription on stone, we should probably render 'he has counted, counted, weighed.' It is render 'he has counted, counted, weighed.' It is curious that the third word one has in the Targum a sense which is very similar to that of the preceding two, i.e. 'to assess' (for the Heb. """ in Lv). The reading of vv. 26-26 would therefore be naturally rendered 'he has counted, weighed, assessed,' and that of v. 26 'he has counted, counted, weighed, and they assess.' The first of these reads like a commercial formula with which goods might be labelled, implying that they were ready for be labelled, implying that they were ready for immediate delivery; while the second might be a description in technical language of a sale in which the salesman gives an accurate description of the goods, for which the buyers offer a price. The interpretation given in vv. 25-28 would in either case err in assigning a separate application to each of the words of a formula which as a whole was a symbolical description of the occasion.

If the inscription given in Dn 5 be historical, it is probable that some euhemeristic explanation of its appearance, such as Prince suggests, should be adopted. The historical character of the name Belshazzar leads us to seek for more elements of fact in this chapter than in the rest of the Aramaic portion of the book; and if it could be made out that the inscription had been misunderstood by the writer, there would be some probability in favour of its authenticity. It must be confessed, how-ever, that the assumption that the inscription is by a different hand from that of the rest of the book opens a wide field for conjecture.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH. MENELAUS (Μενέλασι).—A usurping high priest in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. According to Josephus (Ant. XII. v. 1) he was originally named Onias, and was a brother of Onias III. and Jason; but the account in 2 Mac, which is probably more trustworthy, states that he was a Benjamite, a brother of Simon, the guardian of the temple, who had instigated the attempt of Heliodorus to plunder the treasury (2 Mac 4²², cf. 3⁴). In B.C. 171 Menelaus was sent by Jason to convey his promised tribute to Antiochus, and by offering the king a still larger bribe secured the high priesthood for himself. When Menelaus was established in Jerusalem this money still remained unpaid, and, a dispute on this matter having arisen between him and Sostratus, the Syrian commandant, they were both summoned to appear before Antiochus (2 Mac 4^{23, 24}). When they arrived in Antioch, the king was absent in Cilicia. Menelaus therefore took the opportunity to secure the support of the vicegerent Andronicus by means of rich presents, which were commonly supposed to have been stolen from the temples. He also persuaded Andronicus to murder treacherously the ex-high priest Onias III., who had taken refuge in the sanctuary at Daphne (vv. 31-36). Meanwhile the misconduct of Lysimachus (wh. see), the deputy left by Menelaus, had led to a serious riot at Jerusalem, and the Jews sent a deputation to meet the king at Tyre, and to make formal complaints against the high priest. Menelaus, who seems to have remained in Syria, again had recourse to bribery, and having won over an influential courtier, Ptolemy the son of Dorymenes, he secured both his own acquittal and the execution of his accusers (vv. 39-50). During the Egyptian expedition of Antiochus (B.C. 170), Jason attempted to regain his former position, and, suddenly attacking Jerusalem, forced his rival to take refuge in the citadel. Antiochus treated this attack as an act of open rebellion. He marched on Jerusalem, gave orders for a terrible massacre, and plundered the temple of its most sacred treasures, receiving (it is said) in this sacrilege the assistance of Menelaus himself (ib. 5°-16.22", cf. 1 Mac 120-24). Menelaus was confirmed in power, 1 Mac 1²⁹⁻²⁴). Menelaus was confirmed in power, but after the second attack of the Syrians on Jerusalem (1 Mac 1²⁹⁻³⁴, 2 Mac 5²⁸⁻²⁸) we hear no more of him till the next reign. We do not know who exercised the office of high priest after the victories of Judas. But in B.C. 162, either before (2 Mac 13³⁻⁸) or after (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 7) the campaign of Lysias and Eupator, Menelaus met his death. He had incurred the anger of the Syrian chancellor, who represented him as the Syrian chancellor, who represented him as the cause of all the troubles in Judæa. He was accordingly sent by the king to Bercea, a town between Hierapolis and Antioch, and there executed. According to 2 Mac l.c. he was carried to a certain tower, and thrown down into the ashes with which it was filled—a fitting retribution for one who had so grievously desecrated the holy altar at Jerusalem (cf. Rawlinson on 2 Mac in Speaker's Comm.; Schürer, HJP I. i. 204 f., 225 f.).

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθεύς B and prob. A; Mnestheus).—The father of Apollonius, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes and chief collector of tribute (2 Mac 421, cf. 524, 1 Mac 129). In the RV of 2 Mac 44, on the strength of a conjecture of Hort's in a difficult passage, mention is again made of Apollonius the son of Menestheus (reading Μενεσθέως for μαίνεσθαι ξως), but the person there intended seems rather to be Apollonius the son of Thrasœus (cf. 35). See, further, under APOLLONIUS.

in Arab. to assign, apportion (cf. Heb. 7 7 a portion); and there is little doubt that Meni (properly, that which is apportioned or destined) was a personification of destiny, and was a male deity corresponding to Manat, one of the 'daughters of Allah,' a great stone worshipped by the old heathen Arabians (see particulars from Ibn Kalbi and others in Wellh. MEPHIBOSHETH (πφαρτρ, Β Μεμφιβίσθε, Α -αι).— 1. A son of Jonathan (2 S 4 al.). As the real name of Ishbosheth was Eshbaal (man of Baal), so Mephibosheth is a transformation of the original name Meri-Baal or Merib-Baal, which has been variously rendered 'Baal's man,' 'Baal contends,' or 'Baal's warrior.' As in the case of Ishbosheth, it is the The rease of ishibation, it is the Chronicler who has preserved the true name (1 Ch 8^{24} [B $Mepi\beta da\lambda$, A $Meppi\beta da\lambda$] and 9^{40} [B $Mapei\beta da\lambda$, A $Mexpi\beta da\lambda$]. The reason why Baal was thus transformed into Bosheth has been already exclusion.

Upon David's accession to the throne, it would have been quite in accordance with Oriental custom if he had exterminated the family of Saul. (Compare the conduct of Athaliah in 2 K 111). His friendship for Jonathan led him, however, to follow a different course. With Ishbosheth had perished the last of Saul's sons by wives of the first rank, and with the exception of Jonathan none of them seem to have left any issue, although we read in 2 S 21s of sons of Saul by his concubine Rizpah, and also of grandsons, the children of his daughter Merab. Once David was firmly established upon the throne, he ascertained by inquiry of Ziba, who had been the steward of Saul, that a son of Jonathan named Merib-baal (Mephibosheth) still survived (2 S 9¹⁵.). This son of his most intimate friend could all the more safely be spared by David, as his bodily condition made him of little account in a warlike age, and precluded the possibility of his proving a dangerous rival. From 2S 4 we learn that in the hurried flight of Saul's household, when tidings came of the defeat at Gilboa, M., who was then five years old, sustained

* See Gray, Heb. Proper Names, p. 200, n. 3, and Kittel (in SBOT) on 1 Ch 3²⁴, who both hold that by 3 po ('man or hero of Baal') is the original form, Kittel offering as an alternative rendering 'my lord is Baal' (cf. CIS i. 111). On the other hand, Nestle (Eigennamen, p. 120 f.) adopts the form קריב בעל. The change of 'TO into 'TO (hesides that of TI) into nor) was probably intended still further to disguise the original form of the name, repair being probably taken to mean 'one who scatters or disperses shame' (Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 195).

such injuries through a fall, that he became per manently lame. Since his uncle Ishbosheth's death, he had been living in concealment at Lo debar to the E. of the Jordan. It was probably not without trepidation that he obeyed the summons to court, and, in answer to David's promises of protection and favour, he could only reply with true Oriental self-depreciation, What is thy servant that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?' (2 S 9°). As a pledge of the sincerity of his promises, the king restored to Jonathan's son all the personal estates of Saul, Ziba being appointed to administer these for the benefit of M., who was himself maintained as a permanent guest at the king's table (2 S 913). This latter arrangement commended itself from the point of view both of

The next mention of M. is during the troublous period when, in consequence of Absalom's rebellion, David had to abandon Jerusalem. At the Mount of Olives the king was met by Ziba, who brought a couple of asses laden with bread, bunches of raisins, cakes of dried fruit, and wine, which he offered for the use of the royal household. In answer to the question, 'Where is thy master?' Ziba declared that M. had preferred to remain in Jerus. in the hope that the kingdom of Saul would be restored to him. It was an unlikely story, for M. had surely less to expect from Absalom than from David; yet it served its purpose, and the crafty Ziba had the satisfaction of hearing David say, 'Behold, thine is all that pertaineth to M.' (2 S 164). When David returned to Jerus. after the defeat and death of Absalom, M. came to congratulate him; and being met with the stern question, 'Wherefore wentest thou not with me, M.?' proceeded to exculpate himself and to accuse Ziba of fraud. David's flight, he alleged, had occasioned him the acutest grief, and in token of mourning he had not trimmed his beard nor washed his feet or his clothes from the time the king left his capital till he returned to it. Nay, he had intended to accompany his benefactor, but Ziba had taken advantage of his helplessness, and, instead of saddling an ass for him to ride after David, had gone and basely calumniated him to the king. David's answer seems a strange one, 'Why speakest thou any more of thy matters? I say, thou and Ziba divide the land.' It would seem as if he only Ziba divide the land.' It would seem as if he only half believed M., or at least despaired of reaching the truth. Ziba might have been faithful to David, simply because he felt sure of being on the winning side; but at all events he had been faithful, and the king felt in no mood to reproach him. The easiest way was to compromise the matter, leaving the steward and the master each in possession of half the profits of Saul's estates. A strange way of doing justice from a European but not from an Oriental point of view! M., who always makes a favourable impression upon us, and who seems to have inherited the warm heart and generous disposition of his father Jonathan, replied, 'Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come in peace unto his own house $(2 S 19^{30})$

According to 2 S 912 Mephibosheth had a son named Mica (), from whom seems to have sprung a family afterwards well known in Israel (1 Ch 8 94 [מִיכְה, Micah]).

MERAB (272); 1 S 14⁴⁰ B Me ρ 6 β 6, A omits; 1 S 18^{17, 19} B omits, A Me ρ 6 β 6.—The elder daughter of Saul. According to the later of the two documents in 1 S, Saul promised his daughter to the slayer of Goliath (1 S 17²⁶). This promise, however, was afterwards ignored, and Saul is repre sented as trying to bring about David's destruction by offering him Merab's hand as a reward for his nilitary services against the Philistines (18 1817). But, though David successfully carried out the task which the king had set him, Saul failed to keep his promise, and Merab became the wife of Adriel the Meholathite. In the earlier document nothing is known of this incident in connexion with Merab, but only of the affection of Michal, Saul's second daughter, for David. In 28 218 Michal is clearly a mistake for Merab, whose five sons were delivered by David into the hands of the Gibeonites, by whom they were slain and hanged before the Lord. See, further, art. MERARI (ΥΥΡ, Μεραρ(ε)t) 1. is known to us only from P and the Chronicler. According to these writers he was the third of the three sons of Levi (Ex 6¹⁶, Nu 3¹⁷, 1 Ch 6¹⁻¹⁶ 23⁸), and accompanied Jacob into Egypt (Gn 46¹¹). He had two sons, Mahli and Mushi (Ex 6¹⁹, Nu 3²⁰, 1 Ch 6¹⁹ 29). Nothing further is related of Merari personally, but of the fortunes of his descendants we have fuller particulars. Their history falls into three periods—(1) the wilderness wanderings, and the settlement in Canaan; (2) the monarchy; (3) after the Exile.

(1) At the time of the census taken by Moses in the wilderness of Sinai the Merarites were divided into two families, the Mahlites and the Mushites (Nu 3²⁸). The whole number of males from a month old was 6200 (3²⁴), and between 30 and 50 years of age 3200 (4⁴²⁻⁴⁵). Their position in the camp was on the side of the tabernacle northward, and their chief at this time was Zuriel the son of Abihail (3³⁵). The office assigned to them was the carrying of the less important parts of the tabernacle—boards, pins, cords, etc. (3^{36, 37} 4^{31, 32} 10¹⁷). In this they were to be superintended by Ithamar the son of Aaron (4²⁵), and four waggons and eight oxen were given to them for transit purposes (7⁸). The two families of Merarites are mentioned in the account of the second census taken by Moses and Eleazar in the plains of Moab by the Jordan, when the whole number of the Levites was 23,000 (26^{37, 28)}. After the settlement in Pal., 12 cities out of the territories of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun were assigned to them (Jos 21^{7, 34-40} [P] = 1 Ch 6^{68, 77-81}).

(2) In the reign of David, as narrated by the Chronicler, we have several references to the Merarites. The Merarite family of Jeduthun (= Ethan, 1 Ch 6⁸⁴ 15¹⁷), together with the Kohathite family of Heman and the Gershonite family of Asaph, were, according to this writer, specially set apart to administer the temple music (cf. 1 Ch 6³¹⁻⁴⁷ 16^{41.42} 25¹⁻⁷; and see ETHAN, JEDUTHUN). Consequently at the bringing up of the ark from the house of Obed-edom into Jerus. we find that, of the 220 Merarites who are said to have been present under the leadership of Asaiah (1 Ch 15⁶), Ethan and certain others took part in the music (15^{17, 19}). Descendants of the two families of Mahli and Mushi are mentioned as 'heads of the fathers' houses' when David divided the Levites into courses, 1 Ch 23^{26, 20}, and in 1 Ch 26¹⁰⁻¹⁹ certain Merarites are specified as doorkeepers (cf. 9¹⁴⁻²³ 23⁵). Further, in the reign of Hezekiah, Merarites are mentioned as taking part in the cleansing of the temple (2 Ch 29^{12, 14}).

(3) For the period after the Exile we have a few scattered notices of members of the family of Merarites. 1 Ch 9=Neh 11 seems to contain a list of those who were known to be dwelling in Judæa during the period immediately after the return from captivity. In these lists occur the names of 'Shemaiah... of the sons of Merari' (1 Ch 9¹⁴=Neh 11¹⁵), and 'Obadiah or Abda... son of Jeduthun' (1 Ch 9¹⁶=Neh 11¹⁷). Lastly, when Ezra went up to Jerus. in B.C. 454 it is expressly stated that certain Merarites accompanied him (Ezr 8^{18.19}).

The Merarites (מְיִרְיִי) occur Nu 26³⁷, elsewhere called 'the sons of Merari,' Ex 6¹⁹, Nu 3²⁰ 4²³ 33. 42. 45 78 10¹⁷, 1 Ch 6¹⁹ 29. 44. 63. 77 914 156. 17 23²¹ 24²⁷ 26¹⁸, 2 Ch 29¹², Ezr 8¹⁹; or 'the children of Merari,' Jos 21⁷ 34. 6. For their history see above.

2. The father of Judith (Jth 81 167).

W. C. ALLEN.

MERATHAIM (COTT) is given as a proper name by both AV and RV in Jer 50²¹ 'Go up against the land of Merathaim' (AVm 'or of the rebels, RVm 'i.e. double rebellion'). The term is an enigmatical one, possibly suggested (Del. Parad. 182) by Bab. Marrâtim, the land by the nar Marrâtu, or 'bitter river' (Persian Gulf) = S. Babylonia, and adapted so as to recall to a Heb. ear either 'double rebellion' (2007) or 'double bitterness' (2009). The LXX (B) πικρῶς ἐπίβηθι ἐπ' αὐτήν (27²¹) connects ουρς with the root meaning 'bitter.'

Merchantman is in AV simply 'merchant,' Gn 37²⁸, 1 K 10¹⁸, Mt 13⁴⁸. Latimer, Sermons, p. 500, says, 'The craftsman or merchantman teacheth his prentice to lie, and to utter his wares with lying and forswearing.'

MERCURY.—The tra of Έρμης, Ac 1412, for which the rendering 'Hermes' of RVm is preferable. The Romans in many cases transferred the attributes and functions of the Greek deities to their own. Thus Mercury (from merx = merchandise), the god of commerce and profit, was identified with the Greek Hermes, the patron of good luck. One of the many functions of the latter was that of messenger and spokesman of the gods. Hence the word έρμηνεός = an interpreter ('interpres Divom,' Verg. Æn. iv. 356). He was also regarded as the inventor of speech and the god of eloquence. When Paul and Barnabas had healed the cripple at Lystra, the inhabitants in their gratitude wished to sacrifice to them as gods, and they called the former Hermes because he took the lead in speak-C. H. PRICHARD.

MERCY, MERCIFUL.—These words have somewhat changed in meaning since 1611. As the next article will show, they do not in AV express pardon, they denote compassion. Thus He 2¹⁷ Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things per-taining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people' (ελεήμων = pitiful, Vulg. misericors); Mt 57 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy' (οἱ ελεήμωνες ελεηθήσονται, Vulg. . . . misericordiam consequentur); misericordes Lk 1037 'which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbour unto him that felle among the thieves? And he said, He that shewed mercy on him' ('O ποιήσας τὸ έλεος μετ' αὐτοῦ); Sir 29¹ 'He that is merciful will lend unto his neighbour' (ὁ ποιῶν έλεος). Cf. Shaks. Othello, v. ii. 86-

'Not dead? not yet quite dead? I that am cruel am yet merciful; I would not have thee linger in thy pain.'

Merch. of Venice, IV. i. 6-

'Uncapable of pity, void and empty, From any dram of mercy.'

Pity is the oldest meaning of the word, which, it is now generally allowed, comes from Lat. mercedem, 'pay,' 'reward.' In Low Latin mercedem meant 'pity'; in French it expressed the 'thanks' of one who receives reward or consideration; taken into English, it seems to have been associated with 'amerce' and to have denoted the pay or penalty due for transgression, as' to be in grievous mercie of the king' (Statute of Henry VI.), i.e. 'to be in hazard of a great penaltie,' as Minshew explains. Then to 'cry mercy' is to beg off a penalty, and, that being granted, the sense of pardon and of the grace that pardons successively developed. Thus 'pity,' found in the word as it came from Low Latin, was obscured through the association with 'amerce,' and restored by the natural use of the word.

In Ps 117² 119⁷⁶ up is translated 'merciful kindness.' The translation comes from Coverdale. RV gives 'mercy' in the first passage, 'loving-kindness' in the second; Amer. RV prefers 'lovingkindness' in both.

'Tender mercies' is a frequent tr., esp. in the Psalter, of cran 'bowels' (as the seat of compassion), 'pity.' This tr. is from the Gen. Bible, and sion), 'pity.' This tr. is from the Gen. Bible, and is retained in RV. In Ph 1821 RV turns 'bowels' of AV into 'tender mercies' (Gr. σπλάγχνα, which is the LXX tr. of στητ in Pr 1210). See BOWELS.

The form mercifulness occurs in Sir 40¹⁷ 'Mercifulness endureth for ever' (ελεημοσύνη, RV 'almsgiving'). Cf. Matt. Bible, Notes to Dt 22 'This law wyll no more but that in dealyng mercifullye with beastes we shoulde lerne mercifulnesse unto our neighboures.' oure neighboures.' J. HASTINGS.

MERCY .-- I. OLD TESTAMENT .-- ' Mercy ' is used in AV to translate the following:—1. op hesedh, LXX usually ελεσι (see below on NT), Vulg. usually misericordia; the translation 'mercy' is sometimes retained by RV, sometimes replaced by 'loving-kindness'; also AV 'merciful-kindness' (Ps 1172), and often 'loving-kindness.' The Hithpael of the cognate verb is rendered by LXX δσιωθήση, Vulg. sanctus eris, EV 'show thyself merciful'; the adj. ren höstich by LXX usually sanct Vulg. sanctus eris. sanctus eris, EV 'show thyself merciful'; the adj. ron hāsidh, by LXX usually boios, Vulg. sanctus, EV 'saint,' 'holy (one),' 'godly,' and RV of Ps 14517 'gracious.' There are no English words to which hesedh and hāsidh are exactly equivalent. Oxf. Heb. Lex. renders hesedh by 'goodness,' 'kindness'; and hāsidh, 'as denoting active practice of ron,' by 'kind,' 'pious.' G. A. Smith renders ron by 'leal love,' and explains that it 'means always not merely an affection, "loving-kindness"... but a relation loyally observed '(Book of the Twelve Prophets, i. 243 n.). That hesedh includes these two qualities of kindly affection and of loyalty is shown by the fact that it is coupled with and used as a parallel to rahamim (see below), Ps 779 1034, on the one hand, and to 'emeth, 'fidelity,' Ps 2510 263, and berith, 'covenant,' Dt 79, on the other. Hesedh is used of man towards man, e.g. between David and Jonathan and his house, 1 S 20141; of Israel towards Jehovah, Hos 64.6; but chiefly of Jehovah towards His people. Hāṣidh is almost always—only two exceptions, Jer 3¹², Ps 145¹⁷, of God—used of men, probably as exercising heṣedh (so Oxf. Heb. Lex.). Its application to God is in favour of this view rather than that of 'object of God's hesedh.' Hastdh became specialized in Today a seems. August became specialized in the sense of pious towards God, hence the versions.

2. στορ rahamin, lit. 'bowels,' so fig. 'tender affection,' 'compassion'; LXX έλεος, οἰκτιρμοί, etc.; Yulg. misericordia(α), miseratio, etc.; also translated in EV 'compassion.' The adj. compassion.' rahum is rendered: LXX οἰκτίρμων, etc.; Yulg. misericors, etc.; EV 'merciful,' 'full of compassion.' Corresponding translations are given of the Piel of the verb and. These are used of man towards man, and of God towards man.

3. The verb pn hnn, 'to show favour,' 'do kindness,' of man towards man, and of God towards ness,' of man towards man, and of God towards man, and the adj. 193 hannan, only of God towards man, are rendered by EV 'be merciful or gracious,' show mercy,' 'have pity,' 'merciful'; by LXX 'shew mercy,' 'have pity,' 'merciful'; by LXX 'hetw, olkriepw, etc.; clemens, misericors, etc.

4. In Gn 19¹⁶ 'the Lord being merciful unto him' is EV tra of τ'γμ man τλτημ. '>τη here rendered 'be merciful' is 'spare,' 'have compassion' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.); LXX usually ελεέω, φείδομαι; Vulg. misereor, parco; elsewhere in EV 'have pity.' It is often patallel to τη 'pity,' 'look upon with compassion,' e.g. Ezk 7^{4.9}.

5. In Dt 21⁸ 32⁴³ 'be merciful' is the translation of ττη, here = 'clear,' 'treat as forgiven, and of τις, here = 'clear,' 'treat as forgiven, and therefore as enjoying full favour.' In these two passages LXX has ίλεως γενοῦ (cf. below), ἐκκαθαμεῖ, 'purge'; Vulg. propitius esto, erit; RV 'forgive,' 'make expiation.'

II. NEW TESTAMENT.—'Mercy, merciful, to be merciful, to show mercy,' etc., are used in EV to translate the following:—1. έλεος, έλεημων, έλεέω, 'to be pitiful, compassionate.' These terms are used both of God and man, and are not applied with any special frequency to God; so that in NT ξλεος is a divine attribute, but no special emphasis is laid upon it. Its most common use with reference to God is in the salutation χάρις, ξλεος, εἰρήνη in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 1², 2 Ti 1², Tit 1²) in the Pastoral Epistles (1111', 2111', 11t1') and in 2 Jn'3; cf. Jude ².

2. οἰκτιρμος, οἰκτίρμως, 'compassion, -ate,' not common, but chiefly applied to God, Ro 12', 2 Co 1's, Lk 6's, Ja 5'1.

3. τλεως, 'forgiving,' He 8'12; ιλάσκομαι, 'be propitiated, forgive'; ἀνίλεως, 'not forgiving' (AV 'without mercy'), Ja 2'13.

Thus the chief OT terms which AV, and in a measure RV traplete most unsuitably by 'mercy' measure RV, translate most unsuitably by 'mercy, ascribe to God the following attributes: (a) tender compassion, rahamim, etc., for man's misery and helplessness; (b) a disposition to deal kindly and generously with man, hanan, etc.; (c) the divine affection and fidelity to man, on which man may confidently rely, as he would on the loyalty of his tribe or family, hesedh. Though these terms may include the ordinary sense of 'mercy,' the 'sparing of a wrongdoer,' and the context sometimes shows that they do include this meaning, the terms themselves do not suggest it. Hence the use of the word 'mercy' to translate them, represents God in the OT as occupied with the position of man as a criminal, a rebel, and an enemy, to an extent entirely unwarranted by the original. Cf. Driver, Sermons on OT, 220 ff., also Par. Psalt. 443 f., 447, and see preceding article.

The NT use of the corresponding terms is neither frequent nor characteristic, and is only a faint reflexion of OT teaching. The great ideas represented in OT by rahāmim, hannn, hesedh, and their cognates, are mostly expressed in NT by other terms than $\ell \lambda \cos i k \pi \iota \rho \mu o i$, etc. One might almost say that hesedh covers the whole ground of $\chi d \rho \iota s$, $\ell \lambda \cos i \ell \rho i \rho \eta$ (but see Hort on 1 P 12), and implies the NT doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood.

The sphiect of 'merry' in its usual sense of

The subject of 'mercy,' in its usual sense of 'That benevolence, mildness, or tenderness of heart which disposes a person to overlook injuries or to treat an offender better than he deserves,' is treated under ATONEMENT and FORGIVENESS. The qualities dealt with here are those which moved to provide an atonement, but they describe God's attitude to man, as man, and do not, except OT, 5, of themselves call attention to man's sin.

MERES (בְּכָכ Mares, LXX om.).—One of the seven princes and counsellors of Ahasuerus (Est 114); cf. ADMATHA. With this name and with Marsena, Benfey (see Ges. Thes.) compares Sansk. marsha, Zend. meresh='writing.'

MERIBAH (סריקה 'strife').—The word occurs by itself Ex 177, Ps 95°, and in both places Massah (which see) is also mentioned. Massah is rendered (which see) is also mentioned. Massah is rendered by LXX Πειρασμός, Vulg. Tentatio, in both; Meribah of Ex 17° by LXX Λοιδίρησις, but omitted in Vulg.; Meribah of Ps 95° by LXX παραπικρασμῷ, Vulg. irritatione, RV 'as at Meribah as in the day of Massah,' AV 'in the provocation as in the day of temptation' [these are the only two places where Massah and Meribah occur. Massah occurs with 'waters of Meribah' Dt 33°, and by itself twice Dt 61° 92°]. The expression 'waters of Meribah' is more common, occurring Nu 2013. 20, Dt 33°, Ps 81° [Heb. 8] 1063°. Meribah is in LXX deriλογίας in all these places except Nu 2024, which has λοιδορίας: all these places except Nu 20²⁴, which has loopias; Vulg. has Contradictionis in all; RV has in these passages uniformly 'waters of Meribah,' while AV has 'waters of strife' in Ps 106³².

A fuller expression is פי פריבת קרש in Nu 2714, Dt 32° LXX and Vulg. render as in Nu 20° RV has 'waters of Meribah of Kadesh,' while AV has 'Meribah in Kadesh' in Nu and 'Meribah-kadesh' in Dt. Besides these passages in which reference is made by name to the waters which flowed from the rock when smitten by Moses, many others mention the providing water from the stony rock without detail of name or place, e.g. Dt 8¹⁵, Ps

According to Nu 202-13 the children of Israel, finding no water at Kadesh, in the desert of Zin, nnding no water at Kadesh, in the desert of Zin, strove with Moses (both in v.³ and v.³ RV has 'strove,' while AV by putting 'chode' in v.³ obscures the double reference to strife which exists in the original). The Lord commands Moses, 'Take the rod. . . and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes, that it give forth its water'; but Moses struck the rock with his rod, and water came forth shundardly. Then follows the centre of the forth abundantly. Then follows the sentence of prohibition: 'ye shall not bring this assembly into the land which I have given them.' The carrying out of this sentence in the case of Aaron is related in Nu 20²³⁻²⁹, in the case of Moses in Nu 27¹²⁻¹⁴, Dt 32¹⁹⁻⁵² (see above for the words employed in these passages).

Another account is also given (Ex 171-7) of water flowing from the rock when smitten by Moses. The language is very similar to that of Nu 20, and in points of detail there is a marked resemblance between the two narratives. In this account stress is laid (v.2) on 'tempting' (i.e., in the old sense of the word, proving) as well as 'striving,' and in v.7 two names are given to the place, MASSAH ('temptation,' i.e. proving) because the children of Israel 'tempted' the Lord, and Meribah ('chiding orstrife') because of the 'striving' of the children of Israel (in both verses AV has 'chide' for 'strive' as in Nu 203). Other passages referring to these events are given at the beginning of this article, from which it appears that Massah by itself is mentioned twice, Massah with Meribah twice, and in Dt 33⁸ mention is made of Massah and the waters of Meribah in connexion with Levi, and the verse apparently refers to an incident not recorded in Ex 17 or Nu 20.

A comparison of these two narratives (those in Ex 17 and Nu 20) suggests many difficult questions. Kuenen was not prepared with an answer, and abstained from expressing a decisive opinion (Hexateuch, § 6 n. 42, p. 101, Wicksteed's translation). Cornill (in ZATW, 1891, p. 20 ff.) discusses these narratives at length, and submits them to a searching analysis, arriving at results which are in the main adopted by Bacon (Triple Tradition) in his notes on these passages.

There appear to be two alternatives: (a) the narratives in question are different versions of the same occurrence which has been assigned to different periods in the journeyings of the children of Israel; or (b) an account of occurrences at a place to which the name of Massah was given (mainly preserved in Ex 171-7 and there called Rephidim), and another account of occurrences at Meribah (preserved but with considerable modifi-cations in Nu 201-13, and these connected with Kadesh) existed at one time as independent narratives; but details have been transferred from the one account to the other in the process of compilation, perhaps the addition of Meribah and the idea of strife to the narrative of Ex 17.

From Nu 20 it is difficult to understand clearly wherein the sin of Moses and Aaron is supposed to have consisted. According to 2024 2714 it is described as rebelling against the word of the LORD. The waters of Meribah receive their name because the children of Israel strove with the LORD, and on this occasion the words assigned to Moses are 'Hear now, ye rebels.' May Moses and Aaron on this occasion have shown themselves unworthy of their position as leaders, and in some way joined in the strife? Then a reason for their heavy punishment would be apparent, while reverence for the great leader may suggest a further reason why the narrative appears in its present form.

In art. Exodus, Route of ($ iv.), some reasons have been given for ascribing to the events re-corded in Nu 201-21 an earlier date than that usually given to them. They may be noted here, as (whatever weight they may have) they reduce the interval between Massah and Meribah.

A note on Dt 33° should find a place here. According to RV, 'He shined forth from Paran, and came from the ten thousands of holy once (m. holiness).' AV has 'with' for 'from,' which is not defensible. The rendering in italics arouses suspicion. After mention of Seir, Paran, we might expect the name of some place; and as the words which follow ('At his right hand was a flery law') are certainly corrupt, it is probable that emendation is needed here also. A slight modification of the text would give 'and came to Meribath-kadesh,' an emendation which has found much favour. found much favour.

The manner in which the words 'strife' and 'temptation' and the corresponding verbs are used in the passages already quoted, invites comment. In Ex 17², Nu 20³ the people strove with Moses, but in Nu 20¹³ they strove with the LORD, in Ex 17^{2,7} they 'tempt' the LORD. But in Dt 33⁸ another view of the relation between God and His people is represented: 'whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.' The word prove is the same word as that rendered tempt, and occurs in Gn 22¹ ('God did tempt [RV prove] Abraham'). The same thought is found in Ex 15²⁵ ('there he made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them'). Whether in the first part of this passage there is any connexion between mishpat and Meribah-Kadesh may be questioned (but note that a cause in judgment is 2⁻¹, and Kadesh is the idea underlying Massah is clear.

This double view of the wilderness history is found also in the Psalms. Ps 81' has 'I tried thee at the waters of Meribah,' Ps 95' has 'when your fathers proved me, tried nie'... In these two places the Heb. for try is pn. The above may serve to illustrate the fulness of the religious teaching which may be derived from the Pentateuchal narrative.

Meriboth-kadesh.—'The waters of Meriboth-kadesh' are given in Ezk 4719, and 'the waters of Meribath-kadesh' in 4828, as a southern limit to the land. The difference between the singular and plural in the two passages seems strange, and the LXX renderings Μαρμώθ Καδήμ (4719), Βαρμώθ Καδής (4829), which suggest the plural in both verses, are to be preferred. Note the interchange of β and μ. In 4829 Ql' have Μαρμώθ. AV has 'the waters of strife in Kadesh' in both places.

Here is a clear reference to the events recorded in the Pentateuch, but it is doubtful whether the inference may be drawn that a place bearing the name of Meriboth-kadesh was known to the prophet or his contemporaries. A. T. CHAPMAN.

MERODACH (17)?).—A Bab.-Assyr. deity mentioned as a separate name but once in OT (Jer 50 [Gr. 27]?), B Μαιωδάχ, & AQ Μεωδάχ. The Bab. pronunciation of the name was Mar-u-duk. Its signification is still uncertain, though its Bab. origin is strongly maintained (cf. Delitzsch, Paradies, 228; Jensen, Kosmologie der Babylonier, 242 ff.). On the side of astronomy M. is identified with Jupiter, of the Romans. In the earlier Bab. history he occupies a seat on the same platform with Anu, Bel, Ea, Nergal, etc. But in later times he occupied a position of pre-eminence, particularly as the patron deity of the city of Babylon. In Jeremiah's reference he seems to be one of the two chief gods of Babylon. In his inscriptions, Nebuchadrezzar speaks of Merodach (Mar-duk) as 'the great lord,' the exalted governor,' 'king of the heavens and the earth,' 'the supreme god'; Assurbanipal speaks of him as 'king of gods'; Nabonidus (Cyl.) calls him 'Lord of the gods'; and (Stele) speaks of the king of Assyria as having wrought the ruin of the land by M.'s wrath. The many hints in later Bab. literature of his importance show that he was held to be the supreme god, the source of power, and of all the blessing's which showered upon mankind. At the fall of Babylon, Merodach receives the profoundest reverence from Cyrus, the victor. For his relation to Nebo see the art. NEBO. Under the name Bêl he was worshipped among the Mandeans. His name forms an important element in many late proper names of Babylonia, e.g. Merodach-baladan and Evil-Merodach, as well as in some of an earlier date, e.g. Marduk-adin-ahi of 17th cent. B.C. For his possible connexion with the story of Esther see art. Mordecal.

Baλaδάν), Is 39¹; misspelt (in MT, but not in LXX, BA having Maρωδάχ [Baλαδάν]) Berodach-b. in 2 K 20¹³.— In Assyr. the name is written Marduk-bal-iddina, and means 'Merodach has given a son.' Merodach-baladan was the hereditary prince of the Kaldâ or Chaldæans, who inhabited the marshes at the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates. The inscriptions call him the son of Yagina; but this may signify that Yagina was a more remote ancestor. In 2 K he is made the son of Baladan: this would be the abbreviated form of some name, the first element of which was the name of a deity. In the troublous period which followed the death of Shalmaneser IV. before Samaria, B.C. 722, M. possessed himself of Babylonia, and was crowned king at Babylon (B.C. 721). After a few years, however, Sargon of Assyria found himself sufficiently strong to think of reconquering Babylonia, which had been annexed to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser III. M. accordingly looked for allies, and in B.C. 711 sent an embassy to the West, where the vassal-princes were disposed to throw off their allegiance to the Assyrian king. Judah with the Philistine cities, and Edom and Moab, entered into the alliance, and Egypt promised help. It was on this occasion that Hezekiah boastfully showed the Bab. envoys the material resources which he could bring to the alliance (2 K 20¹³¹¹, Is 39).* Before the allies were ready to move, however, the army of Sargon had descended on Palestine, and severely punished Ashdod, which had been the centre of disaffection Judah, Edom, and Moab thereupon submitted, and the Assyr. king was free to turn to Babylonia. M. vainly sought aid from the Elamites, who were defeated by the Assyrians before they could come to his help, and he accordingly fled from Babylon, which was entered by Sargon, B.C. 709. After being proclaimed king there, Sargon pursued M. to Bit-Yakin, the captured along with its prince. M. afterwards recovered his freedom, and in

M. afterwards recovered his freedom, and in B.C. 702, after the death of Sargon, he returned to Babylon, and reigned there a second time for about six months; though the Annalistic Tablet seems to imply that this M. was not identical with the Kalda prince (as it calls him 'an Assyrian soldier'). At any rate, the usurper was overthrown by Sennacherib at Kish, and Bel-ibni was made king of Babylon by the Assyrians. For some time M. defended himself in the marshes; but after a time, growing weary of the struggle, he embarked for the eastern shore of the Persian Gulf, with his followers and gods, and settled in the Elamite city of Nagitu. To this retreat, in B.C. 695, he was pursued by Sennacherib, who stormed the Chaldwan colony. M. himself seems to have been already dead, but at a subsequent date we hear of his son Nebo-sum-iskun assisting the Elamites in a war against the Assyrians.

* So Driver, Isaiah?, 14, 45, 49; Skinner, Isaiah, vol. i. p. 283; Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. (1888). p. 349; et al. On the other hand, Schrader, KAT2 p. 344 [COT ii. 28], prefers to date the visit of Merodach-baladan's envoys c. 704 s.c.; so also W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. p. 318—at a time, however, when he was not king of Babylonia.

little lake of el-Huleh.' The height of the waters here relatively to those of the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea possibly accounts for the name observed used by the ancient historian (Jos 11³⁻⁷). Several of the places mentioned in the chapter have been identified with tolerable certainty, e.g. Hazor and Achshaph; while Mizpah, from the position assigned to it, must have lain immediately to the north of el-Huleh. The open land in the neighbourhood of 'Ain el-Mellaha would therefore afford an excellent rallying-ground for the hosts assembling for one supreme effort to stay the progress of the victorious invaders.

No absolute proof of this identification can be offered, and certain objections have been raised. onered, and certain objections have been raised, none of which, however, is insuperable. (1) The word me [constr. of mayim, 'waters'] is nowhere else applied to such a large body of standing water; in such cases the term yām ('sea') is commonly employed. Too much may easily be made of this objection, which, being only of a negative character, must give way to more positive considerations. (2) Josephus places the camp of considerations. (2) Josephus places the camp of the kings at Beroth in Upper Galilee, and makes no mention of waters. Here, therefore, we are told the scene of the battle must be sought, and not in the Jordan lowlands (Socin's note in schumacher's Jaulan, 102). Josephus says (Ant. v. i. 18) that Beroth was 'not far from Kadesh': this fixes the locality, Kadesh lying on the heights west of the valley. But the battle was not necessarily fought at the spot where the camp stood. Long afterwards, in this same district, Demetrius its description of the latter than the same district. pitched his camp at Kadesh, and fought Jonathan in the plain below (Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7). Why should not the kings have followed a similar course? (3) By giving battle in this plain the kings would have exposed themselves to grave peril in the event of defeat, since it is so hemmed in by hills and marshes as to make escape expected the state of the tremely difficult; immense natural barriers lying especially between it and great Zidon, towards which a great part of the routed army fled (Jos 11°). In reply to this, it may be pointed out that for the evolutions of the chariots on which the Canaanites so much relied, there was no ground anywhere near so suitable as the comparatively easy downs south of 'Ain el-Mellaha.

To secure this advantage, they were doubtless willing to take some risk. It should also be remembered that the Canaanites were at home amid the intricacies of mountain and marsh, of which their pursuers were largely ignorant. In their flight to great Zidon, the fugitives would probably follow the course of the ordinary route from Banias to the sea, and familiarity with these wild uplands would greatly facilitate their efforts to escape.

Baheiret el-Huleh is a pear-shaped basin, pointing southward, and having a distinct bulge to the north-west. It lies 7 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean, and is from 10 ft. to 16 ft. in depth. Its greatest breadth is about 3 miles, and its length from the edge of the marshes to the exit of the Jordan is 3½ to 4 miles. Measurements vary somewhat with the amount of rainfall and the condition of the muddy banks. The N. limit is especially ill defined, as the waters of the upper Jordan, forcing their way in different channels through the swamp, are constantly changing the line. Owing to the formation at the southern end, the lake might be drained or enlarged with almost equal ease. Probably it was once much larger than it is now (HGHL p. 481, note). To the means taken for this extension, possibly Mukaddasi (A.D. 985) refers in the following sentence: 'In order to form the lake they have built a wonderful embankment of masonry along the river, confining its waters to its bed' (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 68). The floor of the valley northward is one vast morase, varying in breadth from 2 to 3 miles. From the chief source of the Jordan at Tell el-Kadi to the lake, a distance of 11 miles, there is a fall of 498 ft. Towards the lower end the marshes are covered with papyrus-reeds (Arab. babir), and through them in dark sluggish lanes the waters from the north make their way into the lake. The whole place is literally alive with wild fowl, ranging in size from the pelican to the tiny but gay-plumaged kinglisher; and the water is plentifully stocked with fish (see JORDAN). All the waters from the S.W. of Hermon, and as far north as Hasbeiyeh, from Merj Ayún, and from the western slopes south of the Litany, are carried down into el-Hulch. A few miles above the lake on the west side of the valley there is a copious spring, 'Ain el-Balāta. Almost due west is the much larger 'Ain el-Mellāha, which turns a mill and sends a broad stream across the plain. Possibly misled by this name, Burckhardt gave currency to the statement that the S.W. shore of the lake was covered by a saline (Arab. mallāhah) crust (Travels, 316). There is no trace of salt here or elsewhere in the valley.

The uplands of Naphtali drop almost precipitously on the west edge of the plain. On the east the mountains descend from a greater height, but much more gradually, approaching almost to the water's edge. From the lake northward the land is called Ard el-Huleh; southward it is known as

The Waters of Merom appear no more in history under that name; but of the lake and the district under different appellations we have frequent notices. It figures as the lake of Semechonitis in Jos. Ant. v. v. 1 (cf. Jg 4²). Here, in the 'plain of Hazor,' or 'Asor,' Jonathan defeated Denietrius (Ant. XIII. v. 7; 1 Mac 11²). When Zenodorus died, Cæsar bestowed his country, lying between Trachon and Galilee, upon Herod. It contained Ulatha and Paneas, and the country round about (Ant. Xv. x. 3; BJ I. xx. 4). Oùàába here is evidently equivalent to Hulch, and to and ance of the Talmud (Neubauer, Geog. du Talmud, 24, 27 ff.; HGHL 481', note), and it is applied in accordance with subsequent usage to the district as well as the lake. Josephus gives a brief description of the place in BJ III. x. 7, Iv. i. 1. Seleucia, which mentions, is Selúktych, about 9 miles S.E. of the lake, while Daphne corresponds with Difneh, near Tell el-Kūdi. The Arab geographers speak of the lake now as Bahairah Kadas and anon as Bahairah Bâniyas, from its proximity to each of these strongholds; but the name el-Hulch constantly asserts itself as applying to both lake and district (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 52, 68, 32, etc.). To the district also Bohâ ed-Dîn refers (Life of Saladán, PEF tr., p. 155).

The highway from the south and from the west by way of Safed keeps close to the hills on the western edge of the plain, to escape the marshes. It crosses the vale in the north past Tell el-Kadi to Banias, and thence to Damascus.

The land is occupied to-day by the Ghavarineh Arabs, 'the dwellers in the Ghor.' The herds of buffaloes that find congenial haunts in the marshes are their chief care. They also till the soil, which still justifies its ancient reputation for fertility (Mukaddasi, A.D. 985; Yakût, A.D. 1225). Their other occupations are hunting and fishing, and making mats, etc., of the reeds from the marshes. Of these also many of their fragile houses are built. The women, however, do the most of this work.

MERONOTHITE.—1. Jehdeiah 'the Meronothite' (מַלְימִי) was over the asses of king David, l Ch 2750 (Β ὁ ἐκ Μεραθών, A —Μαραθών). 2. Jadon 'the Meronothite' assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem, Neh 37. No place of the name of Meronoth is mentioned in OT, but from the context of Neh 37 it would appear to have been in the neighbourhood of Gibeon and Mizpah.

MEROZ (της; B Μηρώς, A Μαζώρ, Luc. Μαρώρ; Vulg. Meroz) is nowhere mentioned in Scripture except in the Song of Deborah ($Jg5^{23}$), whose curse, like that of the Saviour on Chorazin, has alone preserved it from oblivion. The bitterness of the curse against Meroz can be accounted for only by some special aggravation of its offence. Of Reuben, Dan, and Asher, who also played an ignoble part, the language of the song, although satirical, is restrained. But with what impetuous fury it bursts forth—

'Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord, Curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; Because they came not to the help of the Lord, To the help of the Lord against the mighty.'

This may have been because of their nearness to the field of battle, while the others were far away. If the surrounding country were in a fever of excitement because of the presence of the hostile forces, and the grave issues depending on the coming conflict, the appeal to their patriotism was strengthened unspeakably. If, within sound of the strife when their heroic kinsmen of Zebulun and Naphtali closed in deadly struggle with the oppressor, the men of Meroz skulked, sullen and craven, behind their walls, we can understand why the hot heart of the prophetess overflowed upon them in a flood of corrosive rhetoric.

There is but one site in the neighbourhood with any reminiscence of the ancient name to which these conditions could apply. This is el-Murussus, about 5 miles N.W. of Beisan, and 9 miles E. of Jezreel, on the northern slopes of the vale which runs down from Esdraelon to the Jordan, between Little Hermon and Gilboa. Built entirely of mud, the modern village stands on rising ground, in the midst of plough land. For water it is dependent on the stream below, in Wady Yebla.

Another suggestion (Moore, Judges, pp. 135, 163) is that Meroz was a hamlet in the line of Sisera's flight, 'whose Israelitish inhabitants suffered him to escape,' thus proving traitors to their country's cause, and earning the fierce reproaches of Deborah. Sisera fled 'to the tent of Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite' (Jg 4¹⁷), who had pitched his tent by the terebinth of Betsa'anim by Kedesh. Identifying Kedesh with the ruined Kadish W. of the Sea of Galilee, and Betsa'anim with Khirbet Bessúm (Conder, Tent-Work in Pal. 69; Smith, HGHL' 396), the direct road from the battlefield would have been round the base of Tabor, and across the head of Wādy esh-Sherrár. But as this way was probably barred by the Israelites, whose army descended from Tabor, Sisera would most likely rush down the valley of Jezred, skirting the southern terraces of Little Hermon. In his endeavours to elude pursuit he may easily have approached el-Murussus before turning northward. This site, therefore, meets the requirements of either case; and Moore is not justified in saying that all proposed identifications 'may safely be dismissed' (Judges, p. 162).

MERRAN (Μερράν, Syr. nno, Vet. Lat. b. Myrrhæ).—Found only in Bar 3²³ 'the merchants of Merran and Teman.' Grotius identified it with morrah, a town of Sidonia, Jos 13⁴; Hävernick, with Moarrah, a Syrian city; Fritzsche, with the sterile Arabian desert Mahrah; and Keil, with Marane, a city placed by Pliny near the Red Sea, in the country of the Sakeans. It is decidedly preferable with Kneucker and Ball to suppose that there has been a misreading of ¬for¬in the Semitic original from which our Greek text was taken, and that we should read 'the merchants of Medan (or Midian) and Teman.' The doubled ρ is no obstacle to this, since we have Σαρρά for ¬ip. In favour of it we may cite Gn 37²⁸, where Midianites are called 'merchants,' and Hab 3³⁻⁷, where Teman and Midian are named in connexion.

MESALOTH (Μεσσαλώθ, Μαισαλώθ), 1 Mac 9².— Probably representing nipep 'steps' or 'ascents' (?), referring to the plateau near Arbela, W. of the Sea of Galilee. C. R. CONDER.

MESHA.—1. (κτ) Son of Shaharaim, a Benjaminite, whom his wife Hodesh bare in the land of Moab (1 Ch 8°). LXX reads, A Mωσά, B Mωσά; Vulg. Mosa. The two latter readings seem to have been based on an original κτ. 2. (μτ) Firstborn of Caleb (1 Ch 2¹²). He became the father of Ziph, possibly the founder of the Ziphites. LXX reads Μαρισά, and the Vulg. Mesa; Kittel (in Haupt's 07) follows the LXX, reading πτης, which he thinks is to be expected from the context.

3. Mesha (מֵישָׁע, Μωσά), a king of Moab, who was a sheep-master, and was tributary to Ahab, king of Israel. Upon the death of the latter and the accession of his son Ahaziah, Mesha rebelled and refused to pay his annual tax of 'an hundred thousand lambs and an hundred thousand rams with the wool' (2 K 3^{4.5}). The people of Mesha had fallen before the arms of David (2 S 8²), and in all probability remained subjects of Solomon till the division of the kingdom. The infection of rebellion at that period probably seized the Moabites, and they, in common with other extra-Israelitish subjects of the united kingdom, struck for independence and secured it. The tenor of the record on the Moabite Stone (wh. see) favours this supposition. It also informs us that the subjection of Moab, which Mesha threw off, was due to the prowess and power of Omri, the founder of the 4th Dynasty of Israel. After forty years of yoke-bearing, Mesha's god, Chemosh, delivered him from Israel, in the middle of the reign of Omri's son. This appears to imply that the secession (2 K 11) occurred, not at the death of Ahab, but in the middle of his reign (see 'Moabite Stone' in art. MOAB). At any rate this rebellion cut off valuable revenues from Israel's exchequer, and Jehoram, Ahab's son, who came to the throne after the two years' reign of his brother Ahaziah (1 K 22⁵¹, 2 K 1¹⁷), aspired to re-conquer the rebels. With Jehoshaphat of Judah and his army, and the Edomites of Mt. Seir, Jehoram and Israel marched against the seceders. Upon the counsel of the prophet Elisha, the encamped armies dug trenches to catch the water necessary to slake thirst. Led on by an illusion (2 K 3.2-24), the Moabite army recklessly rushed into the enemies' camp, only to be routed, cut to pieces, trodden down, and dismayed. The few escaped ones entered Kir-hareseth, and the combined armies destroyed the land with stones, stopped cisterns and fountains, felled the forests, and beleaguered the fortress. With 700 warriors and beleaguered the fortress. the king of Moab attempted to break through the ranks of the besiegers. But utterly failing in this he went to the top of the wall, and, in full view of the armies of Judah, Israel, and Edom, he propitiated the wrath of Chemosh by offering up as a burnt-offering his firstborn, the heir-apparent to the throne. Thereupon the three armies withdrew, leaving Mesha master of the situation, though routed, and his land greatly damaged (2 K 3-7).

4. Mesha (wwx) was the name of one of the limit-points of the territory ascribed to the descendants of Joktan in Gn 10. 'And their dwelling was from wip as thou goest toward Sephar, the mountain of the East.' It is plain that it must be sought for in the Arabian peninsula. The earlier views are amply presented by Gesenius (Thesaurus, p. 823), who concludes by finding the location at the E. boundary of Mesene, not far from the mouth of the Tigris river. Pliny, Ptolemy, Arrian, and others mention a seaport Moora or Moora, a others mention a seaport Moissa or Moissa, a celebrated place in classic times, which is now in ruins. Pullen, in his surveys in the Admiralty chart of the Red Sea, cites, at 13° 40' N. lat., 43' 20' E. long., a mountain called Jebel Mousa. Delitzsch (Paradies, p. 242 f.) identifies Ryp with the Bab. Assyr. term Mas, which is the name attached to the district of the Syrian-Arabian desert touching the Lower Euphretas on the S.W. desert touching the Lower Euphrates on the S.W. (LXX reads, A Massone, E Massone). The territory of the Joktanites is fairly well determined, from the language and monuments of S. Arabia, to be in the S.W. portion of that peninsula, extending from modern Yemen on the W. to Hadramaut on the E. The latest and perhaps the most authoritative statements on the location of this hard-tofind locality are made by that successful explorer of Arabia, Eduard Glaser. In vol. ii. of his recent work (Skizze der Geschichtz und Geographie Arabiens, Berlin, 1890, pp. 336 ff., 420 f., 437) we find his results presented. In W. Central Arabia he found a Maciya near Jehel Samar, which he identifies with the biblical Massa. He even goes further and asserts (p. 420) that the biblical Mash, ψ_{7} (Gn 10²⁰), Mesha ψ_{7} (Gn 10³⁰), and Massa ψ_{7} (Gn 25¹⁴) are found in one and the same territory, the difference in spelling being due merely to the different sources or times from which the names reach us. Sephar he locates only in the S. part of Arabia, hence he looks for Mesha at the other limit (Gn 1630) in the north. The most northern Joktanide group (Ophir, Hawilah, Jobah, Uzal, and Diklah) is bounded by a line drawn obliquely from the northern end of the Persian Gulf across Arabia to Medina. Such a line would touch the territory of Djebel Šamar (p. 437), and in particular the district of Massa. Thus, in a word, Glaser concludes that Jebel Samar and its Westland, already identified with Mas, and inclusive of Massa, also encloses within it the biblical Mesha of Gn 1030. IRA M. PRICE.

MESHACH ($\pi \psi \pi$; LXX and Theod. $M(\epsilon) \omega d \chi$; Vulg. Misach).—The name Mishael, by which one of Daniel's three companions, of the children of Judah, was originally called, was changed by the prince of the cunuchs into Meshach (Dn 1⁷ and ch. 3). Such changes of name were not uncommon: they marked the fact that a new state of life had now begun. In the present instance there is no idea of dishonour or humiliation.

Many conjectures have been put forward with respect to the origin of the word. Fuerst dragged in the Sansk. $m\acute{e}shah=$ a ram, and afterwards the name of the sun-god of the Chaldrans. Ges. was favourably inclined towards the Pers. miz shah= friend of the king. Another suggestion connected it with the Accadian mas, a protecting genius, who stood at the head of the demi-gods, and is described in the old magical books as having his abode on the top of the mountains, and protecting all who seek refuge with him. Frd. Delitzsch's proposal to consider it identical with Mi-sha-Aku is rightly rejected by Schrader (COT ii. 126), who points out that the correct form would have been Mannu-ki-Aku. The fact is that no name such as this has been found in the inscriptions; and when we look at the word itself, it gives us the impression that it was formed partly by imitation of the first part of Mishael, and partly out of the companion name Shadrach.

J. TAYLOR.

MESHECH (App., Sam. Tene, $Mo\sigma^5\chi$). —Son of Japheth, $Gn\ 10^2=1\ Ch\ 1^5$. This nation is regularly mentioned in company with Tubal (Ps 1205 is the only exception), and in the two names the Moschi and Tibareni 'are scarcely to be mistaken' (Lagarde, Ges. Abh. 254). The vocalization of the LXX agrees with that of the Assyrian inscriptions, in which a country called Muski or Mushki is of frequent occurrence. The passages in those in-scriptions which treat of the inhabitants of that country are collected by Frd. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies? p. 250), and these, with the other notices of them to be found in ancient writers, are discussed by Lenormant (Les Origines de l'Histoire, II. ii. pp. 181-249). An individual named Meshak is known only to Moses of Khorene (Venice, 1865, p. 32), according to whom such a person was left by Aram as governor of the region called Armenia I., who built there a city called by his own name, but mispronounced Mazhak by the people of the country. The first mention of the nation is in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100 B.C.; WAI i. pl. 9, 60 ff., translated by Lotz, Die Inschriften Tiglath pilesers, p. 16, and Winckler, KIB i. p. 19), where it is stated that in the first year of that monarch's reign 20,000 Moschians with their five kings, after having occupied the lands of Alzi and Purukuzzu for 50 years, came down and took possession of Kummukhu. The last place has been identified with Commagene; and Alzi with Anzitene, mentioned by Ptolemy (v. 13. 18) as a district between the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates. Tiglath-pileser went out to meet them, traversed a region called Kashuyara, and them, traversed a region called Kashuyara, and defeated them with great slaughter. They are next mentioned in an inscription of king Asshurnasir-abal (WAI i. 18; translated in KIB i. 65) about 220 years later, who professes to have received tribute of the Moschi and Commagenians, consisting of 'howls of brass, sheep, and wine,' in which the first item agrees curiously with the 'vessels of brass' which, according to Ezk 2713, were supplied by 'Tubal and Meshech' to Tyre. Their power had become formidable by the time of Their power had become formidable by the time of Sargon (B.C. 722-705), in whose annals the Moschian king Mita plays an important part (Winckler, Die Keilschriftexte Sargons, pp. xxiv-xxxix); from 715 this king appears as a formidable enemy of Assyria, who makes common cause with Rusa of Urartu, seizes cities in Cilicia, and otherwise supports Sargon's enemies. The fortresses of Usi, Usilu, and Uargin are built in 712 to protect the new province of Kammanu against him (ib. p. 33, l. 192). Not till 709 is Mita forced to make peace with the Assyrian king, owing to an invasion of his territory by one of the latter's lieutenants (ib. p. 128, ll. 151-153). The Moschi do not, however, appear in the lists of tributaries of the figure in the 19th Satrapy of Datius (Herod. iii. 94). In chs. 37 and 38 Ezekiel mentions them among the allies of Gog, king of Magog, but in 3226. If he reckons them among the great departed. It is probable, therefore, that the Israelites knew of their fame only at second-hand, and hence Ezekiel would not be clear as to whether the nation still existed or not. It is not, however, known at whose hands they lost their independ-

Their geographical position probably varied somewhat with the vicissitudes of their fortune, but can be generally fixed by the historical references in the inscriptions, where it is approached through Kummukh, and has for its neighbours Tubal to the south and Kammanu to the west, and where it is reduced by the governor of Kui (Cilicia). In Greco-Roman times the nation that bore their name is represented as much farther north, between the Cyrus and the Phasis (cf. Strabo, xi. 2. §§ 14, 16); Hecatæus placed them next to the Matieni (Steph. Byz. s.v.). Too little is known of their language and customs to make it possible to their language and custom.

MESHELEMIAH (τις ξής and τις τός). — The eponym of a family of Korahite doorkeepers, 1 Ch 9²¹ (Β Μασαλαμί, Α Μοσολλάμ), 26¹ (Β Μοσολαήλ, Α Μοσολλάμ), ³ (Β Μοσολλάμ), ⁹ (Β Μοσομαμείδ, Α Μεσολλεμά) = Shelemiah of 26¹⁴, Shallum of 9^{17, 19, 31}, and Meshuliam of Neh 12²⁵.

MESHEZABEL (לְצִקְיִשְׁיִם). —1. One of those who assisted to repair the wall, Neh 3⁴ (B om.; א Maσεζεβηί, A Μασεζειήλ). 2. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10-1 (Β Μεσωζεβήλ). 3. The father of Pethahiah, who was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people, Neh 11²⁴ (B Βασης ά, κ^{c. a} Βασης αβεήλ). It is quite probable that all three references are to the same individual or family.

MESHILLEMITH (nτρ)ωτρ).—A priest, 1 Ch 9^{12} (Β Μασελμώθ, Α Μοσολλαμώθ), called in Neh 11^{13} Mcshillemoth (wh. see).

MESHULLAM (D) po perh. 'the devoted one,' cognate with Arab. Muslim, cf. Del. and G. A. Smith on nate with Arab. Mustim, cf. Del. and G. A. Smith on Is 42¹⁹, LXX Moσολλάμ, Mοσολλάμ, Moσολλάμ, etc.).—
A common OT pr. name. 1.2.3. Three Benjamites (I Ch 8¹⁷ 9^{7.8}). 4. A Gadite (I Ch 5¹³). 5. The grandfather of Shaphan the scribe (2 K 22³). 6. The father of Hilkiah the priest (I Ch 9¹¹). 7. Another priest of the same family as the preceding (I Ch 9¹²). 8. A Kohathite one of the superintendance. Another priest of the same family as the preceding (1 Ch 9¹²). 8. A Kohathite, one of the superintendents appointed by Josiah to direct the repairs on the temple (2 Ch 34¹²). 9. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3¹⁵). 10. One of the 'chief men' whose services were enlisted by Ezra to procure Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezr 8¹⁶). 11. A Levite who opposed Ezra's proceedings in convexion with the foreign marriages (Exr 10¹⁵). 42 nexion with the foreign marriages (Ezr 10¹⁶). 12. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10²⁶). 13. Son of Berechiah, one of those who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 34. 30). His daughter was married to Tobiah (618). 14. Son of Besodeiah. He helped to repair the old gate (Neh 36). 18. One of the company that stood at Ezra's left hand during the reading of the law (Neh 84). 16. 17. A priest and a chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh 10^{7,20}). 18. One of the princes of Judah who marched in procession at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 12³³). 19. 20. 21. Two heads of priestly houses and a porter in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12^{13, 16, 25}).

MESHULLEMETH (n-1777), Luc. and B Μεσολhimself, of the priest as God's messenger carrying λάμ, A Μασσαλαμείθ, Vulg. Messalemeth, Jer. de interpr. Messalem).—Wife of king Manasseh and keeps ΔV tr. 'angel.'

mother of Amon (2 K 21¹⁹). Her father's name (Haruz) and her birthplace (Jotbah) are both given. Similarly in the case of all the queenmothers who follow, but of none who precede, Meshullemeth. If the formula 'daughter of X from (the locality) Z' is due to a preference of the compiler, it may be an indication of the farthest point of time to which he was independent of his main source, in virtue of oral tradition, etc. But the change of style may have occurred in the main source itself. The name is a feminine form of the frequent masculine Meshullam (cf. LXX B and Luc). It is a passive in MT, but Jerome (Lag. Onom. Sac.² p. 77) gives the active meaning reddens as an alternative to the passive reddita (cf. the spellings of LXX A and Vulg.).

MESOPOTAMIA.—See ARAM.

MESS.—A mess is a viand, a dish, properly a dish of food sent to the table. It comes from Old Fr. mes (of which the mod. form mets is due, says Skeat, to a wish to show the connexion with mettre), which is formed from Lat. missum 'sent.' Cf. More, Richard III. p. 46, 'My Lord you have very good strawberries at your gardayne in Holberne, I require you let us have a messe of them.' Shaks. uses the word often, thus Lear, I. i. 119-

'He that makes his generation messes To gorge his appetite.'

Fuller, Holy State, p. 283, says, 'How often did reverend Whitgift (knowing he had the farre better cheere) send a messe of meat from his own table to the Ministers of Geneva?

The word news mas'eth (from white o' lift up') is translated 'mess' in Gn 4334618, 2 S 118. Mess occurs also in Sir 3018 'Delicates poured upon a mouth shut up are as messes of meat set upon a grave' (Gr. θέματα [from τίθημι to place] βρωμάτων). And RV introduces the word into He 1216 'Esau, who for one mess of meat sold his own birthright' (ἀντὶ βρώσεων μιᾶς, lit. 'for one eating,' i.e. one meal: 'mease of meat' is the tr. of the Great [Cranmer's] Bible; it is echoed by Shaks. in Merry Wives, III. i. 63—'I had as lief you would tell me of a mess of porridge.' The tr. of the Rhem. NT is 'a dish of meate'; the AV 'morsel of meat' comes from the Bishops' Bible). J. HASTINGS.

MESSENGER. — The Heb. word and malak means a messenger, and is so translated about 100 times in AV. It is used of messengers both public and private, both Satanic and Divine. But so frequently does the word designate a messenger from God that it assumes the special meaning of 'angel.' In LXX it is nearly always translated by dγγελος (exceptions are, e.g., Nu 21²¹ 22⁵, Dt 2²⁶, all in plu. πρέσβεις; Jos 6²⁶ ol κατασκοπεύσαντες; 1 S 25⁴² παΐδες); but this word άγγελος is rendered 'messenger' in AV in Mt 11¹⁰, Mk 1², Lk 7^{34. 37} 9²⁵, 2 Co 12⁷, Ja 2²⁵, where it is evident that human rendered of the 2 Co 12⁷ SA 12⁻¹⁵ messengers are spoken of; in 2 Co 127 St. l'aul calls his thorn in the flesh 'a messenger of Satan to buffet me' (4γγελος σατανά Ινα με κολαφίζη). It is rarely doubtful whether the meaning is 'messenger' in the original sense, or 'angel' in the derived or restricted sense. Only once does RV change 'messenger' into 'angel,' Job 33²³, and Oxf. Heb. Lex. says that there the 'angel' of RV is too specific; the reference is to 'a messenger from God acting as an interpreter and declaring what is right' (RVm has 'messenger'). Only once ' is a prophet directly called a messenger of God (π΄, ἀγγελοι), Haggai (1¹³), but the name MALACHI (wh. see) is 'my messenger,' and Malachi uses the title not only of the law of the LORD to the people (27), of the Forerunner of the Messiah (31), but even of the Messiah Himself (31, AV and RV 'messenger,' RVm 'angel'). See art. ANGEL.

Other words trd 'messenger' are self-evident, but it may be pointed out that in NT drotrohos 'apostle,' lit. 'one sent out,' is twice rendered 'messenger,' 2 Co 8²³, Ph 2²⁵. See APOSTLE. J. HASTINGS.

Literature.

In approaching this subject, it seems important to distinguish between the historical and the theological points of view from which it may be regarded, and to vindicate the rights of both. There is a danger that a sense, derived from Christian faith, of the purpose and the fulfilment of the hope of the Messiah may somewhat interfere with the accuracy of our view of the course of its The Messianic expectation was formed under the influence of the fundamental beliefs and the national experiences of the Israelite people, interpreted first by the prophets and subsequently by more ordinary religious reflexion and specula-tion. In a historical study we must be careful not to attribute greater distinctness or scope to the expectation at any epoch than had then been attained. The actual genesis and connexion of ideas must, so far as possible, be observed; and elements of the final conception, which existed first as separate thoughts and did not affect the process of development during its earlier stages, must be treated asserted. must be treated as separate till the time when they were in reality combined with the main body of doctrine. On the other hand, in the endeavour to appreciate the true lessons of the history, to understand aright the meaning of the facts, considerations are in place and are necessary, which are, properly speaking, theological—such, namely, as furnish the ground for, or are connected with, our belief in the Moral Government of the world and the Divine plan for man's Redemption, and determine our estimate both of the Christian Faith and of the OT dispensation, and of their relation to one another.

It will be our aim in this art. (i.) to trace the origin and growth of the Messianic beliefs of the Jews, and then more briefly (ii.) to mark the character and extent of the change which these beliefs underwent in the Christian Church, and its results as to the interpretation of OT prophecy.

i. JEWISH MESSIANIC BELIEF.—1. Outlines of its history.—(a) We shall be mainly concerned with the expectation of a personal deliverer. But it is impossible to place this in a right light, if we do not view it in connexion with the belief, as a whole, which the Jews had in the future blessings assured to them. From the conviction that they were the chosen people of Jehovah, and that He would be faithful to His covenant made with them, there arose in times of common distress and of exile the confidence taught by the prophets, and which sustained the most pious and best part of the nation, that their national life, after it had been purified by the punishment of sinners and the discipline of the godly, would be restored, that they would obtain complete victory over their enemies, and that God would bestow upon them such glory and peace and well-being as would surpass all that had been realized in the happiest preceding times, and would satisfy perfectly all the longings of their hearts. These hopes existed before the expectation of a unique person who was to come—the Messiah—had been formed. This is exemplified by the Book of Zephaniah, the whole of which is occupied with a vision of the great day of the Lord's vengeance on the sinners in Israel and destruction of the surrounding nations, and the subsequent happiness of Zion, while yet the figure of Messiah does not appear at all. Again, there were periods in which, or portions of the Jewish world where, the expectation of a coming King seems to have fallen into abeyance, though the more comprehensive hope for Israel and Zion was still vigorous. This is exemplified by the Apocrypha and the writings of Philo. Nevertheless, these different forms of expectation had their roots in beliefs which were closely connected. This whole body of expectation may therefore not unfitly be, as it often is, called 'Messianic.' The importance of those originally simple anticipations, to which we have referred, will further appear when it is observed that out of them, and out of the imagery in which they were expressed, grew in time the elaborate and mysterious doctrines concerning the millennium, the final judgment, the world to come, and other last things (cf. ESCHATOLOGY in vol. i.).

(b) We come now more definitely to the history of the idea of the Messiah. God had not only made a special covenant with Israel, but with David and his descendants as its royal house (2 S 7⁸⁻¹⁷, Ps 89¹⁹⁻³⁷). To the days of David and Solomon, especially, after-generations looked back as furnishing a pledge for the future. It is the renewed glory of the house of David, and the reunion of all the tribes under it, that Amos, for instance (9111.), and Hosea (35) foretell, not the coming of the Messiah. Again, it is on the restoration of a succession of kings, not on one pre-eminent king, of David's line, that Jeremiah dwells (17²⁵ 22²⁴ 33^{15.17}). In some prophecies, however (1s 7¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 9^{6.7} 11, Mic 4. 5), attention is concentrated upon a single descendant of David; and the language used respecting him, taken by itself, would seem clearly to imply the conception of the Messiah, strictly so called. Any remaining doubt whether it did so a greater that we have a for configuratory less than the absence of configuratory. is suggested by the absence of confirmatory language, and even the contrary representations, in other nearly contemporary, or later, prophets. Unquestionably, however, the image of the king who, in accordance with God's covenant with David, stood in a peculiar relation to Jehovah ('I will be his father, and he shall be my son'), who reigned by His appointment, in His name, and by His power, who would do all God's will, whose rule should be one of absolute righteousness, who would compel all men to honour the God of Israel and bestow on His people perfect peace and happiness for ever, contained the essential characteristics of the idea of the Messiah, as that name came to be commonly understood among Jews. At most it was only necessary besides that the conception should be firmly apprehended, that it should be fixed in language, and become clearly recognizable. (c) We proceed to examine the early evidence of the expectation of the Messiah as a unique personality, and in particular of the use of the title

In order to understand the significance of the application of the name Messiah in the special manner which has become so familiar, we must glance at the use of the word in OT. The cereglance at the use of the word in OT. The ceremony of anointing was used in making priests and prophets, as well as kings, and TVO (LXX χρατόs), 'anointed,' is a few times applied to the first of these as an adjective (Lv 4⁸. 16 6²², 2 Mac 1¹⁰). But as a substantive, 'the Lord's anointed,' 'Mine anointed,' 'Thine anointed,' it is used only of kings. A possible exception to this is the use of the plural to designate the Jewish people as a whole (?), at Ps 105 16 (1 Ch 16²²), Hab 3¹³, although even in these passages the reference may be to the king. It is employed of the king, in contrast with the priest, even at 1 S 2²⁶. The title is repeatedly given to Saul (1 S 12³ etc.); but it acquired a far fuller meaning when used of David and his descendants, by reason of God's covenant with him (Ps 2¹ 18⁵⁰ etc.). Its transference to Cyrus (Is 45¹) does but illustrate its primary force. See, further, art. ANOINTING.

At Dn 9²⁴⁻²⁸ we possibly have the word used in that which has come to be its distinctive sense. If so, it is the earliest instance of this.

If so, it is the earliest instance of this.

In the next oldest works which have to be noticed, as probably giving indications of the expectation of the Messiah, the title is not used; but this is explicable from the oracular, apocalyptic character of the writings in question, which favours an allusive or symbolical mode of speech. In the most ancient portion of the Sibylline Qracles (iii. l. 97 to l. 807, or according to some critics a little more), composed about B.C. 140, we have (l. 652 ff.) a description of a king whom God should send, who can hardly be other than the Messiah. Again, in one of the older sections of the Book of Enoch, the Vision of Seventy Shepherds, which probably belongs to the reign of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–106) [in art. ENOCH, vol. i. p. 707, it is placed somewhat earlier], and in which the history and destiny of the Cheer Parks was republicably represented. of the Chosen People are symbolically represented, the Chosen People are symbolically represented, the white bullock, it is generally allowed, denotes the Messiah. Another portion of the Book of Enoch, the so-called Book of Parables, should be considered at this point, if the period assigned for its composition in art. ENOCH, ib., is adopted, and if the chronological order ought to be strictly adhered to. But critics differ widely in respect to its date. The supposed historical allusions in it are of very more tain import. Even on this are of very uncertain import. Even on this ground it would be well to reserve it for separate treatment, when the course of the history of the Messianic Hope, so far as it may be determined by means of evidence of more unquestionable character, has been reviewed as a whole. But there is still stronger reason for doing this. The Messianic doctrine of this book is, by common admission, unlike in important particulars to that found in any other Jewish document. Whatever, therefore, the time and circumstances of its origin may have been, it seems certain that it did not exercise any general influence.

we pass to the Psalms of Solomon, which contain full and clear evidence of the idea of the Mesaish and also (Ps-Sol 17²⁶ 18^{6, 8}) of the use of the title. These psalms were most probably written by one author, and within no very wide limits of time. They contain allusions which can best be explained if the taking of Jerusalem by Paramery (R.C. 63) was still recent when some of Pompey (B.C. 63) was still recent when some of them were composed. Though we possess them only in Greek, they were evidently written originally in Hebrew, and there is every reason to regard them as Palestinian. Pss 17 and 18 are some of the most important passages in all Jewish literature in connexion with the history of the Messianic Their thought and language are moulded on the portions of OT which celebrate God's covenant with David. Another fragment of the Sibylline Oracles, which is probably of a little later date than the Psalms of Solomon, contains an allusion to the Messiah (Or. Sib. iii. 46-50).

The comparative scantiness of the indications which we possess of the expectation of the Messiah in the last two or three centuries B.C. cannot be wholly explained by our want of knowledge of the period. The silence of the Apocrypha has already been referred to. The truth would seem to be that, in part owing to changed political circumstances, in part also to a deeper cause, a move-ment of religious feeling, the hope of the restoration of the Davidic monarchy, after it had slumbered for a while, re-awoke gradually, and in some parts of the Jewish world more decidedly than in others, and especially so in Palestine, during the last cent. and a half B.C., and that as it did so, a unique and ideal character was attributed to the person and mission of the expected king, such as had not before been, commonly at least, associated with any looked for occupant of the throne. The fact itself that he would be separated by so long an interval of time from all his predecessors contributed to this, and in addition a deepened sense of the magnitude of the events in connexion with which he would appear, and in which he would bear a part, had begun to enhance the idea of his greatness.

The chief elements in this early conception of the Messiah have become apparent in tracing its history, but it will be well to mark them carefully before proceeding further. He will be a descendant of David; Son of David comes to be used of him of David; Son of David comes to be used of him as a special appellation (first in Ps-Sol 17th, in the Gospels Mt 9th etc., and commonly in Rabbinic literature). He will be the ideal king, whose mind and action shall be in entire accord with the will of God, who will be God's true representative upon earth, in whose days and through whom God will make good all His promises, and who will lead all men to honour the God of Israel and to respect Israel as God's people. The relation of the Messiah to the actual inauguration of this happy state of things cannot be precisely deterhappy state of things cannot be precisely determined. It is clearly an anaggeration to say with Castelli (Il Messia secondo gli Ebrei, p. 164) and Dalman (Worte Jesu, p. 242) that the Messiah is never according to the original conception himself the deliverer, but only the king of the people after God has wrought deliverance. The writer of Ps 2, and those who took their ideas from it (e.g. Pa-Sol 1724), manifestly attributed the subjugation of the enemies of God to the agency of the Messiah. It was also established by possible for writers who contemplated this to use language implying that the deliverance was God's work. The part taken by supernatural and by human agency would be, no doubt, somewhat variously conceived by different minds; but the language of the documents is not minds; but the language of the documents is not full enough to justify us in defining the views of the several writers with exactness. At the period we are considering, thought upon this subject would be vague. Only through a process of reflexion, and when it came to be a question of harmonizing diverse representations in the prophets, would the place in the succession of events at which the Messiah would appear be determined mined.

d) The evidence so far considered brings us down approximately to the middle of the last cent. B.C. The Gospels are our next important source of information. They supply us with a lifelike picture of Jewish beliefs in Palestine at the time of our Lord's ministry. We gather that the expectation of One who should come—the Messiah -was an article of faith with the masses of the Jewish people, and with the Pharisees there. In the main, their conception of him is that which has already been before us. But one or two additional traits appear. The Jews, whose discussions are reported in Jn 7³⁷, assumed that the coming of the Messiah would be unexpected and mysterious. The same idea is met with in the Talmud and Targum of the prophets, and in the mouth of Trypho in Justin (Dial. chs. 8 and 110). Again, we have a feature in the rôle of the Messiah corresponding rather to what is recorded of some of the greatest prophets than of the kings of old, when it is expected that he will work mighty miracles. That this was the common anticipation is implied in the answer of Jesus to John (Mt 11²⁵), and in the questionings of the Jews (Jn 7³¹). In Rabbinic literature we find evidence to the same effect.

(e) The development of eschatological doctrine, which may be traced especially in the Apocalyptic literature (see ESCHATOLOGY in vol. i. p. 741 ff.), necessarily affected the conception of the Messiah and his office. As the order of events at the end of the world came to be more clearly defined, his work was marked out with greater precision. A more unearthly character was also imparted to him. The Apocalypse of Baruch and Fourth Ezra (see ESDRAS, SECOND BOOK OF) are important for illustrating the change. They may with confidence be pronounced to be Jewish, and there is a large amount of agreement among critics that their composition should be placed between A.D. 70 and the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D. The calamities that are to come upon the earth are described in dark colours. In the midst of them the Messiah appears. He is said to be preserved by the Most High to the end of the days. In 4 Ezr 13¹¹ he is seen as a man coming from the sea, flying with the clouds of heaven. Nevertheless just before, at 12²⁰ he is referred to as 'the Anointed One of the seed of David.' We must suppose, therefore, that the author had the notion which is met with in the Rabbinic literature, that one born of David's line had been caught away from the earth and was being kept in heaven, or in Paradise, till the time should have arrived for his Advent. When he has executed vengeance on all the enemies of God, and the dispersed of Israel have been gathered together, he will reign for a long period (400 years according to 4 Ezr) in a state of peace and plenty, such as that imagined in what Christians came to call the Millennium. Then the Messiah himself and all flesh would die. After this there would be a general resurrection and judgment by the Most High, and a new world. The Messianic doctrine of the Talmud and Targum agrees as to its main outlines and character with that attained at the time we have now reached. The additional point of most interest to be considered in connexion with them is the extent to which they bear testimony to the belief that the Messiah would participate for a time in the sufferings of men. Further reference will be made to this presently.

It has sometimes been held that there existed even in pre-Christian times various types of Messianic expectation. Gfrörer (in Jahrh. d. Heils, 1838) formulated this theory, distinguishing them as 'the common-prophetic,' 'the Danielic,' 'the Mosaic,' and 'the Mystical-Mosaic'; and Westcott (Introd. to Study of Gospels, ch. ii.) countenances this idea. But it does not fairly represent the evidence of our documents. In the Expedic Back of Parables indeed, to which refer-It has sometimes been held that there existed Enochic Book of Parables, indeed, to which reference has already been made, and to the doctrine of which we shall recur under the next head, we do find a different type. But, putting this on one side, the evidence, when arranged according to the times that the different portions of it most probably illustrate, sets before us a single line of orderly development. There is one root-conception which in process of time is elaborated, and in some respects changed, yet so that its original features remain recognizable throughout.

2. Discussion of Special Points.—There are some questions which need to be more particularly considered on account of their intrinsic importance, or the diversity of views held in regard to them, or their connexion with Christian doctrine. first relates to an ideal other than the kingly one which was combined with it in Christian faith, but which seems in Jewish belief, at least before the Christian era, and in the main throughout, to

(a) The Prophet.—In Dt 18¹⁵ the promise is given of 'a prophet like unto Moses'; yet if the whole context be taken into account the meaning seems to be, not so much that one supereminent prophet should be sent, but that God's people should not be left destitute of prophetic guidance. When prophecy had for a time ceased, and at a period when the expectation of a king of David's line does not seem to have flourished, religious hope was fixed upon the rise of a true prophet (1 Mac 14⁴¹; cf. 4⁴⁶ and 9²⁷). Among the Jews of the time of our Lord's ministry the return of one of the famous prophets of old (Mk 8^{27L} and parallels, Mk 6¹⁵), or the coming of one who was defined as 'the prophet' (Jn 1^{21, 25} 6¹⁴), was awaited. But in all these passages, except Jn 6¹⁴⁵, it is evident that 'the prophet' is distinct from the Messiah; and in that place, also, there is no need to suppose an identification of, or confusion between, the two ideas. Nevertheless, some traits taken from the prophetic character seem to have found a place in the conception of the Messiah's work and office. One, the working of miracles, has been referred to already. Again, the Messiah, according to the woman of Samaria, is to be the revealer of all truth that men need to know (Jn 4²³). This view of the Messiah agrees with the special complexion of Messianic doctrine among the Samaritans at a later time.

(b) The doctrine of a suffering Messiah.—There are passages in the OT which teach deep lessons as to the Divine purposes that are accomplished through the sufferings of the righteous, and fore-shadowings even of one pre-eminent vicarious sufferer. But, so far as we can trace the connexion of ideas in these passages and their contexts, there does not seem to have been any clear reference to the Messiah and his atoning work in the thought of the writers. The suggestion for their prophecies seems to have come either through individual experience, or (as notably in the latter half of Isaiah) from the belief that, through the afflic-tions which the better part of the Israelite nation was undergoing, its purification and restoration were being effected.

We desire, however, to know what the influence we desire, however, to know what the inhuence of these prophecies was upon Jewish Messianic belief. The true answer appears to be that for a long time they did not affect it at all, and that they never did so to any considerable degree. There is no trace of the idea that the Messiah would undergo suffering, in the extra-canonical pre-Christian literature which we have been reviewing. And the evidence supplied by the Cornels seems to show conclusively that no such Gospels seems to show conclusively that no such belief existed among the Jews at the time of our Lord's ministry. His own disciples were totally unprepared for His announcements on the subject. And yet, if such a belief was to be found anywhere, it might be expected to be among those who were attracted by the character and teaching of Jesus. There were differences in the spirit in which the Messiah and his times were thought of and desired. The mass of men thought chiefly of victory over their enemies and the bringing in of great material prosperity, while the truly pious dwelt on the remission of sins (Lk 17). But there is no sign of this remission being connected with the vicarious sufferings of the Messiah except in the Baptist's words (Jn 125, 25); and plainly this inspired utterance cannot be taken as evidence of Jewish belief: those who heard it do not seem to have understood it at the time. Some have held that in our Lord's time there had, through devotion to earthly ideals, been a decline, esp. in regard to the point under consideration, from a conception of the Messiah prevalent in an earlier age which had been more truly in accord with prophetic teaching (cf. Liddon, Divinity of our Lord, II. ii.). It would be strange if this fuller and higher doctrine had been so completely lost, as it must in that case have been. Moreover, as we have seen, this theory has no documentary support.

We pass to writings subsequent to the Christian era. The view of 4 Ezr that Messiah would die after a long and prosperous reign, at the end of this world, has evidently nothing to do with atoning suffering. Christian controversialists appear to have been equally mistaken in the meaning they have often attributed to the doctrine of two Messiahs—Ben-Joseph and Ben-David. The former is the Messiah of the ten tribes, a warlike deliverer and king. He was, it is true, to die, but only in order to make way for the union of the

In the Targum of Jonathan much of Is 52¹²-53¹² is applied to the Messiah, but those verses which speak of the sufferings of the Servant of Jehovah are referred to the Israelite nation. And the general current of Jewish interpretation is to the same effect. There are some traces in the Talmud of the belief that the Messiah would suffer with the sufferings of his people, and that he is the subject of the whole of this prophecy; but they are rare, and are not found in the earlier portions.

A good deal of stress has been laid on the fact that Justin Martyr in his Dialogue with Trypho represents his Jewish interlocutor as forced to allow that the Scriptures forcetell a Messiah destined to suffer (chs. 68. 89. 90). But this cannot rightly be pressed, since Justin may attribute this admission to his, perhaps partly imaginary, opponent, as a literary device for setting forth his own argument. If accepted as evidence of Jewish opinion, it could only show that some Jews a little before A.D. 150 did not feel able to resist this interpretation of prophecy when it was urged upon them by Christians.

We may observe, in taking leave of this subject, that before the historical realization in Jesus Christ, and apart from belief in Hin, it must have been extremely difficult to combine the idea of suffering with the conception of the promised king derived from the representations of OT prophecy generally. It can have been possible at all only for men of unusual depth of spiritual insight and sympathy with the sorrows of their people.

(c) The use of the name 'the Son of Man,' the Messianic interpretation of the vision in Dn 7, and the doctrine of the Messiah's pre-existence.—The Messiah was certainly not called 'the Son of Man' by Jewa with that fulness of signification which

(c) The use of the name 'the Son of Man,' the Messianic interpretation of the vision in Dn 7, and the doctrine of the Messiah's pre-existence.—The Messiah was certainly not called 'the Son of Man' by Jews with that fulness of signification which Jesus gave to the name. The use of this title for the Messiah among Jews, if it was used by them at all, is closely associated with the interpretation of Dn 7, and the discussion of the two points may conveniently be connected.

From Jn 12²⁴ it appears that the Jews were puzzled by the designation 'the Son of Man,' and that it was not with them a recognized title for the Messiah. Indeed, if it had been, the use of it by Jesus could hardly be reconciled with His course of action as a whole. We gather from the records generally, that He refrained till the very end of His ministry from claiming before the multitude to be the Messiah, and till within a few months of the close from making this claim before even the innermost circle of His disciples. Yet He repeatedly and openly designated Himself from an early period by the name 'the Son of Man.' It is true that, in connexion with this early and public use of it, He does not introduce imagery taken from, or similar to, that of the vision in Dn 7, as He does in later sayings addressed to His disciples which contain this title. From the first, however, His use of it was marked and emphatic, and such as would not have been consistent with the rest of His conduct, if it already commonly denoted the Messiah.

With respect to the vision in Dn 7 it has to be observed that he who is brought to the Ancient of Days is described not as 'the Son of Man,' but as 'one like unto a son of man.' Further, the vision is accompanied by an interpretation, from which it appears that this human form represents 'the saints of the Most High' (vv. 18. 22. 27) in contrast with the earthly kingdoms represented by forms of beasts. Nevertheless, from the relation between the form of the vision in 4 Ezr, to which allusion has already been made, and that in Dn 7, we may clearly infer that the writer of the later Apocalypse saw a reference to the Messiah in the language of his prototype. But it should be noted that he described the Messiah not as 'the Son of Man' or as 'like unto a son of man,' but as 'like unto a man.' In Rabbinic literature, from the 2nd cent onwards, indications of the Messianic interpretation of the vision in Dn 7 are not wanting, but they are not prominent. There is nothing in this literature to lead us to suppose that 'the Son of Man' was ever in common use as a name for the Messiah.

The employment of imagery such as that of Daniel's vision in describing the advent of the Messiah implies his existence before his appearing, in some extra-terrestrial region. But this view could, as we have seen, be harmonized with the belief that he would be of David's line, by supposing that a descendant of David had been first caught up from the earth, or that David himself or one of the kings of his house would reappear. And as the Davidic lineage of the Messiah was a thoroughly established dogma, and there is no reason to suppose that any doubt on the point was entertained, or would have been tolerated, in the Rabbinic schools, we must conclude that any pre-existence of the Messiah before his manifestation to men which they thought of, was only such as was consistent with a previous human birth.

Harnack indeed (Dogmengesch. i. 755) asserts that, as a way of representing to themselves the Divine foreknowledge, the Jews were in the habit of supposing that every important person or thing which has successively appeared or is to appear on earth has first existed in heaven, and that such a heavenly pre-existence was assumed in the case of the Messiah in accordance with this mode of thought. But G. Dalman, the chief expert in Jewish literature among recent writers, emphatically denies that this was a Jewish, or at all events a Palestinian, principle. He does not allow that the familiar instances of the heavenly prototypes of the holy city and the temple establish it (Worte Jesu, p. 245). We may at least say that it must be difficult for us to understand exactly and fully what such a notion imported, even where we seem to find it and that consequently it must be rash for us to imagine it in the case of persons and objects with which it was not plainly associated. The older Rabbinism at least seems to have contented itself with the idea of the pre-existence of the Name of Messiah (Ps 7217). (See Dalman, ib. p.

One work there is, apparently Jewish, which is an exception in Jewish literature in regard to more than one of the points which we have been discussing -the Enochic Book of Parables, to which reference has been made, but the consideration of which was deferred. The present is a suitable opportunity for making a few remarks upon it. In this docu-ment the Messiah is repeatedly called 'the Son' of Man,' and described as surrounded with majesty in the presence of the Lord of Spirits, and reserved for a future manifestation. Furthermore, he is to be the Judge in the Universal Judgment—a function never assigned to the Messiah, but always ascribed to the Most High in other Jewish writings. in spite of the various points of contact with Christian ideas and language, there is nothing (save one phrase, which is probably to be otherwise explained) to connect this Son of Man with the Christ of Christian faith, who has been crucified and has since ascended to His throne, and is waiting to return in glory. It is very unlikely that a Chrisreturn in glory. It is very unlikely that a Christian writer would have so concealed his own belief, or that a Christian interpolator, while introducing those passages and expressions which correspond with Christian rather than with Jewish ideas, would have done his work with so much reserve. The traits in question may however, for all that, be due to Christian influence. To any one who considers how Christian teaching affected the thought of many pagans in the early centuries, even sometimes of such as remained most hostile to Christianity, or who is at all familiar with the many instances of the same kind which there are among educated Hindus at the present day, this will seem a not improbable hypothesis. And in the relations which existed during the 1st cent. A.D. between Jewish Christianity and Judaism there were the conditions which would make such effects natural. It is to be added, that even if it is a mistake to trace the peculiarities of the Enochic Book of Three Parables to Christian influence, it may still be post-Christian. It is true that 'the figure of the Messiah is here drawn specially in dependence upon the Bk. of Daniel.' But it would not be justifiable the Br. of Dainel. But it would not be justifiable to regard this as making an early date more credible. For between the original vision and this rendering of its imagery there lies a difference in the definiteness and fulness of the Messianic ideas implied, which was only by degrees approached and never elsewhere attained among Jews.

ii. THE CHRISTIAN TRANSFORMATION.—The fact that Jesus claimed to be the Christ, and the significance of this fact, the manner in which and the time when He did so, and the part which the temper of the prevalent Jewish expectation had in determining His course of action, need not here be considered. It must suffice to note that He gave a new character to the conception of the Christ when to His acceptance of His disciples' faith in Him, as such, He linked the distinct announcement of His approaching sufferings (Mk 8^{276} and parallels, Mk 10^{33-46} — Mt 20^{30-28}). In the minds of the first members of the Christian Church, the experiences of the Cross, the Resurrection, and Pentecost, together with the impression which the character and work, the life and teaching of Jesus had made upon them. led to a rapid transformation, pregnant with important consequences, of the idea of the Messiah which they had held as Jews. They turned again, as Jesus had taught them to do (Mk 12^{10, 24} = Mt 21⁴² 22²⁹, Mk 14⁴⁰ = Mt 26⁵⁴, Lk 4¹⁷, Jn 5²⁹ etc.), to their aucient Scriptures, and read them with new

They found scattered there the elements of a relatively complete ideal, which had been perfectly fulfilled in Jesus. The process by which they combined them was uncritical, and was to a large extent performed unconsciously, but the result was in harmony with essential truth.

By the very character which Jesus had assumed

By the very character which Jesus had assumed in His mode of life and ministry, attention was directed to the promise of a true prophet, and we are not surprised to find that special stress is laid on it in the early preaching in the Acts (Ac 3²² 7²⁷).

The references in the same part of NT to 'the servant of Jehovah,' though they have not perhaps been commonly noticed, can hardly be questioned when they have been pointed out (Ac 4^{27,30}, where \(\pi a^{27}\) is should, in view of the manifest allusions to Is, and the use of this term in the LXX he rendered rais should, in view of the manifest allusions to Is, and the use of this term in the LXX, be rendered—not with AV 'child'—but with RV 'servant,' as also at Ac 3^{12, 26}). His 'anointing' (Ac 4²⁷, cf. Is 61¹) with the Spirit served as a link to connect Him with the king of David's line. It may be permissible to see an allusion to the same figure of prophecy in the parable Lk 14^{18t}, though δούλοs is the word there employed. the word there employed.

But the question upon which the whole controversy between believers in Jesus as the Christ and the Jews necessarily turned was as to the Divine intention, foreshown in the prophets, that He should pass through suffering and death to His triumph (Ac 318 8522 173 2622). Stress was also laid upon those spiritual blessings, the expectation of which had already been associated with the Messianic times—the call to repentance, the remission of the Spirit (Ac 917-21). sins, peace, the outpouring of the Spirit (Ac 2¹⁷⁻²¹ 5²¹ 10⁻⁶).

Two comings of the Messiah, first in humiliation, then in glory, were now distinguished, and this distinction became a characteristic article of the Christian faith; for the withdrawal from the earth of one who had not in any way discharged the office of Messiah, though destined to do so hereafter, according to the Jewish notion referred to above, can hardly be regarded as equivalent. Further, even from the very necessities of the case, the kingship of the Messiah could no longer be conceived as primarily an earthly one. He had been exalted to a throne in heaven at God's right hand, whence He was expected to return in glory. Some, and for a time many, Christians supposed that He would then reign upon earth for a certain period. But to thoughtful believers this must always have seemed a very subordinate part of His discharge of His kingly office. It scarcely appears in the NT (Rev 20° is the only passage that can be regarded as a distinct indication of it). The predominant thought was that of a heavenly king. Moreover, He was to be the Judge in the final universal judgment (Ac 10⁴³ 17^{30, 31}, Ro 2¹⁶, 2 Co 5¹⁰, Mt 25³¹⁶.).

Meanwhile He exercises a heavenly priesthood. This aspect, too, of Messiahship was first clearly brought out in Christian teaching. That this was so, appears from the fact that Christian believers did not at once perceive it. The title of 'priest' did not at once perceive it. The title of 'priest' is in NT given to Jesus Christ only in Ep. to Heb.; and His right to it is founded primarily upon a passage in which a psalmist had once recognized the priestly character belonging to Israel's king (Ps 110⁴, He 5⁵ 7. 8⁴). Lastly, a meaning so much loftier than before was given to His relationship to God, that the title 'the Son of God' lost, or almost so, the associations with specifically Messianic ideas which it once might have had.

To some the view of OT prophecy suggested in

To some the view of OT prophecy suggested in this article may be disappointing. For the purpose of the argument from prophecy in support of the Christian faith as it has been ordinarily used, the strictly miraculous character of the prophecies should be as plain as possible. Predictions are therefore demanded, the reference of which is guaranteed by their circumstantial accuracy, and by their having been more or less clearly intelligible before the time of fulfilment came. Modern inquiry has rendered it doubtful how far the predictions satisfied these requirements. But, on the other hand, the history which we have been tracing is full of the signs of Divine Providence. The whole religious history of Israel down to the time of Him whom Christians believe in as the Christ, and in a special manner the teaching of the prophets, formed a most remarkable preparation for his coming. It remains true as ever, and criticism and historical investigation only confirm it, that the Scriptures were in reality full of Him, and that, in proportion as men had entered into their spirit, they must have been able to receive Him (Jn 5^{38, 39}). It is still legitimate as ever to regard types and ideals which were first fully realized in Him as divinely intended to foreshadow Him. And if the method in which Israel was trained in its great hope, even while in many respects unique, was more analogous to that in which truth has ordinarily been unfolded to mankind, permitting a larger amount of illusion and error on their part than has sometimes been supposed, it may for this very reason be the more instructive.

WETE, METEYARD.—To 'mete' (from Anglo-Sax. metan, and radically connected with Gr. μέτρον, Lat. metiri, Eng. 'measure'; and even with Gr. μέδειν to rule, Lat. modus, measure, moderation, Eng. 'mode,' 'modest,' etc.) is to measure. Thus Ex 16¹⁹ 'And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack'; Mt 7² 'With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.' Cf. Knox, Hist. 97, 'But bee yee assured, my Lord, with such measure as ye mete to others, with the same measure it shall be met to you againe.' Tind. uses the word in Dt 21² 'Then let thine elders and thi judges come forth and meet unto the cities that are rounde aboute the slayne,' and Cov. in Ru 3¹³ 'And he meet her sixe measures of barlye.' Sir John Cheke, in his determination to use Anglo-Saxon at all hazards, turns Tindale's 'cubite' in Mt 6²⁷ into 'half yard mete.' Chapman uses the verb in lliads, iii. 327—

'Then Hector, Priam's martial son, stepp'd forth, and met the ground.'

Meteyard is used by Tindale in Lv 19³⁶ as the tr. of 1750, a measure, and it is retained in AV and RV. The word occurs also in Pref. to AV, 'neither is it the plain-dealing Merchant that is unwilling to have the weights or the meteyard brought in place, but he that useth deceit.' Coverdale has the similar forms 'meteline' (Jos 17³⁶ 14) and 'meterod' (Ezk 40^{3, 5} 41⁸).

Keil, Stade). Budde [in SBOT] makes various objections to this, and leaves the expression blank in his Heb. text as irrecoverably corrupt. The LXX reads την άφωραμένην, which may, according to Wellhausen, imply a reading πέτων. Wellh. himself (Sam. 174) emends to προ ηι 'Gath the mother city,' comparing I Ch 181 ητημη τι 'Gath and her daughter towns'), which he argues may have arisen from the text he postulates in Samuel. Klostermann attempts to obtain from the two texts (of S and Ch) τι προτη πίτης 'Gath and her border to the west.' Thenius emends to προτη 'bridle of tribute,' i.e. 'David laid the Philistines under tribute.' Löhr despairs of recovering either the meaning or the text. Cheyne (Expos. Times, Oct. 1899, p. 48) emends to τημέντης μποτη, 'Ashdod, the city of the sea.' Sayce (EHH 414 n.) suggests that προτη πίτης if the Heb. transcription of the Bab. métég ammati (for métég ammati) = 'the highroad of the mainland' of Palestine. The reference would thus be to the command of the highroad of trade which passed through Canaan from Asia to Egypt and Arabia; but the appearance of such distinctively Babylonian words in Hebrew of this date is extremely improbable.

METHUSELAH (π'ρψης).—A Sethite, the father of Lamech, Gn 5²¹². P (A Μαθουσάλα), 1 Ch 1³ (B Μαθθουσάλα, A Μαθουσάλα), Lk 3³¹ (Μαθουσάλα) = ΜΕΤΗUSHAEL (which see) in J's genealogy, 4¹². The name π'ρψης is interpreted by Holzinger as 'man of the javelim' (Mann des Geschosses), a fitting name for a time when the earth was full of violence. Ball (in SBOT), following Hommel (PSBA, March 1893), makes the name = 'man of Selah,' where Sclah may be a modification of Bab. Sarrahu, a title of Sin, the god of Ur Casdim. Methuselah would thus answer to Berosus' 'Αμέμψισς = Amel-Sin, 'Sin's man.' While Ball remarks that the form Methushael, 'man of El,' is less original than Methuselah 'man of Selah,' Sayce (in Expos. Times, May 1893, p. 367) suggests that Methushael, an exact transcription of the Bab. Mutu-ša-ili, has been in 'the Sethite genealogy corrupted into Methuselah (perhaps for Mutu-ša-ilati, 'man or husband of the goddess'), which does not admit of an etymology.

METHUSHAEL (ὑκτνς).—A Caintte, the father of Lamech, Gn 4¹⁸ (J); LXX (A) Μαθουσαλά, which is read also for Methuselah (πὴτης) in P's genealogy, 5^{21π.} The interpretations of the name are various. Dillm. remarks that ὑκτης may have meant 'suppliant or man of God' (Ges. Thes.; = Mutu-ša-ili according to Lenormant, Origines de l'histoire², 262 f., cf. Sayce in Expos. Times. May 1896, p. 367, May 1899, p. 353; Hommel, ZDMG xxxii. 714), or 'one who has been obtained by asking' (Budde), but not 'man of Sheol' (Redslob). ME-ZAHAB (הֵהְיִי 'p' 'waters of gold').—Father of Matred and grandfather of Mehetabel the wife of Hadar (Hadad), one of the kings of Edom, Gn 36* (A Μεζοόβ)=1 Ch 1 (LXX om.). The name Μεσαhab (cf. Με-deba) is certainly, as Hommel (AHI 264 n.) remarks, much more like that of a place than of a person. Holzinger (Gen. ad loc.) suggests that it is the same name which appears in a corrupted form in Dt 1¹ as 27; ¬Di-zahab. Hommel

(l.c.) makes the radical suggestion that 'it is a question whether we ought not to restore Gn 36³⁰ as follows: "and his (Hadar's) cities were Pa'ish (in MT Pa'a, var. Pa'i, LXX Φογώρ), Me'eshet, Mehêtab-el, Bath-Matred, and Mê-zahab."'

MEZOBAITE.—One of David's heroes is called in 1 Ch 114 'Jaasiel the Mezobaite' (מְּמִבְּרָה). As Kittel (in SBOT) remarks, the MT is 'certainly incorrect, but totally obscure.' B has Μειναβειά, Α Μεσωβιά, Luc. Μασαβιά.

MIBHAR.—In 1 Ch 11²⁸ one of David's heroes appears as. 'Mibhar the son of Hagri' (γη τορτομο). The parallel passage 2 S 23²⁸ reads, 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite' (της τρ τρπο), which is probably the correct text. While the LXX has, in 1 Ch 11²⁸, B Μεβαάλ νίδι 'Αγαρεί, Α Μαβάρ νίδι 'Αταραί, it reads in 2 S 23²⁸ ἀπὸ δυνάμεως [i.e. κρηγο instead of τρπο] νίδι Γαλααδδεί (Β; Α . . . Γαδδί). See Driver (Text of Sam. 284) and Kittel (SBOT on 1 Ch 11²⁸).

MIBSAM (1977).—1. A son of Ishmael, Gn 25^{13} (A $Ma\sigma\sigma d\mu$)=1 Ch 1^{20} (B $Ma\sigma\sigma d$, A $Ma\beta\sigma d\nu$). 2. A Simeonite, 1 Ch 4^{23} (Β $Ma\beta a\sigma d\mu$, A $Ma\beta a\sigma d\nu$).

MIBZAR (1922) 'fortification'). — A 'duke' of Edom, Gn 36^{42} (Maζάρ) = 1 Ch 1^{83} (B Maζάρ, A Maβσάρ). If we take Mibzar as a place-name, Dillm. rejects decidedly Knobel's identification with Sela or Petra, and, while pronouncing Hitzig's view 'more possible' that Mibzar is the same as Bozrah of v. he thinks it 'most probable,' in view of the words of the Onomasticon (ξτι καὶ νῦν κώμη μεγίστη Μαβσαρὰ ἐπὶ τῆς Γαβαληνῆς, ὑπακούουσα τῆ 11έτρα), that this identification must also be given up.

MICA (μρφ). — 1. Son of Merib-baal (Mephibosheth), $2 \, \mathrm{S} \, 9^{12}$ (B Μειχά, A Μιχά), called in I Ch 8^{34} . 9^{40} . Micah (μρφ). See MICAH, No. 2. 2. Son of Zichri, I Ch 9^{15} (B Μειχά, A Μιχά), Neh 11^{17} (B Μαχά, A Μιχά), where he is called son of Zabdi, v. 22 (B Μειχά, A Μιχά) = Micaiah (μρφ) of Neh 12^{36} . See MICAIAH, No. 7. 3. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{11} (A Μιχά, B om.).

MICAH.—1. (תְּבְיִם, but תִּיבְים in Jg 17. 4; see Gray, HPN 157, B Meixalas, A Mixi). A resident in the highlands of Ephraim, whose story is related in a supplement (chs. 17. 18) to the Bk. of Judges, with a view to explain the origin of the sanctuary of Dan. There is no need to doubt the historicity of the narrative, though it contains signs of revision, if not of composite authorship. That two accounts were woven into one, is the conjecture of some critics, whilst others try to explain the phenomena of the text on the supposition of redaction by a reviser who was indignant at the pretensions of the Danite priests. For a full and fair statement of the different opinions, see Moore, Judges, xxix. xxx. 366–369. The nucleus of the story is evidently of great age, and the events it describes may be assigned with some confidence to the generation after the invasion by Joshua.

Micah stole 1100 shekels of silver from his mother, but restored the money on hearing the curses with which she threatened the unknown thief. His mother thereupon had part of the silver made into 'a graven image and a molten image'; but as the context speaks of but a single image, and the former term is sometimes used (is 4019 4410) generically for an idel though cast, the latter term is probably an editorial explanatory addition of subsequent date to that of the earliest form of the story. This image of J" was given to Micah, who placed it in his private chapel, together with an

'ephod,' which was some portable object used in divining (Jg 8st, 1 S 23^{s. 9} 30^r) and not necessarily a part of a priestly dress, and 'teraphim' or idols, possibly household gods. There is no evidence that these were the busts or images of ancestors; but they were used at least in later times in some unknown way for the purposes of divination (2 K 23²⁴, Ezk 21²¹, Zec 10²). See EPHOD. One of Micah's sons was formally invested with the office of priest.

In the course of time a Levite in search of a livelihood migrated from Bethlehem to Mount Ephraim. and settled there. He is described as of the family of Judah (177), and as a grandson of Moses (1820, where MT has Manasseh, written, however, with 1 suspensum). The most likely explanations of the former phrase are that Levite here means merely a descendant of Leah, or that, the tribe having been broken up, the man in question had attached himself to that of Judah (Gn 49⁵⁻⁷), or that the word Levite is not used here technically of a clan but of a profession, and denotes that the man was an expert in religious denotes that the man was an expert in religious lore and in the art of divination; but no explanation is entirely free from difficulty. In the latter phrase the change of Moses to Manasseh in phrase the change of Moses to Manassen in some of the texts was possibly due to an attempt to detract from the dignity of the priesthoods of the early northern sanctuaries, for whose officials a Mosaic lineage seems to have been justly claimed; see JONATHAN, No. 1. This young Levite was welcomed by Micah, who attached him the bis bound of 1711. to his household (1711), and transferred to him the duties at first assigned to his own son. But soon afterwards the Danites, finding their quiet establishment in the district allotted them by Joshua impossible on account of the resistance of the Philistines and the Amorites (Jg 1²⁴, Jos 19⁴¹), sen five of their tribe to find a suitable place for settle ment elsewhere; and these, while passing through the highlands of Ephraim, stayed for a night at the house of Micah. There they recognized the Levite by his voice, as, if he were actually a descendant from Moses and a recent resident in their own neighbourhood, they may well have done; though, according to a less natural explanation, the southern dialect that he used was the cause of the recognition. At their request he consulted the oracle for them, and promised them success in their expedition. At Laish (or Leshem, Jos 1947), the northern limit of the settlement of Israel, identified by name and ancient authority with Tell el-Kadi (less probably with Banias; see G. A. Smith, HGHL, 473-481), they found an attractive blocality and an unwarlike people, and returned with the tidings to the temporary centre of their tribe in the district made famous by Samson's exploits. Six hundred of the Danites, with their families and cattle (18²¹), determined to migrate to Laish. and cattle (1821), determined to migrate to On approaching the village in which Micah lived, the main body halted at its entrance, whilst the man detailed to secure the idols. They prooeeded to the house of Micah, and, after greeting the Levite, seized the idols; and when the Levite expostulated, they persuaded him to keep quiet and even to accompany them as the priest of their tribe. Hastily rejoining their comrades, they sent forward their families and flocks, placed the Levite and his apparatus in their midst, and marched with the majority of the 600 in the rear to guard against attack by pursuers. Micah collected a few of his neighbours, and overtook the column at some distance from the village . but his remonstrances were received with contemptuous menace, and, as the employment of force by his to return home and leave his idols in the hands of the Danites. They continued their march to

Laish, which they took without difficulty; and in a new town built on the site of the old they set up a temple of their own in charge of Micah's Levite, who thus became the ancestor of the Danite priesthood.

How long this priesthood lasted is not known. The note of time (18³¹) is of little help. If 'the day of the captivity of the land' (1880) is not a late editorial addition, it will probably denote the times of the Philistine wars under Eli; but if it is, the conquest of Galilee (2 K 15²⁰) by Tiglath-pileser in B.C. 734. See art. JUDGES (BOOK OF), in vol. ii. p. 818 f.

2. (app in 1 Ch 8^{34. 25} [B Mexid, A Mixd] 9^{40. 41} [B Mexid, A Mixd]; Mpp, RV Mica, in 2 S 9¹²) A son of Merib-beal (or Mephibosheth), and grandson for Jonathan. The name occurs alike in the general Benjamite genealogy (1 Ch $8^{84.80}$), and in the specific one of the house of Saul (1 Ch $9^{80.41}$). The allusion in $2 S 9^{13}$ (B $Mei\chi d$, A $Mi\chi d$) is probably a late genealogical gloss to remaind the reader of the line of descent notwithstanding such passages as 2 S 21⁵⁻⁹.

3. The name and head of the chief family of the Uzziel branch of the Kohathite Levites, according to the arrangement for public service attributed to David in 1 Ch 23²⁰ (B Mειχάs, A Mεχά). The name is repeated in 1 Ch 24^{24, 26} (B Mειχά, A Mεχά) in the classification of the Levices according to their duties. duties. 4. A name occurring in the genealogy of Reuben (1 Ch 5°) as that of an ancestor of Beerah, the chief of the Reubenites carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser. 5. A contemporary of Josiah and the father of Abdon, 2 Ch 34²⁰ (B Μειχαίας, A Μιχαίας), who is called Achbor son of Micaiah in 2 K 22¹². 6. A Simeonite, father of Ozias, one of the three rulers of Bethulia in the story of Judith (Jth 6¹⁵). To the same tribe belonged Judith here. self (92) (B Meixe, A Mixe), and probably the other rulers, with the majority of the population of the district; and warrant for confidence in the antiquarian accuracy of the author of Jth, and for the assumption of a Simeonite settlement in the north, may be found in Gn 497, 2 Ch 15° 34°. 7. MICAH (אַרְקָהָּוּ Jg 17^{1.4}; in pause סִיכְהָהּוּ 2 Ch 17⁷; shortened אינה בינה אור בינה who appointed a Levite to minister as priest before the image (1958) which his mother had caused to be made from 1100 shekels of silver. See the preceding article, No. 1. 2. Mica(ia)h ben-Imlah, a man of kindred spirit with Elijah, who, at the moment when Ahab of Israel desired to secure the alliance of Jehoshaphat of Judah against the Syrians, predicted, in opposition to the prophet Zedekiah, the unfortunate issue of the campaign Zedekiah, the unfortunate issue of the campaign and the death of Ahab, and ranged himself as a true prophet of J" over against the lying prophets (1 K 22). One will hardly be wrong in tracing the attitude of Mica(ia)h ben-Imlah to the circumstance that Ahab favoured the worship of the Tyrian Baal in Israel—a practice which appeared to Mica(ia)h irreconcilable with Israel's belonging to J". On the reference probably intended in 1 K 2220 opp cap was to the opening words of Mic, see König, Einleit. in d. AT, p. 330. See, further, MICAIAH, No. 3.

3. MICAH (B Meixalas, A Mixauds) THE PROPHET, —of Moresheth (wh. see), the younger contemporary -of Moresheth (wh. see), the younger contemporary of Isaiah, after whom one of the writings in the Dodekapropheton is named, the 6th in the Heb. order but the 3rd in the Greek.

i. The Contents and Unity of the Book.—There can be no doubt that the prophecies collected in the book which bears his name proceed only in part from Micah, for alike in contents and style they are totally diverse in character.

(a) The first three chapters, apart from 2¹²⁶, present no difficulty. The prophet begins with announcing the Divine judgment, which accomplishes itself in two acts, namely, upon Samaria and upon Judah, although, of course, the judg-ment upon Judah forms the central point of his message. Then chs. 2 and 3 state the reasons for the judgment denounced upon Judah in 196., and it is especially against the ruling classes in Jerusalem that Micah utters his reproaches. The verses 2¹²¹ are quite foreign to this line of thought, for they presuppose the Exile, and occupy themselves with the restoration of the people.

(b) To these denunciations of judgment in chs. 1-3 we have the counterpart in chs. 4-5, which open a glimpse into the Messianic time. Against their composition by Micah there are the following objections: (1) The strange conjunction of the Messianic hopes of 4^{1f.} with the threatenings of 313; (2) the circumstance that mutually exclusive views present themselves (cf. 45-8 with v. 25., 411-13 with v. 14, 51-3 with v. 45.), and that frequently a connexion can be established only by very artificial methods (cf. 45 with v. 55, 45 with v. 25, 411-13 with v. 14 51-31. (3) the dependence when trains of with v. ¹4 6¹⁻³; (3) the dependence upon trains of ideas which did not become current till after the time of Micah (cf. 4¹¹⁻¹⁸ with Ezk 38 f.), as well as the presupposing of relations which were strange to Micah's era (cf. 4⁶⁻⁸ [2^{1st}.] 5^{1st}.) If there are any words of Micah at all in chs. 4-5, these can include no more than 497. 14 59-13. (c) 6'-76, which consist of three short addresses (6'-8 6'-16' 7'-6), whose original context, however, is doubtful, might, so far as their contents are con-cerned, proceed from Micah. They present J''s controversy with His ungrateful people, the pro-phet's denunciation of the people for the unright-eousness which marked their whole manner of life, and finally Zion's lament over the decay of her children. This lament is intelligible in the time of Manasseh, when the sacrifice of children (Mic 67) was a flourishing custom; but not only the tenderness of feeling exhibited in 61st, but also the dramatic and exceedingly an inated descriptions, make the composition of this section by Micah make the composition of this section by Mican very improbable.

(d) 7⁷² cannot possibly be attributed to Micah,† for what in 6¹-7⁶ is yet in prospect is in 7⁷² actually come to pass—Zion suffers for her sing and the prophet looks to a better time, when J' will again interest Himself on behalf of His people, and build the walls of Jerusalem.

ii. The Activity of the Prophet.—It follows from the above investigation, that if we are to form an idea of the characteristics of Micah and the method of his activity, we must base our conclusions only upon 1²-2¹¹ 3 (4⁹¹. 1⁴ 5⁹⁻¹³). It results from these data that the title in 1¹ rightly represents the prophetic activity of Micah as having begun as early as the reign of Ahaz, for according to 1.25. he predicted the fall of Samaria. Since of the two contradictory dates given in 2 K 18¹ (cf. 17⁶) and in 18¹² the latter is clearly the better entitled to credit—i.e. Hezekiah probably ascended the throne B.C. 715—it follows that at the time of the destruction of Samaria the occupant of the throne of the Southern kingdom was not Hezekiah (as in 2 K 181, cf. 176) but Ahaz, who would have begun to reign c. 734. Whether Micah had entered upon his prophetic activity before 734, i.e. in the time of Jotham, as the title asserts, we have no certain data to enable us to decide, for the threatening of 312 was, according to the express testimony of Jer 2618ff., uttered under Hezekiah, and probably after the accession of Sennacherib in 705-an event which appears to have determined Hezekiah to a change of policy towards the Assyrians. Since ch. 3 stands in close connexion with ch. 2, and the latter as the foundation for the threatenings of 19st is not to be separated from ch. 1, we can only assume that the threatenings once uttered and meanwhile realized against Samaria were taken by Micah into a written discourse against the Southern kingdom (cf. Is 28 ff.)—a happy thought whereby this denunciation, calculated to strike terror into all, acquired special weight against Jerusalem.

^a Cf. Driver (LOT⁶ 327 f.), who, though he questions the necessity of attributing the verses to an exilic (Stade, Kuen.) or post-exilic (Yellh.) hand, agrees that they do not now stand in their proper context.

† So Wellhausen, Stade, Kuenen, Cornill. Glesebrecht. For the reasons on the other side, we may refer to the discussion in Driver, LOT⁶, 33 f.

iii. Style and Message of Micah.—It has rightly been remarked that in his rhetoric Micah is sharply distinguished from the simplicity of Amos and the originality of Hosea. He begins with the violent hiatus of 12 and the imposing description of Jahweh's descent in storm from heaven to earth v.*.), to which the denunciation of judgment upon Samaria attaches itself, in order finally to introduce the burden of his discourse—the judgment upon Judah,—a discourse, however, which runs off into mere puns attached to local and personal names. It is possible that this, as Wellhausen suggests, was the ancient scholastic model of prophetic style, which elsewhere has maintained itself especially in prophecies regarding foreign nations. Apart from this peculiarity, Micah has close points of contact with Amos. Like the latter, he displays a deep moral earnestness which does not shrink from drawing the last conclusions, and which, in opposition to his great contemporary Isaiah, who looked with confidence to J" the holy God to preserve Jerusalem, leads him to predict the destruction of the city as a punishment for the treading under foot of righteousness. Whether we are justified in concluding from 31 that Micah anticipated the destruction of the whole kingdom, has been rightly called in question and denied by W. R. Smith (Prophets of Israel, 287 ff.), for Micah in assigning the ground for judgment— and in this likewise he agrees with Amos—has specially to do with the aristocracy of Jerusalem, against whom his whole anger is turned on account of the injustice perpetrated by them ('Jerusalem is Judah's sin,' cf. 1⁵ LXX). What a powerful impression this message of judgment produced upon Micah's contemporaries we may infer from Jer 26^{18f.}, where we find that 100 years after its utterance this denunciation of judgment, which stood in such glaring contradiction to the preaching of Isaiah, is not yet forgotten.

Whether Micah had a glimpse of better days and committed his anticipations to writing, must, in view of what has been said above, remain uncertain; the verses which alone could come into consideration as from his pen, contain scarcely anything more than a reference to a future de-liverance and a removal by J" of things displeasing (cf. 49. 59-13). In any case, our prophet, even if he never gave expression to such hopes, would in this respect also have a predecessor in Amos, for the Messianic hopes expressed in Am 9⁸⁶. are a later

A brief reference may further be made to Mic 67t, which are not only marked by a depth and a moral earnestness, but also interpenetrated by an intensity of genuine feeling such as are scarcely paralleled elsewhere. These verses likewise have a point of contact with Amos, in so far as in them the thought is emphasized that moral goodness coincides with humanity ('Das Sittlich-Gute ist auch das Natürlich-Menschliche'); but in another point they go far beyond Amos—in fact, scarcely anywhere in the OT is the essence of true worship expressed so briefly and appropriately as in 6° 'It is said to thee, O man, what is good and what J" requires of thee: to do justice, to love kind ness, and to walk humbly before thy God.

ness, and to walk humbly before thy God.'

MICAIAH.—The Heb. name יסְרָהְרָּה ('who is like J"?') and its abbreviations מְרָבָּה, מִיבְּה, מִיבְּה, מִיבְה are variously rendered in AV; but, with the exception of one instance, the first three words appear in RV as Micaiah. The exception is in Jg 171.4. Here the name מְּכֶּה, which occurs frequently in Jg 17. 18, is found in the longer form מָּכָּהָה, and is rendered Micah for the sake of the unity of the narrative. The LXX equivalents of Micaiah have marketve. The LAX equivalents of Michael have and Meix., the latter being found uniformly in B.

1. Micaiah (τριγκ, Μααχά, AV Michaiah) is the name given in 2 Ch 13² to the mother of Abijah. It is evident from 1 K 15¹, 2 Ch 11², and from LXX, that this is a corruption of Maacah (wh. see). 2. One of the princes of Judah (2 Ch 177) appointed

2. One of the princes of Judan (2 Ch 17-) appointed by Jehoshaphat to superintend religious instruction throughout the kingdom, was called Micaiah (17-)7, Μιχαίας, ΑV Michaiah).

3. Micaiah (17-)7, Μ(ε)ιχαίας) the son of Imlah was a prophet of J" in Israel in the days of Ahab. His name is once (2 Ch 1814) spelt προ (RVm Micaiah). In Secripture history has appears only on Micah). In Scripture history he appears only on the great occasion described in the almost identical narratives of 1 K 22⁴⁻²⁸, 2 Ch 18³⁻²⁷. It is evident, however, from 1 K 22²⁸ || that this was not the beginning of his prophetic activity, and that his former messages had not been favourable to the former messages had not been favourable to the king. Josephus (Ant. VIII. xiv. 5) identifies Micaiah with the prophet who disguised himself after the victory over the Syrians at Aphek, and reproved Ahab for allowing the king of Syria to escape (1 K 20²⁸⁻⁴³); and adds that Ahab, in his displeasure at this, put Micaiah in prison. These statements at least harmonize with the Scripture account, and the identification is not in itself unlikely. itself unlikely.

In LXX 1 K 22 follows 20, and both chapters are derived from a special source (see Kings I. and II., vol. ii. pp. 867, 868) in which Elijah is not mentioned, but which has several references to unamed prophets. In so far as any prophet is mentioned by name, Micaiah may be said in this section to take Elijah's place (Kittel, Hist. Heb., Eng. tr. ii. 275).

On the occasion recorded in Scripture, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, was on a visit to Samaria, phat, king of Judah, was on a visit to Samaria, when Ahab asked his co-operation in recovering Ramoth-gilead, which the Syrians had formerly captured, and which they were now retaining, contrary to the conditions of the latest peace (I K 20³⁴ 22³). Jehoshaphat declared his willingness to join in the expedition, but suggested that at the outset they should 'inquire at the word of J"'. The prophets of Israel, to the number of 400, were accordingly assembled where the two kings sat in royal state at the gate of Samaria. They prophesied unanimously that the undertaking would be successful, and one of them, Zedekiah would be successful, and one of them, Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah, emphasized the prophecy by producing horns of iron as symbols of the conquering might of Ahab and Jehoshaphat. These Israelite prophets posed as prophets of J", and spoke in His name (2 Ch 186 has 'God' instead of 'J"); but Jehoshaphat was doubtful of their true cheroters and saled assignable if there are of 'J''); but Jenosnapnat was unuful of there was not besides a prophet of J' whom they might consult (cf. 2 K 3"). Ahab then mentioned Micaiah for the first time, but added that he hated him, as he was always a prophet of evil-a remark which Jehoshaphat courteously deprecated. A eunuch was sent to fetch Micaiah (who, according to Josephus, was already in prison), and this officer told him of the favourable reply which the 400 prophets had given to the inquiry of the kings, counselling him in a friendly way to answer in the same strain. Micaiah, however, replied boldly that he would speak only what J' should say to him. When he appeared before the kings, and when Ahab asked his counsel, he at tirst echoed ironically the advice of the 400. But Ahab detected the irony; and Micaiah, when pressed for his true opinion, answered in words of solemn imagery, which boded nothing but disaster. He had seen all Israel scattered upon the mountains as sheep that had no shepherd: Jehoshaphat courteously deprecated. A eunuch the mountains as sheep that had no shepherd: and J' had said, 'These have no master, let them return every man to his house in peace.' Besides replying thus to Ahab's immediate question, he went on to pronounce a verdict on the whole situation and on the prophets who were opposed to him. This he did in an account of a remarkable vision. J" sat on a throne, attended by all the host of heaven. He asked who would entice Ahab that he might go and fall at Ramothgilead. A spirit volunteered to do so by being a 'lying spirit' (''') in the mouth of Ahab's prophets. J'' accepted the offer, and sent the spirit forth with a promise of success. Micaiah's concluding message to Ahab, therefore, was that his prophets were false prophets, and that J" had spoken evil concerning him. Zedekiah the son spoken evil concerning him. Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah replied to Micaiah by an insulting blow and a mocking question. The account of Jos. (Ant. VIII. xv. 4) adds that Zedekiah sought to refute Micaiah's prophecy by appealing to the prediction of Elijah (1 K 2119), who had foretold that the dogs should lick Ahab's blood in Jezreel; and that Zedekiah also challenged Micaiah to wither the hand that smote him, as had been done in the case of Jeroboam (1 K 13°). Micaiah warned Zedekiah of the future perils that awaited him, and, when he was carried off by Ahab's orders to suffer rigorous imprisonment, he contented himto suffer rigorous imprisonment, he contented himself by appealing confidently to the issue of events for proof that his prophecy had been true. At this point his history, which may have been continued in the source (Ewald, HI, Eng. tr. iv. 76), breaks off abruptly, and is not resumed. The exordium, 'Hear, ye peoples, all of you,' is apparently an interpolation, taken from Mic 12, and due to a confusion of Micaiah the son of Inlah with the canonical Micai Imlah with the canonical Micah.

Much interest attaches to Micalah's vision. It is not to be taken, of course, as a literal description of an objective scene, but a question may be raised as to how far it shows us the form is which the truths proclaimed by the prophet were first presented to his own mind, and how far he consciously cast these truths into this dramatic shape in order to convey them to others. In regard to such visions it seems best, while allowing for a possible element of literary embellishment, to hold with Davidson (Exchiel xxix.), that they are 'not mere literary invention,' but that the spontaneous working of a prophet's inspired imagination threw truths 'into a physical form, making them stand out before the eye of his phantasy

as if presented to him from without. The vision, with its picture of a scene in heaven, is strikingly similar to the Prologue of Job (16-18 21-5). Another parallel may be found in Zec 8, and the idea of a heavenly assembly is present also in P8 36-7. The account of Micalah's vision-embodies theological conceptions which are strange and even perplexing to the Christian mind. In opposing the 400 prophets Micalah did not question their claim to have J''e inspiration, but simply asserted that this was in their case an inspiration of falsehood. The explanation of this (to us) apparently self-contradictory conception is to be found in the strength of the OT idea that J'' is supreme, and that nothing happens independently of Him. The problems raised by the varied moral quality of events in relation to the holiness of J' were as yet in the background. A 'spirit from J'',' such as the 'lying spirit' of Micalah's vision, signified simply a real Divine influence directing actual events. In this OT view, to use the words of Schultz, 'the Spirit of God is in itself only a wonderful power by which the life of man is regulated... but in itself there is no direct moral element' (Theology of OT, Eng. tr., ii. 20s-20s. See also Dillmann, Alt.-Test. Theol. 304-6; Stanley, Jewish Church, ii. 270). Schultz goes so far as to say (i. 257) that Micalah 'had at first, in accordance with the Divine will, to say what was untrue, because he was aware that God intended to begulle the king.' This, however, seems an exaggeration. If Micalah's first reply had been anything but ironical, it would have been inconsistent with his position as a true prophet of J'', as well as with his declaration to the euunch. In connexion with Micalah's standing as a true prophet, Zedekiah's macking remark deserves to be noticed. Whether we take it as in EV following MT, or in the sense of the LXX reading (*view *views*sens*siv abalieus is *vi.), the implication of the question is the same. Zedekiah did not deny the charge of false ins iration, but instinuated

The whole history of Micaiah presents impressively the contrast between true and false prophecy which became so marked afterwards in phecy which became so marked afterwards in Jeremiah's time. We see in it already some of the features by which, apart from the decisive test of the event, the false could be distinguished from the true. The false prophets relied on the consent of numbers; their message fell in with the royal wishes; and, whatever truth there may be in Josephus' account of Zedekiah's argument from Elijah, it at least illustrates the method of mechanical and mistaken inference from prodicmechanical and mistaken inference from predic-tions already accredited which Jeremiah denounced in the false prophets who were his contemporaries (Jer 7⁴ 23²⁰). Micaiah, on the other hand, was independent, conscious of J"s inspiration, resolute to speak only what J" said to him, indifferent to the anger which his message might excite, and to the personal hardships and dangers he might incur by delivering it. He stands out in this single scene which has been recorded of his life as a solitary and heroic figure, in whom are embodied many of the noblest characteristics of the true prophet, the instrument of God's genuine revelation to men.

4. Micaiah (προ [Keth.], M(ε) καίας or Μικάς; AV, RVm Micah) the Morashtite in Jer 2618 is the same as the canonical prophet MICAH (wh. see).

5. Micaiah (1777), $M(\epsilon)$: xalas or $M(\epsilon \epsilon as, AV Michaiah)$ the son of Gemariah (Jer $36^{11\cdot 13}$) was one of the nobles of Judah in the days of Jeremiah. the fifth year of Jehoiakim he heard Baruch reading the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies in the ears of the people from the chamber of his father Gemarish in the Temple. He then told what he had heard to the other nobles who were gathered in the 'scribes chamber' in the royal palace, and it was his report which led to the subsequent reading of the roll first to the nobles and then to the king.

6. In 2 K 22¹² mention is made of Achbor the son of Micaiah (מִכְהָה Μ(ε)ιχαίας, AV Michaiah, AV m Micah) among the messengers whom Josiah sent to consult Huldah after the discovery of the book of the Law (see ACHBOR). This Micaiah may very possibly have been the same as the son of Gemariah referred to in 5 above. In 2 Ch 34²⁰ 'Achbor the son of Micaiah' appears as 'Abdon the son of Micaiah.'

7. Micaiah (בְּיִרָּה, Μ(ε)εχαιά, AV Michaiah) the son of Zaccur is named (Neh 12⁵⁶) in the Asaphite genealogy of Zechariah the son of Jonathan, one of the priests of Nehemiah's time, who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem. In the parallel genealogy of 1 Ch 9¹³ this Micaiali is called 'Mica (AV Micah) the son of Zichri,' and in those of Neh 11^{17, 23} he appears as 'Mica (AV Micha) the son of Zabdi.' All the lists mention that he had a son called Mattaniah.

8. There was a Micaiah (στο ΑV Michaiah) among Nehemiah's priests themselves (Neh 1241). among Nenemian's priests themselves (Nen 12"). He took part in the dedication of the wall, and is not to be confounded with the ancestor of Zechariah (7 above) mentioned in the same chapter. Neh 12" is omitted in the chief MSS of LXX. Those that have it give this name as Mixaias.

MICHAEL (ἡκρφ 'who is like God?'; on the name see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 157, 165, 181, 210, 221; LXX Μειχαήλ, Μιχαήλ).—1. Father of the Asherite spy, Nu 1313. 2. 3. Two Gadites, 1 Ch 5134. 4. The eponym of a Levitical guild of singers, 1 Ch 640 [Heb. 25]. 5. Name of a family in Issachar, 1 Ch 73 2718 (B Μεισαήλ, Α Μιχαήλ). 6. Eponym of a family of Benjamites, 1 Ch 816. 7. A Manassite chief who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 1220. 8. A son of king Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 212 (B Μεισαήλ, A Μισαήλ). 9. The father of Zebadiah, an exile who returned, Ezr 86, 1 Es 834 (in the latter Μ(ε)ιχάηλος). 10. The archangel. See next article.

MICHAEL (יירָאַל) who is like unto God?'; in the LXX and NT M(e)ιχαήλ) holds a very lofty rôle in Judaism from B.C. 200 onwards. He is one of the seven archangels who execute the commands of God at the final judgment (Eth. Enoch 9020-21), or present the prayers of the saints before God (To 12¹⁵), or who stand in the immediate presence (Rev 1¹ 4⁵ 8²). Michael appears as fourth in the oldest list of the seven: Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, Michael, Suriel, Gabriel, and Remiel (Eth. En. 20). In this list the order is no key to the relative dignity of the angels mentioned; for according to other authorities Michael stands at the head of the four great archangels, who apparently form a class apart, though three of them are members of the sacred seven. These four angels are Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Phanuel (Eth. En. 40° 71), or Michael, Uriel, Raphael, and Gabriel (Eth. En. 91 Gizeh and Syncellus Greek).

We must now consider the various functions assigned to Michael in Judaism and the NT. Thus he appears variously as Israel's angelic patron and warrior, their mediator and likewise lawgiver. With these and other functions of Michael we shall now deal.

 Michael is first mentioned as the angelic patron of Israel. Thus he is called 'your prince,' i.e. the prince of Israel, Dn 10²¹. In 10¹³ he is described as 'one of the chief princes.' All nations have their angelic patrons or guardians (see art. ANGEL, vol. i. ρ . 96), and the destinies of the former are determined by the relations of the latter in heaven. As the end draws nigh the strife grows fiercer, and Michael, Israel's angelic guardian, becomes the great hero of the last days. 'And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which protecteth the children of thy people,' Dn 121. According to Eth. En. 20⁵ he 'is set over the best part of mankind, over the people,' i.e. Israel. As Israel's champion, he is appointed to avenge Israel on their enemies at the close of the world (Assumption of Moses 10²). It is not improbable also that he is referred to in Dn 8¹¹ [LXX and Theod.] under the phrase 'prince of the the Slav. Enoch 22^s, where he is termed 'the chief captain,' and in 33¹⁰ 'the great captain.'

ii. Another hardly less ancient conception is that which regards Michael as the heavenly scribe who entered in the heavenly books the deeds of the angelic patrons of the nations. That the angel who discharges this function is Michael in Eth. En. 90 we infer from two facts: first, this angel is one of the seven archangels (90²²); and, secondly, he is the archangel who helps Israel (90¹⁴). No further record of this function is found till the lat cent. A.D. According to the Ascension of Isaiah 9^{25,27} (Latin), Michael records the deeds of all men in the heavenly books.

iii. Michael seems also to have been regarded as the medium through whom the Law was given. This is clearly stated in the late Apocalypse of Moses I: Διήγησις . . . ἀποκαλυφθείσα . . . Μωϋσῆ . . . ὅτε τὰς πλάκας τοῦ νόμου τῆς διαθήκης ἐκ χειρὶς Κυρίου ἐδέξατο, διδαχθείς ὑπὸ τοῦ ἀρχαγγελου Μιχαήλ. Most probably, therefore, the angel of the presence, who in Jubilees 1π 21 instructs Moses on Mount in deliver to him the tables of the Law is Sinai, and delivers to him the tables of the Law, is to be taken as Michael, and the same identification should no doubt be made in the case of the angel in Ac 728.

iv. A very notable extension of the attributes and offices of Michael is attested in the Similitudes and the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs. Thus he is described as 'the merciful and the long-suffering,' Eth. Enoch 40^{9} (cf. 68^{2-3}), and as 'the angel who intercedeth for the race of Israel and of all the just' (70^{10} $d\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nu$ 70^{10} $\pi\alpha\rho\alpha\iota\tau\alpha\nu\mu\nu\nu\nu\nu$ $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$.), Levi 5, and 'the mediator of God and man for the peace of Israel' ($\mu\nu\sigma\iota\tau\eta\tau$ $\theta\epsilon\sigma\lambda$ $\kappa\alpha$ $d\tau\theta\rho\omega\tau\omega\nu$ $\kappa.\tau.\lambda$.), Dan 6. The same view of Michael appears in the Ascension of Israel 9^{22} (Latin) appears in the Ascension of Isaiah 928 (Latin)

In the NT Michael is mentioned twice by name, Jude Rev 127. In both these passages the conception of Michael belongs to division i. above. Thus what is more fitting than that the angelic patron of Israel should protect the body of Israel's great lawgiver against Satan? Jude", as we are aware, is derived from the Assumption of Moses (see Charles' Assumption of Moses, pp. 105-110). We find elsewhere the burial of Moses attributed to the agency of angels, particularly of Michael, in the Targum of Jonathan on Dt 34.

In the second NT passage (Rev 12⁷⁻⁸) Michael and his hosts go forth to war against the dragon, the old sevent, the second s

'the old serpent' that is called the Devil and Satan. Here the figure of Michael thrusts aside that of the Messiah; for it is Michael and not the Child that overthrows Satan when storming the heavens—a fact which speaks strongly for the Jewish origin of most of Rev 12.

Under division iii. above we have already noticed a possible reference to Michael in Ac 7.5. With the Talmudic conceptions of Michael we with the Talmude conceptions of Michael We have not here to deal. For these the following books may be consulted: Lueken's monograph, Michael, 1898; Weber, Jüdische Theologie², 167-172, 205, 253; Schoettgen, Hor. Heb. i. 1079, 1119, ii. 8, 15 (ed. Dresden, 1742); Hamburger, Real-Encyclopædie für Bibel und Talmud, 1892, pp. 753,

* In Eth. En. 69¹³⁻¹⁷ (a fragment of the Book of Noah) Michael is said to be the guardian of the mysterious magical formula wherewith the heavens and earth were founded.

754. On later Christian conceptions see Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 227-231.

R. H. CHARLES. MICHAL (570 contracted from happ who is like unto God?').—The younger of Saul's two daughters (1 S 14⁴⁰, Μελχόλ). Saul, who was wavering between desire to destroy David and reluctance to promote him to be the king's and in law suddenly gave him to be the king's son-in-law, suddenly gave Merab his eldest daughter to Adriel (1 S 18¹⁹). It now transpired that Michal had fallen in love with David. For a woman to take the initiative in such matters is without a parallel in the Bible, but it suited Saul's designs, and David, on his part, lost no time in providing double (not LXX) the dowry demanded. It should be noted that the LXX (B), followed by Josephus (Ant. VI. x. 2), simplifies the story by omitting the incident about Merab (1 S 18^{17-19, 265}); and Josephus here, and again in Ant. VII. i. 4, misses the point of Saul's again in Ant. VII. i. 4, misses the point of Saul's savage mockery of 'the uncircuncised Philistines' by representing the conditions imposed on David as six hundred heads of Philistines. David was soon to owe his life to the wife whom Saul had designed to 'be a snare to him.' When the emissaries of Saul 'watched the house to kill him' (1 S 19¹¹⁻¹⁷, Ps 59 title), Michal baffled them by letting David down by the window, and delayed pursuit by a clever ruse. Placing the household god in the bed, she covered the supposed sick man's head with a mosquito net (RVm), and finally disarmed Saul's jealous anger by a plausible lie. disarmed Saul's jealous anger by a plausible lie. In this passage the rare word in v.15 'pillow' γτρς (on which see Driver's note) was read τρς (constr. of τρς) 'liver' by the LXX. Josephus (Ant. vi. xi. 4) seems not to have understood the LXX translation of 'teraphim,' τὰ κενοτάφια, for he says that Michal placed in the bed a goat's liver, which, as it pelvisted and shock the bedclethes might as it palpitated and shook the bedclothes, might suggest that David was gasping for breath.

The last scene in which Michal figures (2 S 6¹⁶⁻²⁸)

presents a startling contrast to the time when, for love of David, she had flung aside conventionalities and braved her father's fury. That love was now all changed into coldness and dislike. When from a window in the palace on Mt. Zion Michal looked down on David leaping and dancing before the ark, it was not merely her woman's impatience of the absurd that made her 'despise him in her heart,' or that prompted the sarcasm in which that contempt found utterance later on. To appreciate her daring mockery, and the cold anger of David's rejoinder, we must read them in the light of the years that had passed It is probable that Michal had been happy with Palti, or Paltiel; to whom she had been married on David's banishment (1 S 25¹⁴). From that home she had been torn (2 S 3¹⁵) merely that David might be enabled to claim a sort of hereditary right to the throne, and have by him a living memorial of his early prowess. Now she was but one of many wives, equalled with mere 'hand-maide,' probably neglected. What wonder if the bitter reflexion that she had indirectly facilitated the humiliation of her own family was coupled with a suspicion that David had from the first regarded her merely as a means of self-aggrandisement? It is difficult not to feel some sympathy with Michal; though the historian characteristically sees in her childlessness a punishment for that illomened outburst of spleen on the most glorious day of David's life. The Chronicler omits, as usual, the painful incident, except 2 S 6¹⁶.

It remains to add that in 2 S 21⁸ 'Michal' is an ancient but obvious mistake for 'Merab' (which is read by Luc. and Pesh.). Josephus (Ant. VII. iv. 3) says that Michal returned to her former husband (Palti), whom he does not name, and bore five children. The AV explanation 'brought up' for 'bare' is that of the Targum and Jerome (Qu.

Heb.); and the Targ. on Ru 36 mentions the pious Paltiel, who placed a sword between himself and Michal . . . because he had refused to go in unto her.' Similarly Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 S 254) explains that Paltiel wept for joy because the Lord had kept him from knowing her. He also (Qu. Heb. on 2 S 36 623) mentions a Jewish tradition that Michal is the same as Eglah, who is emphatically styled 'David's wife' because she was his first wife, and that she died when giving birth to a child.

MICHEAS (Micheas), 2 Es 130. — The prophet Micah.

MICHMAS (σρορ).—The form in Ezr 2^{27} (B Mαχμάs, A Χαμμάs) = Neh 7^{31} (A B Μαχεμάs) of the name which appears elsewhere (1 S $13^{2.5.11.16.22}$ $14^{5.21}$, Is 10^{26} , Neh 11^{31}) as Michmash (ερρο). See next article.

MICHMASH (ΕΓΡΡ); in Ezr 2²⁷, Neh 7²¹ οργρ; LXX Μαχ(ε)μάς; Josephus Μαχμά; Vulg. Machmas).

—A town in the tribe of Benjamin east of Bethel and Beth-aven (1 S 13th, cf. Jos 7²). In OT it is called nine times Michmash (1 S 13²⁷. 14⁵. 11, 10²⁸, Neh 11³¹) and twice Michmas (Ezr 2²⁷, Neh 7²¹). In 1 Mac 9⁷³ AV has Machmas, RV Michmash. Michmash is mentioned only in connexion with the war of Saul and Jonathan with the Philistines, the (ideal) invasion of Judah by the Assyrians the (ideal) invasion of Judah by the Assyrians described by Isaiah, and as the seat of government of Jonathan Maccabæus.

It still bears the name Mukhmas, and stands in the mountains of Judah about 7 miles north of Jerusalem on the eastern slopes at an altitude of 2000 ft. above the Mediterranean Sea, about 900 ft. below Bethel, which is situated on the backbone of the country. Though located in the midst of the tribe of Benjamin, it is not mentioned in the list of the towns of that tribe.

Michniash is first mentioned as the headquarters of Saul, who, on being made king over Israel, came up from Gilgal, and with two thousand men occupied the mountains of Bethel, while Jonathan with a thousand men occupied Gibeah of Benjamin, a stronghold about 4 to 5 miles north of Jerusalem; between them lay a strong mountain fortress, Geba, occupied as an outpost by the Philistines. Jonathan, with his characteristic intrepidity and impulsiveness, smote the Philistine garrison (? 272) at Geba. On hearing of this, the Philistines of the Shephëlah got ready for battle, and coming up with great multitudes of sharing and, coming up with great multitudes of chariots and horsemen and swarms of footmen, drove the badly armed Hebrews out of the hill-country about Bethel, and pitched their camp at Michmash, east of Beth-aven, opposite to Geba, which was occupied by Jonathan.

The Hebrews were greatly perturbed at this invasion of their lands, and some fled beyond Jordan, while others hid in caves and cisterns, and many assembled at Gilgal with Saul in fear and many assembled at Gligal with Saul in lear and trembling. Saul, fearing that the Philistines would pursue him even to Gilgal, disobeyed the directions given to him by Saunuel, and, after a very unsatisfactory interview with the prophet, abode with Jonathan at Geba (13¹⁶ RV, not Gibeah as AV; but see vol. ii. 116⁵, 169^a) of Benjamin with only six hundred badly armed men.

The Philistines sent out three companies east, west, and north to spoil the lands of the Hebrews, much to the distress of Saul and Jonathan, who were not strong enough to prevent it. Jonathan now secretly devised a scheme (14^{1st}) for dividing the Philistines against themselves and securing their arms for the defenceless Hebrews, and with this intent he left the camp at Gibeah (v.2) during the night, unknown to Saul and the garrison, and in company with only his armour-bearer set out on

They descended the rocky crag called Senneh, protecting Geba to the north, and, arriving at the bottom of a deep valley, found the precipitous cliff of Bozez terminating Michmash, facing them to the north. Here Jonathan, having ascertained that the young man with him would be faithful to death, disclosed his plans, an expanded account of which is given by Josephus (Ant. VI. vi. 2). The camp of the Philistines was on the spur of a hill, with three plateaus shelving down, one below the other, with precipitous sides and terminating in the rocky crag of Bozez; and at this point the outposts of the enemy were neglectful of their watch, because they thought it impossible that any one would ascend this crag. Jonathan therefore discovered himself just after daybreak to some other Philistine outposts, who called out to the Hebrews to come up and receive the chastisement due to them. This invitation Jonathan considered to be a favourable omen, and retiring out of their sight, with the aid of his comrade, by great labour and difficulty, scaled the heights of Bozez and fell upon its outpost (while they slept?), slaying about twenty of them. The Philistines, waking up in the dim light of dawn, could not imagine that there were only two Hebrews at work; but supposing they were surprised by a strong force, and being of different tribes, and suspecting each other to be the enemy, fought against one another, as so often happened on other occasions, and some of them died in battle, while others threw away their armour and fled, many of them being thrown down the rocks headlong. When the watchmen of Geba saw that the multitude of the Philistines melted away from Michmash they reported it to Saul, who went out to battle with his six hundred. The Hebrews that were in hiding in the rocks came out, and those who were with the l'hillistines also turned from them, so that Saul found himself suddenly in command of a large force (Josephus says ten thousand men), all fully equipped with the arms of the slaughtered or fleeing Philistines; and they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to Aijalon.

Benjamin was now in peaceful possession of Michmash, and there is no further record of it until the time of the Assyrians' threatened march on Jerusalem in the reign of king Hezekiah, spoken of by Isaiah (10²²). Sennacherib is depicted as coming along the northern road from Samaria against Jerusalem, along the backbone of the mountain chain; but instead of passing south from Bethel to Beeroth he turns aside to the eastern slopes towards Ai, and passing Migron (the precipice) lays up his baggage (AV carriages) at Michmash, because they could go no farther in a southerly direction. See, further, MIGRON. The Philistines, when they brought their chariots to Michmash, came from the west. their chariots to Michmash, came from the west. The host of Sennacherib then go on foot to Geba, where they make a lodgment. They arrive here over the passage or pass of Michmash, mentioned as the place where the Philistine garrison was encamped before Geba when Jonathan scaled the crag Bozez (1 S 13²³ 14⁴). The town Makaz (1 K 4⁹) is given by the LXX as May(e)µás. See Makaz. Ezra relates (2²⁷, Neh 7³¹) that one hundred and twenty-two men of Michmas came with Zerubbabel out of the Captivity unto Jerusalem and Judah.

Judah. When Bacchides returned to Antioch with his army from Judea, after having been so rudely repulsed by Jonathan Maccabeus, Michmash was made the seat of government, and Jonathan dwelt there, 1 Mac 973.

Eusebius and Jerome describe Machmas as large village 9 miles distant from Jerusalem and not far from Ramah (Onomast. s. 'Machmas'). In the Middle Ages the site of Michmash was removed to el-Bireh (Beeroth). Cf. Brocardus, c. 7; Quaresmius, ii. p. 786; Maundrell.

The Mishna describes Michmash as famous for its barley, giving rise to the Talmudic proverb 'to bring barley to Michmash' (Reland, Pal. 897).

The great valley west of Ai, which runs to Jericho as the Wady Kelt, becomes a narrow gorge, south side of this great chasm stands Jeba (Geba of Benjamin) on a rocky knoll, with caverns beneath the town and arable land to the east. neath the town and arable land to the east. Looking across the valley, the stony hills and white chalky slopes present a desolate appearance; and on the opposite side, considerably lower than Jeba, is the little village of Mukhmás (Michmash), on a sort of saddle backed by an open and fertile corn valley (Conder, Tent - Work in Palestine, ii. 112). With regard to the description of Michmach by Lecophus Conder states if Fractly of Michmash by Josephus, Conder states, 'Exactly such a natural fortress exists immediately east of the village of Michmash, and it is still called the fort by the peasantry. It is a ridge rising in thin rounded knolls above a perpendicular crag, ending in a narrow tongue to the east with cliffs below, and having an open valley behind it, and a saddle towards the west on which Michmash itself is situated. Opposite this fortress to the south there is a crag of equal height, and seemingly impassable: thus the description of the Old Testament is fully borne out' (1 S 144). 'The picture is unchanged since the days when Jonathan looked over the white camping-ground of the Philistines, and Bozez must then have shone as brightly as it does now, in the full light of an Eastern sun. To any one looking over the valley it seems a most difficult feat to cross it, and, in the words of Josephus, "it was considered impossible not of Josephus, "it was considered impossible not only to ascend to the camp on that quarter, but even to come near it" (Tent-Work in Pal. ii. 113). Mukhmās is a small stone village. The water supply is from cisterns, with a well to each. On the north are rock-cut tombs. There are foundations and remains of former buildings in the village, and the mesonry of what appears to the village, and the masonry of what appears to have been a church (SWP vol. iii.).

MICHMETHAH (אוס with art.).—The name of a place on the north border of Ephraim, to the Luc. els 'Αχθώθ) 17' (where 'πι της of MT is represented in B by Δηλανάθ, A and Luc. άπὸ 'Ασθω Μαχθώθ). From the circumstance that the art. is Maχθώθ). From the circumstance that the art. is prefixed, Siegfried-Stade suggest that 'an may not be a proper name, but an appellative. If so, its meaning must remain obscure, as the meaning of the root [כמת] is quite unknown. The name may perhaps exist in a corrupt form as Mukhnah, applying to the plain east of Shechem. The change may be compared with that which has certainly taken place in the case of Michmash (mod. Mukhmas), and the change of n for m is not infrequent in Aramaic as compared with Hebrew. But Mukhnah may also stand for mahaneh 'camp,' a term applied in two cases (Mahanaim and Mahaneh-dan) to plains. Buhl (GAP 202) conjectures that Michmethah may be Khirbet kefr besta, between Sichem and Ta'na. C. R. CONDER.

#ICHRI (٦٥٠).—Eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 96 (B Maxeip, A Moxopé, Luc. Maxeipi).

MIDDIN (1770; B apparently Alvár, A Madár, Luc. Madácle).—A town in the wilderness (midbar) of Judah, Jos 15⁶¹. The site has not been recovered. If we might suppose 1775 to be an early clerical error for 770, the site of Mird on the plateau S.W. of Jericho would be a likely one. This was at one time occupied by a monastery. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xviii. C. R. CONDER.

MIDDLEMOST, MIDLAND.—The Heb. word אַכינוֹן tikhon, usually translated 'middle,' is rendered 'middlemost' in Ezk 42°. The tr. comes from Cov., and RV retains it. Cf. Jer. Taylor, Works, ii. 65, 'Truth hath a mysterious name, . . consists of three letters [i.e. now], the first and the last and the middlemost of the Hebrew letters.'

Midland is still in use as an adj., and as a subst. in the pl. 'the Midlands.' As a sing. subst. it occurs in 2 Mac 8²⁵ 'he came like a fugitive servant through the midland (1611 'mid land') unto Antioch' (διλ τῆς μεσογείου). RV retains the word, but mod. Eng. is 'interior.'

The form middest for 'midst' often occurs in the early editions of AV. Mod. editions spell 'midst.' Cf. Fuller, Holy State, 260, 'Two eyes see more then one, though it be never so big, and set (as in Polyphemus) in the middest of the fore-head.' Other forms are, besides 'midst' itself, 'midest' (Jth 6¹¹), 'middes' (Ps 116¹⁹, Ac 27²¹, Ph 2¹⁵), and 'mids' (Jer 37¹², Three ^{27, 66}, Sus ^{34, 66}). J. HASTINGS.

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES (1770).—A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 25¹⁻⁴, 1 Ch 1^{22, 23}), and the name of by Keturah (Gn 25¹⁻⁴, 1 Ch 1^{32, 32}), and the name of the nation of which he is reckoned the progenitor. The plural συχτρ occurs Gn 37²⁸, Nu 25¹⁷ 31² only. In Gn 37³⁸ συχτρ is probably a variant of συχτρ, and refers to the same people as in v. ³⁰. The LXX have the same rendering in both verses. Τρο οccurs Nu 10²⁸, but elsewhere the nation or the country is called τρο, LXX Μαδιάμ (but B has Μαδιάν in Nu), Vulg. Madian, and in Jth 2²⁸, Ac 7²⁹, AV has Madian. Other renderings of LXX are Μαδιηναίου Gn 37^{28, 26}, Nu 25¹⁷ Μαδιανείται, Nu 10²⁸ 31². Both AV and RV have Midian or Midianites in OT. or Midianites in OT.

In connexion with the genealogies of Gn 25, three points may be noted.

(a) The name Keturah. The meaning of the word is either incense or the perfumed one (cf. Ca 3* perfumed with myrrh or frankincense), and may imply that the tribes descended from her may imply that the tribes descended from her were occupied in the production of incense and spices, or were traders in these articles. It will be remembered that the merchantmen (described as Midianites in Gn 37) who carried Joseph into Egypt are represented as bearing 'spicery and balm and myrrh' (v. 25), and that the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah are mentioned as bringing and and inconse (la 606) gold and incense (Is 606).

(b) The relationship between Midian and the Israelites. The genealogy, by tracing the descent of both nations from Abraham, acknowledges kinship, but assigns separate territory to each (Gn 25°). But among the descendants of Midian are Ephah, Epher, and Hanoch. Ephah is most interest that the control of th mentioned twice in genealogies connected with Judah 1 Ch 2^{st. 47}, Epher in connexion with Judah 1 Ch 4¹⁷, and with the half-tribe of Manasseh on E. of Jordan 1 Ch 5²⁴. Hanoch is the name of Reuben's eldest son. This similarity of names (note that they belong to frontier tribes) may point to further alliances between the Midianites and Israel. The marriage of Moses with a Midianite woman is recorded without disap-proval, and it may be but one of many similar unions of which no record has been preserved.

(c) The distinction between the Midianites and the descendants of Ishmael. This distinction, the descendants of Ishmael. This distinction, clearly indicated in the genealogy of Gn 25 (cf. v.⁵ with v.⁹), is not so marked elsewhere, for in Gn 37 the merchantmen who carried Joseph into Egypt are described both as Ishmaelites and Midianites (cf. v.²⁶ with v.²⁶ and v.²⁶), and in Jg 8²⁴ the same interchange of names occurs.

The Midianites appear in Gn as traders moving about in companies with camels. In the earlier chapters of Ex they are described as a pastoral people tending their flocks. Moses flees from the face of Pharaoh to Midian, is hospitably received by Jethro the priest, and marries his daughter Zipporah. While Israel is at Sinai, Jethro visits his son-in-law, and at their departure from Sinai Moses begs him to accompany them, but he declines. The descendants of Jethro continued their friendly relations with the children of Israel, for in the time of the Judges they are found dwelling in the land (Jg 1¹⁶ 4^{11. 17}), and Saul shows favour to them because of the services which they rendered to the Israelites in the wilderness (1 S 15°). In these passages they are called Kenites. Towards the end of the journeyings, when Israel is on the E. side of the Jordan, Midianites are acting in concert with Moab in procuring the services of Balaam; they tempt Israel to idolatry and lewdness, and are defeated with great slaughter [Nu 22, 25⁶⁻¹⁸ 31, with ref. in Jos 13²¹.

The character of the Midianites as here portrayed is very different from that presented in the people, with Jethro their priest acknowledging and praising the God of Abraham (Ex 18⁹⁻¹²), the children of Israel are now confronted with a nation of idolaters, on whom they are bidden to take vengeance. These varied aspects under which Midian is presented to us may be accounted for by supposing that the name of Midian was applied to a number of clans spreading over a large area, some of whom settled down peacefully, tending their flocks, while others were of a roving

Due regard must also be had to the fact that the accounts of the Midianites are derived from different sources. The chapters which refer to Jethro are assigned to JE, and Nu 25⁵⁻¹⁵ and 3t to P. Nu 31¹⁵ states that the action of the Midianites described in 25⁶⁻¹⁵ was prompted by the counsel of Balaam. In the account of Balaam (Nu 22-24) the elders of Midian are mentioned twice at the commencement (Nu 29¹.7) but twice at the commencement (Nu 224.7), but throughout the rest of the section Balak and the princes of Moab are represented as treating with Balaam, and there is no further reference to Midian. Some commentators are of opinion that this cursory mention of Midian implies the existence of a document which gave further details about the conduct of Midian on this occasion, some of which are preserved in Nu 25 and 31 (cf. Jos. Ant. IV. vi. 6–13). Another view is that Midian is inserted in Nu 22 on harmonistic grounds.

The account of Gideon is also a composite one, and it is generally allowed that Jg 61-83 and Jg 84-21 are from different sources, though the contrast between the two sections has been exaggerated treat between the two sections has been exagging. As the Midianites disappear from history after their defeat by Gideon, it is possible that later writers may have employed the name of Midian in a less exact manner, as a general designation of ancient foes of Israel. The peculiar character of Nu 31 will not escape the notice of the thoughtful reader. The ideal picture of a holy war there portrayed may remind him of that symbolical treatment of Midian as the spiritual enemy which is to be found both in Jewish and Christian writers.

Yet another characteristic of Midian, which distinguishes nomad tribes even to the present day, appears prominently in the Book of Judges: they made raids upon their neighbours at harvest time and stripped the land bare, coming as grasshoppers for multitude with their tents and camels as far as Gaza. The story of their defeat by Gideon is told in Jg 6-8. He not only drives them out of Western Palestine, but pursues them on the east side of the Jordan, captures their two chiefs Zebab and Zelmunne, and takes yen. two chiefs Zebah and Zalmunna, and takes vengeance on them for their slaughter of his brethren by putting them to death (Jg 8¹⁸⁻²¹) (see GIDEON).

The memory of this great deliverance was cherished by the people. Isaiah uses the phrase 'day of Midian' to describe the joy of Israel when the rod of his oppressor is broken (Is 9⁴ 10³⁶), and the Pralmist property that the committee of his and the Psalmist prays that the enemies of his nation may be put to shame and perish, as were the Midianites and their chiefs Zebah and Zalmunna (Ps 839. 11). A victory over Midian by Edom in the field of Moab is recorded (Gn 36²⁶, 1 Ch 1²⁶), but its date cannot be determined. The only other references to Midian are 1 K 11¹⁸, and in the 'prayer of Habakkuk, 'Hab 37.

Extent and position of territory.—The accounts Extent and position of territory.—The accounts given in Nu and Jg imply that the Midianites occupied country to the E. and S.E. of Palestine. In the genealogy (Gn 25°) Midian and the sons of Abraham other than Isaac are sent away into the east country, and in Jg 6° Midian is associated with the children of the East. This is the only direct evidence of position afforded in the OT, and it indicates a territory E. of the Jordan and of the Arabah. Moab and Edom occupied the country on the E. and S.E. of Palestine from the river Arnon to the head of the Gulf of Akabah. There would remain, therefore, for Midian a tract of country to the N. of Arabia, and on the E. shore of the Gulf of Akabah, with freedom to roam northwards along the E. boundary of Edom and Moab. In this region Ptolemy mentions (vi. 7) a city Moδίανα on the E. shore of the Red Sea (i.e. the Gulf of Akabah), and another Μαδίαμα situated inland. The former of these corresponds in position with the Madian of Onom. Sac. (136. 31, p. 168, ed. Lagarde) and with the Medyen of Arab writers, who locate there the well of Moses from which he watered the flocks of his father in law. Classical writers give no information about Midian. Josephus says that Moses in his flight came to a city of Midian, lying on the Red Sea, so called from one of Abraham's sons by Keturah (Ant. II. i. 1). Philo considers Midianites to be an ancient name of the Arabians (de Fortitudine, ii. and the Mangey). In recent times the country on the E. shore of the Gulf of Akabah has been explored by Sir R. Burton. The account of his first journey is given in The Gold Mines of Midian, 1878, and of his second in The Land of Midian, 1878, and of his second in the The Land of Midian, 1878, and of his second in the The L Midian Revisited, 1879. In the first book he gives a resume of Jewish tradition with reference to Midian (c. vii.), and, in the second, extracts from Egyptian papyri and Arabic writers are collected

No reference has been made in the geographical part of this article to passages in Exodus. The only geographical detail which these passages supply is relative, viz. that Mt. Sinai or Horeb was in or in close proxingly to Midian. If from other considerations the position of Sinai be determined, then an additional fact is known concerning the territory of Midian. If the traditional situation of Sinai be accepted, then Midianites must have moved westwards into the peninsula between the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Akabah. Remembering the wide area over which the Midianites roved, such a migration is not improbable. But this proximity of Sinai to Midian may be urged in favour of assigning to Sinai a position E. of the Arabah, thereby assigning a uniform geographical position to Midian and rendering the hypothesis of migration unnecessary. Other considerations in support of this view may be briefly indicated:—

(1) The poetical references to Sinai, Dt 332, Jg 54. 5, Hab 33, imply that the writers regarded Sinai and Sec. as contiguous.

(2) The geographical note (Dt 12) and the account of Elijah's visit to Horeh (1 K 19—the only visit recorded in the OT outside the Pentateuch) supply no definite data for assigning a position to Sinai. The same may be said of Josephus' account of Elijah (Ant. vIII. xiii. 7) and of his other references to Sinai (II. xii. 1, (Aft. vill. XIII. 1) sand to all III. v. 1).

(3) The peninsula at the time of the Exodus was part of Egypt, or inhabited by Egyptian settlers. A journey due east (in the direction of the modern hajj route) would lead the Israelites most quickly to safety, whereas that to the traditional Sinai would bring them again into contact with their Egyptian enemies.

would oring them again into contact with their Egyptas enemies.

(4) Elim may be a variant of Elath or Eloth, and a place of this name is on the Gulf of Akabah. The encampment by the sea following suits this position very well.

(5) The absence of satisfactory identification of any of the stations on the road to or from Sinai. Cf. Exodus and Journey to Canaan, §§ ii. iii., and separate articles.

The question as to the position of Sinai is discussed by Sayce, HCM p. 264 ff. St. Paul's reference, Gal 4th, to Sinai in Arabia is not conclusive as to the position of Sinai, for the boundary of Arabia towards the W., according to Herodotus, reaches to the canal dug by Necho and Darius, and includes part of the coastline of the Mediterranean to the S. of Gaza (Herod. iii. 5, iv. S9). The LXX speak of Goshen as \(\text{Figure} \text{Arabia} \text{Arabia} \text{may} then include territory as far west as the modern canal. See Arabia, Goshen, Sinai.

midianitish woman (numer), Nu 256-18, by name Cozbi, the daughter of Zur, was brought into the camp of Israel by Zimri the son of Salu. The parents of both were persons in high station. The people were weeping before the door of the tent of meeting (v. s, and from vv. s it appears that a plague was raging among Israel at the time); and Phinehas, enraged at this profanation of the camp, thrust both of them through with a spear ('javelin' AV). His zeal was rewarded by the promise of an everlasting priesthood to him and to his seed after him (vv. 10-13). The plague was stayed after 24,000 had been slain.

This account (vv. 6-18) belongs to P. According to Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. p. 114), it is placed here after the Balaam section because it was originally connected with an account of Balaam, in which he appears as the counsellor of Midian, advising them to tempt Israel by means of their daughters. This part of the narrative has been replaced by the account in vv.1-5 of Israel's connexion with Moab, and joining themselves to Baal-peor (JE). Here the daughters of Moab make Israel to sin, stress is laid on sacrifice and worship to strange gods, and the 'judges' carry out the sentence. But Kuenen doubts whether, in joining the two accounts together, so interesting a detail would have been entirely suppressed, and is disposed to think that Balaam's name did not occur in the original introduction to the story of the Midianitish woman. This is certain, that the two accounts in Nu 25 are from different sources, that they are incomplete, and that emendation must be they are incomplete, and that emendation must be conjectural. It is probable that vv. 16-18 have been added by way of introduction to the account of Nu 31. For further details the writers above mentioned may be consulted, and Dillmann's commentary on the chapter. A. T. CHAPMAN. commentary on the chapter.

MIDRASH.—See Commentary.

MIDWIFE (n.γ.), μαῖα, obstetrix. — Midwives must have been employed among the Hebrews from a comparatively early period (Gn 35¹⁷ 38²⁵, Ex 1¹⁵⁶.); but it would appear that Hebrew women usually had little difficulty in childbirth, and that such assistance was not always required (Ex 1¹⁹). In some cases the necessary service was rendered by friends or relatives (1 S 4²⁰), as is still the custom in many parts of the East. From the fact that in Ex 1 only two Hebrew midwives are spoken of, it may perhaps be inferred that they were not a numerous class.

A word used in the narrative of Exodus has given rise to some difficulty. CAR 'obnayim—a dual form meaning apparently 'the double stone'—occurs again only in Jer 183, where it is applied to the 'potter's wheel.' In Ex 116 it can hardly denote anything but a special kind of stool used by women in labour. Gesenius (Thesaurus, p. 17) doubted the early invention of such a contrivance, and interpreted the word of a stone bath in which the child was washed; but the study of medicine had made considerable progress in Egypt in very early times; birth-stools of various patterns have been employed in many parts of the world (Ploss, Das Weih?, ii. 35, 179 ff.); and at the present day in Egypt a chair of peculiar form, called the Knesee elwiliadch, is still in common use (Lane, Modern Egyptians (1871), ii. 241).

The meaning of the names Shiphrah and Puah is quite uncertain; also whether they are of Hebrew or of Egyptian origin. The statement that 'God made for these women houses' (Ex 121) must refer to their numerous or prosperous families, which were regarded as a reward for their upright and courageous conduct towards their Hebrew patients.

MIGDAL-EL (ἡχ-ὑμρ; B Μεγαλααρείμ, A Μαγδαλιπωράμ, the following name Horem being incorporated).—'The Tower of God,' a town of Naphtali (Jos 19²⁸) between Iron and Horem. The exact site is uncertain, though Eusebius (Onom.
s.v.) places it between Dora (Tantūra) and Ptolemais (Acre), and 9 miles from the first. In this case it would correspond with Athlit. But the territory of Naphtali did not extend so far, and the site must rather be looked for in one of the numerous Mejdels of N. Palestine. See, further, Dillm. Jos. ad loc.

MIGDAL-GAD (1) 'τουρ' tower of Gad'; B Μαγαδὰ Γάδ, A Μαγδὰλ Γ.; Vulg. Magdal-Gad).—Mentioned only (Jos 15³⁷) in the list of the cities of the lot of Judah, together with Zenan and Hadashah, neither of which has been identified. It is one of the group of sixteen cities which are found in various parts of the Shephēlah, so that there is no clue as to the position. Of the same group, Makkedah, Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah have been found to the north, Lachish and Eglon to the south, and Socoh, Adullam, Azekah, and Jarmuth to the east of the Shephēlah. The name, the 'Tower of Gad' ('Fortune'), may refer to the ancient worship of Gad (good luck or fortune) among the Canaanites. Gesenius conjectures that Gad was the planet Jupiter. In the north of Palestine the modern representation of Baal-gad is conjectured (BRP iii. 409) to be Bāniās, which is known to have been the sanctuary of Pan; but there is nothing whatever at present known of the remains in the Shephēlah to allow of any conjectures concerning Migdal-gad.

of any conjectures concerning Migdal-gad. There is a town named Mejdel about 2½ miles north-east of Ashkelon ('Askalan') which is suggested as possibly the site of Migdal-gad, solely from the resemblance of the first portion of the name. It is the most important modern town of the district (Nahiet el-Mejdel), has a good weekly market, and a population of about 1500 inhabitants. There is a bazaar in the town; rope-making is carried on outside; the inhabitants are traders, rich and prosperous, and there is a bustle and activity about the place contrasting with most towns in Palestine. There is a mosque with a very conspicuous minaret, seen for a long distance inland. The houses are of mud, the water supply from wells and a pond to the east, where there is also a grove of palms. To the north are olive groves with large trees, and it is a rich corn country. The sandy dunes are encroaching on the west close on to the town.

Eusebius and Jerome (Onom.) mention Magdala, but give no information. This town may be the Magdolon (Μάγδολον) mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 159) where Pharaoh-necho conquered the Syrians (B.C. 608). As the conquest of Cadytis (Jerusalem?) follows, it is usually conjectured that the Magdolon of Herodotus is the Migdol of the Old Testament (Ex 14², Nu 33⁷), situated in Lower Egypt (Eusebius, Prap. Evang. ix. 15).

C. WARREN,

MIGDOL (לְּבְּיִלִים, לְּבִּיְּבִילְּם, Μάγδωλον), the name of one or more places on the frontier of Egypt. The word is Semitic, and means 'tower'; it is commonly found in composition, as in the names Migdal-el, Migdal-eder, Migdal-gad. Similarly in Egyp. inscriptions of the 19th and 20th Dynasties, at a time when many Semitic words were adopted into the hieroglyphic vocabulary, the word occurs compounded with the names of different Pharaohs, etc., to designate what appear to have been fortresses on the eastern frontier. In OT, however, the simple form Migdol is always found whenever the place in question is in Egypt.

Egypt.
In Ex 14³, Nu 33⁷ 'Migdol' refers to a place situated between Goshen and the Red Sea, and near the spot where the Israelites crossed the latter. According to a papyrus, there was in this region, near Succoth, a Migdol of the Pharaoh

In Jer 44¹ and 46¹⁴ Migdol, Noph (Memphis), and Tahpanhes (Daphnae) are named as the cities in which the Jews dwelt in Egypt, together with the country of Pathros (the south country, or Upper Egypt). Ezekiel twice mentions Migdol as the N.E. extremity of the country, the other extremity being Syene ('from Migdol to Syene,' the marginal rendering in Ezk 29¹⁰ 30⁵, preferable to AV and RV). One of the principal routes from Palestine passed along the Wady Tumilat; it is possible that the Migdol of Ex was the first station in Egypt on this route from Syria, and was thus considered as marking the N.E. frontier. But a Roman Itinerary mentions a Magdolo nearer the coast, only 12 miles south of Pelusium, and this situation (perhaps at the modern Tell el-Her) agrees still better with the biblical indications. Mashtûl. the present form in which the name Migdol occurs in Egypt, is derived through the Coptic; it is found as a village-name three times—twice in the eastern Delta, and once in Middle Egypt. But none of these Mashtûls can be identified with a biblical Migdol.

MIGRON (ἡτῷ; B Μαγών, Luc. Μαγεδδώ).—1. A place in Benjamin, in the neighbourhood of Gibeah (1 S 14²). There are reasons for suspecting that the vocalization of the MT is incorrect, and that a proper name should not be read here at all. The Syr. read τὰς 'by the threshing-floor,' and Wellh. (Sam. ad loc.) proposes τρῶς, with the same meaning. This is accepted by Budde (in SBOT), who objects to Klostermann's emendation ἐτρῷς 'in the common-land,' that this is hardly an old enough word to be used here. If τρῶς be taken as a proper name, it is a question whether it is to be identified with—2. Migron of Is 10²8 (B Μαγεδώ, i.e. Megiddo, which of course is out of the question). The prophet, in his (ideal) description of the Assyrian invasion, mentions Migron as one of the stages in the march of the enemy, and appears to place it north of Michmash, and thus at a considerable distance from Gibeah (cf. v.²). W. R. Smith, indeed, proposes (Journ. of Philol. 13, 62 ff.) to identify with the Migron of 1 S 14², south of the Wady Suweinst, by supposing that the Assyrian, before marching through the pass, is pictured as seizing by a coup-de-main this position at its southern end. This is accepted by Driver (Isaiah², p. 72), but Dillmann and Buhl both object to it as too artificial, and agree in locating Isaiah's Migron at the modern Makrun, about ½ mile S.E. of the village of Burka (cf. Baedeker-Socin, Pal.² 121).

MIJAMIN (19:19 and 19:19).—1. One of those who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10²³ (B' Αμαμείν, A Μεαμίμ, called in 1 Es 9²⁶ Maelus). 2. Eponym of the 6th of the priestly courses, 1 Ch 24⁹ (B Βενιαμείν, A Μειαμείν). This family returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12⁵ (κ^{α-2} Μειμίν), and was represented at the sealing of the covenant 10⁷ (B Μιαμείμ, A Μιαμείν) = Miniamin of Neh 12¹⁷.

MIKLOTH (Μύρρ).—1. A son of Jeiel, 1 Ch 8²⁰ = 9^{571.}. The words 'and Mikloth' (Μύρρι) have probably been dropped at the end of 8³¹ (Β καὶ Μακαλώθ). In 9⁵⁷ they are found both in MT and LXX (Β Μακελλώθ, Α Μακεδώθ). 2. An officer of David, 1 Ch 27⁴. There is a strong suspicion that the MT is corrupt. The name is wanting in LXX (ΒΑ).

MILCAH (π/τρ, Μελχά).—1. Daughter of Haran, and wife of Nahor who was her uncle, "Gn 1129. The names of her children are given in 22-207. Rebekah was her granddaughter, 2415-24. 47. All these passages proceed from J. Nöldeke (ZDMG klii. 484) conjectures that Milcah may be the same name as π/τρ, the goddess worshipped by the Phœnicians. Ball (SBOT) thinks it possible that π/τρ and π/τρ: (also Gn 1129) may be phonetic or dialectic variants of the same (tribal or local) name; cf. Δπ/τρ=Assyr. Kaldu. 'The weakening and disappearance of m is a well-known feature of Babylonian.' This, however, appears somewhat precarious. See, further, art. IsCAH.

2. Daughter of Zelophehad, Nu 262 271 3611, Jos 173 (all P). There can be little doubt that Kuenen is right in pronouncing Zelophehad's 'daughters' to be really towns, and, if the above conjecture of Nöldeke be correct, Milcah may be an abbreviated form of Beth-milcah (see Gray, Hcb. Prop. Names, p. 116).

MILDEW (ppr. yerakôn, δχρα, rubigo). — This word occurs with prove shiddāphôn, ἀνεμοφθορία, αëre corruptus (Dt. 282, 1 K 827, 2 Ch 628, Am 42, Hag 211). Yêrākôn signifies 'yellowness' or 'pallor' (cf. Arab. yerakân = 'jaundice'). It is in contrast with shiddāphôn, which signifies the drying up or scorching of the grain or fruit by heat, during the siroccos or khamsîn winds. Mildew consists of various species of parasitic fungi, which grow at the expense of their host, and suck out the juices of the grain or fruit, and so destroy them. As shiddāphôn is due to excessive drought, yērākôn is due to excessive moisture. They are both peculiarly liable to occur in a climate marked by

MILE .- See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MILETUS (Μίλητοι) was in very early times the most famous and important of the Ionian cities, an ancient Greek colony on the coast of Caria. It was situated at the southern end of the sea entrance to the gulf into which the river Mæander formerly emptied itself. But the silt which the river carries with it has entirely filled up the gulf, and forced the coastline far out to sea. Hence the modern Palatia, which marks the site of Miletus, is about 5 or 6 miles from the sea, and Lade, which in the time of Strabo (A.D. 19) was an island in front of the harbour of Miletus, is now a small hill in the low alluvial plain. Once the greatest Greek city in Asia, Miletus was a second-rate town under the Romans, and now is, and is likely always to continue, an obscure village or a ruin. Our ignorance of the exact truth as to the situation of Miletus in relation to the coastline about the middle of the 1st cent. makes the circumstances narrated in Ac 20¹⁵-21¹ rather obscure. The present coastline extends nearly direct northwards on the west side of the site of Miletus. But in A.D. 19 Miletus was situated on the south coast of a gulf of irregular shape (Λατμικός Kόλποι), which extended far into the country east-wards. The south-eastern extremity of this gulf is now a lake. The rest of the gulf is now land, often swampy, through which the Mæander flows in two arms—one keeping near the north side of the low alluvial plain, and one near the south side. The southern arm in its upper part seems to be the channel of the ancient river. The two arms unite channel of the ancient river. The two arms unite close on the north-west side of the site of Miletus, and flow into the sea by one mouth. We do not know the exact line of the coast about A.D. 50; but Strabo gives a rough idea of its situation 30 years earlier.

Thus, in modern times, a messenger could easily be sent by land straight north from Miletus to Ephesus. But in ancient times a foot-messenger would have to make an immense circuit: for example, he would have to traverse about 110 stadia from Miletus to Heracleia, and 100 from Heracleia to Pyrrha, whereas the sea-crossing from Miletus to Pyrrha was only 30 stadia. Pyrrha was 50 stadia south of the mouth of the Mæander, which joined the sea between Pyrrha and Priene. At the present day Priene is 12 miles from the coast. The coastline on to Priene is not stated by Strabo, but it must have been more than 100 stadia. Hence the foot-messenger would have a journey of over 360 stadia from Miletus to Priene (45 miles), whereas the straight line across the gulf is barely 100 stadia (12½ miles). From Priene to Ephesus, the land road across the mountains cannot be less than 25 miles, though the air line is under 20. St. Paul's messenger, then, probably sailed to Priene and walked or rode thence to Ephesus. The vague statement often made, that Ephesus was by land only about 20 or 30 miles distant from Miletus, is, as we now see, very misleading.

If we accept as true the Bezan and Western addition to Ac 2015 μείσαντει τη Τρωγυλλίω, we see that the ship on which were St. Paul and the delegates, bearing the contributions of the Churches of the four provinces, Achaia, Macedonia, Asia, and Galatia, after sailing from Assos on a Monday morning,* must have spent Wednesday night at Trogyllion, the extreme promontory of Mount Mykale on the north side of the Mæander valley, projecting far out towards the west and towards Samos. On Thursday a voyage of only about 23 Samos. On Thursday a voyage of only about 23 miles with the morning breeze from the north would bring them to Miletus. A messenger was then found, and sent to Ephesus. He would probably reach Ephesus during the course of Thursday night, and the assembling of the elders and their journey (some being doubtless comparatively elderly n en) would take time. The morning of Saturday, then, is the earliest possible date for the arrival of the elders in Miletus; and we must suppose that St. Paul spent the day with them; and probably the early morning of Sunday + was the time when the ship proceeded on its voyage to Jerusalem, reaching Cos that day.

According to 2 Ti 420 St. Paul visited Miletus

Trophimus sick. This visit is quite inconsistent with the narrative of Ac, and must be referred to a later period, after St. Paul was released from his Roman imprisonment, and returned to the Ægean lands and churches.

The famous temple of Apollo Didymeus at Branchidæ was about 20 miles south of Miletus, in the territory subject to that city. It stood about 2 miles back from the coast, overlooking the harbour Panormus. The best account of Miletus and Branchidse is given in Sir C. T. Newton's works, and in Radet's Milet et le Golfe Latonique.

Miletus is mentioned as a bishopric in all the Nutitive Episcopatium; but, although it is given first in the list of Hierocles' Synekdemos, the common statement that its bishop occupied the first rank among the bishops of Caria is wrong: that rank belonged to Aphrodisias, for the coast cities of Caria lest and the inner sities grained inventors. of Caria lost and the inner cities gained importance in the late Roman and Byzantine times. But during the 5th cent. Miletus became an archbishopric 1 independent of the control of Aphrodisias (autoxé-φαλοι), but without subject bishoprics.

Few traces of the influence of Christianity in Miletus have been discovered. It is apparent that m the coast towns of Asia, which were less thoroughly Christianized and also more closely under the eye of the imperial officials than those of Phrygia, hardly any public memorials of the new religion can have been erected before the time of Constantine. An official inscription of the time of Justinian is published in Byzant. Zeitschrift, 1894, p. 21. Another late inscription mentions the saint and martyr Onesippos (CIG 8847). A strange example of popular superstition and angelolatry, invoking the seven archangels to guard the city, was found in the theatre (CIG 2895); it perhaps belongs to the 4th cent: on the kind of practices connected with this class of superstition see Wünsch, Sethianische Verfluchungstafeln, 1898.

Miletus is mentioned in LXX of Ezk 2718 (see Field, Hexapla). W. M. RAMSAY.

MILK.—See FOOD in vol. ii. p. 36.

millstone (nin, Arab. raha).—The hand-mill is in constant use in many parts of Syria at the present time. It consists of two circular stones, one of which is placed on the top of the other, and the upper and lower surfaces of each of them are flat. From the centre of the lower stone a strong pin of wood passes through a funnel-shaped hole in the upper stone. Into this hole the grain to be ground is thrown, and it escapes as flour between the two stones at the circumference, and falls on a smooth sheepskin which is placed under the lower stone. On the surface of the upper stone, near its circumference, the handle is inserted, which may be of any length, according to the number of hands used in turning it. Small stones are generally turned by one woman, but larger ones may be turned by two, three, or four women.

In ancient times, turning the mill was a work Samson was set to grind in the prison. In La 5¹⁵, rendered in RV 'the young men bare the mill, and the children stumbled under the wood,' it should probably be, as in the Arab., 'They caused the young men to grind, and the boys stumbled under the wood.' The poet laments that the young men encountry was a supplement of the wood. should be put to so degrading an employment, and that the boys should be put to a work for which they were not able, such as carrying the wood to the oven for firing the bread which was made from the flour ground by the young men. Hand-mills have no wood about them except the handle and the central pin, which are fixed so that they cannot be taken out. In Lebanon and those parts of Syria where a fall of water can be obtained, large millstones are turned by a horizontal water-wheel. The water falls through a pipe formed of large stones perforated, and at the lower end of this pipe a wooden channel directs the stream against the floats of the wheel. The water-wheel is enclosed in a vault, the roof of which forms the floor of the room in which the millstones are placed. The wooden axle of the wheel passes through the roof of the vault, through the lower millstone, and is fixed to the upper millstone, which it turns round. When the wheat is ground into flour it is gathered in the same way as when the hand-mill is used. This kind of mill is called tahoon. Cf. the Heb. tchon. There is another kind of mill turned by animals, which is called tahanet. In Mt 18°, Mk 9⁴² we have μόλος δνικός, a millstone turned by an ass. Usually the stones of the mill are of a dark-brown sandstone, and when the stone is soft the flour is full of sand. The upper stone has frequently to be taken off to have its under surface roughened; but when the porous Hauran stone is used, that is not necessary, as the stone in wearing presents new holes, and, consequently, new cutting edges.

The hand-mill being an implement absolutely necessary in a household, it was forbidden to take the upper millstone (277, Arab. mirdat) as security for debt, as that would render the mill useless (Dt 246).

Mills are used not only for grinding wheat into flour, they are used also for making crushed wheat (burghal). The wheat is first boiled and then dried in the sun, and when put into the mill water is sprinkled upon it to prevent its being ground into flour. The mill is turned slowly. Crushed wheat is used to make a kind of food which is a great favourity with the mountaineers which is a great favourite with the mountaineers of Lebanon; it is called kibby. It is a mixture of crushed wheat (RV 'bruised corn,' Pr 272) and raw mutton beaten together in a mortar for hours, and is generally eaten cooked, but often raw. The grinding of the burghd, or bruised wheat, was a season of rejoicing in Lebanon some years ago. The young men gathered together, and, while the grinding was going on, songs were sung to the accompaniment of musical instruments and a kind of small drum.

MILLENNIUM.—A name suggested by the period of 1000 years described in Rev 202. 4.7 during which Satan is confined in the abyss, and the martyr saints reign with Christ. Hence variously understood, according to the interpretation put upon the passage, either as (1) the period, present or future, definite or indefinite, 'during which the kingdom of Christ will be established upon earth, and will dominate over all other authority' (Cent. Dict.); or more specially (2) as the period in which 'Christ will reign in bodily presence on earth for a thousand years' (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s. 'Chiliasm'). In this latter sense it is associated with pre-millenarian views of Christ's Second Coming, the word Chiliast or Millenarian being usually applied in the pre-millenarian sense (Oxf. Eng. Dict. l.c.; Cent. Dict. 'Millenarian').

That which is characteristic of the doctrine in all its forms is the belief in a period of triumph and blessedness for the saints on earth, preceding and distinct from the final blessedness of the world to come. Such a belief meets us not only in the early Christian eschatology, but also in that of the later Jews, where it was probably due to a combination of the simpler eschatology whose horizon is bounded by this world and the hope of earthly triumph, and a more developed eschatology which distinguishes two worlds or sons, and place the true salvation in the latter (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 178). While the term is often used loosely to describe carnal ideals of the future, whether limited in duration or not (as when reference is made to the chiliastic views of the Jews in Christ's time), it should properly be restricted to those opinions which, making the above distinction be-tween the two seons, hold to a preliminary period of blessedness in the former. Hence those modern millenarians (like Seiss, The Last Times, 211) who identify the Millennium with the world to come, use the term in a sense altogether different from that which we are now discussing.

As thus defined, the doctrine of the Millennium is not found in OT. The prophets look forward to a state of blessedness and glory for Israel, to be introduced, either by the advent of J" Himself (Is 40⁸⁻¹¹ 52⁷⁻¹³), or of the Messiah (Is 9⁶, Zec 9^{2 10}). This state is variously described—sometimes in language which requires no more than the establishment of the redeemed Israel in the first place among the nations; at others, in words which imply a change of nature itself, and the creation of a new heavens and a new earth (Is 65¹⁷². Yet note that even this picture does not represent the individual members of the redeemed Israel as immortal. Cf. Enoch 5⁹ 10¹⁷ 25⁶, Apoc. Bar 73³). But, however conceived, this blessed state bounds the horizon of prophecy (cf. Jer 33¹⁷⁻²², Ezk 37²⁵, JI 4²⁶). Especially in Daniel is the eternity of the Messianic kingdom emphasized. 'And in the days of those kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed' (2²⁴). 'And the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High. His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom' (7²⁷, cf. 7¹⁴).

In much of the Pseudepigraphical literature we find the same point of view. So Sibyll 3*6-50, Jub 32 (quoted by Drummond, 314), Ps-Sol 174, Sibyll 3*705

'And then will he raise up a kingdom for all time for all men'; Enoch 62¹⁴ 'And the Lord of spirita will abide over them, and with that Son of Man will they eat and lie down and rise up for ever and ever.' Doubtless it is true, as Drummond remarks (314), that these expressions do not necessarily imply strict eternity (cf. Bar 73¹ with 40⁸; and see Enoch 10¹⁶), although, in the case of Enoch 62¹⁴ as of Daniel, this seems required by the context. But in any case the ideal which is set forth in these passages is final. The same view appears (Jn 12²⁴) in the objection to Christ's prophecy concerning His lifting up. 'We have heard out of the law that the Christ abideth for ever.' So in the Targ. Jon. (on 1 K 4²⁴) the Messianic time and the world to come are identified. (Cf Mishua, Berachoth i. 5. and the literature cited by Schürer. HJP II. ii. 177.)

Side by side with this view, we find in the Pseudepigraphical books another, which distinguishes between the Messianic kingdom, which it regards as belonging to this present age, and the final consummation of all things in the world to come. Perhaps the first trace of this doctrine is in Enoch 91¹²⁻¹⁷, a fragment assigned by Charles to B.C. 104-95, and by Dillmann to the time of John Hyrcanus. The seer has described the seven weeks into which he conceives the past history of the world to be divided (933-10). 'And after that there will be another week, the eighth, that of righteousness, and a sword will be given to it that judgment and righteousness may be executed on those who commit oppression, and sinners will be delivered into the hands of the righteous. And at its close they will acquire houses through their righteousness. And the house of the Great King will be built in glory for ever more. And after that, in the ninth week, the righteous judgment will be revealed to the whole world, and all the works of the godless will vanish from the whole earth, and the world will be written down for destruction, and all mankind will look to the path of uprightness. And after this, in the tenth week, in the seventh part, there will be the great eternal judgment, in which he will execute vengeance amongst the angels. And the first heaven will depart and pass away, and a new heaven will appear, and all the powers of the heavens will shine sevenfold for ever. And after that there will be many weeks without number for ever, in goodness and righteousness, and sin will no more be mentioned for ever' (Charles' tr. p. 268 ff.). Here we have a period of righteousness, in which the temple is to be rebuilt, and a missionary week resulting in the conversion of the world, preceding the final judgment, which introduces the new heaven. There is, however, no mention of a personal Messiah. Briggs (Mess. Gosp. 15, 16; cf. Mess. Apost. 9), calls attention to the parallel between this passage and the later Persian eschatology, which regards the final resurrection and judgment as preceded by two preparatory millenniums, in which the prophets Ukhshyat-ereta, or Aushētar, and Ukhshyatnemah, or Aushētar-māh, of the Avesta and the Pehlevi literature of Zoroastrianism, prepare the way for the coming of the final redeemer Saoshyahi or Soshāns. It is, of course, possible that in this, as in the allied doctrine of the resurrection, Jewish thought may have been affected by Persian ideas. But our sources for the Persian eschatology are so late (the Bundahis, in their present form, dating not earlier than the 7th cent. A.D.; cf. West in Sac. Books of East, v. p. xli, cf. also vols. xxiv. xxxvii. and xlvii.) that we must use great caution in drawing conclusions.*

On Persian eschatology, cf. Hübschmann, 'Die parsis, he Lehre von Jenseits, 'Jahrb, Prot. Theol. 1879, ii.; Fr. Spiegel, art. 'Parsismus,' in Herzog, RK's'; Jackson, 'The Ancient Persian Doctrine of a Future Life,' in Biblical World, 1996, pp. 149-148. For

In the later Jewish Apocalypses, as in Talm., we find the limitation of Messiah's kingdom clearly set forth: thus Apoc. Bar distinctly limits its duration to this present world. Et erit principatus ejus stans in sæculum, donec finiatur mundus corruptionis et donec impleantur tempora prædicta (405). The character of this kingdom is set forth in extravagant language (women bearing children without pain, the vine yielding 1000 branches, each branch 1000 clusters, each cluster 1000 grapes, each grape a cor of wine, etc., ec. 29. 73), which occurs also in Papias, and is applied to the Christian Millennium. Still more striking is 2 Es 725.20 'For my Son the Messiah (so Syr. Æth. Arab. over ag. Lat. 'Jesus') shall be revealed with those that are Lat. 'Iesus') shall be revealed with those that are with him, and shall rejoice with those that remain 400 years. And it shall come to pass after these years that my Son the Christ and all men who have breath shall die. And the world (soculum) shall be changed into the ancient silence seven days as in the first beginnings, so that no one shall he left. And it shall come to pass after the seven days that the world which does not now wake shall be aroused, and the corruptible shall die. And the earth shall give up them that sleep in her, and the dust them that dwell in that silence, and the store-houses (promptuaria) shall give up the souls entrusted to them. And the Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment, etc. (cf. 12³⁴). Here, unlike Baruch, where the Messianic age forms a transition between this world and that which is to come (74²⁻³, cf. Schürer, II. ii. 178), the contrast between the Messianic age and the world to come is emphasized in the sharpest way. The Messiah and all flesh die, and remain dead for seven days. The length of the Messianic kingdom is expressly limited to 400 years—a number explained in the Talmud as due to the combination of Gn 15¹³ (the sojourn in Egypt) with Ps 90¹⁵ 'Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us' (Sanh. 99a). Another passage cites Mic 7¹⁵ 'As in the "tys of thy coming forth out of the land of Egypt will I show unto him marvellous things' (l'anchuma, Ek:b 7, quoted Weber 3, 372). In the later Jewish theology the view of the Messiah's king-dom as limited became the prevailing one (Schürer, as above; cf. Weber, 373). Its duration was a favourite subject of speculation. The classical passages are Sanh. 97, 99a, where the following reckonings are given: three generations, 40 years (corresponding to the 40 years in the wilderness), (corresponding to the 40 years in the winderness), 70 years, 100 years, 365 years, 400 years, 600 years, 1000 years, 2000 years, 7000 years (see the passages quoted at length in Gfrörer, ii. 252 ff.; also Weber, 371 ff.; Drummond, 315 ff.). The determining principle seems to have been either 'the analogy between the first and the last redemption, therefore 40 or 400 years,' or 'the symmetry of the final period with those which precede, hence 2000 years, corresponding to the 2000 before and the 2000 under the law; or finally, 'the thought that the Messianic time is a time of joy, Israel's marriage—hence 1000 or 7000 years' (Weber, 373). Still another reckoning is based upon the idea of a Sabetical week in which air millousiums of Sabbatical week, in which six millenniums of work are followed by one of rest. This view, perhaps first found in Secrets of Enoch 331.2 (see Charles' note at the passage, and Index ii., s. 'Millennium'; also art. ENOCH in vol. i. p. 711a), rests upon Ps 90⁴ (cf. Jub 4, Sanh. 97a) and meets us in the Christian Epist. of Barnabas (c. 15).

a discussion of Persian influence on OT eschatology, Cheyne in Expec. Times, ii. (1890) pp. 202, 224, 248, and Bampton Lectures for 1800, p. 381 ff.; Moulton in Expec. Times, ix. 352 ff.; Stave, Einfluss des Pureismus auf das Judentum, 1898, p. 145 ff.; on the eschatology of the Talmud, Kohut, ZDMG, 1807, p. 552 ff.

difference of view. On the one hand, we find passages in which the horizon of prophecy is bounded by the second advent of Christ, which, like the day of J" of OT, is regarded as closing the present age, and introducing the world to come. In many passages it is expressly associated with the general resurrection and the judgment (Mt 13²⁰, parable of the Tares; Mt 25²¹⁻²⁶, the great judgment scene; Jn 5²⁰ 6⁴⁴, Ac 17²¹, cf. 10²⁰). It results, for the wicked, in 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord and from the glory of his might' (2 Th 16-10), while it introduces the saints into 'an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away' (1 P 14-8, cf. 2 P 1¹¹). On the other hand, we find a view which distinguishes between the Coming of Christ and the end of the world, and inserts between the two a period of millennial reign, in which Christ will dwell with the saints upon the renewed earth, and in which the OT prophecies concerning the glory of Jerus. and the victory of Israel over the nations will find their fulfilment. This period is variously described in language more or less gross or spiritual. But its essential features are these: a preliminary victory of Christ over the forces of evil at the advent (the destruction of Antichrist); a double resurrection, first of the saints at the beginning of the millennial period, then of all men at the last day; an earthly kingdom, in which the saints reign with Christ on the renewed earth, and the OT prophecies find literal fulfilment; a last brief outbreak of the forces of evil, followed by the universal resurrection and final judgment.

The doctrine of the Millennium is set forth in NT in clear terms only in Rev, where it constitutes the most easily recognizable dogmatic peculiarity (Holtzmann, Hdcom. iv. 319). It is here taught that after the victory of the Messiah and His army over the victory of the Messian and His army over the beast and his army, and the destruction of the latter with the false prophet and all his followers (ch. 19), Satan himself will be cast into the abyss, and confined there for 1000 years, 'that he should deceive the nations no more until the 1000 years should be finished (20°). This triumph is followed by the resurrection of martyr saints, who reign with Christ as kings and priests 1000 years (204, cf. 5¹⁰). This is expressly called the first resurrection, it being stated that 'the rest of the dead lived not until the 1000 years should be finished' (v. 5). At the close of the 1000 years Satan is loosed for a little while. Then follows a last world-conflict of the powers of evil, at the close of which takes place the final resurrection and judgment, ending in the destruction of all evil, Death and Hades themselves being cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death (2014, cf. 211). This passage is most naturally understood as teaching a very millennial advent of Christ and teaching a pre-millennial advent of Christ, and an earthly reign (so most recently by Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 2nd ed. p. 442). It is to be noted, however, that the reference is only to a reign of the martyrs, not, as the later theory represented, of all Christians. Those who reject this interpretation are obliged either to break the connexion between chs. 19 and 20 (so Briggs, who regards the two chs. as belonging to two different Apocalypses, Mess. Apost. 305), or else to deny to ch. 19 any reference to the second advent, seeing in it only such a preliminary advent for judgment as is referred to in 26.16 32.10 (so Moses Stuart, who sees in it no more than a reference to the approaching destruction of heathenism, ii. 352). The most serious difficulty in the way of this interpretation is the reference to the resurrection of the martyrs. In NT the resurrection of the saints is always associated with the advent of Christ. The older interpretations of a symbolic resurrection (as that of Israel in Ezk), or of a spiritual resurrection (as in regeneration), are rendered untenable by the explicit reference to the martyrs (cf. 6⁹⁻¹¹ 19⁹). Those who reject the idea of a physical resurrection are obliged, therefore, to think of a resurrection from Hades to heaven, taking place at the close of the martyr age, and introducing those who are thus specially honoured into a state of heavenly blessedness which continues till the close of human history. (So Briggs, Mess. Apost. 357, who quotes Mt 27^{52.53}, Eph 4⁹, 1 P 3¹⁹ 4⁸, Jn 5⁵⁵; Moses Stuart, ii. 478. The case of Moses and Elijah might also be cited. Cf. Schürer, II. ii. 180, for similar ideas among the Jews). From this point of view, the significance of the Millennium, while introduced indeed in time by the martyr age, and corresponding in general 'with the duration of the Church as the triumphing institution of the world in the last complete period of human history' (Briggs, 357), is not earthly but heavenly.

Paul seems to distinguish between the Parousia of Christ with the resurrection of the saints, and the end when He shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father. Between these two events they conceive to lie that reign referred to in v. 2, which they identify with the period of 1000 years described in Rev 20 (so Olshausen, de Wette, Moses Stuart; Godet, Com. 1 Cor. Eng. tr. ii. 377 ff. et al.). Meyer distinguishes the two events in time, but rejects the identification of the intervening period with the Millennium of Rev 20. So Schmiedel, Hdcomm. ii. 161. On the other side, Heinrici, 1 Kor. 503 ff.; Weiss, Bib. Theol. 401; Harnack (art. 'Millennium, Enc. Brit. xvi. 315); Briggs, Mess. Apost. 114, and the majority of modern interpreters. Those who find a pre-millenarian meaning in 1 Co 15²²⁵ interpret in like sense Ph 3¹¹ (St. Paul's hope of attaining the resurrection), 1 Th 4¹⁴⁻¹⁷ (which clearly (the regeneration, when the apostles shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel). Pre-millenarian interpreters also refer to the period between the advent and the end, the promises in Mt 55 (the meek shall inherit the earth), Mt 20 cm, (the reward of the labourers), and Mk 10 cm, Lk 18 cm. (the reward given to the disciples in this world, which is distinguished from that in the world to come; yet cf. Lk 20³⁵, where the resurrection introduces the world to come). For a temperate statement of the exegetical argument for pre-millenarianism, cf. H. Schultz in JDTh, 1867, pp. 120-127. On the other side, Salmond, op. cit. pp. 520, 561 ff., and the authorities cited above. See, further, under PAROUSIA.

Millenarian views were common, though by no means universal, in the early Church. They meet us in gross form in Papias, who quotes as a genuine word of Christ a prediction, generally agreeing with Apoc. Bar, concerning the remarkable fertility of the vine in the millennial kingdom (Iren. adv. Hær. v. 33; cf. Euseb. iii. 39); in more spiritual form in Barnabas, who, combining Gn 2³ with Ps 90⁴, looks for a Millennium of Sabbath rest, following the present six millenniums of work, and introduced by the coming of the Messiah 'to put an end to the time of the wicked one, and to judge the ungodly, and to change sun, moon, and stars' (15⁵). This he declares to be the true Sabbath rest for which Christians look—a time when, having been themselves justified, and having received the promise, lawlessness no longer existing, but all things having been made new by the Lord, they will be able to keep holy the Sabbath, having first been sanctified thamselves (v.?). At the close of this millennial period follows the beginning of the eighth day, which is the beginning of another world (v.8). Hermas and 2nd Ep. Clement are also claimed as pre-millenarian, but without sufficient reason. There is no trace of the doctrine in either I Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, or the Epistle to Diognetus. The Didaché, indeed, restricts the resurrection at the Advent to those who are Christ's, but is silent as to what follows thereafter. 'And then shall appear the signs of the truth: first the sign of the outspreading in heaven, then the sign of the voice of the trumpet, thirdly the resurrection of the dead, yet not of all; but as it was said, The Lord shall come, and all his saints with him. Then the world shall see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven.'

The prevalence of millenarian views in the later The prevalence or milenarian views in the latter Church was due partly to the Jewish Apocalypses, which were read and highly esteemed in the Christian Church (Papias, cf. Harnack, art. 'Milennium,' 315), partly to the explicit statement of the Apoc. of St. John (Justin, Trypho, 81). Hence we find later opponents of Chiliasm denying the authenticity of Rev (Dionysius ap. Euseb. vii. 25). While most common among the Jewish Christians, to whom their origin was attributed by later to whom their origin was attributed by later opponents (Cerinthus ap. Euseb. iii. 28; cf. Test. XII. Pat. [Jud. c. 25; Benj. c. 10]; Ebionites ap. Jerome, Com. on Is. lx. 1, lxvi. 20), such views early meet us among the Gentile Christians. Justin, while in certain passages apparently ignoring them (Apol. 52, Trypho, 45, 49, 113; cf. Briggs in Luth. Quar. 1879), elsewhere explicitly recognizes them. When asked by Trypho whether he really admits that Jerus.
will be rebuilt, and expects that his people will be
together with the patriarchs and the prophets, and together with the patriarchs and the prophets, and the men of our nation and procelytes who joined them before your Christ came,' Justin answers in the affirmative. While admitting that 'many who belong to the pure and pious faith, and are true Christians, think otherwise,' he declares that he and others 'who are right-minded Christians on all points, are assured that there will be a resurrection of the dead, and 1000 years in Jerus., which will then be built, adorned and enlarged as the prophets Ezekiel, Isaiah, and others declare' (80). For this view he cites Rev as follows: 'There was For this view he cites Rev as follows: 'There was a certain man with us whose name was John, one of the apostles of Christ, who prophesied by a revelation which was made to him that those who lelieved in our Christ would dwell 1000 years in Jerus., and that thereafter the general and in short the eternal resurrection and judgment for all men would likewise take place' (81). With the exception of Justin, the Apologists show no trace of Chilliasm. The anti-Gnostic Fathers of the lease of the 2nd cent on the other hand were close of the 2nd cent., on the other hand, were pronounced Millenarians. Ireneus (adv. Hær. v. 32-35), Tertullian (adv. Marc. iii. 25), and later Hippolytus (Com. in Dan. 1772, p. 99) give us in their writings full descriptions of the millennial kingdom. Tertullian wrote an entire work on the subject (de Spe Fidelium), which has unfortunately perished. Doubtless the views of these Fathers were influenced by their opposition to the Gnostics, who with Chiliasm rejected also the entire Christian eschatology. But the adoption of chiliastic views by the Montanists, who looked for the speedy setting up of the millennial kingdom at Pepuza in Phrygia, soon brought them into disrepute. were opposed in Rome by the Presbyter Caius, who attributed their origin to the arch-heretic Cerinthus (Euseb. iii. 28). In the East they were attacked by the Alexandrines, who, following the example set by the Gnostics, interpreted the passages cited by the Chiliasts allegorically (cf. Origen, de Prin. ii. 11). The attempt of the Egyptian bishop Nepos to enforce a literal interpretation was unsuccessful. Especially effective was the opposition of Dionysius of Alexandria, who wrote a book 'On the Promises,' in which he advocated the allegorical exegesis, and denied the Johannine authorgorical exegesis, and denied the Johannine authorship of the Apocalypse. Later Chiliasts, like Methodius of Olympus (Banquets of the Ten Virgins, ix. 5) and Apollinaris of Laodicea (Basil, Ep. 263), were unable to stem the tide.

deos, 43, 44) and Lactantius (Inst. vii. 24) were pronounced Chiliasts. Victorinus of Petau is so claimed by Jerome, although his commentary on the Apocalypse shows no trace of such views (yet cf. Briggs, Luth. Quart. p. 234). Jerome himself, while often speaking contemptuously of the Chiliasts as 'our half-Jews (semi-Judæi), who look for a Jerus. of gold and precious stones from heaven. and a future kingdom of 1000 years, in which all and a lutter kingdom of 1000 years, in which an nations shall serve Israel' (Com. on Is. lx. 1, lxvi. 20), elsewhere (Com. on Jer. xix. 10) speaks of them with more respect, as holding views 'which, although we may not hold, we cannot condemn, because many ecclesiastical men and martyrs have taught the same.' Even Augustine, the strongest of all opponents of Chiliasm in the West, distinguishes between a gross and a more spiritual form, and admits that in his early days he himself had been an advocate of the latter (de Civ. Dei, xx. 7).

The final defeat of Chiliasm in the West was due to Augustine, who, in his City of God, identified the Millennium with the history of the Church on earth, and declared that, for those who belonged to the true Church, the first resurrection was passed already (de Civ. Dei, xx. 7-9). With the acceptance of this identification by the Roman Church, the power of Chiliasm was permanently broken.

Pre-millenarian views have, indeed, been revived from time to time, now in grosser, now in more spiritual form, and have never been without their advocates in the Church; but they have failed to win general acceptance. The Church as a whole, Protestant as well as Catholic, has either adopted Augustine's identification of the Millennium with the Church militant, or else looks for a future period of prosperity, preceding the second advent of Christ. The history of later Millenarianism lies beyond the scope of the present article.

mentioned once as an ingredient of the very complex bread made by Ezekiel (49). It has a seed not much larger than mustard, much used for feeding the smaller kinds of birds. It is also sometimes used, mixed with wheat and barley, to make bread. Setaria Italica, Kth., is also cultivated in the East, under the name of dukhn. Its seed closely resembles that of Panicum miliaceum. In addition to the above, Sorghum vulgare, L., has been proposed as the equivalent of dohan. This is a tall Gramen, with broad leaves, and a compact panicle, often a foot long, and 6 to 8 in. broad. The seeds are white, and larger than hemp seeds. They are extensively raised in the East as a cheap bread-stuff for the poorer classes. The Arab. name of this, dhurah, usually given in Eng. books dourra, seems to be ancient, and is never confounded with dukhn. The Arabs call the sorghum dhurah beida = 'white dhurah,' and dh. saif's or dh. kaizi = 'summer dh.,' in distinction from maize, which is known as dh. safra = 'yellow dh.,' or dh. shamiyyah = 'Syrian dh.,' or dh. ktzan = 'dh. of Kizan.' The sorghum is cultivated in the great central plains of Syria, and ripens in midsummer, having had no water since the cessation of the spring rains. G. E. Post.

MILLO. — 1. (κήτρη, always with the definite article, probably [but see below] 'the fill' [of earth]: 2 S and 1 K 112' ή άκρα; 1 K 916 [Aq.?] τὴν Μελώ καὶ τὴν άκραν, ν. ¾ τὴν Μελώ; 2 Ch τὸ ἀνάλημμα). According to the brief notice in 2 S 5' (=1 Ch 118) 'and David halls and from (the) Mills and David built round about from (the) Millo and inward, the Millo formed part of the original defences of the old Jebusite city, situated on the easternmost of the two hills on which Jerusalem stands: most probably it was an outwork or rampart of earth, which protected the northern entrance of the Jebusite fort. After the capture of the city and its subsequent extension by David, it became necessary to fill up that part of the Tyropœon valley, which separated the new from the old city at this point, in order to connect the two. To this end David built a new and larger Willo, of which traces remain to the present day (Schick, ZDPV, 1894, p. 68). With this agrees the statement of Josephus (Ant. VII. iii. 1, 2), that David, having crossed the ravine and seized the citadel ("")" "Aκρα"), rebuilt the city and called it by his own name. He further states that David, by his own name. He further states that David, having also surrounded the lower city $(\tau^{\dagger})^{\mu}$ $\kappa^{\dagger} \alpha^{\mu} \omega^{\dagger} \alpha^{\dagger} \lambda^{\mu} \nu$, and joined the citadel to it, made them one body. It would seem, however, that this important work was only planned or, at most, only begun by David; for we learn from 1 K 9^{18. 34} (and especially 11²⁷ Solomon built (the] Millo and that the result of PV (nonvival the base) and the property of the property o shut in the ravine [RV 'repaired the breach'] of the city of David'), that the actual building was carried out by his successor. The Millo is men-tioned again as forming an important part of the defences of Jerusalem in 701 B.C., when Hezekiah prepared to resist the attack of Sennacherib (2 Ch 32⁵).

The above explanation is quite consistent with The above explanation is quite consistent with the old derivation of the word given by the Targums (x_1, y_2 ° a filling up'), and adopted by Gesenius (Thes. 787 f.), Schick, and others. The Millo would, on this view, be connected with the Hebrew root x_1, y_2 , but, as Grove (Smith, DB^2 ii. p. 367) and Moore (Jg 9°) have pointed out, its properties in corporation with the old Consents. occurrence in connexion with the old Canaanite town Shechem (see below) makes it probable that it is an archaic, possibly Jebusite, form borrowed by the Israelites. See Jebus and Jerusalem. 2. The House of Millo (איֹשְׁ מִיבְּ Beth-millo;

Some identify it with the tower of Shechem (vv. 46.40), but this view lacks support, as apparently the latter verses do not belong to the same narrative as the rest of the chapter. (See Moore, ad loc.). If we accept the rendering of the RV, we must take 'the house of Millo' as the name of a family or clan.

MINCE (derived by Skeat from Anglo-Sax. minsion to grow small, fail, but clearly connected with Old Fr. mincer to shred) is found in AV only in Is 316 'Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, where the meaning is 'taking short steps.' Cf. Shaks. Merch. of Venice, UI. iv. 67—

'And turn two mincing steps Into a manly stride.'

J. HASTINGS. MIND.—This aspect of the human soul, or of man's inner life, is not distinguished in the OT by any radical term, but only by derivatives such as τη, which has the meaning of 'prudence' or 'good sense' rather than 'knowledge' or 'understanding.' The term τς, and its equivalent καρδία in the NT, include the intellectual as well as all other inward movements. (See HEART). The greater analytic precision of Greek thought and its closer attention to the intellectual element in our nature brought into the language of the NT such words as roûs with its congeners διάνοια, έννοια, rόημα; also σύνεσις, διαλογισμός, etc. But even there, they are not used with any psychological refinement or exactitude. It is quite impossible, for example, to follow Olshausen (Opuscula Theologica, p. 156) when he attempts to show that roos and ourcois, with their corresponding verbs, as used in the NT, represent the Kantian distinction between Vernunft and Verstand, familiarized to us in English by Coleridge as that between Reason and Understanding—the former, the higher intuitive perception; the latter, the lower or dialectic judgment. It is plain that the terms are really interchangeable (Mk 8¹⁷, Mt 13^{14, 15}, 2 Ti 2⁷). Some more abstract terms, such as 'thought,' 'minding,' 'thinking,' are used in the NT, almost indiscriminately, to represent the contents or products of the inward life, or what the OT calls the imagination of the thoughts of the heart' (Gn 65).

Of the two Greek words most frequently representing the notion, roos may be held to denote the faculty of reflective consciousness, the organ of moral thinking and knowing; σύνεσις a peculiar force or acuteness in the exercise of that faculty. The leading word (rous) occurs very seldom in the Septuagint. In the few places where it does, it represents or 2. In Is 4013 roor Kupiou stands for marm, and the rendering is retained in 1 Co 218. The OT Apocryphal writers have used it a few times and in a sense more distinctively Greek. In the NT its almost entire absence from the Gospels and from the writings of the older apostles (it occurs there only in Lk 24⁴⁵, Rev 13¹⁸ 17⁹) shows how closely they adhered to OT phraseology from which the special notion represented by roos was absent. To note its frequent use by St. Paul and that almost delicate antithesis in which he contrasts it with $\sigma d \rho \xi$ in one connexion and with $\pi \nu \epsilon \hat{\nu} \mu a$ in another, completes its history.

St. Paul uses wrecome for the divine or spiritual power coming to the renewed man: for man's own highest sense of right or faculty of knowledge he uses roos, as do the best classical writers. Accordingly, in sharp contrast with the 'flesh,' in which evil dwells, he calls the divine commandment 'the law of his mind' (Ro 723), and declares that 'with the mind' (v. 26) he serves it. This same faculty, when perverted or enthralled by inherent evil, becomes 'the fleshly mind' (Col 218), 'a reprobate mind' (Ro 126), 'corrupted mind' (I Ti 63, 2 Ti 36).

The other antithesis is when the apostle takes poῦs for deliberate, reflective consciousness—its proper sense—and contrasts it with πρεθμα in the sense of affatus or unconscious impulse coming from without or above (1 Co 14^{14, 15, 19}). See, further, next art. and Psychology.

MIND.—The verb to 'mind' is both trans. and MIND.—The verb to 'mind' is both trans. and intrans. As a trans. verb it means to 'give attention to,' Ro 85 'They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh' (φρονοῦσιν); 1216 'Mind not high things' (μὴ τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονοῦντες, RV 'Set not your mind on high things'); Ph 316 'Let us mind the same thing' (τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῦν); 319 'Who mind earthly things' (οἱ τὰ ἐπίγεια φρονοῦντες). Intransitively it means to purpose, intend, Ac 2013 'for so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot' (μέλλων). Cf. Pr. Bk. 'Ye that mind to come to the holy Communion'; Golding's Calvin's Job, 562, 'Althoughe they protest that they minde Job, 562, 'Althoughe they protest that they minde to justifie him . . . yet neverthelesse they condemne him'; and Lk 1428 Rhem. 'For, which of you minding to build a toure, doth not first sit downe and recken the charges that are necessarie?'

The phrase 'to be minded' has the same meaning of the interest work 'to mind' as Ru 118 When she

as the intrans. verb 'to mind,' as Ru 118 'When she saw that she was stedfastly minded to go with her'; 2 Ch 24' 'And it came to pass after this that Joash was minded to repair the house of the LORD'; Ac 272 'They discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship' (TR έβουλεύσαντο, edd. έβουλεύσττο, RV 'they took counsel'); Ph 313 'Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you' (φρονῶμεν, καὶ

God shall reveal even this unto you' (φρονωμεν, και είτι ἐτέρως φρονείτε).

There are many phrases of which the ptcp. 'minded' forms a part: 'carnally minded' (τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός, RV 'the mind of the flesh') Ro 8°, and in the same verse 'spiritually minded' (τὸ φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύματος, RV 'the mind of the spirit'); 'double minded' (δίψυχος) Ja 1° 4°; 'feeble minded' (δίψυχος) RV 'fainthearted') 1 Th 514; 'highminded' (ὑψηλοφρονεῦν, edd. ὑψηλὰ φρονεῦν, 'be highminded'), Ro 11°, 1 Ti 61° (τετυφωμένος, RV 'puffed up'), 2 Ti 3°; 'light minded' (κοῦφος καρδία) Sir 19¢; 'likeminded' (τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῦν, RV 'to be of the same mind') Ro 15°, Ph 2° (Ισύψυχος), Ph 2°ς 'sober minded' (σωφρονεῦν) Tit 2°.

MINES, MINING.—We are here concerned with this subject only so far as it relates to Bible history and Bible lands. Mines are but once referred to in OT, and for the reason that in Palestine proper they are unknown. In the Sinaitic peninsula it is otherwise. The remarkthe process of mining and the miner's life are graphically described, must have been written by one who had a personal knowledge of the subject. Egypt and Arabia Petræa probably furnished to the writer the details on which the poem is founded. We shall take the passage as given in RV, with some notes from the Speaker's Commentary-

1. 'Surely there is a mine (vein AV) for the silver, and a place for gold which they refine.' Two processes were known to the ancients—one by washing, described by Diodorus (iv. 2), as practised in Egypt; the other by smelting. The word here denotes the former.

2. 'Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass (copper) is molten out of the stone.'

2. 'Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass (copper) is molten out of the stone.'

3. 'Man setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out to the furthest bound the stones of thick darkness and of the shadow of death.' The miner lets in light to the very abode of darkness (in the mine or shaft) by means of the lantern.

4. 'He breaketh open a shaft away from where men sojourn; they are forgotten of the foot that passeth by: they hang afar; they swing (or fit) to and fro.' This passage is also rendered in the margin, 'the flood breaketh out from where men sojourn,' suggestive of the sudden outburst of pent-up waters in the mine when a fisure is broken open: and after the waters are escaped 'they are minished, and gone away from man.'...

7. 'That path no bird of prey knoweth, neither hath the falcon's eye seen it; the proud beasts have not trodden it, nor hath the fierce lion passed thereby.' The mine is a path which none but man can discern. The ingenuity of man is contrasted with the instinctive sagacity of animals.

9. 'He putteth forth his hand upon the flinty rock: he overturneth the mountains by the roots'; apparently referring to blasting. Pliny describes various processes (NH xxxiii. 21).

10. 'He cutteth out channels' 'corrugi', Pliny) 'among the rocks; and his eye seeth every precious thing.' Channels to tran the mine, while he carefully scans the mineral vein for traces of ore.

11. 'He bindeth the streams that they trickle not, and the traces of ore.

11. 'He bindeth the streams that they trickle not, and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.' Descriptive of the alternative process to that in v.10 of damming up the waters in the river while the miner digs out the auriferous alluvial gravel—a process described by Pliny (NH xxxiii. 21).

The whole passage, though couched in poetic language, shows us that the processes of mining nearly 2500 years ago were not dissimilar to those practised in the time of Pliny, and even down to the present day, except in the use of machinery and of powerful explosives. We shall now describe some localities where

Gold (371).—This was one of the earliest metals discovered by man, as may be gathered from its occurrence in the sepulchres of the most ancient races, worked into ornaments. Mining for gold was carried on in many countries in ancient times by the Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Babylonians. In Upper Egypt it was worked in the country of the Bishareeh Arabs, and between Coptos and Kossayr (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, i. 232, iii. 227). The gold occurs in quarte vains are market. The gold occurs in quartz-veins amongst the Archæan rocks, from which it was extracted by breaking, grinding, and washing; criminals being employed and compelled to work under overseers taken from tribes speaking a different tongue. Gold was also worked by Ramses II. at tongue. Gold was also worked by Ramses II. at Akita (Wady Ollagi) by means of shafts, but the mines had to be abandoned owing to want of water (Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, 287). The gold which was so abundant in Palestine in the reign of Solomon (1 K 10¹⁴⁵) came from various countries—Spain, India, Arabia, and probably South Africa. The Phænicians, according to Herodotus (vi. 47), worked mines for gold in the island of Thasos, but Spain was the country which yielded to these navigators the most abundant wealth in metals. Gold, according to Pliny, was found in the bed of the Tagus, and there were mines of it in Galicia, Asturias, and elsewhere (NH xxxiii. 4). The produce of Asturias formed the major part. The process of mining gold from shafts and galleries, as well as by washing the alluvia from the bed of streams, is described in what must be considered highly exaggerated language by Pliny (NH xxxiii. ch. 21); but in the auri sacra fames (Verg. Aen. iii. 57) human life was little accounted of, and both in Egypt and elsewhere the hardships and cruelties endured by those employed in mining must have been great indeed. The gold of Ophir may have come from India; but it is not improbable that some of the ancient workings visited by the late Mr. Theodore Bent in S. Africa may date back to the time of Solomon (J. Th. Bent, 'Ruine of Mashonaland,' Rep. Brit. Assoc. 1892, p. 543). See, also, art. GOLD.

Silver (192), which Pliny calls 'the next folly of mankind' (after gold), was mined by means of shafts 'sunk deep in the ground,' and smelted in combination with lead ore or galena (Pliny, NH xxxiii. 31). Most of our silver comes from argentiferous galena. The finest ores were worked in Spain. In Upper Egypt silver mines were worked in the mountains bordering the Red Sea (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 235). See, further, art. SILVER.

Copper (ngn), brass [which see], which in Old Eng. means copper).—Copper mines were worked in very ancient times in Arabia Petræa. The earliest mining operations of which we have any record were those carried on by the Egyptian kings of the 4th, 5th, and 12th Dynasties in the Sinaitic mountains. In the Wady Magharah and at Sarabit el-Khadim copper ore was extracted from veins in the ancient rocks by means of shafts, under the auspices of the early Pharaohs (Brugsch, Ancient Egypt, i. 65; Birch, Ancient Egypt, 64). It must have been this part of the Promised Land that is referred to in Dt 87.9, for in Palestine proper copper is unknown. The ore also occurs in the Wadis Nash and Khalig (in the latter somewhat extensively) in company with those of iron and manganese; while the smelting of the ores was carried on in the Wady Nasb near to the springs, where extensive slag-heaps may still be seen (Bauerman, Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. xxv. 27). Similar mines and slag-heaps occur in Wadis el-Marká and Sened, where a dyke rich in copper ore traverses syenite for a distance of nearly 2 miles (Holland, in Ord. Survey of Sinai, 224). The ore was extensively worked by the Phonicians in Cyprus, where, according to Pliny, it was first discovered, and from which the island derives its name.

Tin.—This metal, which, when used as an alloy of copper, produces bronze, was wrought in very been discovered in Thebes. Tin (5-12) is mentioned in Nu 31²² P, and also in Is 1²⁵; in the latter in a sense indicating its use as an alloy (cf. also Ezk 22¹⁵. 27¹², Zec 4¹⁰). The word used by Homer (II. xviii. 474 and 613), kassireos, is the same as the Arabic kasdeer, probably derived from ancient Phænician. Certain it is that these mariners brought Scilly Isles and the coast of Cornwall (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, vol. iii.). One of the most remarkable facts connected with the early races in Europe and Asia was the extensive use of weapons and implements of bronze; and Sir John Evans shows that the use of bronze preceded that of iron in Egypt (Ancient Bronze Implements, pp. 7, 8). See, further, under TIN.

diffused in the rocks than any other, it seems to have come into general use later than copper, bronze, and tin. Iron ores are unknown in Palestine, except at the southern base of the Lebanon (Porter in Smith's DB ii. 87) and near Beirût; perhaps it was from these deposits that the celeore is scarce in Egypt, but one mine of rich hæmatite, discovered by Burton in 1822, was worked in ancient times in the eastern desert at Hammami (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii. 246). Iron ores were mined, also, in the Wadis Nasb and Khalig, and in the mountain of Sarabit al. Khadin, associated with manners and convergence of the contract of the c el-Khadini, associated with manganese and copper; also in Jebel Hadíd, all in the Sinaitic region (Holland, Ord. Surv. Sinai, p. 230). It is probable that these mining operations were carried on at the same time as those in search of turquoise stones during the early Pharaonic occupation—about B.C. 2500. Cf. also art. IRON.

Turquoise Mines.—Of all the ancient mines of which we have any knowledge in the countries we are dealing with, the most remarkable are those of Jebel Sarabit el-Khadim, and Wadis Sidreh and Magharah in the Sinaitic peninsula, from which turquoises were extracted by the early Egyptians. Amongst the lofty and precipitous cliffs of the Nubian sandstone, extensive galleries were opened out by colonies of slaves presided over by taskmasters, in the time of Sneferu of the 4th Dynasty of Manetho, and of Amenemhat II. of the 12th Dynasty, and his successor. The numerous inscriptions and cartouches on the walls of the mines, the steles and ruined buildings scattered over a considerable area of this mountainous region, indicate extensive mining operations at this early period, c. B.C. 2500. From recent examinations of these galleries, it appears that the turquoise stone ('mafka') occurs in thin threads and pockets in an ochreous matrix. But, notwithstanding the extent of these ancient works, the turquoise is a gem almost unknown amongst the Pharaonic ornaments in the tombs of Egypt, from which it is inferred that the stones have decomposed and crumbled away to powder. These old mines were reopened a few years ago by Major Macdonald, who employed Arab labour. The ruins of a church indicate inhabitants in early Christian times.*

minish (from Low Lat. ministive and Lat. minish smallness, through Fr. ménuiser to make small, extenuate) has been displaced in mod. English by its derivative 'diminish.' It occurs twice in AV: Ex 5¹⁹ 'Ye shall not minish ought from your bricks of your daily task' (שַּקְשִּהְשִׁלִּי), and Ps 107²⁹ 'They are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow '(שַּמְבְּי). Further examples from the older versions are: Wyclif, 1 K 17¹⁴ 'The stene of mele shal noght fayle, ne the vessel of oyle shal not be mynushid, unto the day in the which the Lord is to gyue reyn upon the face of the erthe' (1388 'schal not be abatid'); Tindale, Ex 5⁵ 'the nombre of bricke which they were wont to make in tyme passed, laye unto their charges also, and minysh nothinge therof'; Cov., Ezk 5¹⁶ 'I will encrease hunger, and mynish all the provysion off bred amonge you'; Great Bible, Ps 12¹ 'For the faythfull are mynished from amonge the children of men'; Rhem., He 2' 'Thou didst minish him litle lesse then Angels.' As the same Heb. verbs are frequently translated 'diminish,' it does not seem that the Revisers were justified in retaining this obsolete form in the two passages quoted. The Amer. Revisers were justified in retaining this obsolete form in the two passages quoted. The Amer. Revisers prefer 'diminish' in both passages. But RV further introduces 'minish' into Is 19⁶, Hos 8¹⁰.

MINISTER.—In modern English this word is applied either ecclesiastically to the servant of God, or else politically to the servant of the crown or state. The eccles use has come from the practice in the early Church of translating &decrors by Lat. minister, and then making the title apply to all under the order of the presbyter. See Smith and Cheetham's Dict. of Ant. s.r. But in AV, though the translation of &dxorors as well as of other words, 'minister' has always the primitive sense of 'servant,' 'attendant,' or 'officer,' as in classical Lat. minister had.

*For a description of these mines, see Ordnance Survey of Sinai by Wilson and Palmer (1869), with notes by S. Birch and F. W. Holland; Lepsius, Briefe aus Egypten, p. 336 (1852); Bauerman, Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. xxv. 31, 32; Maspero, Dawn of Civiliz. 354 ff., 473 ff. Bauerman believes that flint implements were used in cutting the rock.

Thus Joshua is called Moses' minister (Ex 24¹³, Jos 1¹), being first of all his personal attendant; and John Mark is called (Ac 13⁵) the minister of Barnabas and Paul. The ministers of Solomon, at whose 'attendance' the queen of Sheba marvelled (1 K 10⁵, 2 Ch 9⁴), were not officers of state, but household servants; and the minister to whom Jesus handed the book (Lk 4²⁰) was the hazzan or attendant in the synagogue. St. Paul speaks of Christ as 'a minister of the circumcision' (Ro 15²), in conformity with the Lord's own words that He was sent to be a servant to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; he also asks if Christ can be the minister of sin (Gal 2¹⁷), by which he means its agent; and when he speaks of being himself a minister of Christ (Ro 15¹⁵, 2 Co 11²⁵, Eph 3⁷) or of the gospel (1 Col 12²⁵), he does not use the word in any other sense than the absolute sense of servant. The word 'servant' in AV means commonly modern 'slave,' and so 'minister' is modern 'servant.' The minister in biblical language is always a 'waiter on,' as Sir John Cheke translates the word in Mt 20²⁶ 'Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister.'

Elyot (Governour, i. 13) says that 'in the message to kynge Pharo, Aaron rather as a ministre than a companyon wente with Moses.' Tindale's tr. of Mt 526 is 'Agre with thyne adversary quicklye...lest... the judge delivre the to the minister.' Wyclif, who has 'minister' very often for 'officer,' as Jn 26.9 722 1818, has 'domesman' here; the Geneva Bible has 'sargeant'; the 'officer' of AV is from the Rhemish. Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Paraphrase, i. fol. c., 'Finally entring in he satte emong the ministers warming him at the coles.' See next article.

MINISTER, MINISTRY.—1. IN OLD TESTAMENT.—These words are still employed by RV as the trⁿ almost exclusively of shērēth and its correlates, which again are translated in the LXX almost exclusively by λειτουργεῖν and its correlates. The exceptions in the LXX are so rare as to be almost negligible; and yet the exclusiveness and some of the exceptions, when examined, are striking and suggestive. Shērēth is the word chosen to express ministration towards a higher being for the common weal; hence it expresses the ministration of the priests and Levites as a high function, for the common weal, in relation to God (e.g. Ex 29²⁰; and, ironically, the ministration to gods of wood and stone, Ezk 20²⁰; it stands also for the ministration Godward of the elemental angels as the forces of nature (Ps 103²¹ 104⁴); and likewise of one human being to another of higher rank, again most frequently for some public good, as of Joshua to Moses (Jos 1¹).

To represent ministration looked at in this light—a high function for the common weal—the LXX most fitly chose λειτουργεῖν (-ἰα, -ημα, -ὑτ, -ικὸτ, -ἡσιμοτ), derived, as it was, from ἔργον and the Atti:

*For the practice in the Scotch Reformed Church, cf. Calderwood, The True History of the Church of Scotland, 106—! Pastors, Bishops, or Ministers are they who are appointed to particular congregations, which they rule by the word of God, and over the which they watch. In respect whereof, sometime they are called Pastors, because they feed their Congregation; sometime Episcopi, or Bishops, because they watch over their Flock; sometimes Ministers, by reason of their service and office; and sometimes also Presbyturs or Seniors, for the gravity in manners, which they ought to have, in taking care of the spiritual government, which ought to be most deare unto them.

λεῖτος (Ionic λήῖτος, Doric λάῖτος, 'pertaining to the λαός,' the people), and carrying with it, as it did, the remembrance of public duty discharged for the state by richer citizens at their own expense. That the idea of priestly ministration, though strange to the word in classical literature, was not strange to it in Alexandrian Greek, is proved by Egyptian papyri of the 2nd cent. B.C. (see Deissmann, Beiträge aus den Papyri, p. 137 f.); and it is found later on in the use of the word by Diodorus Siculus, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Plutarch (see Deissmann, ibid., and Cremer, Lexicon, Eng. tr. p. 764). Aarpeter (only twice for shërëth, Nu 16°, Ezk 20°, and each time of the priestly function) is mostly in LXX the representative of 'ābhad, and differs from \(\lambda_{erroupper}\)\(\text{in}\) in being not so much priestly service as the religious service of the entire congregation (Ex 3¹²) or of the individual worshipper (2 S 15²; cf. Ph 3², Ro 1²). individual worshipper (2 S 15°; cr. Pn 3°, Ro 1°). (It is true, on the other hand, that, almost in every case where the subst. λειτουργία appears, the original is 'dbhōdāh; but this may be because no abstract subst. had been formed from shērēth). When θεράπων stands for shērēth (ptcp.), as it once does, Ex 3311 'his mister (RV) Joshua, 'the idea present is non-servile attendance, like that of a squire in the Middle Ages. (Cf. Hom. II. xvi. 244, the relation of Patroclus to Achilles; and Nu 12', He 3', the relation of Moses to God). Twice only does λειτουργεῖν represent the rare Aramaic pčlah, Ezr 7²⁴ (-os), 7¹⁹ (-la), and in both cases in regard to the service of the sanctuary. Here the idea in the Aram. appears to be that of labour, as though it were the labour of ploughing. Augment (-ia, -o) as the rendering of shereth is entirely confined to Esther, and occurs but two or three times even there. The idea in this word will be dealt with below. Not one of the instances in Esther touches the priestly function.

These remarks on the variations in the Heb. and LXX will suffice to show how shërëth and herroupyeir have practically the monopoly of ex-

Autroupγεῖν have practically the monopoly of expression when the subject is priestly ministration, whether narrowly or widely interpreted.

2. In NT.—While λειτουργεῖν is the word for ministration in the LXX, the word in NT is διακονεῖν. The exception in the OT is the rule in the NT. And this is a suggestive fact. The NT ministry is not one of the priest as distinct from the neonle: the exclusive class becomes a universal the people: the exclusive class becomes a universal priesthood. Auroupyen and its correlates occur (in St. Paul, St. Luke, and He, and nowhere else) only about fifteen times in all, and not in any single case can they be made to apply to a literal priestly function on the part of the Christian ministry. Sometimes there is a literal reference to the Jewish ritual (Lk 1²⁸, He 9²¹ 10²¹). Once Christ is spoken of in the same region in the light of fulfilment as 'minister, λειτουργός, of the sanctuary (in the heavens) and of the true tabernacle.' (in the neavens) and of the true tabernacie. Once the word is used of prophets and teachers at Antioch, Ac 13², with reference, perhaps, to the offering of prayer in the face of the congregation. Twice there is, in connexion with St. Paul, the thought of sacrifice; but in Ph 2¹⁷ 'the Philippians are the priests, their faith is the sacrifice, St. Paul's life-blood is the accompanying libation' (Lightfoot, is loco); and in Ro 15¹⁶, though St. Paul is the sacrificing priest, he is so only figure. Paul is the sacrificing priest, he is so only figuratively: his priestly function is preaching the gospel, and the sacrifice is the believing Gentiles. Its uses elsewhere concern the ministration to the wants of the poor saints, 2 Co 9¹², or of St. Paul himself, Ph 2^{28, 30}—the sacrifice of charity or the service rendered to God by state officials, Ro 13°, or by the angels of wind and fire, He 17°. 14. The fact seems clear that the NT writers prefer Siakoveîv (-la, -os) because it connotes two things:

the first, which herroupyer also connotes, ministration Godward in the service of others; the second, which herroupyer does not connote, lowliness in that ministration. In both these senses it is in the line of succession from classical usage. To the Greek the practically dominant connotation was a service relatively low and even menial. That didagoes and doubles breathed in classical Greek the same air is obvious from Plato's junction of διακονικάς with δουλοπρεπεῖς and ἀνελευθέρους (Gorg. 518 A), and from his identification of διακονεῖν and the work of δοῦλοι in tending cattle and tilling the soil (Laws, vii. 805 E). In NT the use is in no wise different. St. Paul employs both Anset (Ph 1, 2 Co 11²²) and to his converts δι' 'Inσοῦν (2 Co 4⁵, 1 Co 3⁵); and he tells how Christ Himself both took the form of a δοῦλος (Ph 27) and became a didkovos of the circumcision (Ro 158), as though his Lord's own description of His position had impressed him with the parallel (Mt 20³⁶⁻²⁶). And though, in the parable of the Wedding Garment, it is δοῦλοι that invite and διάκονοι that cast out, Mt 22³⁶⁻⁴⁸, ¹⁰⁻¹³, the latter word appears to be preferred in v.13 because attendants at table are there spoken of, such attendants being either bond or free, Lk 12⁹⁷⁶, Mt 8¹⁸. This menial service of waiting at table (διακονεῦν) is cited by Christ, Lk 17⁵ 22²⁷, as the characteristic sign of the contrast between the relative positions of master and servant, and furnishes Him with a parabolic picture both of His own position among His disciples, Lk 22²⁷, and of the striking way in which the Great Master shall reward His servants continued watchfulness, Lk 12st. Even in secular Greek there was an inkling of the dignity of this menial humbleness in relation to the gods. Aristeides (Orat. 46, p. 198 f., quoted by Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 203 f.) 'refuses to call [Athenian] statesmen who had saved their country] διάκονοι of statesmen who had saved their country] diaknow of the state, but will gladly call them diaknow of the Saviour Gods who had used their instrumentality'; and Epictetus (Hort, p. 204) 'in several remarkable passages (Diss. iii. 22. 69; 24. 65; iv. 7. 20; cf. iii. 28. 28) makes it the dignity of a man to be a diaknows of God. The Gospel gave the word a still higher consecration of the same kind... For [a Lord who had taken on Himself the form of a servant] every grade and pattern of service was lifted into a higher sphere. . . . Ministration (διακονία) thus became one of the primary aims of all Christian actions' (ε.q. Eph 4¹², where 'the work of διακονία' is parallel with 'the edification of the body of Christ'), whether for apostles, 2 Co 4¹, or for evangelists, 2 Ti 4⁵, or for the presbyter or episcopus, Col 4¹⁷, or for the 'deacon' himself: whether the emphasis was (Ph 1) on government (ἐπισκοπή) or on service (διακονία), διακονία was 'the badge of all the tribe'; whether the service was to God, 2 Co 6⁴, or to Christ, Col 1⁷, 1 Ti 4⁶, or to the gospel, Eph 3⁷, or to the Church, Ro 12⁷, or to the material wants of the poor saints, Ac 6^{1.2}, For [a Lord who had taken on Himself the form the material wants of the poor saints, Ac 61.2, 2 Co 9. He 61.9, or to St. Paul himself, officially Ac 19.2, Col 17, 2 Ti 411, or materially Philem 13, 2 Ti 11.8 (cf. Lk 83, women διηκόρουν to Christ and His disciples of their substance). In all cases His disciples of their substance). In all cases there was διακονία to the Master for the benefit of others, Col 17. And so also in the technical sense of the word, the definite office, διάκονος (see Deacon). This office did not exclude teaching: such exclusion, in the presence of capacity, 'would have been contrary to the spirit of the Apoetolic age' (Hort, p. 202). Stephen, one of the Seven, was a powerful preacher (Ac 6. 7); and whether the Seven (cf. Ac 6² διακονεῖν τραπέζαις) were technically deacons or not, they must surely have suggested the office in the several churches later on: 'analogous wants might well lead to analogous institutions' (Hort, p. 209). That teaching, however, was 'no part of the official duty' of a deacon, is suggested by a comparison of the qualifications required for a deacon at Ephesus and those required for a presbyter or episcopus (1 Ti 3^{257, 857.}); while the injunction against talebearing in the men-deacons and backbiting in the women suggest a frequent contact with individual Christians and Christian families, a going in and out among them, a visitation from house to house. Thus they appear to have been 'the main instruments for giving practical effect to the mutual sympathy of the members of the body'; and the efficiency of the office was sensibly increased by being divided between the sexes (1 Ti 3¹¹ compared with Ro 16¹¹).

Besides λειτουργός and διάκονος there is in NT a third word still (RV) occasionally translated 'minister,' viz. ὑπηρέτης (-εἰν), lit. an 'underrower' in a galley, but used simply as 'servant,' and retaining no special connotation from its derivation, unless it be that of subordination.

The verb is used of David's service of God, Ac 1326, and Moses is called by Josephus God's υπηρέτης (Ant. III. i. 4). The subst. is found only twice in the canonical LXX, and -εν and -εσία once each, and all in the various senses of ordinary service. But in Wis the words occur eight times, and once (64) in a lofty sense,—kings the ὑπηρέται of God's kingdom. In this word the subordination comes out more distinctly than in the other two (cf. Xenoph. Cyr. vi. 2. 13=the orderly of a com-Xenoph. Cyr. vi. 2. 13=the orderly of a commander), but διάκονος and ὑπηρέτης are continually running into one another (1 Co 4¹, 2 Co 11²²). Of the five places where AV translated the subst. by 'minister,' three remain in RV: Lk 1² ('m. of the word': cf. Ac 6⁴ 'διακονία of the word'), Ac 26¹² ('m. and eye-witness' for Christ), 1 Co 4² ('m. of Christ': cf. 2 Co 11²² 'διάκονα of Christ'). RV appropriately gives 'attendant' or 'servant' elsewhere: so John Mark (Ac 13²) is now the 'attendant' on Paul and Barnabas; possibly, as Blass suggests, for the secondary work of bap-Blass suggests, for the secondary work of bap-tizing; and, as Ramsay suggests (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 71), 'the curiously incidental way in which he is brought before the reader's notice and, we may add, the word of subordination, chosen to describe his position) may serve 'to emphasize the secondary character of John Mark, in view of what was to happen in Pamphylia: he was not essential to the expedition: he had not been formally delegated by the Church of Antioch he was an extra hand taken by Paul and Antioch: he was an extra hand, taken by Paul and Barnabas on their own responsibility.' So also the 'minister' in Lk 420 is now the 'attendant': he was the hazzān of the temple,—'a kind of verger,' see DEACON in vol. i. p. 575,—'whose office it was (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 66 f.) to bring out the Holy Scriptures at public worsely and to put them by Scriptures at public worship and to put them by again.' He was no Jewish anticipation of deacon, but was in every respect the servant of the congregation, having, e.g., to execute upon those con-demned to it the punishment of scourging (Makkoth iii. 12), and also to instruct the children in reading (Shabbath i. 3; but see EDUCATION in vol. i. p. 650°). A similar use of the word occurs in Mt 5²² 'deliver thee to the officer,' i.e. one of the attendants or officials of the Sanhedrin, like lictors or sergeantsometals of the Sannedrin, like lictors or sergeants-at-arms (Schürer, HJP II. 1. 187), the temple police, a special feature in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 18¹⁸ e.g.), from whom Jesus doubtless takes His parallel when in Jn 18³⁶ He says, 'my ὑπηρέται would now be striving.' For Mt's ὑπηρέτης (5²⁶) Lk (12³⁶) gives πράπτωρ, the avenger of the tragedians (Æsch. Eum. 210) the targettern of Deposits of Parallel and the same of Deposits of the same of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of Deposits of the same of the same of the same of Deposits of the same 319), the taxgatherer of Demosthenes (778. 18), the public accountant of the papyri (3rd cent. B.C., see Deissmann. Beiträge, p. 152), who has now become an under-ordicer of justice.

J. MASSIE.

MINNI (12, LXX παρ' έμοῦ, Aq. Symm. Μενεί).— Name of a country mentioned in Jer 51²⁷ between Ararat and Ash-kenaz, and summoned to make war on Babylon. It is evidently equivalent to Mann, which the authors of the maps appended to KIB i. and ii. place somewhere between Lake Van and the Araxes, while Sayce (JRAS, 1882, p. 389) infers from the line of march of the Assyrian kings that this people must have lived on the S.W. shores of Lake Urmia. The Assyrian texts supply us with several names, both local and personal, connected with Mann. Their chief city was called Zirtu or Izirtu, and their chief fortress Ishtat (Assurbanipal, ed. S. A. Smith, i. 21); other cities were Izibia, Armed, Shuandakhul, and Zurzukka (Sargon, ed. Winckler, pp. 105, 107); tribes included in Mann were Umildish, Zikirtu, and Misianda (ib.). Shalmaneser II. in the year 830 A.D. attacked king Udaki of Mann (KIB). 147), and his success the state of the second tribute from the cessor Shamsi-Ramman received tribute from this country (ib. 179). In Sargon's history the kings of Mann play an important part. He relates how, after the death of their king Iranzu, he put on the throne Iranzu's son Aza. Aza was shortly afterwards murdered by insurgents, who at the instiga-tion of king Ursa of Urartu put Aza's brother Ullusunu on the throne. Sargon marched against the insurgents and defeated them, but on Ullusunu's submission received him into favour. Presently, however, Ullusunu again revolted, but the inscription is defective at the point where it originally recorded his fate (Winckler, l.c. and 89). Assurbanipal in his fourth campaign attacked Aklsheri king of Mann, seized his capital Izirtu, and laid waste 15 days' extent of country. After Akhsheri had been betrayed by his subjects, the Assyrian king set Akhsheri's son Ualli on the throne, but increased the tribute of Mann by 15 horses, and took Ualli's son Erishinni and his daughter to Nineveh (S. A. Smith, l.c. 23).—In the Vanic increases of the king Minney and Argistia inscription of the kings Minuas and Argistis, whose dates can be approximately fixed for the last decade of the 9th and the first decade of the 8th cent. B.C., there are repeatedly allusions to the country Ma-na-a, and even to a king named Haza, probably a namesake of, though not identical with, Sargon's contemporary (Sayce, l.c. 607). These inscriptions imply with certainty that the country of Mann was raided by the kings of Van (=Urartu), but the language in which they are composed is perhaps still too obscure to give us much more information. Both sets of documents lead us to suppose that Mann was a province of considerable extent, and thickly populated; that it was alternately under Assyrian and Vanic domination, and suffered severely from the rivalry of these powers. The words that have been quoted have no obvious linguistic affinities, and it does not appear that any of the local names have been maintained.

MINNITH (Γ'35).—1. Jephthah smote the Ammonites 'from Aroer until thou come to Minnith,' Jg 11³³ (Β άχρις 'Αρνών, Α είς Σεμωείθ, Luc. Σεμενείθ). According to the Onomasticon (ε.υ. 'Mennith') it was shown 4 Roman miles from Heshbon on the road to Philadelphia, but the name has not been recovered in this direction, which, as Moore points out, does not suit the requirement of the text that Minnith should be in Ammonite territory beyond Aroer, not in the immediate vicinity of Heshbon. C. R. CONDER. MINT (ἡδύοσμον, mentha). - Mint is not mentioned in the OT, and only once in NT (Mt 2828 || Lk 1142) along with dill, rue, and cummin, as a tithable product. The ancient Greeks employed in medicine a plant called μίνθος or μίνθη, which likewise bore the name ἡδύοσμον=' the sweet-smelling,' on account of its pleasant odour. It is believed by some to have been the peppermint, Mentha piperita, L. It is more probable that it was generic, and included M. sativa, L., the garden mint; M. viridis, L., the spear mint; M. sylvestris, L., the horse mint; and M. aquatica, L., the water mint; and perhaps M. Pulegium, L., the pennyroyal. A patch of garden mint is cultivated near almost every house in Bible lands, and the fragrant leaves enter into many of their salads and cooked dishes. It is known in Arab. as na'na'. It is the only species now cultivated and eaten. M. sylvestris grows wild everywhere by ditches and banks. M. aquatica grows in water. It is less common than the other. M. Pulegium is not uncommon in wet places. For illustrations from Rabbinical sources of the tithing of mint, see Wünsche, Neue Beiträge, 291, 443. G. E. MIPHKAD, THE GATE (יְשֵׁשֵּׁר רְפֵּכֶּרְ RV Ham-miphkad; πόλη τοῦ Μαφεκάδ; porta judicialis).—A gate near the east wall of Jerusalem during the rebuilding of the city walls on the return from the Captivity (Neh 3³¹). Its position was somewhere between the northern portion of the Ophel wall and the Sheep Gate, i.e. somewhere east of the temple buildings and adjoining palaces. It can be deduced as follows: -

On the dedication of the city walls on their completion (Neh 12sh.), two great companies issued from the temple to the centre of the western wall of the city, and, separating near the Valley Gate, proceeded along the walls to the temple-one by the northern defences, and the other by the southern The principal gates and towers they defences. passed during their progress are enumerated. By the north they traversed the whole way along the wall, and, passing the towers of Hananel and Meah, and the sheep-gate, stood still in the prison-gate, i.e. to the north of the temple. The other company traversed the southern wall, and, passing the dung-gate and the fountain-gate (near Siloam), came down from the wall, and went up by the stairs of the city of David, even unto the watergate eastward, i.e. to the south of the temple. In the account of the rebuilding of the walls (Neh 3) the same gates and towers are enumerated, and, in addition, all that portion of the wall to the east of Jerusalem, from the/fountain-gate, the the east of Jerusalem, from the fountain-gate, the pool of Siloam, the armoury to the court of the prison; and another portion along the Ophel wall to the place over against the water-gate (of the temple) towards the east and thence by the horse-gate and the east to the place over against the gate Miphkad, to the going up of the corner, unto the sheep-gate. This apparently indicates that the gate Miphkad, if not actually in the eastern city wall, was a very near it, to the north-east of city wall, was vry near it, to the north-east of the temple.

outside the sanctuary, but inside the city walls: Ezk 4321 'Thou shalt take the bullock also of the sinoffering, and he shall burn it in the appointed place

Miphkad has three meanings (Ges. Lex.): (1) A number, or numbers; (2) a commandment or mandate; (3) an appointed place. It is used in connexion with the chambers of the house of the Lord, and the oblations and tithes: e.g. by the command-ment (miph!:ad) of Hezekiah the king and Azariah the ruler of God's house, certain men are appointed overseers (2 Ch 3118). It is used in connexion with David's numbering of the people of Israel (2 S 249, 1 Ch 216).

Lightfoot (ii. 27) points out that the Vulgate renders the gate Miphkad as the gate of judgment: this may perhaps refer to the hall of judgment in the Prætorium, situated in later days in the Antonia, to the north of the temple, or it may refer to the east gate of the temple (Ezk 35-39, Jl 2, Mic 43) overlooking the Valley of Jehoshaphat: both Moslems and Jews believe that the last judgment is to take place there. Brocardus speaks of a Porta Judiciaria over against the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

The general opinion is that Miphkad was situated to the north-east of the temple (PEFSt, 1879, 176; 1883, 215; 1885, 61; 1889, 90; 1890, 47).

i. THE OBJECTIVE POSSIBILITY OF MIRACLES. -1. It is a remarkable circumstance that the great stumbling-block at the present day to many persons who are anxious to accept the Christian creeds should be the statement of the very fact which was put forward in the apostolic age as the one convincing proof of their truth, viz. the fact of the Resurrection of Christ. The Christian miracles were once an 'aid to faith'; they are now regarded by many as a grave hindrance to the acceptance of Christianity. It is not hard to account for this. With the development of physical science, and with the largely increased knowledge of what we are accustomed to call the laws of nature, and still more with the growth of the conviction which is at the root of all science that nothing happens abnormally, but that in the physical world every effect has its cause, and that the same causes under the same circumstances will always produce the same effects, men have come to think that there is something about a 'miracle' which no scientifically educated person can believe. So it has come to pass that the argument based on the miracles with which Christianity was ushered into the world, has been more vehemently attacked than any other of the 'evidences' which are usually marshalled: so 'evidences' strenuous, indeed, has been the attack, that not a few theologians, in deference to the spirit of the age, while not conceding in so many words the impossibility of miracles, have relegated the miraculous to some obscure corner of the religious system which they profess and teach. And the impossi-bility of miracles is avowedly the foundation of much of the negative criticism to which the Christian documents have been subjected. The spirit in which Goethe said to Lavater, 'A voice from heaven would not convince me that water burned or a dead man rose again,' often finds The following passage seems to indicate that it expression in literature. Renan prefaces his Vie was the place where the sin-offering was burnt de Jésus by saying of the Gospels, 'C'est parce Copprynda, 1940, my Charles Scribner's Sons. qu'ils racontent des miracles que je dis, Les Evangiles sont des légendes; ils peuvent contenir de l'histoire, mais certainement tout n'y est pas historique.' And Strauss is careful to distinguish the 'supernatural' element in the Gospels from 'the natural element which alone is historically available,' criticism of the documents being thus prejudiced at the outset by the assumption that no account which involves the miraculous can possibly be historical.

2. What then is a 'miracle,' and wherein consists the difficulty of believing that it has taken place? It is evident that precise definition is necessary, if we are to arrive at any conclusion of value in respect of a question like this. Let us start with the definition given by J. S. Mill: 'To constitute a miracle, a phenomenon must take place without having been preceded by any ante-cedent phenomenal conditions sufficient again to reproduce it. . . . The test of a miracle is, Were there present in the case such external conditions, such second causes we may call them, that whenever these conditions or causes reappear the event will be reproduced? If there were, it is not a miracle; if there were not, it is.'* Now from this definition it is apparent that to one who holds that there is nothing to be known save the sequences and coexistences of phenomena, that 'nature' is only a name for the sum-total of the mechanical and chemical forces of the universe (see NATURE), that there is, in short, no other mode of existence than that which can be perceived by the bodily senses, the occurrence of a miracle would be a state of the large of expectation which demonstrates and the state of the large of expectation which demonstrates are stated to the large of the la violation of the law of causation, which demands a cause for each observed effect. No causes other than material can come within the cognizance of man, and therefore, since a 'miracle' has no material cause, it cannot be considered as within the field of possibility. 'To consistent and thoroughgoing materialism miracles are impossible. If, by any chance, some anomalous and extraordinary phenomenon were attested on unimpeachable testimony, which satisfied the definition that has been quoted from Mill of a 'miracle,' the conclusion that the materialist would be forced to adopt would be that the phenomenon in question was due to some hitherto unobserved combination of physical forces. It could not be a miracle, for a miracle, ex hypothesi, is a perturbation of the normal sequence of physical causation, and the materialist does not admit the existence or the possibility of any force adequate to produce such perturbation.

3. Materialism, however, is not the last word of philosophy. It is inconsistent with any form of religion, and need not be elaborately discussed here. All Theists recognize that the operation of spiritual forces is just as real, just as familiar, an experience as the operation of material forces. An obvious illustration of the intervention of spiritual force in the phenomenal world is afforded by the consequences which ensue in the visible order every time we exert our free will. Mind is not a mere function of the bodily organism, and thought is something distinct from those movements of the grey matter of the brain which seem to accompany it perpetually in our present experience. But mind, poor, reason, is a vera causa—a cause which produces effects in the physical order, effects which are often far-reaching and important. The action of man's free will, of which the outward effect is the motion of his limbs, is not a violation of the law of causation: that law is true only of physical causes, and the physical sequence is perfectly observed, so far as we know. But the originating impulse comes from a region other than physical, even from the domain of spirit, where man lives his highest life and from which he catches his highest inspirations. We shall see presently that there is no complete analogy between such intervention of human will in the physical order, and that intervention of the Divine volition which we shall find to be the characteristic of a 'miracle'; but, although the analogy is incomplete, it is important to recognize that we have experience of an intrusion into the physical by the moral order every time that we exert our wills to move our bodies. There are forces other than physical to be reckoned with.

4. Thus among the agents which can produce effects in the physical order spiritual agents must be counted; and of these the highest is God. Our conception of the universe is partial and inadequate unless we realize that a great Spiritual Being is the ultimate source of all the manifold activities which it daily and hourly presents to our view. (See NATURE.) And if, with this in our minds, we approach an anomalous phenomenon which seems to us to interrupt the continuity of physical sequence, we shall have to enumerate among possible explanations this other, that it is due to the direct volition of the Deity. If we are satisfied that this is its explanation, we call it a miracle, and Mill's definition of a miracle may be replaced to the property of a replaced to the property of the property by words of a thinker of a very different school. 'Miraculum,' said St. Thomas Aquinas, 'est præter ordinem totius nature create; Deus igitur cum solus sit non creatura, solus etiam virtute propria miracula facere potest.'* It would not be easy to express oneself more succinctly than this. And it is important to observe that the very idea of a miracle, in this view, presupposes the existence of a supreme spiritual agent. To attempt to prove the existence of God by the aid of well-attested occurrences of 'miracle' is idle, because we have not any conception of the possibility of miracle apart from His existence and providence.

5. The possibility of miracle involves the existence of God; it does not at once follow that the converse is true, and that the existence of God implies the possibility of miracle. And we have now to consider whether, granting the existence of a Supreme Being who stands to nature in the relation of Author and Governor, its Creator and its Life, at once immanent in it and transcending it, there are any grounds in reason for denying the possibility of His miraculous intervention in the universe which He has made. The argument by which Spinoza attempted to subvert this possibility has become famous, and, inasmuch as almost all a priori arguments on the negative side are but variations of it, a summary of it is essential to the present discussion. In the article NATURE, Spinoza's view of the relation of God to the world is briefly explained. It was a kind of Pantheism, according to which the processes of the universe were the manifestations of its Spiritual Life, the exhibition, as it were, of the natura naturans unfolding itself in the natura naturata. Thus no place is leit for free acts of the Divine volition. And Spinoza lays down as a thesis that 'nothing happens in nature which is in contradiction with its universal laws.' Proceeding, then, to define a miracle as an event in contradiction with the universal laws of nature, he has no difficulty in establishing the impossibility of any event of the miraculous order. The whole force of the argument, and at the same time its whole fallacy, is found in the ambiguity of the word nature. Spinoza's thesis that 'nothing happens in nature which is in contradiction with it; universal laws' is true only if nature includes a l that is, if it is understood as embracing the sur of all existence and of all force, material and spiritual, as including not only physical movements but the energy of man and of God. But if nature be taken in this large sense, it is quite unjustifiable to assert without proof that 'miracles are in contradiction with the universal laws of nature.' They are only, as Aquinas has it, 'præter ordinem totius naturæ creatæ'; miracles are contrary to the order of nature, only if nature be regarded as exclusive and independent of God.* The distinction is as old as Augustine, and must be carefully borne in mind: 'Portentum fit, non contra naturam, sed contra quam est nota natura' (de Civ. Dei. xxi. 8). Nature as we know it is not to be identified with nature as God knows it, with the 'nature' of which He is a part; and it is only of the latter that we can say that its laws are universally valid.

6. There is, however, a form of Spinoza's argument which has more plausibility than that just considered, based as the latter is on a palpable logical fallacy. For it may be argued that miracles are contrary to the very conception of God as the All-Wise. A miracle would be an introduction of disorder into that creation of which the only idea worthy of God is that of an unchangeable order. It would be a contradiction of God by Himself, for the law which is at variance with the miracle is as much the reflexion of the divine will and purpose as the miracle itself.† God is not a man that he should repent? (1 S 1529). His eternal decrees are unchangeable, and they are dictated by perfect wisdom. But a miracle is an intervention which can only be demanded by an imperfection in the existing order; and thus we have to suppose that the creation is, after all, but an imperfect expression of the Divine will. Here, it is urged, is something inconsistent with the infinite wisdom and power of Him who pronounced all, at the beginning, to be 'very good.' In a perfect system, any interference with the normal course of things could only be for the worse.

The answer is not far to seek, when we express our difficulty in such words as these last. For this world is not, however much we may desire it, the best of all possible, or even of all imaginable, worlds. At some remote epoch in man's history his progress was violently interrupted; his career was checked in its progress 'from strength to strength.' The free will, which was his greatest gift, became the source of his greatest misery. And his fall has left permanent traces on the fair animous of Cod Horrard could ever have entered. universe of God. How evil could ever have entered into the world we do not know (see FALL); but as things are, man has not fulfilled the Divine in-tention for him. From the consequences of his sin he cannot be saved by the mere normal operations of natural law, by the orderly development of his own nature. That redemption can be brought about only by an act of Divine mercy, which may involve - which perhaps necessitates - a perturbation of the established order. But the real marvel is not the intervention of grace, but the sin which demanded it. For sin is drouls, lawlessness (1 Jn 34); it is a violation of moral law, which may be—and we can see reasons which suggest that it is—a far greater anomaly than any apparent violation of physical law could possibly be. There is an incongruity which we cannot reconcile (see FALL) between our conceptions of an All-Wise and All-Good God and the existence of sin; but that incongruity being frankly recognized, there is no further difficulty in conceiving of God as intervening, in an exceptional way, at an exceptional moment, to save man from the consequences of his own rash acts.

* See Spinoza, Tructatus Theologico-Politicus, c. 6, and Mosley, Miracles, p. 215 ff.

7. There is, indeed, a point of view from which it would be impossible to conceive of such intervention taking place, without doing violence to our best notions of the Supreme. We are not to conceive of the relation between God and nature as that merely which subsists between an architect and his work (see NATURE), between a mechanic and the machine which he has made, and which, once made, is left to its own devices, unless it gets out of order.

'The reason why, among men, an artificer is justly esteemed so much the more skifful as the machine of his composing will continue to move regularly without any further interposition of the workman, is, because the skill of all human artificers consists only in composing, adjusting, or putting together certain movements, the principles of whose motion are altogether dependent upon the artificer. . . But with regard to God, the case is quite different; because He not only composes or puts things together, but is Himself the Author and continual Preserver of their original forces or moving powers. And consequently it is not a diminution, but the true giory of His workmanship, that nothing is done without His continual government and inspection.'

On the mechanical theory of nature, the word intervention' might seem to suggest imperfect workmanship or foresight on the part of the Creator; but that is not a theory with which, as Christians, we are concerned. One who upholds 'all things by the word of His power' (He 13) cannot be spoken of as intruding, either in nature or in grace. And thus, despite the associations which cling to the word 'intervention,' it is hard to get a better word to express a special and extraordinary manifestation of purpose on the part of Him who is ever immanent in nature. We do not imply by its use that God stands aloof from the affairs of the world, save on those few occasions which we call miraculous, but we mean that, at certain critical moments in the history of the human race, the uniformity of His rule has been departed from, 'lest one good custom should corrupt the world.' 'When,' says Augustine,† 'things happen in a continuous kind of river of ever-flowing succession, passing from the hidden to the visible, and from the visible to the hidden, by a regular and beaten track, they are called natural; when, for the admonition of men, they are thrust in by an unusual changeableness, then they are called miracles.'

8. There prevails, however, at the present day a widespread dislike to any conception which involves a break in the continuity of the physical order, and thus various hypotheses have been proposed, according to which miracles may be made to appear more or less 'natural.' Indeed, 'natural law in the spiritual world' has been accepted by some as the principle of the much desired eirenicon between science and religion. It will be instructive to consider in detail some of these hypotheses.

(a) In the discussion of the miraculous, stress has at times been laid on the principle that God works by means. 'Miracles,' says the Duke of Argyll, 'may be wrought by the selection and use of laws of which man knows and can know nothing, and which, if he did know, he could not employ.' t And he suggests that much of the difficulty attendant on belief in supernatural agency is due to neglect of this truth. Most people seem to understand by supernatural power, power independent of the use of means, and the scientific mind cannot bring itself to believe in this. It is doubtful if this helps us much. The difficulty of accepting an alleged miracle as real would not be much lessened, if it were shown that natural means had been used for its accomplishment. For example, in several of the 'miracles' of the OT, it is distinctly asserted that natural forces were employed as means. Thus the dividing of the Red Sea and the supply of quails are asserted to have been brought about through the agency of a wind blowing in a particular direction (Ex 14²¹, Nu 11⁸¹). Now, if any incredibility attach to these events, it does not seem that the introduction of machinery renders them any more credible. For the introduction of this machinery does not remove the direct intervention of God; it merely shifts it back to an earlier stage. The wind brought the quails, but what brought the wind?

'It is as real a miracle that the wind should come at the direct command of God, as that the qualis should come without the wind. And so in every case. The immediate consequent of the special exertion of the Divine will is a miracle. Between the immediate consequent and the final result any number of "means" may be interposed; but this does not alter the miraculous character of the event—it only disguises it. A miracle is not the less a miracle because in the series of phenomena which we call an event there are present in addition to the one miraculous element a hundred elements which are not miraculous.'*

(b) Such events, however, as the dividing of the Red Sea and the supply of quails are not in themselves extraordinary; they can be classed as 'miracles' only because of the circumstances under which they happened, and should perhaps be rather described as 'special providences,' to use a common phrase whose meaning is discussed below. But can we conceive any way in which events which seem to be an interruption of the physical order may be brought under law? An ingenious illustration was put forward in this connexion by Babbage in his Ninth Bridgewater Treatise. He supposed the case of a complicated machine, so constructed that by turning the handle the first 100,000 natural numbers appear consecutively at regular intervals on a dial plate, but such that the next number is 100,100 instead of 100,001; after which apparent miracle the series goes on as before in arithmetical progression. Now, the exceptional numbers are not miracles or even anomalies; they were all provided for in the original construction of the machine; they are examples of law, unknown to the unscientific public, but known to the wise artificer. Peabody gave a similar illustration. He told a story of a church clock, so contrived that at the close of a century it strikes the years as it ordinarily strikes the hours. 'As 100 years come to a close, suddenly in the immense mass of complicated mechanism a little wheel turns, a pin slides into the appointed place, and in the shadows of the night the bell tolls a requiem over the generations which during a century have lived and laboured and been buried around it. One of these generations might live and die and witness nothing peculiar.' The ano-malous striking of the clock at the close of the century would seem a miracle to the uninstructed public; and yet it was not abnormal in any true sense. Such analogies are obviously not apt in certain particulars. Not to speak of the comparison of nature to a machine, which, as we have already seen, is misleading, it is plain that the exceptional phenomena described above would react at regular intervals, however long. We cannot suppose that there is any such periodic law in the case of miracles, which, as signs, are in their very nature unique. And so the only service which such analogies render is to remind us of our unfathomable ignorance of the inner constitution of nature, and so to guard us from hasty dogmatic negations of the possibility of this or that alleged event.

(c) A better illustration, perhaps, than either of the above is the following, which was (like that of the numerical machine) suggested by Babbage. The science of mathematics teaches us that there are many curves made up of isolated points, in addition to a continuous curved line. To a non-mathematical mind it seems an absurd paradox to maintain that a single outlying point can be treated as lying on a continuous curve in its neighbourhood. But, in spite of the apparent absurdity, nothing is more certain than that it can be so treated. A curve, which to the eye appears to be discontinuous and broken, is known by the mathematician to follow an unvarying law. Now, it is not extravagant to suppose that our knowledge is at least as inferior to that of the Divine mind as the knowledge of geometry possessed by the beginner is inferior to the knowledge of the skilled mathematician. In short, apparent discontinuity may not involve any real breach of law, the whole progress of science tending as it does to bring what were formerly anomalous facts under the protection of general principles. And thus a 'miracle' may really be explicable by Supreme Intelligence as an illustration of law. These considerations do not prove that miracles are reducible to law, but show that there is nothing incongruous with daily experience in supposing that they may be so reduced.

9. The law of continuity, which is often appealed to as putting out of court the possibility of miracles, is - it must ever be remembered - nothing more than a convenient principle for the direction of scientific investigation. It may often deceive us; we may imagine that phenomena exhibit discontinuity, when a larger experience shows us that continuity has been most strictly observed. But it is even more important to recognize that it has no claim at all to be regarded as a constitutive principle of nature; it is not a fetish before which we must bow down, and which we must worship. The gap between the inorganic and the organic, between death and living matter, between animal life and human thought,—all these are chasms which cannot be bridged, so far as we know. In each case there is a μετάβασις els άλλο γένος. The most evident breach of continuity that can be imagined is the Creation itself: to conceive an Infinite Creator calling into existence a finite world, is to conceive discontinuous action. And other points of singularity on the curve of development of life are to be found at the points where man became conscious of his powers and of him-self, and, lastly, when, in the fulness of time, God became Man. Stupendous miracles, indeed !
'Tria mirabilia,' said Descartes, 'fecit Dominus;
res ex nihilo, liberum arbitrium, et hominem Deum.

10. We may put the case in another way. Conceive for the moment the existence of beings confined to two dimensions of space. Length and breadth they understand; of height they can have no conception whatever. They live their lives in a plane; that space has other possibilities in store would be to them the maddest of dreams. To move northward or southward, eastward or westward, would be within their power; but the terms 'upward' or 'downward' could have no meaning at all. To such beings the advent of a visitor from the third dimension of space would be a true 'miracle'; it would be a violation of all the laws by which their universe has been ordered in the past. For such visitation could be reduced by them to no law; the appearance or disappearance of the vision (which would be simply brought about by descending upon or rising from the plane of their being) would be inexplicable. The movements of a visitor who could thus intrude into their universe would remain for ever anomalous and extraordinary, inasmuch as the third dimension of space is for them inconceivable. Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur. By what right do we, the inhabitants of this solid earth, assume that space is necessarily limited to three dimensions, and three only? Why not four or five? Indeed, mathematical research does not get very far before it begins to suggest that the possibilities of space are infinite, though inconceivable. We cannot, in short, assert the impossibility of miracle unless we are prepared to assume that the laws of space which fetter and confine us in every region of outward experience are laws for the whole universe. It does not need a study of the Kantian philosophy to perceive that such an assumption is entirely unwarranted. But—it is only a possibility, yet one worth pondering—if the existence of a world where space has four dimensions be credible (though not imaginable), it may well be that what we call miracles are to the inhabitants of that world the ordinary manifestations of 'natural' forces.*

11. Such considerations as these lead to a conclusion of considerable importance. They teach that the wonderful or anomalous or extraordinary character of any phenomenon is quite insufficient, by itself, to justify us in asserting that it must be due to the intervention of supreme spiritual For there is always the possibility, not to be ignored, that it is due to unknown combinations of known natural forces, or to a natural force hitherto undetected. A remarkable verse in the Bk. of Wis (1916) illustrates the anomalous combination of natural forces in a miracle, by likening it to the transposing of the melody played on a musical instrument to a different key: 'As the notes of a psaltery vary the character of the rhythm, even so did the elements, changing their order one with another, continuing always the same, each in its several sound.' And (as is pointed out in art. NATURAL) it is inevitable that what seems extraordinary to one man will not seem so to another. seemed a superhuman person to the Mexicans when he predicted an eclipse. To a dog, the actions of his master must repeatedly seem 'extraordinary,' i.e. anomalous and inexplicable to his faculties. Thus Locket defines a miracle as 'a sensible operation, which, being above the comprehension of the spectator and in his opinion contrary to the established course of nature, is taken by him to be divine.' The definition is not entirely satisfactory, for it loses sight of the important consideration which has been under discussion, viz. that the anomalous character of the alleged occurrence does not by itself establish the operation of spiritual force; but it is valuable as bringing out clearly the inadequacy of any such criterion to serve as an objective or universal test of 'miracle.' To class all 'extraordinary' or 'abnormal' occurrences as 'miracles' is to make an unwarrantable assumption. In short, to use the technical language of scholastic theology, we must not include among miracles 'ea quæ natura facit nobis tamen vel alicui occulta,' viz. the effects of physical forces as yet unknown.

12. Further, the wholesome consciousness of the limitations of our knowledge will prevent us from describing miracles as 'violations of law,' a phrase too commonly used, without any clear conception of the meaning of the words employed. If law here means 'law of the universe,' of that sum of existence which includes God Himself, it is plain that such a phrase is self-contradictory; the laws of the Cosmos, in this view, are the general principles of wisdom according to which the world is ruled, and these are, strictly, inviolable. Thus, when Butler suggests that 'God's miraculous interpositions may have been all along by general laws of wisdom,' ; and that we shall be able to see this in a future state of wider knowledge, he means by 'laws of wisdom,' not physical sequences which have been observed to be invariable in our experience, but the reasons by which the Divine Being is guided in the action of His Providence. And his observation amounts to this, that although miracles, produced as they are by the direct intervention of the Divine volition, do not obey the ordinary rule that every physical effect may be accounted for by an antecedent physical cause, yet they are not, on that account, lawless. They are wrought for a worthy end, and in accordance with a wise plan. And Butler explains elsewhere * that there may be an inherent limit in the nature of things to the utility of miracles, beyond which they would produce injury and disadvantage; the general bad result of the interposition being greater than the particular benefit produced by it. Thus one of the 'general laws' which might be sup-Thus posed to govern miraculous interposition would be a Law of Economy, that it should take place only at exceptional crises in the history of man or of the universe.

* The argument suggested in this paragraph was developed in an ingenious essay, published anonymously in 1894, under the title Flatland.
† Discourse on Miracles.

13. But, no doubt, when miracles are described as 'violations of law,' what is generally meant by law is physical law, the kind of law which is ascertained in the laboratory, and whose operation comes within the sphere of the bodily senses to observe. Such a law might be conceived as violated without any violence being done to our reason, for the sum of physical forces is not the entire Cosmos, or its most essential factor. But, as a matter of fact, observation could never demonstrate a violation of law in this sense, save to a being who was omniscient. For (see NATURAL) we have no title to assert that we know and can infallibly predict the outcome of a hitherto unobserved combination of physical forces; we cannot tell what is above nature, unless we know all that is within it.† As Huxley tersely wrote: 'If a dead man did come to life, the fact would be evidence, not that any law of nature had been violated, but that those laws, even when they express the results of a very long and uniform experience, are necessarily based on incomplete knowledge, and are to be held only on grounds of more or less justifiable expecta-tion.' With our imperfect knowledge of the condition.' ‡ tions of life, we are not justified in saying with confidence that the dead could not be restored to life by some, to us, unknown combination of physical forces. And thus the mere marvellousness of our Lord's miracles by no means justifies us in ascribing them to supernatural agency. All that the evidence in respect of their extraordinary character would justify would be that they were what He Himself called them, 'the works which none other did' (Jn 15²⁴). In this regard, suggestions have often been made to the effect that those phenomena which we now call miraculous may be all scientifically accounted for in the future, and shown to be the action of obscure natural causes, with whose action we are only partially acquainted. Archbishop Temple hints that 'the miraculous healing of the sick may be no miracle in the strictest sense at all. It may be but an instance of the power of mind over body - a power which is undeniably not yet brought within the range of science, and which, nevertheless, may be really within its domain. In other words, what seems to be miraculous, may be simply unusual.' And so all that the anomalous character of these recorded events would prove would be, that Christ's healing acts

*Analogy, i. 7.
†Angustine suggested that the miracle at Cans of Galilee is only the acceleration of a natural process: 'Ipse fecit vinum in nuptils qui omni modo hoe facit in vitibus.' It is the rate of the process which is extraordinary.

were at least relative miracles, in Schleiermacher's well-known phrase, 'miracles if not for the purpose of science, at least for the purpose of revelation, arresting attention on the Agent, accrediting Him as God's messenger, singling Him out from other nien and proving Him to be in possession of credentials deserving serious consideration; miracles for Christ's own time if not for ours, and having for that time the function and value of genuine miraculous deeds.'

14. We are thus led round again to the conclusion that the true miracle, which shall enable us to see the finger of God in the matter, must be more than a wonder. The word $\tau \ell \rho as$ is never used in the NT of a miracle, save in connexion with another word, viz. $\sigma \eta \mu e i o v$. The miracles of Christ are not only wonders; that would not guarantee their quality: they are signs (see Sign). They must not be separated from their context and viewed as the prodigies of a thaumaturgist; for they are capable of being interpreted as the manifestations of supreme spiritual force, only when the attendant circumstances are considered. Mozley puts the case thus:

'To say that the material fact which takes place in a miracle admits of being referred to an unknown natural cause, is not to say that the miracle itself does. A miracle is the material fact os coinciding with an express announcement, or with express supernatural pretensions in the agent. It is this correspondence of two facts which constitutes a miracle. If a person says to a blind man, 'see,' and he sees, it is not the sudden return of sight alone that we have to account for, but its return at that particular moment. For it is morally impossible that this exact agreement of an event with a command or notification could have been by a mere chance, or, as we should say, been an extraordinary coincidence, especially if it is repeated in other cases.'

Thus, then, in the case of an alleged event which would seem to satisfy the definition of a miracle given above by Mill, we have two possible explanations. One is that it is the result of unknown natural law; the other is that it is due to the intervention of supreme spiritual power. And the latter explanation is the one which we feel compelled to adopt, when the extraordinary event presents distinct evidence of purpose. A miracle, then, may be described as an event manifesting purpose, occurring in the physical world, which cannot be accounted for by any of its known forces, and which, therefore, we ascribe to a spiritual cause. It is an interference with the ordinary action of the forces of nature on the part of the Author of Nature—an event brought about, not by any observed combination of physical forces, but by a direct Divine volition. It is thus at once a τέρα and a σημεῖον.

15. These two characteristics enable us to dis-

18. These two characteristics enable us to distinguish miracles, so called, from other phenomena which resemble them in certain respects. For instance, as has been already said, an interference with the physical order on the part of the spiritual takes place every time we exert our free will. On every occasion of such exertion we demonstrate the possibility of material phenomena being influenced by a personal, conscious, free agent. The resulting action is a σημεῖον of the Intelligent Will which started the series of physical movements with a view to the fulfilment of foreseen purpose. We do not, however, call this a τέραs, a wonder, although it is truly a very wonderful thing. But there is no sensible interruption of the physical sequence; the continuity seems to be unbroken; and, so far as the powers of observation reach, it is unbroken. Once the initial impulse has been given, the power of the muscles is subject to physical laws, like any other physical force. An act of free will is not, strictly, comparable to a miracle, but to the action of Divine Providence in relation to mankind. All 'special providences,' or

—to use a better phrase—all answers to prayer, are strictly due to the intervention of the spiritual in the physical order. We do not call these miracles, because there is no apparent interruption of the ordinary course of nature; but yet at some point in the physical series there has been the intervention of the Divine will. Our conception of God (see NATURE) is not that He stands aloof from the world save on those rare occasions where we speak of miraculous interposition, but that He perpetually directs and controls the forces of nature in accordance with His purposes. But these forces are not His masters; they are His servants. And we have no ground for assuming that He cannot, for a special purpose, combine, counteract, paralyze their energy as He wills. Here we have reached the point beyond which the analogy of man's free will does not carry us. For man's free will is subject to strict limitations in its exercise. One obvious limitation is that man's influence over foreign bodies is possible only through the instrumentality of his own body. Despite some recorded phenomena, it seems to be true that man's will can enter the physical series only through the medium of the grey matter of his own brain. We have no warrant whatever for extending any such limiting law to the action of the Divine will, nor indeed would it be consistent with the conception of a Supreme Agent who is immanent in nature, while transcending it. This is a fundamental difference, indicating, as it does, that the Divine volition is related to the forces of nature in a fashion very diverse from that in which the human volition is related to those forces. The result of the exercise of human will is a σημείον; it is not a répas.

16. It may be asked at this point (and the question demands an answer), If miracles are not impossible, can it be said that anything is impossible? Has the word impossibility any meaning, if the possibility of interruptions of the ordinary course of nature, of breaches of the law of physical continuity, be admitted? It has a meaning. There are certain permanent impossibilities which can neither be conceived nor believed, of which we cannot assert in any intelligible sense that they could become possible by the act of Omnipotence, viz. logical impossibilities, violations of the laws described by logicians as the laws of thought, the laws of identity, contradiction, and excluded middle. That A should be the same as not-A, that a thing should possess two directly contradictory attributes at the same time,—these are permanent impossibilities; their truth is inconceivable for any rational being. Such axioms are not like the axioms of mathematics, which depend for their validity upon the constitution of space, and which therefore may not be true in regions where the conditions of space are not the same as they are with us. We cannot impose the laws of space upon Him 'whose kingdom is where space and time are not.' But it is quite otherwise with the laws of thought, of that reason in virtue of which it is written that man was made 'in the image of God.' These laws we must consider to be of universal and permanent validity, unless we are prepared to surrender ourselves to intellectual chaos; and a violation of them must be counted by us as strictly impossible. It is evident that such violation is not ejusdem generis with those anomalies in the ordinary course of nature which we call miracles. There is no miracle recorded in the Bible or anywhere else which is in the least like a violation of the laws of thought: if there were, we could not believe it, no matter what the authority on which it were presented to us, for we should be prevented from doing so by the constitution of our own minds. Far from being violations of the laws of thought, miracles cannot (as has been shown) be accurately and with confidence described as violations of the laws of nature; they are not violations, for instance, of the law of causation, that every effect must have an adequate cause, because in each case, ex hypothesi, the cause that is assigned is the direct action of the Divine will. It is doubtful, even, if any of the Gospel miracles could be described as violations of the laws of space and time. But however that may be, the point necessary to emphasize is, that in asserting the possibility of miracles on the hypothesis of Theism, we are far from denying the impossibility of any such contradiction as a violation of the fundamental laws of thought would involve. Such a violation would be contradictory to reason; it is a misuse of language to say that the miracles of the Gospel are so.

17. The problem of the abstract possibility of miracles cannot be considered further here. Nothing has yet been said as to their probability, or credibility, or utility; but, before this section of the subject is closed, it may be worth while to remark that representative thinkers of many schools of thought have expressed their conviction that thus far the argument is impregnable. Thus Kant, the apostle of criticism, while allowing no value to miracles as credentials of a moral religion. distinctly concedes their possibility, and indeed their utility, under certain circumstances.* So, in like manner, Rousseau declared: 'This question, whether God can work miracles, seriously treated, would be impious, if it were not absurd; and it would be doing too much honour to him who would answer it in the negative to punish him; it would be sufficient to keep him in custody.'t And, once more, Huxley wrote: 'Denying the possibility of miracles seems to me quite as unjustifiable as speculative Atheism.'t There is, indeed, a growing conviction among Christians and non-Christians alike that a priori speculation in theology, as in science, is worth very little; that the one hope of arriving at truth is to keep an open mind, and to welcome evidence from any and every quarter, without previous decision as to its value or worthlessness. It is in this spirit that an investigation into the evidence of the Christian miracles must be approached.

ii. THE SUBJECTIVE CREDIBILITY OF MIRACLES. -1. It would seem, from the preceding discussion, that the question whether miracles have ever happened or not is a mere question of fact. This question, like all similar ones, must be determined by evidence—the evidence of the senses if the 'miracle' is within the range of our own personal experience, the evidence of credible and sufficient testimony if it belongs to an age other than our own. In the case of the miracles which accompanied the dawn of Christianity, the former kind of evidence is not now to be had; we must have recourse to the testimony of others. And so it might be thought that the only problem for the scientific inquirer is to investigate the nature of the evidence which is forthcoming, its amount, its date, and its consistency, and to determine, if it may be, the character and veracity of the witnesses. A preliminary difficulty, however, was raised by the ingenuity of David Hume, which still remains to be dealt with.

In his famous essay on Miracles, Hume took up the remarkable position, that even if miracles happened, their occurrence could not be established by testimony; for, without troubling ourselves with any metaphysical discussion about their objective possibility, they may be seen to be subjectively incredible. Hume's case has often been argued since his day, but it is doubtful if any writer has ever presented it in a more plausible form than its original advocate; and it will therefore be best to take it in his own words:

'A'miracle,' he says, 'is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unaterable experience has established these laws, the priof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined. . . . It is no miracle that a man, seemingly in good health, should die on a sudden; because such a kind of death, though more unusual than any other, has yet been frequently observed to happen. But it is a miracle that a dead man should come to life; because that has never been observed in any age or country. . . . The consequence is that no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle, unless the testimony be of such a kind that its fulsehood would be more miraculous thun the fact which it endeavours to establish. Or, briefly, it is contrary to experience that a miracle should be true, but not contrary to experience that testimony should be false.'

2. In this argument a careful observer will not

2. In this argument a careful observer will not fail to observe that the point to be proved is assumed at the outset. 'A firm and unalterable experience has established these laws . . . that has never been observed in any age or country. Why, this is the very question at issue. (i.) The very thing that the believers in miracle assert is that experience has not always given negative testimony on the point. All the evidence (whatever it be worth) that has ever been produced to guarantee the occurrence of miracles must be reckoned as counter evidence in refutation of the ground on which it is asserted that miracles must be disbelieved. It is in the highest degree unscientific to sweep away all the positive evidence for any alleged fact in such a fashion. In matters of science a new trial must always be granted whenever there is any reasonable ground to sup-pose that new evidence has turned up, or that any fault can be found with the processes by which, from ascertained facts, inferences have been drawn. 'The question can only be stated fairly as depending on a balance of evidence; a certain amount of positive evidence in favour of miracles, and a negative presumption from the general course of human experience against them'*; it being always borne in mind that negative evidence is never so conclusive as positive, since facts of which there conclusive as positive, since facts of which there had been no previous experience are often discovered and proved by positive experience to be true. (ii.) Next, Paley's familiar criticism must not be forgotten. Paley points out † that Hunue's argument turns on an ambiguity in the phrase 'contrary to experience.' The miracles of the Gospel are not contrary to experience in the sense that they contradict our own present experience, the witness of our own sensee: they perience, the witness of our own senses; they can only be said to be contrary to experience can only be said to be contrary to experience in the sense that we have never experienced anything like them. This unusualness is, of course, a distinguishing feature of miracles, a mark of their signal character (see Sign); if they were ordinary occurrences, they would cease to be miracles, but the fact that they are thus unusual or extraordinary does not in itself make them incredible. These two considerations may be thus summarized. Hume says that miracles are contrary to experience. Now, if by experience he means all experience, his maxim is a plain petitio principii; and if he only means general experience, it sinks into the platitude that miracles are uncommon.;

3. We refuse, therefore, to allow that Hume's argument is complete in logic. Viewed as an attempt to eliminate the credibility of miracles on the ground of the fallibility of human testimony, it is a failure. But we cannot fail to recognize the element of truth which has given the argument its plausibility. It is this. The course of nature is, as a rule, uniform. What is disturbed by the assertion that a miracle has taken place is the mechanical expectation of a recurrence, and we find it hard to get out of our scientific groove, in which everything does recur mechanically, because we so often regard nature as a mere machine—self-acting, whether self-created or no.* If nature were such a machine, the improbability (we are not justified in speaking of incredibility) of a miracle would be enormous, although even then there would be no reason why that improbability should not be overcome by adequate testimony. But the question as to the probability or improbability of miracle assumes quite a different aspect when we recognize that nature is the exhibition of the Divine will and purpose.

'Hume's argument is far from being conclusive when the existence of a Being who created the present order of nature, and therefore may well be thought to have power to modify it, is accepted as a fact, or even as a probability resting on independent evidence. Once admit a God, and the production by His direct volition of an effect which in any case owed its origin to His creative will is no longer a purely arbitrary hypothesis to account for the fact, but must be reckoned with as a serious possibility 't' as a serious possibility.'+

The question is one of balancing improbabilities, as Hume said, but we must now take into consideration, on the positive side, not only the mere evidence of the witnesses, but also whatever there is of a priori probability that the Supreme would intervene in such fashion. Such a priori probability undoubtedly exists in the case of a miracle like the Incarnation. There is, on the one hand. if you will, the improbability that an event thus anomalous and out of the established order should take place. There is, on the other hand, not only the witness of the Gospels and of the Church to the claims of the Christ, not only the striking fact that thus all the hopes and expectations of ages found their realization, but this other serious consideration as well. If God made man in His own image, and intended him at the first for holiness, there is an a priori improbability in the supposition that such Divine purpose would be for ever frustrate and in vain. The Fall demands the Incarnation and the Atonement; it demands a fresh act of Divine grace, which shall raise man out of the slough in which he is struggling. And so we can perceive a reason why, in the interests of morality and goodness, some such miracle as that of the Word who became flesh should appear in 'the fulness of time.' In other words, if we adopt Hume's way of looking at the question, though our belief in a miraculous occurrence depend ultimately on our regarding the testimony to it as so strong that its falsity would be more miraculous than the truth of the miracle in question, yet when thus balancing probabilities we must not forget to give due weight to the moral probability that the Author of Creation may desire at certain epochs to give a special manifestation of Himself, of His will, of His grace, to the creatures whom He has made.

4. It must be frankly conceded that such considerations have been at times made too much of. A priori speculation in theology, as we said above, is often misleading; and if we committed ourselves altogether to its guidance we might be led to conclusions which should forbid us to regard as reconcilable the benevolence of God and the misery and sin and sorrow with which this earth is afflicted. If it be regarded as a priori probable that a remedy should be provided for sin, why, it has been asked,* is it not also a priori probable that a remedy should be provided for disease? Why should not sin be just as permanent an inheritance of man as death? And to that the only answer is that we do not rely solely on a priori probabilities in religion; if they were contradicted at every turn by experience, we could not trust them. But when, as in the case of the miracle of the Incarnation, the a posteriori witness falls in with the a priori suggestion of reason, then the two kinds of evidence, derived respectively from abstract and concrete considerations, mutually corroborate and support each other. A priori reasoning may lead us astray, but that is no reason for believing that it never points to the truth. Indeed, to profess that there is no scope for moral and rational probabilities in God's government of the world, is to accept a creed more gloomy and more irrational than any which has yet been proposed to man.

5. It is not too much to say that the occurrence of miracle can hardly be certified to the intellect in a quiet hour of after-reflection, unless there be a convergence of both lines of evidence—the a posteriori of testimony, the a priori of antecedent probability. This is to say, that more and higher evidence is required to substantiate a miracle than is required to substantiate ordinary matters of fact. As the course of nature is generally uniform, we must grant that there is some special improbability attaching to the allegation that an event of a miraculous order has been witnessed. To overcome this special improbability it is needful, first, to adduce some seemingly adequate reason why the Creator should deviate from that observed course of action which (save in the specific cases of alleged miracles) prior experience proves to have been His rule; and secondly, that we should have stronger and more unimpeachable direct evidence than that which is required for an ordinary event. Certainly 'le vrai n'est pas toujours le vraisemblable'; we must never reject any statement merely because it sounds improbable. We must try to discover if its falsity would be more or less improbable than its truth. But, granting the force of this proviso. we must also admit that more evidence is required for a miracle than for ordinary matters of fact.

There is a very strong preaumption against common speculative truths and against the most ordinary facts, before the proof of them, which yet is overcome by almost any proof. There is a presumption of millions to one, against the story of Casear, or of any other man. For suppose a number of common facts so and so circumstanced, of which one had no kind of proof, should happen to come into one's thoughts, every one would, without any possible doubt, conclude them to be false. And the like may be said of a single common fact. And from hence it appears, that the question of importance, as to the matter before us, is, concerning the degree of the peculiar presumption stall against them. For, if there be any peculiar presumption of millions to one against the most common facts, what and a samall presumption, additional to this, amount to, though it be peculiar? It cannot be estimated, and is as nothing. The only material question is, whether there be any such presumption against miracles as to render them in any sort incredible.

Now, Mill pointed out very clearly the confusion of which Butler is here guilty: it is that Butler does not distinguish between two different kinds of improbability, which may be called respec-tively improbability before the fact and improba-bility after the fact. The antecedent presumption against any ordinary occurrence taking place, which it comes into my head to imagine taking place, is immense; but if a credible witness asserts that it has taken place, that improbability becomes as nothing. This is the improbability before the fact. In fact, that any ordinary event should take place is improbable before testimony has been given, but not a whit improbable after testimony. But the case of miracles is quite dif-ferent: the presumption against a miracle is not merely a presumption against a specific event, but against that kind of event taking place. And this presumption remains, and must be allowed for even after testimony has been given. Butler really compares the improbability of miracles (which remains after testimony to their occur-rence has been given) with the improbability of the truth of a random guess (which vanishes after testimony to its accuracy has been brought for-ward); and this is to compare two things not fairly comparable at all.

^{*} e.g. by Mill, l.o. p. 285 ff. † Analogy, il. 2. ‡ System of Logic, il. 178-

6. The truth is, that when estimating the difference between miracles and ordinary facts as matters of credit, we must not lose sight of our fundamental assumption of the existence and activity of supreme spiritual powers.

'A miracle,' says Mozley, 'is on one side of it not a fact of this world, but of the invisible world; the Divine interposition in it being a supernatural and mysterious act: and so the evidence for a miracle does not stand exactly on the same ground as the evidence of the witness-box, which only appeals to our common-sense as men of the world and actors in ordinary life, but it requires a great religious assumption in our minds to begin with, without which no testimony in the case can avail; and consequently the acceptance of a miracle exercises more than the ordinary qualities of candour and fairness used in estimating historical evidence generally, having, in the previous admission of a Supernatural Power, first tried our faith.'*

As we conceive the case, then, there must be, to certify the miracle—(a) a posteriori evidence greater in degree than would be required for ordinary matters of fact; (b) an a priori conviction of the Divine power, and an a priori faith in the Divine will to intervene. And this conclusion (to which we have been led on grounds of reason alone) receives remarkable confirmation from the circumstances of our Lord's miracles as recorded in the Gospels. The great miracle of the Resurrection was only witnessed by believers; there was no manifestation of the Risen Christ to the soldiers, to the priests, to Pilate (cf. Ac 1041). It is a question, indeed, which may fairly be raised, whether the recognition of the Risen Lord would have been possible for the faithless, and whether unbelievers would have perceived any exceptional appearance at all in the Garden, in the Upper Room, or on the Galilman mountain. t It is a question whether we have not here the supreme illustration of that strange limitation to the powers of the Incarnate Word described in the words, 'He could do there no mighty work' (Mk 65): 'He did there no mighty works because of their unbelief' (Mt 1356). But, without entering into so difficult and sacred a field of inquiry, it is at least certain that miracles are not regarded in the Gospels as sufficient objectively in themselves to generate faith. 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded if one rise from the dead' (Lk 16¹¹), is the general teaching of the Synoptics.
iii. THE EVIDENTIAL VALUE OF MIRACLES.

We pass to the consideration of the evidential value of miracles. It is an 'acknowledged historical fact,' as Butler says, 'that Christianity offered itself to the world and demanded to be received upon the allegation . . . of miracles publicly wrought to attest the truth of it in such an age.' The Christian Church was founded on the basis of belief in a stupendous miracle, the resurrection of Christ: this was continually put forward by the early Christian Apologists as chief among the credentials of the Gospel. Whether the reasoning of Nicodemus was logically valid or not, it un-questionably was accepted by thousands. 'We Whether the reasoning know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do these signs that thou doest except God be with him, Jn 32. (See Sign). And it was largely due to the miracles which (it was alleged) accompanied the advent of Christianity, that Christian missionaries were able in the early ages to get a hearing for their message. But it has been urged that, granting the historical fact that this line of argument was once very attractive, it ought now to be set aside, for it is quite fallacious and inadequate. Miracles as credentials seem now to be at a discount, and the reaction against the exclusive attention to this aspect of their purpose which prevailed in the last century in English theology has perhaps gone too far. We have already said above that we do not claim for miracles that testimony to their occurrence is by itself sufficient to prove the existence of Divine power. The possibility of a miracle implies the existence of God, and no testimony would be sufficient to convince one who did not recognize the Divine existence that a miracle had ever occurred (see ii. § 6).* But a difficulty emerges, even in the case of a believer in spiritual force, which must now be considered.

* Miracles, p. 102. It is especially the fault of the apologetic writers of the 18th cent, that they neglected this consideration. It is a fault from which Paley is not entirely free, but it appears most piainly in books like Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses, which once had a wide vogue.

2. A miracle, i.e. an anomalous intervention of spiritual force indicating purpose, supposed to be established by testimony, would merely prove the energy of superhuman power; it bears no necessary witness to superhuman goodness. It might be of Satanic origin, not of Divine, and it is not a credential which ought, by itself, to inspire belief, for it may be a delusion of the Prince of lies, rather than a manifestation of Him who is the Truth. Indeed the advent of antichrist is to be ushered in 'with signs and lying wonders' (2 Th 29). It is here that the context, so to speak, of the miracle is allimportant. Miracula sine doctrina nihil valent is the principle which will resolve our difficulty. Certainly miracles, regarded merely as tokens of power, do not establish the goodness of the agent who works them; but if we are able to recognize this latter characteristic from the doctrines which he teaches, then the miracle will pronounce that those doctrines proceed directly from the Author of goodness. If the doctrine commends itself to the conscience as good, then the miracle seals it as Divine. As Pascal has it, 'Les miracles discernent la doctrine, et la doctrine discerne les miracles.'† And Pascal points out that this twofold test of power and of goodness, which must be applied to a miracle, is like the twofold test by which a prophet was to be tried according to the Pentaprophet was to be tried as speaking in the name of Jehovah if (a) his prophecy was falsified by the event (Dt 18^{32}), or (b) if his teaching led the people into the ways of idolatry (Dt 13*). He was to be tried by his doctrine no less than by the superhuman prescience which he exhibited. And so a miracle is not only to be regarded in the light of a wonder; it is also a sign—a sign of the character of the agent from whom it proceeds, not only in itself but in all the circumstances which lead up to and result from it. So the reply to the frequent query, 'Do the miracles prove the doctrine, or does the doctrine prove the miracles?' is strictly this: Miracles are a proof of the Divine origin of a doctrine, provided the doctrine be in itself worthy of a Divine author. No miracle could justify us in acting or teaching contradictory to conscience, or in referring such teaching to God. But if the moral teaching of one who professes himself to be a measurer from God be of surpassing excellence, then His possession of superhuman power corroborates His authority and justifies His claim. If it be historically true, e.g. that Jesus Christ rose from the dead, then this fact 'identifies the Lord of physical life and death with the legislator of the Sermon on the Mount. Miracle is the certificate of identity between the Lord of Nature and the Lord of Conscience—the proof that He is really a moral being who subordinates physical to moral interests.'*

*This is the contention of Spinoza: 'Porro quamvis ex miraculis aliquid concludere possumus, nullo tamen modo Dei existentia inde poesit concludi.' As we agree with his conclusion here, it is unnecessary to quarrel with the argument by which he reaches it, but we do not regard it as convincing. † Pensées' Des Miracles, i give pages in which there is perhaps more wisdom than in anything else ever written on the subject.

3. A miracle is not only a display of thaumaturgic power. This enables us to answer an objection raised by Matthew Arnold, who asked what possible evidence of authority would be shown by a man's turning a pen into a penwiper before our eyes.† And truly the answer is, None whatever! But then this applies only to miracles which are τέρατα, without being σημεία; whereas, in the view we have adopted, the true miracle is a vehicle of revelation, as well as an evidential adjunct.

'This guarantees the standing of miracles, gives them a secure position in connexion with revelation; and also it guarantees their quality; it requires them to possess characteristics congruous to the nature of the revelation with which they are associated. If it be a revelation of grace, the miracles also must be gracious. Any kind of miracle will not do; a definite ethical character is indiageneable. They must tend directly to advance the interests of the Divine kingdom.' ‡

When miracles are regarded as credentials, their inward meaning no less than their outward form must receive attention. Thus Augustine likens the man who sees the outward side of the miracle to one who, being unable to read, admires the fair writing of a manuscript which the student values rather for the message it brings him: 'est oculis laudator, mente non cognitor.' § No amount of evidence to the occurrence of a miracle, in short, is sufficient to justify us in inferring the intervention of Divine power, unless the miracle be one which our conscience assures us is not unworthy

4. It hardly needs illustrations to explain that this is a test, which, though necessary to apply with all care and reverence, may yet be applied with some confidence. Many of the miracles recorded in the Apocryphal Gospels and in the Acta Sanctorum when submitted to this moral test are found at once to be lacking in the qualities which alone would justify their claim to be cre-dentials. They are grotesque and absurd; they teach no definite lesson; they are associated with no word of wisdom; they are signs of nothing, save the poverty of imagination possessed by the romancers who invented them.

The alleged miracles of the infancy of Christ are purposeless and wanton, even when they are not deliberately cauel. There is an absence of dignity about them, for they are worked without any great or worthy object. And, speaking generally, if a recorded miracle does not serve any moral purpose, if it be unfruitful in any good result, if the teaching by which it is accompanied be not spiritually elevating, then it stands self-condemned, 'the story,' as Butler would say, 'being rightly proved false from internal evidence.' On the other hand, the miracles of the Gospel are not mere freaks of power; they have a definite moral purpose. They are examples and acted parables of the love of Christ; they are the works of Him who declares His almighty power most chiefly by showing mercy and pity.' 'As nature is an image of grace, so,' says Pascal, 'the visible miracles are but the images of those invisible which God wills to accomplish; they are, as it were, sacraments of the Divine operation. Thus, then, if a miracle be looked upon merely as an act of power beyond the power of man, it would not prove that the revelation which it accompanies is from God; but if it bear marks of wisdom in regard to the time and circumstances of its introduction, and of goodness as regards its moral character and its fruits, there can be no further doubt about the matter. And when we so look at the Christian miracles, we see that the supposed alternative that they might be due to superhuman malevolence rather than to benevolence is only ingenious but not serious. For Christianity so completely opposes evil and is so identified with God's providential working both before and since its promulgation, that to say that its miracles might have been worked by Satanic agency is simply absurd.

It is not contended that the Gospel miracles are all alike the evident work of supreme wisdom and goodness. The blasting of the fig-tree (Mt 21126. I Mt 1126.) has often been described as being rather like a freak of power than a sign of love. But, not to speak of the many explanations of the purpose of such an act at such a moment which have been suggested, and passing by the lesson which it surely conveyed to the observers, that the Divine judgment on unfruitfulness is stern and final, it may be said at once that this miracle must not be detached from the others which were wrought by Christ. Noscitur a sociés is a maxim of prudence; and a miracle like this of the fig-tree is guaranteed, so to speak, by the company in which it is found, and by the character, otherwise known, of Him who worked it. Viewed as an isolated marvel, it would not serve as a sufficient credential of the claims of the Christ; viewed as one of the incidents of His Passion, as one of His fayea, it has a meaning full of instruction. And the same may be said of any other cases in which a similar objection might be raised. It is not contended that the Gospel miracles are all slike the

5. It has been already pointed out (ii. § 6) that miracles are not represented in the Gospels as sufficient of themselves in all cases to generate conviction. 'Though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on Him' (Jn 1287). All the spectators at the Raising of Lazarus were not persuaded of the claims of Christ (Jn 1149). Yet the miracles of Jesus are repeatedly said to have arrested the attention and quickened the have arrested the attention and quickened the faith of those who witnessed them (Mt 8²⁷, Lk 5⁸, Jn 2¹¹). Not only the disciples, but the populace were impressed (Jn 6¹⁴, Lk 7¹⁶). 'Many believed on his name, beholding his signs which he did' (Jn 2²²), is a typical statement. And this aspect of His miracles, their witness to the truth of His claims, is emphatically asserted by Christ Himself. The very works that I do hear witness of me' 'The very works that I do bear witness of me' (Jn 536). 'That ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, I say unto thee, Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thy house' (Mk 2¹⁰): the cure of the paralytic was a credential of His claim to be the pardoner of sin. When the tidings reached the disciples that Lazarus was dead, He said that it was well, for the miracle of his recovery would be the greater 'sign' (Jn 1115). He rebuked the greedy multitudes, because they followed Him for what they might get, and not because of His signs (Jn 628). He upbraided Chorazin and Bethsaida because His mighty works had not drawn them to repentance (Mt 11²⁰). And St. John expressly states that the signs of Jesus were recorded 'that ye may believe' (Jn 20³¹): the evidential function of miracles was not merely an accidental result, due to the credulity of the contemporaries of Jesus; it was a function, according to the Fourth Gospel, which miracles and the record of them were in some measure to fulfil throughout the Christian centuries (see, however, iv. § 7).

But it is also to be observed that Christ more than once refused to work 'signs,' and that He often kept secret those which had been wrought. 'Tell no man,' He said to the leprous, the blind, the deaf, who had been healed (Mt 84 95), Mk 75). Herod 'hoped to see some sign done by him' (Lk 236), but no sign was forthcoming. The scribes and Pharisees who sought a sign were sternly refused (Mt 1228). The faith which would be enkindled by signs, though it may be true faith, is not the highest. To believe Him 'for the very works' sake' is the lower stage of discipleship (Jn 14"); though it, too, may find its reward (Jn 4*8). The highest faith is not that of Thomas, who believed when he saw the wound-prints, but that which can believe without seeing any sign (Jn 20^{29}).

In brief, miracles are represented in the Gospels as of considerable evidential importance, although they will not convince an unwilling heart (Lk 1681), nor is the faith which they enkindle the purest

iv. THE MIRACLES OF THE GOSPELS.—Their Characteristics.—1. A somewhat closer examination of the miraculous element in the Gospels must now be made. We have seen that miracles are possible objectively and in the abstract; that it is unreasonable to declare that no testimony can make them credible, albeit testimony of a high order may fairly be demanded; and that, when put forward as credentials, a scrutiny of their internal character is necessary as well as a scrutiny of the evidence by which they are substantiated. The miracles of the Gospel come well out of this last test; and we go on to ask, Are there any other leading characteristics which they present to our view besides this, that they are morally sublime?

2. A second characteristic is probably that they are certain, not tentative or doubtful. Many alleged cases of thaumaturgic power profess to be no more than this. Out of many trials there are a few successes. Such, doubtless, were the supposed cures wrought by the relics and at the tombs of martyrs. Nothing is alleged concerning them which is not alleged of various quack medicines, namely, that out of the thousands who use them a few will be found to as at that they have derived benefit. But the phenomenon presented by Christ's miracles as recorded by the evangelists is quite different. There is nothing in the narratives which in any way suggests that the Lord attempted cures in many instances and succeeded only in a few; we seem to be told of a 'standing miraculous power lodged in a person.' *

Here, however, we must speak with great caution. To assert that the miracles of the Lord were wrought without effort, as it were, and that they are to be ascribed to the exercise of His Divine nature rather than to the operation of His human nature enriched and glorified by His indissoluble union with the Father, is perhaps to go beyond the evidence. The power, the δύναμες which He put forth as He 'went about doing good,' is not spoken of as always present in the same fulness or as bearing no relation to the faith of those for whose sakes it was exercised. He said once that power had 'gone forth' from Him (Lk 5%); He 'sighed' as He restored hearing to the deaf (Mk 7%); and a mysterious limitation to His power to heal seems to be hinted at in passages such as Mt 1850, Mk 6%, of which something has been said above.† The truth is, that we so little understand the conditions of the Incarnation that we find ourselves at fault when we attempt to define closely the laws (if we may so speak) of Christ's miraculous activity. Considerations such as have been suggested hardly touch the miracles which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those which He wrought upon sature, as distinct from those such that while there was a 'standing miraculous power' in Him, there was also a remarkable economy in its exercise, the reasons for which we cannot fully comprehend.

3. There is, indeed, an intimate connexion between the several miracles of Christ, arising from the fact that the greatest miracle of all is the Person of Christ Himself. Sin is the true droula, the true violation of law; and this finds its remedy in a corresponding miracle of grace, even the Incarnation. It is quite misleading to compare the evidence, say, for the raising of Lazarus with that for a miracle in the life of a mediæval saint; for the heart of the Christian position is that the circumstances were quite dissimilar. Christians assert, at the outset, that the Person of Christ is supernatural, or rather that the perfectly 'natural' humanity which He took upon Him was associated with the unearthly spiritual powers of the Godhead; and, that being so, it is natural, i.e. congruous, that His advent and ministry should be attended with works 'such as none other man did.' All through the Fourth Gospel, Christ's miracles are described as His $\xi \rho \gamma a$; they did not stand, as it were, in a class by themselves, but they constituted a part of that Divine manifestation which dwelt in Him. We say that His life being greater and larger than that of a mere man like ourselves, was irradiated by the awful light of His super-human origin, and that therefore (as might have been expected) that superhuman origin betrayed itself by a superhuman energy of action, that, after a public life of superhuman works of mercy, He suffered, died, was buried, but rose again, appeared on several occasions to His followers, and finally in their presence ascended into heaven. This is not like the allegation of a single isolated miracle. The whole advent of Jesus Christ was miraculous, and therefore we refuse to isolate any one of His works from His life. 'Isolated events,' it has been profoundly said, 'are often incredible,' but the crowning miracle of Christianity is the Incarnation. If Christ were altogether an exceptional personage, there is nothing to stumble at in the miracles recorded of Him, which in-deed then are seen at once in their true character as σημεία, or έργα,—His signs or His works, —but which refuse to rank themselves as θαύματα or prodigies which amaze and perplex. They are not specimens of His power, but manifestations of His Person.*

4. Arother consequence of importance follows from these considerations. The miracles, the σημεία of Jesus Christ, are essential to the Gospel history. And this does not mean merely that Christianity is a 'supernatural religion,' and that it is impossible to retain its consoling and strengthening power over mankind if we reject the supernatural element, true and deeply important as this is. But it means that we cannot construct a consistent picture of the life of Jesus Christ from the Gospels, if we do not take account of His miraculcus powers, however those 'miraculous' powers are to be explained. His miracles are not like the miracles in Livy or in the history of many of the mediæval saints, detached pieces that do not disturb the history, which goes on very well without them; but the whole history is grounded in them and presupposes them. Without making any assumption as to the date and manner of composition of the Synoptic Gospels, this fact stands out. We cannot contrive any theory by which we may entirely eliminate the miraculous, and yet save the historicity, in any intelligible sense, of those wonderful narratives. It is vain to say, as some have done, that possibly the original nucleus of the Gospels contained no miraculous stories. For what is the fact? Even if we attempt to reconstruct the original document which the Synoptic evangelists had before them when compiling their

* So Augustine: 'Mirum non esse debet a Deo factum miraculum . . . magis gaudere quam mirari debemus' (in Joun. Tract. xvii. 1).

Gospels, by the simple (though unscientific) process of rejecting everything as added which is not common to all three, and so arrive at the 'triple tradition,' we shall find that it still teems with miracle. The Feeding of the Five Thousand, the Raising of Jairus' daughter, the Stilling of the Storm, besides half a dozen miracles of healing, are still left.* We cannot, in short, by any artifice reach a primitive gospel which is not to a greater or less extent a miracle gospel, and so we cannot treat off-hand the Gospel history in the matter of rejecting miracles as we would treat the Acta Sanctorum. But if we admit one miracle, there is little intellectual hindrance to admitting There is no aid to faith in the mere twenty. reduction of the number of miracles. Matthew Arnold compared this modern tendency to saying that while it is extravagant to suppose Cinderella's fairy godmother to have actually changed the pumpkin into a coach-and-six, we may believe that she did change it into a one-horse cab.† The she did change it into a one-horse cab.† The illustration is flippant, but it is just. There is nothing to be gained by the attempt to minimize the supernatural in the Gospel history. It is there, do what we will. Miracles play so important a part in Christ's scheme, that any theory which would represent them as due entirely to the imagination of His followers or of a later age, destroys the credibility of the documents not partially but wholly, and leaves Christ a personage as mythical as Hercules. † We have, indeed, no warrant for insisting that any particular explanation or theory of the miraculous shall be accepted by a believer in the Gospels; but the fact of the miraculous, however we define it, remains. And a miracle reduced to its lowest terms, remains a miracle still.

5. Classifications, more or less instructive, of the miracles of Christ, have often been drawn up.§
We can here only briefly indicate their general character in respect of their claim to be regarded as due to power other than that of the ordinary forces of nature, as known or as conceivable to us. (a) There are, first, the miracles worked upon man, the miracles of healing. Some of these present no peculiar difficulty of credence to any one who is familiar with the remarkable phenomena of hypnotism, or more generally with the influence of a strong will over a weak one, though it would be rash to assert, and (in view of all the facts) is in itself improbable, that this is the whole secret in any case. Such, for instance, are the cures of the demoniacs (Mt 829 1521 1714, Mk 122), of the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda (Jn 5°), of the man with the withered hand (Mt 12¹0), of the woman with the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13¹¹), of the dumb man with a devil (Mt 9³²), and of the man 'possessed with a devil, blind and dumb' (Mt 12²²). We find it increasingly difficult to accept any such explanations in the cases of the healing of the paralytics (Mt 8⁵ 9²), of the deaf man (Mk 7⁸²), of the blind (Mt 9³⁷ 20³⁰, Mk 8²², Jn 9, the last of which is specially remarkable, and was so regarded at the time), of the dropsical man (Lk 142), of the fever patient healed with a touch (Mt 814), of the woman with the issue (Mt 92), of the lepers (Mt 82, Lk 1711, the healing in the former case being brought about by a touch, in the latter case by a mere word of power), of Malchus' servant (Lk 22⁵). And more wonderful (to our eyes) than any of these was the raising of the dead, the daughter of Jairus (Mt 923, though here it is noteworthy that the statement that the child was really dead was not made by Christ Himself), the widow of Nain's son (Lk 7¹¹), and Lazarus (Jn 11⁴⁸), in the last of which cases, at least, all doubt as to the fact of death is excluded by the attendant circumstances.

(b) We have, secondly, the cosmic miracles, as they have been called—those which were wrought upon nature. The Blasting of the Fig-tree (Mt 2118), the Stilling of the Storm (Mt 820), and the Walking on the Sea (Mt 1420), betray the energy of One who had power not only over man, but over the unin-telligent forces of the universe. Certainly these cannot be explained, or explained away, by any hypothesis such as that which has been resorted to in the case of the healing of demoniacs or the And a controlling force of a quite extraordinary character seems to have manifested itself in the Feeding of the Four Thousand (Mt 15²²) and of the Five Thousand (Mt 14¹⁹), as well as in that first 'sign' of all, the Transformation of water into wine at the marriage feast (Jn 21).

(c) Four cases have been left out of consideration, inasmuch as if they stood alone they might be explained as coincidences, the like of which happens in every one's experience. The great draughts of fish (Lk 5¹ and Jn 21⁶) and the finding of the stater in the fish's mouth (Mt 17²⁴, although here it is noteworthy that we are not told that the coin was actually found), as well as the recovery of the nobleman's son at Capernaum (Jn 446), are not in themselves præter naturam; but they receive their significance from their connexion with prophetic words of the Christ. They are (to take the lowest view) σημεία of His superhuman wisdom.

6. Thus, on a review of all the miracles of the Ministry of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels, although no doubt this or that isolated event might be plausibly referred to natural causes, yet undoubtedly there are some among the number which cannot be reasonably thus explained; and all, taken together, if they have been correctly reported to us, present a phenomenon for which we are driven to seek a cause other than the physical forces of the universe can provide.

7. The Evidence.—What is the value of the evidence for these phenomena? The Gospels received their present form, let us assume, between the years 60 and 90 A.D. That is to say, we have written testimony to the facts set down within half a century of their alleged occurrence. this testimony strong enough to outweigh the admitted improbability, a posteriori, of such anomalous and extraordinary events? The question about the Gospel miracles is often put in this form, but it is not the form in which it will be put by any one who appreciates what is the real problem at issue. For nothing has been said in the foregoing summary of the alleged resurrection of Christ Himself. It was this upon which the controversy as to His claims hinged in the early days of Christianity, and it was a true instinct which led the first preachers of the gospel to place it in the foreground. If He really rose from the dead, then it is plain that He cannot be judged by the standards which we rightly apply to the alleged doings of men like ourselves. The miracles of the ministry, with rare exceptions, were not worked under circumstances which should fit them to be absolutely convincing credentials to the world of the Divine mission of Jesus. They were, speaking in general terms and with reservations which have been already explained (see iii. § 5),

^{*} All through, however, we must bear in mind that it is not the anomalousness of the resurrection of Christ which is the significant matter. 'It is quite possible that our Lord's resurrection may be found hereafter to be no miracle at all in the scientific sense. It foreshadows and begins the general resurrection; and when that general resurrection comes we may find that it was, after all, the natural issue of physical laws always at work' (Temple, Bampton Lectures, p. 196).

rather sacramental signs of His grace than proofs that He had the power to bestow it. But it was otherwise with the resurrection on the first Easter Day. This was a credential to which the Church continually appealed (Ro 14 424, 1 P 120), although it, too, was a σημείον of spiritual truth. And the evidence for this is not confined to the Gospels. It is presupposed in all the apostolic Epistles, as it is the burden of the apostolic sermons recorded in the Acts (cf. Ac 2⁹² 3¹⁵ 10⁴⁰ 13⁸⁴ 17^{8,31} 26²³); and not only is this the case, but the whole history shows that belief in the resurrection was the one source of the continued faith of believers after their hopes had been shattered by the crucifixion, and was, as a matter of fact, the foundation on which the edifice of the Christian Church was raised. Examine the evidence of the four 'undisputed' Epistles of St. Paul. These were all written before the year 58, i.e. about a quarter of a century after the crucifixion. St. Paul bears direct testimony to the fact of the resurrection, as be-lieved in by all Christians of the day. 'To this end Christ died and lived again, that he might be Lord of both the dead and the living' (Ro 14°); 'I delivered unto you . . . that which also I received . . how that he hath been raised on the third day, according to the Scriptures; and that he appeared to Cephas; then to the Twelve; then he appeared to above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain until now...; then he appeared to James; then to all the apostles' (1 Co 15³⁻⁷). For circumstantiality, it would be difficult to surpass this last statement (cf. also Ro 1⁴ 8³⁴, 2 Co 5¹⁵, 1 Th 4¹⁴). Again, St. Paul is so confident of the fact of the resurrection of Christ that he uses it as a proof that we too shall live after death: 'if there is no resurrection of the dead, neither hath Christ been raised' (1 Co 1518); he does not consider it necessary to add anything to this reductio ad absurdum. And, finally, the fact is so familiar that it is repeatedly appealed to in its symbolic and spiritual significance: 'that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life' (Ro 64; cf. Ph 310, Col 31).

8. This was the confident belief of St. Paul and of his correspondents years before the Gospels and of his correspondence years because the Gospele assumed their present forms, and (although we cannot here enter fully into the question) all attempted 'naturalistic' explanations of that belief are entirely inadequate. This is good evidence; it is quite different in degree from the evidence which might be brought for any of the Lord's miracles of healing, taken singly; indeed it is not too much to say that had not the evidence been entirely satisfactory to those who had the best means of judging, the Christian Church would not have lived for a year after the crucifixion. Thus it is the Church itself. that is the abiding witness to the resurrection; otherwise we should have to believe a more 'incredible' thing than any 'miracle,' viz. that the greatest and most blessed institution in this world is based on the delusions of a few credulous and superstitious fanatics. The question to be answered is, not, Is the evidence of the Gospels for the miracles of the ministry sufficient by itself to inspire belief not, Is the documentary evidence for the resurrection of Jesus provided in the Gospels and Epistles sufficient by itself to command our acceptance of it -but, How are we to account for the origin of the Christian Church on the basis of belief in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, supposing that belief to have had no foundation in fact? And to that question there is no satisfactory answer. We are driven back on the hypothesis that the belief grew out of the fact, and with that hypothesis all the existing evidence is in entire agreement.

Leslie in his once famous tract, A Short Method with the Deists, may have laid too much stress on the evidence viewed in a purely juristic aspect, but there is real force in his argument that the four tests which may be applied to the testimony to the fact of the resurrection of Christ are tests which would satisfy a reasonable court of inquiry. The alleged fact was (1) one which could be judged of by men's senses; (2) it was public; (3) it was verified by a monument set up in observance of it, i.e. the Christian Church; and (4) this was set up immediately after the event.

9. We may now turn back to the miracles of the Gospel. They fall into line at once, if the miracle of the resurrection is a fact; they become σημεία and ἔργα (as they are represented by St. John to be) of the Christ. The evidence for it is, prima facie, evidence for them. True it is that St. Paul does not mention them at all in his letters, but it did not come within his purpose to do so. It was the permanent results, not the temporary incidents, as it were, of the Divine life on earth with which he and his correspondents were concerned. And yet it is worth observing that, so far is St. Paul from thinking that miracles are foreign to the Christian dispensation, that he claims the power of working them himself, and that in letters addressed both to strangers who did not know him and to friends who did. Christ wrought by him, he says, 'in the power of signs and wonders' (Ro 15¹⁸); 'truly,' he writes to the Corinthians, 'the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, by signs and wonders and mighty works' (2 Co 12¹²); among the Divine gifts of the Church are 'miracles (δυνάμει), gifts of healings, divers kinds of tongues' (1 Co 1229); and he asks the Galatians, 'he therefore that worketh miracles (δυνάμεις) among you, doeth he k by the works of the law?' (Gal 38). If it had not been a matter of acknowledged fact that some such Divine powers had attended his apostolic ministry, it would have been truly extraordinary that he should have claimed them. And, further, it is plain that he would never have claimed powers for himself of which he believed his Master to have been destitute, so that his omission of any mention of the Lord's miracles of healing cannot have any significance as regards St. Paul's belief in the supernatural character of Christianity.

10. To this mass of evidence, a priori and a posteriori, in favour of the miracles of the NT, the answer that is usually returned in our time is not that of Spinoza (though his presuppositions are more widely accepted than is always recognized), nor of Hume, but of Matthew Arnold, who. while declining metaphysical disquisitions as to their possibility or credibility, attempted to settle the controversy by declaring that at any rate 'miracles do not happen,' and that the vast number of admittedly fabulous miracles recorded in ecclesiastical literature dispenses us from formal inquiry into the excellence of the evidence for those of one particular period. It is plain that the mere dictum, 'miracles do not happen,' has no application whatever in logic, unless the pro-pounder of it is prepared to accept the principles either of Spinoza or of Hume; and these we have already examined. The force of the statement resides in this, that the modern world is very chary in receiving the report of any alleged miracle, because we know of so many cases in which like reports have proved untrue. But that 'miracles do not happen' within a certain area of experience, does not prove that they have never happened outside that area. The rule 'all or none' is a very unsafe rule for common life. Every case that arises ought to be judged on its own

And the first question to be asked about the evidence for the NT miracles is, Were the witnesses predisposed to believe such things of Jesus Christ? In particular, was there any pre-conception in favour of His resurrection? Were it so, there might be considerable room for hesitation in accepting report of it, and the rapid dis-semination of belief in it might be set down to a widespread credulity. Now (a) it is true that belief in the supernatural was quite common in the first century of our era, nor could men and women then have had the same intellectual difficulty in trusting the evidence for an alleged miracle that we, with our larger knowledge of the laws of nature, now experience. In particular, the lower classes of Roman society, though not ready to accept miraculous stories which interfered with their traditional beliefs, were steeped in an atmosphere of magic and superstition. But it was not so with the higher classes. The first century could not be called an 'age of faith.' Stoics and Epicureans alike were disinclined to believe in any irruption of the spiritual into the established physical order. (b) And when we turn from Gentile to Jew, when we consider the national prejudices alike of the first preachers as of the first hearers of the gospel, we see that nothing could have been more opposed to preconceived ideas than the doctrine of the Incarnation, with the resurrection as its appropriate and (so to speak) inevitable sequel (Mt 2764f., Lk 242i, Jn 5is 8is 10si etc.). This once recognized, there would, no doubt, have been no difficulty in believing that the 'works' of One like Christ should be superhuman, but this was not recognized at the first even by the faithful apostles. Prejudice in favour of the Incarnation, of the Resurrection, of the Ascension, there was none. The evidence cannot be set aside on the score that it grew up in the course of years as the outcome of presuppositions as to what the Messiah should be and do.

11. This was the theory of Strauss; but it is not tenable, for this reason, among others, that the interval of time which elapsed between the death of Christ and the composition of the records which described Him as a superhuman personage is not long enough to account for such legendary developments. The evidence is not like that for the miracles attributed to St. Anthony or to Ignatius Loyola, which are found only in the later and not in the earlier biographies. It is as nearly contemporary as we could expect. It does not grow as we advance from decade to decade in the history of the Church. The belief in a superhuman Christ is as deep-rooted in the letters of St. Paul written before the year 58 as it is in the Gospel according to St. John written at least thirty years later, although it is not expressed in the same way. The evidence is as good in degree and in kind as we could expect it to be, without the intervention of a special miracle by which scientific testings, not in the least necessary for the faith of the first century, should have been provided to satisfy the cravings for certitude of the nineteenth. It is fully detailed, delivered in transparent good faith, and under circumstances which would forbid a careless assent.*

v. OTHER BIBLE MIRACLES.—1. The Acts of the Apostles.—The miracles ascribed to the apostles in Acts stand on a somewhat different platform. Standing alone, the evidence for them would hardly be sufficient to compel their reception. But they must be considered in their relation to the advent of Christianity, and to the superhuman powers of the Founder of the Christian Church. The commission to the apostles (Mt 108) included the direction: 'Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devila.' This does not suggest, it will be observed, that what we have called cosmic miracles came within the powers with which they were entrusted by the Lord, and we find no trace of such miracles in Acts. In the appendix to St. Mark (Mk 1617) the remarkable promise is recorded: 'These signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover.' With the exception of immunity from poison, instances are given in Ac of all these powers being enjoyed, not only by the original eleven and by St. Paul, but by many other disciples. Thus the gift of tongues found its fulfilment at Pentecost, and is alluded to by St. Paul in his Epistles. Prophecy, which was akin to this, is frequently spoken of as a 'sign' of an apostle. Agabus not only predicted a famine (Ac 11²⁸), but also warned St. Paul of what would happen to him at Jerusalem (Ac 21¹⁷). Twelve unnamed Ephesian disciples on whom St. Paul laid his hands were endued with this gift (Ac 19⁶), as were also the four daughters of l'hilip the Evangelist (Ac 219). And that 'wonders and signs' were wrought by the apostles is repeatedly asserted (Ac 248 512 68 818), and it is in entire harmony with St. Paul's own claims (see iv. § 9). Among these were the expulsion of demons (Ac 5¹⁶ 16¹⁸), the healing of the lame (Ac 3⁷ 14⁸), of a paralytic (Ac 9⁸⁴), and of the sick (Ac 5¹⁶ 28⁹ 19¹², the cures in the last case being described as δυνάμεις ου τας τυχούσας, which operated through the medium of St. Paul's clothing). Two cases of raising the dead are recorded (Dorcas, Ac 981, and Eutychus, Ac 200). Visions and voices from heaven are spoken of (Ac 98.10 103.11 123), and the intervention of angels is mentioned (Ac 512 823). Two visitations of judgment, upon Elymas (Ac 13¹¹) and upon Ananias and Sapphira (Ac 5^{5, 10}), are brought about by St. Paul and St. Peter respectively. It is not necessary to discuss the healing virtue ascribed to St. Peter's shadow (Ac 51s), or the deliverance of St. Paul from the viper (Ac 28s); for in the former case nothing is said as to the success of the attempted remedy, and in the latter case no miracle is necessarily involved (but cf. Mk 161s). But, on the whole, it is impossible to evade the consequence that the ministry of the apostles, according to the only records which we have got, was sustained by powers which are beyond the power of man or of nature as known to us. They fall into their place immediately if Christ was what He claimed to be, and the Church which He founded the minister of His grace; but on any other hypothesis they cannot be explained.

2. The Miracles of the OT.—Similar observations may be made about the miracles of the OT. It is evident that we cannot speak with the same confidence about these that we can feel when describing the miracles of Him who showed in His own person His superiority to death, of Him who is the Prince of Life. For they are narrated in ancient books, the origin of which in many instances is wrapped in obscurity. We cannot claim to have contemporary evidence for the miracles of the OT as we have for those of the NT. And so to one approaching the OT literature without any appreciation of its fulfilment in the Christ, some of the miracles therein recorded, while always possible to a believer in God, may perhaps seem to be guaranteed by no sufficient testimony to compel belief in occurrences so improbable in themselves. But for us 'Votus Testamentum in Novo patet.'
The obscurities of the older revelation find their explanation in the fuller light of the later. And if it be a fact that the law was a maidaywyds els Χριστόν, and that Israel was chosen by the Almighty as His instrument for the teaching of the world, then it ceases to be a priori improbable that, at exceptional crises in the history of the Hebrews, special manifestations of Divine power might be vouchsafed, which should enable men to say with boldness, 'This is the finger of God.' And, again, it is not to be forgotten that the use of the OT by Christ and His apostles sufficiently proves to Christians that the literature therein contained was a unique literature, and was produced under quite unique conditions of inspiration. Thus the records must, at the least, be treated with respect greater than that which we bestow upon books like the Acta Sanctorum, and we are entitled to place fuller reliance on the accuracy of the writers than would be justifiable in a history which came to us without any such lofty guarantee and claim. It is in such a spirit that we approach their accounts of miracles.

The OT miracles are chiefly grouped round two epochs—the Deliverance from Egypt, and the Reformation of Elijah and Elisha. It is true that these periods are described in greater detail than any other periods in the history, but nevertheless it can hardly be without significance that it is at these two great crises in the fortunes of Israel that the tokens of God's providence were most apparent to pious observers. Of the former cycle it should be observed that very few of the socalled miracles are difficult of credence, inasmuch as the majority of them are not (seemingly) in themselves out of the order of nature. The Ten Plagues (Ex 8-12), the Parting of the Red Sea (Ex 14^{21-31}), and of the Jordan (Jos 3^{14} , cf. 2 K 2^{7-14}), the Water from the Rock at Rephidim (Ex 17⁸), and at Kadesh (Nu 20⁷), the Curing of the Waters of Marah (Ex 15²⁸, cf. 2 K 2²¹), the Budding of Aaron's rod (Nu 17⁸), the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Lv 10¹), as of Korah and his company (Nu 1631), did not involve any apparent breach in the continuity of the physical order. We can readily conceive how similar occurrences might be brought about through the operation of the ordinary forces of nature. None of these events, considered singly, would seem a prodigy to an impartial observer. It is the concurrence of so many circumstances of the kind which forbids us to deny their signal character, and conveys to us the conviction that here was the finger of God. And it is even more important to observe that these remarkable events were associated in many cases with a word of power from God's ministers. The predictive element, which we have spoken of above (see i. § 14) as characteristic of so many of our Lord's miracles, is here conspicuous. The plagues are foretold; so was the dreadful death of the rebels in Korah's rebellion; and the division of the waters of the Red Sea is described as having been connected with-prayer and invocation on the part of Moses. Here we come upon the most prominent aspect of miracle in the OT, viz. the element of prophecy, which includes prediction. However this feature may have been exaggerated in Christian apologetics in the past, and however we may try to reduce it to lower dimensions, it is impossible to eliminate it from the Hebrew literature. The function of a prophet was not confined to predic-tion, but this was certainly within his powers, as indicated from time to time in the history of Israel. And true prediction is essentially miraculous; it is beyond human powers, and it is a sign of a special revelation of God to man over and above that which is continually offered in His providence (see PROPHECY). Prophecy being admitted as possible, and the actual prophecies of the OT seers being certified, the 'wonders and signs' with which their ministry was accredited are deprived of much of that antecedent improbability which (as we have admitted) attaches itself to miraculous stories in general.

The miracles of Elijah and Elisha may be viewed in this light. They are, as it were, their credentials. Other prophets, both of OT and of NT, worked no signs indeed (Jn 1041), and this shows that it was not the habit of the Hebrews to surround the figure of every prophetical personage with a halo of miraculous glory. But Elijah and Elisha lived in an age of spiritual upheaval: great wickedness and deep piety came into conflict. 'Let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel' (1 K 1886) was the perpetual burden of Elijah's prayers. And perhaps nothing short of a miraculous sign would have satisfied the Israel of his day that the Lord was God. At the same time it may be freely conceded that the accounts of these two great prophets, Elijah and Elisha, stand somewhat apart from the general history of Israel. The miracles of Elisha are never alluded to in the OT after the story of their occurrence, and they are only once mentioned in the Apocr. (Sir 4814). It cannot be said that the miracles ascribed to these prophets are essential to the history, nor can it be maintained that all of their miracles are on the lofty moral level which we have found to be conspicuously the case with the miracles of Christ. It is an bypothesis with a good deal of prima facie evidence in its favour that the miracle-stories of 1 K 17, 18, 2 K 1-6 are rather of the nature of Jewish Haggadoth than of sober history.* With even greater probability may this be said of the stories of Daniel and the den of lions, and the Three Children in the furnace of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 3^{196} 6^{106}). In the rest of the OT the miraculous element (if we exclude prophecy) is remarkably small. The song of the Bk. of Jashar, which speaks of the sun standing still at Gibeon (Jos 10¹²), can hardly be taken as a scientific statement of fact; it is poetry, not prose. The somewhat similar story of the shadow moving backward on the sundial of Ahaz (2 K 20¹¹) is related in prose and interwoven with the history of Hezekiah, and cannot be dismissed so easily. But in the absence of fuller knowledge of the circumstances it wouldbe impossible to be sure that in this there was anywhich Isaiah seems to have had that this 'sign' would take place. The story of Balaam's ass speaking has been referred to its parallels, s.v. BALAAM;† and the episode of Jonah and the whale seems to be of a similar class. In the latter case, it has been urged, indeed, that our Lord's application of the story (Mt 12⁸⁰) forecloses all inquiry into its literal truth. But this is not the judgment of the most careful and devout scholars of our own time.t

On the whole, then, while we maintain that the history of the Jews cannot be truly interpreted unless the special intervention of Providence in many a crisis of their national life be discerned, and while we distinctly recognize the miraculous nature of the Messianic prophecies of the OT, and are not slow to accept the allegation that miracles may have accompanied their progress, we cannot think that the evidence for several recorded miracles, such as Elisha making the axe-head to swim (2 K 65), the speaking of Balaam's ass (Nu 2228), and the staying of the sun and moon at Gibeon (Jos 1012), is at all sufficient to compel implicit credence in their literal truth.

far too brief for its subject, but something ought to be said of miracles recorded elsewhere than in the OT and NT, if our discussion of miracles in general is to be in any way complete. We have seen that the infant Church is described in Ac as having been favoured with miracles as well as with other gifts of the Spirit. When did these miracles cease in Christian history? Many different opinions have been held, one branch at least of the Church believing that there has been no cessation and that miraculous powers are still in her possession, it being often urged, on the other hand, that they died with the apostolic company. The chief reason alleged for this latter opinion is apparently based on the assumption that miracles are given only for evidential purposes, that their sole function is to certify the Divine character of revelation, and that when this has been sufficiently established their work is done, and that they may not be expected to continue. And, curiously enough but most unreasonably, it has been assumed that the apostles could not have worked any miracle save those recorded in Scripture, or at least that no record of such could be trustworthy. Between these extreme views are to be ranked the great body of old English divines, e.g. Dodwell and Tillotson, who held that miracles were occasional in the Christian Church until the time of Constantine, when, Christianity being established by the civil power, it no longer needed such supernatural assistance. Thus Fuller explains that 'miracles are the swaddling clothes of the infant Churches'; and yet another view has commended itself to many, viz. that the power of working miracles extended to but not beyond the disciples upon whom the apostles conferred it by imposition of their hands.*

2. According to Acts, the Divine powers promised by Christ to His Church were at least occasionally exercised, not only by the apostolic company but by other persons as well. It would not be surprising, therefore, if we found in the literature of the early 2nd cent. many references to miracles like those in Acts. And yet such references are few and scanty. Our records of the period are fragmentary, to be sure, but it is remarkable that they tell so little on the subject. With a few notable exceptions, of which something is said further on, there is no trace up to the end of the 2nd cent. of any miraculous gift still existing in the primitive Church save those of prophecy and healing, including exorcism, both of which are frequently mentioned.

(a) In Hermas (Mand. xi.) and in the Didaché the abuse of the grace of prophecy is spoken of, and a little later Justin (Dial. § 82) has the statement παρά γὰρ ἡμῖν και μέχρι νῦν προφητικά χαρίσματά ἐστιν. We observe here that the earliest notices of the power of prophecy imply also the presence of its counterfeit, and indeed prophecy is, of all the Divine 'gifts,' that which would most easily lend itself to imposture. And Justin's statement seems to imply his surprise that prophecy should have continued so long, for he says 'even up to the present,' from which we might gather that instances of genuine prophecy in his day and in his neighbourhood were not very numerous.

(b) The gift of healing is also noted by Justin (Dial. § 39), though he does not give any instances within his own observation. Origen goes further (contra Celsum, iii. 24), and says that he has seen many persons rescued from delirium. But the commonest exemplification of this gift was displayed in the expulsion of demons; exorcism is regarded quite as a thing of course by the 2nd cent. Fathers. Justin (Apol. ii. § 6, Dial. §§ 30, 76) and Tertullian (Apol. 23, 37, 43, de Idolol. 11, etc.) speak in extravagant terms as to the certainty with which demons could be expelled by the prayers of the faithful. They allege these powers to be the common property of all Christian people, and to be susceptible of exercise at any moment and on any occasion. This is going far beyond the language of the Gospels and Acts, but it is here sufficient to observe that phenomena of this sort are often explicable without any recourse to supernatural

3. Next, it is important to note that the early Fathers, although seeing the miraculous in the incidents of their daily life, place the miracles of the apostolic age on a pinnacle quite above the miracles of their own time. When we go to the 4th cent., we find Chrysostom saying that 'all the men of his time together' could not do as much as St. Paul's handkerchief (de Sacerdot. iv. 6), and he implies that in his day there were no raisings from the dead (cf. Hom. in 1 Cor. vi. 2). But, much earlier than this, Tertullian, after saying that the apostles had spiritual powers peculiar to themselves, adds 'nam et mortuos suscitaverunt quod Deus solus; et debiles redintegraverunt, quod nemo nisi Christus' (de Pud. c. 21) - language which would be strange if such occurrences were even occasional in his day. And of the miracles of the apostolic age, Origen only says that traces $(t\chi r\eta)$ remain in his time (contra Celsum, i. 2). We find then (i.) that by the end of the 2nd cent. there is a growing suspicion that miracles are dying out, (ii.) that such miracles as are recorded are generally regarded as different in kind from those of the apostolic age, and (iii.) that in the earliest age of post-apostolic Christianity the 'miracles' are almost, without exception, of prophecy, healing, and exorcism.

4. The exceptional cases remain to be mentioned. (a) Eusebius records (HE iii. 39) that Papias related that in his time a man rose from the dead, as he had heard from the daughters of Philip the Evangelist, and that Justus Barsabbas was once delivered from the effects of drinking poison. The former of these occurrences may relate to some such occurrence as the raising of Dorcas (Ac 927), which the daughters of Philip may have witnessed, and the latter is not related in sufficient detail to enable us to draw any conclusion from it (cf. Mk 1618). But it is significant that Papias' account seems to have been silent as to miracles which came within his own observation. The occurrences he mentioned were in the apostolic age, and he does not profess to speak as an eye-witness.

(b) The often quoted statement of Irenæus is more difficult to explain or to explain away. He speaks of prophecy, healing, and exorcism as impossible in heretical circles, but as common in the Church, and he adds, 'Yea, even the dead were raised and abode with us many years' (17400000 καί παρέμειταν σύν ήμεν Ικανοις έτεσι, adv. Hær. II. xxxii.). All that can be said about this is that no specific instance is produced; the language is rhetorical, and the statement occurs in the middle of a polemic against heretics. Nor are we furnished with details. Further, when Irenæus passes from the mention of the more common miracula to speak of raising the dead, the tense is suddenly and un-expectedly changed. Healing, exorcism, and prophecy, these are matters of present experience for him; but he speaks of resurrections from the dead in the past tense. Even the words quoted hardly mean more than that such events happened within living memory. Now Irenaus was a disciple of Polycarp, who was himself a disciple of St. John, so that if we view his statement thus it will not appear so extraordinary. The inference, in short, from the whole passage is that the major miracles no longer happened — an inference which is confirmed by all the available evidence.

* See further, Mozley, Miracles, p. 295.

8. But if the miraculous powers of the Church seem to have grown less and less as the 2nd cent. went on, it must also be remembered that miracles of the most astounding character abound in the records of ecclesiastical history from the 4th cent. onward. On what grounds, it may be asked, do we reject these? Or must we reject them? Is there any reason why these should be rejected and those of the NT accepted? and on what principles is such differentiation to be made?

6. It is plain, at the outset, that miracles are always possible to the believer in God, and again that there is always a presumption against them to one who believes that God governs the world by general laws. This fact, that His rule is uniform for the most part, is what gives to miracles their signal character, their character as signs, and so forbids us to see 'miracle' in the ordinary activities of Providence. They are σημεία, and are therefore a priori unlikely to be of everyday occurrence. And the remarkable economy in the use of miracle displayed both in the OT and in the NT confirms us in the conviction that there is an antecedent probability against them as a general rule. This antecedent improbability may be overcome by the special circumstances of the case (as we have pointed out is true of the miracles of Christ), or by the strength of the evidence which may be adduced; but normally it has considerable force. Further, supposing true miracles occur, nothing is more certain than that they will provoke imitation and imposture, and will encounter the rivalry of a host of false ones. Pascal goes so far as to say that the existence of the false necessarily points to the existence of the true as their antecedent cause, without which they would never have gained a footing.* We need not accept this dictum in its integrity, but there is this of truth in it, that it shows on the one hand how unscientific it is summarily to reject the evidence for a given occurrence, merely because somewhat similar evidence has proved misleading in other cases; and, on the other hand, that we must always allow for on the other hand, that we must always and low for a readiness to believe in miracle arising from previous (real or imaginary) experience of such interpositions of Divine favour. We say then, first, that while we do not in the least feel bound to reject mediæval or modern miracles, we start with a determination to test the evidence for them very severely. If we draw conclusions as to the history of the Christian Church from what we read in the OT of the history of the Jewish Church, we shall expect to find miraculous interposition very rarely exhibited, and then only at great national crises, and not merely for the warning and instruction of individual souls.

7. This same law of Divine economy will bid us also to exclude from the category of miracles such events as may reasonably be referred to natural causes. Visions or voices which may be resolved into false perceptions or deceptions of the senses must be so classed. The extraordinary phenomena which are recorded as having accompanied the martyrdoms of Polycarp, tof Savonarola, of Hooper, may readily enough be explained as the operation of physical forces, a little exaggerated perhaps by pious enthusiasm. Stories like that of the Thundering Legion and the rain which followed the prayers of the Christian host may be true in the main, although the events of which they tell are not necessarily miracles in any other sense than that in which every answer to prayer is a miracle (see above, i. § 15). In other cases the recorded phenomena are too like the tricks of a thaumaturgist for sober piety to recognize in them the finger of God; and in many the alleged

* Pensées, il. 265 (ed. Faugéres). † See Lightfout, Appelolic Futhers, II. l. 516. miracles are grotesquely absurd and utterly devoid of that character of $\sigma\eta\mu\epsilon\hat{a}$ which all true miracles have as revelations of the Divine will and purpose.

8. Next, in an overwhelmingly large number of the cases which remain, both of mediæval and modern miracles, the evidence is entirely insufficient. There is no a priori probability in their favour, and very inadequate a posteriori testimony. In how few cases, outside the NT, have we got the evidence of the agent who is supposed to have worked the miracles! And it is to be feared that many stories of miracles worked by saints may be accounted for by the misguided piety of their biographers. All too soon in the Church's history a false criterion of sanctity grew up. It was supposed that the measure of a man's goodness was the amount of miraculous power by which his preaching was aided.* Now from the belief that the man who works miracles must be a good man, the transition is easy to the converse inference. This man was a good man, hence he must have worked miracles, and so it can be no harm to write down a few in his biography. He must have worked, if not these particular wonders, at least others very like them.† We thus find that the further removed in time the saint is from his biographer, the more is his life embellished with legend and glorified with miracle. We distrust the mediæval records on these grounds. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, we say. No criticism of this sort can be applied to the miracles of the NT; for here we have contemporary testimony of the principal persons concerned, and the miraculous is as prominent in the earlier as in the later canonical writings.

9. It is a suspicious circumstance that many of these mediæval miracles happened so opportunely for the triumph of a particular party or the glorification of a particular individual. In one sense, indeed, it is very far from suspicious to read that a miracle came at the right moment, i.e. for the support of God's truth, but in another sense it is suspicious. If men are anxiously expecting a sign from heaven to guarantee the piety of a doubtful undertaking or the success of a hazardous cause, it is very likely that they will see the finger of God in what is really only the operation of His ordinary laws, and it is not improbable that they may be the dupes of unscrupulous persons who play upon their prejudices. 10. All these qualifications being made, a residuum of recorded cases is left, which it is difficult to explain. Men will view them differently, according to their predispositions. But it is not too much to say that no recorded occurrences in recent centuries seem to bear the character of σημεία in at all the same degree as the miracles of the Gospel, whether we have regard to the general circumstances under which they were worked, or the results, moral and spiritual, which were consequent upon men's belief in them. Quite apart from the adequacy or inadequacy of the evidence brought forward in their favour, or the possibility of 'natural' explanations, alleged miracles such as the apparition of the Blessed Virgin at La Salette, and the cures of pilgrims at the shrine which has been built at the spot, are lacking in the dignity and moral grandeur of the miracles of the Gospel. Whatever may be thought about them, it is plain that even if these and their like are really to be traced to the intervention of the Divine mercy which loves to reward a simple faith (and it does not seem to us that the evidence is sufficient to establish such a conclusion), yet they do not serve as vehicles of revelation as the miracles of the Gospel did. They may be θαύματα, δυνάμεις, τέρατα, but they are not σημεία of a new spiritual message to mankind, which it sorely needed to learn. And this is the essential characteristic of the miracles of the Christ.

MIRIAM (פְרָיִי, LXX and NT Μαριάμ, Josephus Μαριάμνη).—1. The daughter of Amram and Jochebed, and sister of Aaron and Moses, being probably the eldest of the three. Though not mentioned by name, she was the sister who watched from a distance what would happen to Moses in the ark of bulrushes, and went and fetched her mother to act as nurse to her brother for Pharach's daughter (Ex 24th (E)). She took a leading part in the Exodus with her two brothers. She is called 'the prophetess, the sister of Aaron,' and she led the women in their chant of victory after the passage of the Red Sea (Ex 1520. (E)). We find her during the wanderings combining with Aaron against Moses at Hazeroth because of his marriage with a Cushite woman. They claimed to have the power of prophecy equally with him, though Moses stood upon a higher plane in the world of revelation, which ought to have made them afraid to rebel. Miriam and Aaron were both severely rebuked, but the chief punishment fell upon Miriam. 'The cloud removed from over the tent; and, behold, Miriam was leprous as white as snow.' Aaron at once confessed their sin, and begged Moses' forgiveness; whereupon Moses obtained Miriam's healing from God. She was, however, sentenced to exclusion from the camp for seven days, and the camp remained unmoved for that time (Nu 121-16). Towards the end of the wanderings Miriam died'at Kadesh, and was buried there (Nu 201). Two allusions are made to Miriam in other books of the OT. As an incitement to the strict observance of the law of leprosy in Dt 248 the people are bidden to remember her case: Remember what the Lord thy God did unto Miriam, by the way as ye came forth out of Egypt' (Dt 24°). In Mic 6' she is mentioned with Moses and Aaron as a leader with them of the people. Josephus asserts (Ant. 111. ii. 4) that she was the wife of Hur, and grandmother of Bezalel. was the wife of Hur, and grandmother of Bezalei. Jerome (de Loc. Heb. 108) says that her tomb was shown close to Petra in Arabia in his day. Josephus adds other details, which we need not trouble ourselves with; and the Koran identifies her with the Virgin Mary. The name 'Miriam' is of great interest to Christians as being the name by which the Virgin Mother of Christ was known.

2. A second Miriam is mentioned in 1 Ch 417 (Heb.). It has been supposed by Bertheau that the last clause of 1 Ch 418 should come before the three names of which this is one. If so, they would be the children of a daughter of Pharaoh.

H. A. REDPATH.

MIRROR (בְּרִיוֹן ,רְאִי , בַּרְאָה), κάτοπτρον, έσοπτρον). Any surface so smooth and regular as to reflect uniformly the rays of light, produces, by the operation of simple optical laws, images of objects in front of or above it, which appear to the eye as if they were behind or beneath it. This property has been valued and applied as an aid to the toilet from very early times. The surface of a transparent substance like glass or still water may thus act as a mirror (Pr 2719), and even a black surface if highly polished may do the same. The higher the reflecting power of a substance, however, the brighter and clearer the image which it gives. A flat mirror produces images of the same size as the objects, a convex mirror diminishes the images, while a concave one (if sufficiently near) gives magnified images, which are erect or inverted according to circumstances. Modern mirrors are commonly made of glass coated on the back with an amalgam of mercury and tin. Mirrors for scientific purposes, however, are either of polished 'speculum metal' (a special alloy of copper and tin) or of glass silvered in front. The words 'glass' (in the sense of mirror) and 'looking glass' occur in AV (see the places below); but as all mirrors used in hibling times were matched. biblical times were metallic, so far as we can judge, RV substitutes for these terms the more general one 'mirror' (see GLASS, 2).

Our knowledge of ancient mirrors is derived (a) from literary notices, and (b) from actual specimens that have been preserved.

(a) Under the first head we note only references to material, manufacture, and the like. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 26) describes what seems to have been an attempt to make glass mirrors at Sidon, but nothing is said as to the success of the experiment. Alexander of Aphrodisias, a writer of the 3rd cent. A.D., refers (Problem. i. 132) to glass mirrors coated with tin (Marquardt, Das Privatleben der Römer, p. 737, n. 2), and an Egyptian mirror made of glass is said to be in the museum at Turin (ib. n. 1). In Pliny's day, however, only metallic mirrors were in use. The ordinary material for them were an alloy of converged tip, and rial for them was an alloy of copper and tin, and the best of this kind were made at Brundusium. Silver mirrors were the finest, and were first made by one Pasiteles in the time of Pompey. The effects of the various kinds of curvature in mirrors were Seneca describes the phenomena of reflexion in a concave mirror (Nat. Quæst. I. iv. 3), and speaks of gold and silver mirrors large enough to give an image of a whole human figure (ib. I.

(b) The ancient mirrors still existing may be classified as-

(1) Egyptian. These are made of an alloy of copper, highly polished, and are nearly circular with ornamental handles of wood, stone, or metal. They are described and figured in Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 350 ff. (2) Etruscan. These have been found in great numbers in the ruins of Præneste and in other Etrurian burial-places. They are round or pear-shaped, with handles attached, and are remarkable for the elaborate engravings of mythological scenes on their backs. See Gerhard, Ecruskische Spiegel, i. 78 ff., and the plates in the other 4 vols. (3) Roman. The mirrors of this class are mostly circular. Some have handles and some are without them. The term for the and some are without them. The term for the latter variety was orbis (Mart. IX. xvii. 5). Among those found at Pompeii some are square (Overbeck-Mau, Pompeii⁴, p. 453). (4) Greek. Specimens of these were unknown till 1867. They are of two kinds: circular discs with handles in the form of statuettes, and box mirrors consisting of two discs which fit into one another and are sometimes hinged together, the outer surface of the polished disc being ornamented in low relief and the inner surface of the other being engraved.

LITERATURE.—De Witte, Les miroirs chez les anciens; Bauermeister, Denkmäler des Classischen Alterthume, iii. 1690-3; Marquardt, Das Privatleben der Römer, p. 669 fl.; Collignon, Manuel d'Archéologie Grecque, 346 fl.; Mylonas, Eldunza zerszys; Seyflert, Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, by Nettleship and Sandys, sv. 'Mirror'; Guhl and Koner, Life of the Greeks and Romans, 184, 499.

The following are the Scripture allusions to mirrors. In Ex 38° the laver of the tabernacle is said to have been made of 'the mirrors' (AV 'looking glasses,' AVm 'brasen glasses') of the serving women.* This implies that they were made of metal (see Brass). The Heb. is τητης (LXX κάτοτρον), a word which is elsewhere rendered 'vision.' In Job 3718 the sky is compared for strength to a molten 'mirror' ('ΥΠ, LXX δρασιε έπιχύσεων, AV 'looking glass'). The whole verse embodies the ancient conception of the sky as a hard metal-like solid. The verb at the beginning ('spread out' AV and RV) is μη 'to beat, beat out,' from which comes the term γρη ('firmament') applied to the sky (see Cosmogony). In Is 32° 'hand mirrors' (AV 'glasses') are named among the articles of female luxury denounced by the prophet. The Heb. is μ''), and the general idea of the word appears to be that of a smooth flat surface. It occurs again in Is 8¹, where it is rendered 'tablet' in RV and 'roll' in AV. In late Heb. it came to mean the blank margin of a book. In the former passage, however, LXX understands by τη' μη garments of some thin transparent material, and renders by διαφανή Λακωνικό.

and renders by διαφανή Λακωνικά.

In Apocr. and NT ξσοπτρον takes the place of the usual classical word for mirror, κάτοπτρον. In Wis 7²⁸ wisdom is called the unspotted 'mirror' of the working of God. In Sir 12¹¹ the persistent malice of an enemy is compared to the rust on a 'mirror' (AV 'looking glass'), which it is difficult to wipe away completely—a metallic mirror being clearly referred to. In I Co 13¹² the spiritual knowledge of the present life is likened to the dim perception of images in a 'mirror' (AV 'glass'). In Ja 1²²⁶. the Christian law of liberty is described figuratively as a 'mirror' (AV 'glass'). The careless hearer of the law, who does not obey it, is compared to one who looks at himself in the mirror and forgets the reflected image as soon as he has turned away from it, while the obedient disciple is likened to one who keeps gazing steadfastly into the mirror, and who thus has the image of what he ought to

The verb κατοπτρίζεσθαι occurs once (2 Co 318). Here AV has 'beholding as in a glass' the glory of the Lord, RV 'reflecting as a mirror,' and RVm 'beholding as in a mirror.' The translation of the word is closely connected with the interpretation of the context, and the two renderings in RV mark the wide divergence which exists among scholars and commentators with regard to the passage. For the new translation 'reflecting' there may be quoted Chrysostom, Theodoret, Luther, Bengel, Billroth, Olshausen, and, more recently, Schmiedel, and Mayor (on Ja 123). The old rendering 'beholding' is supported by Grimm, Winer, Meyer, Heinrici, Beet, and Denney, and should, we think, be preferred. The idea of 'reflexion' does not accord well either with the context or with the usage of κατοπτρίζεσθαι in other writers. The simple physical fact that one who beholds a bright light reflected in a mirror has his own face illumined by it at the same time is taken as an illustration of the transformation of the Christian's character, which some about through beholding the glory of God On this passagesee Ismar Peritz in JBL, 1808, Pt. ii, p. 145 L.

reflected in Christ, or the glory of Christ reflected in the gospel.

JAMES PATRICK.

MISAEL (B Μεισαήλ, Α Μισ-). — 1. 1 Es 9⁴⁴ = MISHAEL, Neh 8⁴. 2. Thr ⁶⁶ (LXX, Dn 3⁵⁸), elsewhere MISHAEL, the Heb. name of one of Daniel's three companions in captivity; called MESHACH in Babylon (Dn 1⁶⁵.).

MISAIAS.—See Masias.

MISGAB (בְּנְיְבְיִהְ with art.; B 'Αμάθ, ΑΝ τὸ κραταίωμα). — Mentioned along with Nebo and Kiriathaim in the oracle against Moab, Jer 48 [Gr. 31]¹. Perhaps it is not intended as a proper name. The same Heb. term occurs in Is 25¹², where both AV and RV tr. 'high fort' (cf. 28 22³, Ps 9° bis 18² 467.11 48³ 59° 16.17 62².6 94²² 144², Is 33¹6). C. R. CONDER.

MISHAEL (סישאל [the derivation is disputed. It comes either from מי אַשְר אַל = כִּי אַל "Who is what God is?' or from כִּי שְׁהָּ אַל "Who is like God?' In either case it is sufficiently near such Assyrian forms as Mannu-ki-ilurabu, Munum-ki-Ashur]; LXX Μισαήλ, Μεισαήλ, and [Lv 10¹⁴] Μισα-δαί).—1. According to Ex 6²² Mishael belonged to the Kohathites, and stood fourth in descent from Levi. At Lv 104 he and his brother Elzaphan are ordered to carry from before the sanctuary out of the camp the dead bodies of Nadab and Abihu, who have perished because of their presumption. Both of the passages in which Mishael is mentioned are attributed to P. 2. A man named Mishael was one of Ezra's supporters in his great work of reform. He was amongst those who stood at the scribe's left hand on the great pulpit of wood from which the law was read aloud to the people, Neh 84. These men, twelve in number, one for each tribe (as Ryle appears to think), or thirteen (MT and LXX), or fourteen (Guthe on 1 Es), have been supposed to be the chief priests of the course which was at that time performing the temple service. But there is nothing in the text to support this. Almost certainly they were either Levites or laymen. 3. One of Daniel's three companions, Dn 16t. 11. 19 217. See MESHACH. J. TAYLOR.

MISHAL (ὑκτρ).—A town of Asher, Jos 19²⁰ (Μασσά), given to the Gershouite Levites, 21²⁰ (Β Βασσελλάν, Α Μασαάλ) = 1 Ch 6^{74} [Heb. 10], where, perhaps by a clerical error, it is called ὑτρ Mashal. In this last instance B has Μασσά, A^{10} Μασάλ. The site is unknown. It is only an inference from the context when Eusebius (Onomast. 280. 139) says Μασάν συνάπτει τῷ Καρμήλφ κατὰ θάλασσαν.

MISHAM (αχτρ). — Eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 8¹² (Β Μεσσαάμ, Α Μισαάλ, Luc. Μεσσαμ).

MISHMA (νρψρ; in Gn 25¹⁴ Michaelis points νρψρ). —1. A son of Ishmael, Gn 25¹⁴ (A Μασμά, Luc. Μασμάν) = 1 Ch 1²⁶ (B Μαμά, A Μασμά). The tribe of which Mishma is the eponym has not been identified. The name has no connexion, according to Dillmann, either with the Μαισαμανεῖς of Ptolemy (VI. vii. 21), or with the place called el-Mismiye in the Lejjāh, south of Damascus. He thinks that a trace of the name may remain in one or other of the two places — Jebel Misma', south-east of Kâf, east of the Wâdy Sirhân, in the latitude of Idumæa, or another Jebel Misma' farther south, towards Teimâ, where inscriptions have been found. 2. The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4²⁶ (B A Μασμά).

J. A. SELBIE.

joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 1210 (Β Μασεμανή, Α Μασμάν).

MISHNA.—See TALMUD.

MISHNEH (прер), 2 К 2214, 2 Ch 3422, Zeph 110 RVm.—See College.

MISHRAITES (ינְילְינָין). — A family of Kiriathjearim, 1 Ch 2⁵³ (B Ἡμασαραείμ, Α – είν). No place of the name of Mishra is mentioned in OT, and the MT of the closing verses of 1 Ch 2 is involved in considerable uncertainty. See Kittel in SBOT, ad loc.

MISPAR (τρος).—One of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2º (Β Μαλσάρ, Α Μασφάρ), called in Neh 7º Mispereth (πηρος, Β Μασφεράν, Α Μασφαράθ, κ Μασφαράδ).

MISPERETH.—See preceding article.

MISREPHOTH-MAIN (Ο ΤΟ ΠΙΒΊΡΟ, Μασερών, Μασρεφωθμαειμ, Μασερεθμεμφωμάιμ).—One of the places to which Joshua (118) chased the Northern Canaanites after their defeat near Lake Merom. The older explanation, following the Jewish commentators, was to translate the words 'burning of waters,' and to refer them to local hot springs or smelting-works (cf. Ges. Thes.). This ignored the fact that the words are Canaanite in origin, probably assimilated to like-sounding Hebrew words.

Others gave the site as Zarephath (1 K 17°) on the ground of the similarity of name, and because 'Zarephath belongeth to Zidon,' which place occurs in the verse from Joshua.

Most probably we should revert to a suggestion of Thomson (Land and Book, ch. xv.), who identified it with Musheirifeh or 'Ain Meserfi, a site on the coast, S. of Ras en Nakhurah or the Ladder of Tyre (Section ii 100. Scholz Pring Ladder of Tyre (Seetzen, ii. 109; Scholz, Reise, 154).

This position would agree much better than Zarephath with the only other passage in which the name occurs (Jos 13°). There the Zidonians, who are not yet dispossessed, are said to extend from Lebanon to Misrephoth-maim. We should scarcely expect Zarephath, a place which lay be-tween Tyre and Zidon, to be given as the S. point of the dominion of Zidon, while the Ladder of Tyre A. C. WELCH. might well be so named.

MITE.—See MONEY.

MITHKAH (прпр., Матекка В, Мавекка AF, Methca Vulg.).—One of the 12 stations following Hazeroth, Nu 33^{28–29}. See Exodus and Journey to Canaan, vol. i. p. 805a, § iii.

MITHNITE ('μφη'). — 'Joshaphat the Mithnite' appears in the catalogue of David's officers in 1 Ch 11° (Β ὁ Βαιθανεί, Α ὁ Μαθθανί). This gentilic name would imply the existence of a place called inc (however we may vocalize that word), which, however, is nowhere mentioned in OT. Kittel (in SBOT, ad loc.) suggests that the LXX (A) and Vulg. (the latter has Mathanites) readings appear to have poin mind, in which case the gentilic name would be vocalized uppo.

MITHRADATES.—1. (Α Μιθραδάτης, Β -ριδ., ΑV Mithridates), 1 Es 2¹¹ (LXX ¹⁰) = ΜΙΤΗRΕΙΛΤΗ, Ezr 1⁸, the treasurer of Cyrus king of Persia. 1 Es, ty translating his title correctly with της transfacing his title $η_{\mu}$ correctly with γαροφύλαξ, shows itself independent of the LXX of Ezr, which renders it as a proper name Γασβαρηνός.

2. (BA* Μιθραδ-, Α*τία B Μιθριδ-, AV Mithridates), 1 Es 2^{16} (LXX 18) = ΜΙΤΗΚΕΔΑΤΗ, Ezr 4^7 , a

Persian officer stationed in Samaria under Arta-

MITHREDATH (ητηφ., Pers. = 'given by Mithra, or the sun'; Mιθραδάτης; 1 Es 2¹¹ Μιθραδάτης Β, v. ³⁸ B^{ab} A'; Mithridates).—1. The Persian treasurer, whom Cyrus commanded to deliver to Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah, the sacred vessels taken from the temple by Nebuchadrezzar (Ezr 18).

2. Apparently a Persian officer stationed in Samaria. Together with his colleagues he wrote to Artaxerxes (Longimanus) to hinder the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezr 47). The correspondence between the Samaritans and the Persian court probably took place in the interval between the missions of Ezra and of Nehemiah.

MITRE.—1. The word used in AV for next (LXX-μίτρα or κίδαρις), the official head-dress of the Heb. high priest (Ex 28⁴ of 30 29⁶ 30³⁶ 31, Lv 8⁹ 16⁴; cf. also Ezk 21²⁸). RVm has 'turban,' except in Ezk 21²⁸, where AV has 'diadem' and RV 'mitre,' without marginal note. The head-dress of the ordinary priest was next (AV bonnet, RV headtire). The mitre of the high priest was, like the headtire of the subordinate priests, of fine linen, and was made from a piece, said by the Rabbins to have been sixteen cubits long, rolled into a sort of turban. Hence its name, from an 'to wind.' On the front of the mitre, just above the high priest's forehead, was the sacred crown (see Crown, 2). The precise shape of the mitre is, however, disputed. It is frequently represented as lower, rounder, fuller at the sides, and resting more lightly on the head than the headtire of the ordinary priests, which was shaped somewhat like a helmet (so Braunius, de Vest. Sacerd. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 21). On the other hand, Bähr (Symb. ii. p. 110) maintains that it was higher and longer, though perhaps, as Maimonides seems to imply, with the top bending over. The description of Josephus (Ant. III. vii. 6, 'The (high priest's) hat was similar to that used The (high priest's) hat was similar to that used by all the priests, but above it was sewn another embroidered with blue') has given trouble to archeeologists; and Philo (de Vit. Mos. iii. 11) seems to speak of a third part of the head-dress, besides mitre and crown, which he calls κίδαρις or diadem. The language of OT is, in fact, quite indefinite as to the shape of the mitre, and Philo and Josephus may either have misinterpreted its expressions, or have had in mind later embellishments. The mitre was as representative of the priestly dignity as the crown or diadem was of the royal. Hence in Ezk 2128 'Remove the mitre; and take off the crown' (RV), may signify the desola-tion of both priesthood and monarchy.

2. Another word (7:x) from the same root is in Zec 35 tr⁴ 'mitre' in AV and RV (RVm 'turban or diadem'), and is applied, apparently as a synonym of the technical word described above, to the head-dress which the prophet saw placed on Joshua the high priest. It is also found in Job 29¹⁴ (AV 'diadem,' RVm 'turban') in a figurative description of a righteous man arrayed in the garments of nobility; in Is 3" (AV 'hoods,' RV 'turbans') as an article of elaborate female attire (cf. μτρα in Jth 168, Bar 52); and in Is 622 Kerê (AV and RV 'diadem') as a symbol of the honour which J' will place upon His people. See HEAD-DRESS. G. T. PURVES.

MITYLENE (Μιτυλήνη), or Mytilene (as usually spelt on coins, cf. Blass on Ac 11¹³), the chief town of Lesbos, lies on the E. side of that island, about 10 or 12 miles from the coast of Asia. M. itself was originally built on a small island, and perhaps joined to Lesbos by a causeway which formed two excellent natural harbours, one on the N. and the other on the S. St. Paul on his return from his Third Missionary Journey had arrived at Troas from Philippi, and, after a week's stay at the former place, had preferred travelling by land to Assos, while the ship rounded the promontory of Lectum and picked him up on its S. voyage. His motive for going by land may have been to remain longer with the disciples at Troas, or to be assured of the complete recovery of Eutychus. After St. Paul was taken on board at Assos, the ship sailed to Mitylene (Ac 20¹⁴) and stayed there for the night. This was the usual practice for vessels in the Ægean Sea, where, during the summer, the N. wind blows during the day but falls in the afternoon. An early start would be made each morning before sunrise, so as to get the full benefit of the wind. After leaving Mitylene (Ac 20¹⁵) the travellers sailed to a point opposite Chios, probably near Cape Argennum.

M., which has in later times given its name to the whole island of Lesbos, was a town of some importance in early history. It joined the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war, revolted from them, and was punished by almost complete annihilation. It made an alliance with the Macedonians under Alexander the Great, it offered a stubborn resistance to the Romans in the Mithridatic war, and was afterwards made a free city by Pompey. There is no record of any Christian church existing in the island at the time of St. Paul's visit. M. formed part of the eastern half of the Roman empire, and was conquered in A.D. 1462 by the Turks, under whose power it has since remained.

MIXED MULTITUDE, an expression used to describe certain people who accompanied the children of Israel out of Egypt Ex 12²⁸, and fell a lusting' at Kibroth hattaavah Nu 114. It is also used of those who were separated from among the Israelites after their return from captivity Neh 13³. In Ex 12²⁸ the Heb. is 37 372, LXX ἐπίμακτος πολότ, Vulg. vulgus promiscuum innumerabile, Targ. Onk. 'many strangers,' Syr. και μο καιν. The VSS agree in giving to 371 the sense of a mingled people, as it is rendered in other passages (see further on), and to 371 its common meaning of 'many,' so that 'mixed multitude' represents adequately the original in this passage. But in Nu 114 Heb. has a different word, γρερας (the κ being quiescent) occurring only in this passage. It is probably a contemptuous term for a gathering together of the people, and there is no further indication of multitude than that implied in any gathering. The LXX and Vulg. omit the adjectives πολότ and innumerabile, but otherwise render as in Exodus. The earlier English translations indicate the difference in the original. Wyclif has in Ex 12²⁸ the comoun of either sex unnoumbrable' (where the influence of the Vulg. is evident), and Nu 114 'the comoun forsothe of either kynde.' Tindale in Ex has 'moch comon people,' and also Coverdale ; but in Nu Tindale's the rascall people' was perhaps a little too forcible, and Coverdale has 'comon sorte of people.' The rendering of AV puts out of sight a variation in the original indicated in the earlier translations, and RV has not (as in some similar cases) brought it back into view.

A similar criticism of AV and RV applies to Neh 13². There the Heb. is בְּיִרְיִבְּי, the LXX renders the noun as before, but Vulg. has omnem alienigenam, which Wyclif renders by 'alien,' and the early English versions 'every one that had mixte himself therin,' a fair rendering of the Hebrew.

means 'mercenaries,' and (the y being pointed with Seghol) Jer 25^{30. 34} (σύμμκτος). Both AV and RV translate 'the mingled people' in these passages, in 25³⁰ the people are in or near Egypt, in 25³⁴ they are to the S.E. of Palestine on the borders of Arabia. The same Heb. consonants (differently pointed) denote Arabia; and for the parallel passages 1 K 10¹⁵, 2 Ch 9¹⁴, where both punctuations occur, see ARABIANS. The meaning of the Heb. word in the account given in Neh is evident. The strangers with whom Israel had contracted alliances, and the children of such alliances, formed the 'mixed multitude' or the 'mingled people.' The verb (in Hithpael) is used, Ezr 9³, of these marriages, and Ps 106³⁵ of 'mingling with the heathen.' A similar condition of affairs existed when the Israelites came out of their bondage in Egypt. The intercourse between Egypt and Israel concinued, Solomon allied himself with Pharaoh's daughter, and the special permission for the children both of Edomite and Egyptian parents to enter into the congregation (Dt 23³) shows that alliances between Israel and these nations were recognized. After the return from captivity a strict rule of severance from surrounding nations was enforced.

MIZAR.—Ps 42⁵ [Heb.⁷] reads, following the MT, 'O my God, my soul upon me 's cast down; therefore do I remember thee from the land of Jordan and the Hermons, from the mountain of Mizar' (so Driver, Parallel Psalter, and [substantially] AV and RV; AVm and RVm suggest as an alternative tr³ of the last expression γχο το 'from the little hill [or mountain],' cf. LXX dπδ δροκ μαροῦ, and Vulg. a monte modico]. The question is whether mizar is an appellative or a proper name. If the latter, Mt. Mizar must have been in the vicinity of (or perhaps a part of) † Hermon, but it cannot be identified. In the former sense (='a little thing,' 'a trifle') mizar occurs in Gn 19²⁰⁻²³, where by one of J's characteristic etymologies the substitution of the name Zoar for the earlier Bela' is accounted for by Lot's plea, 'O let me escape thither, is it not a little one (γχο)!... therefore the name of the city was called Zōar' (γχ, i.e. 'pettiness,' 'petty town,' see Dillm. ad loc.). Cf. 2 Ch 24²⁴ αγίκ γχο 'a small company of men'; Job 8⁷ γχο τηνών 'thy beginning was small'; Is 63¹⁸ γχο τηνών 'thy beginning was small'; Is 63¹⁸ γχο τηνών 'thy beginning was small'; Is 63¹⁸ γχο τηνών 'the victory of the reference

It is possible that we ought to understand the word in this second sense in Ps 42°, the reference being to Zion, 'the little mountain,' in contrast to the giant Hermon (so Sinend, Wellhausen, Siegfried-Stade).§ The Psalm may be the expression of the feelings of an Israelite, who, when he has reached the northern boundary of the Holy Land on his way to exile, sends back his sighs to the temple-hill and its services. Of course this involves an alteration of the MT, but all that is necessary is to drop the D in YD, which may easily have crept into the text by accidental repetition of the final letter of DYD. This would give the rendering, 'I remember thee, thou little mountain, from the land of Jordan and the Hermons.' Wellhausen-Furness (in PB), reading, as above, T instead of YD, tr. 'Therefore on thee do I think, thou diminutive mountain, above all the land of Jordan and of Hermon,' i.e. Zion is the one spot in all Palestine ('the land of the Jordan and of Hermon') which is

J. A. SELBIE. MIZPAH and MIZPEH.—A name of several places and towns in Palestine. In most cases it is spelt (in AV) Mizpah, but in several instances Mizpah. The same variety of reading, ways or reach, occurs in the original. In three cases only is Mizpah used with the definite article, viz. Mizpah Mizpen used with the definite article, viz. Mizpen a town of Judah (Jos 15²⁸), Mizpeh a town of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁸), and 'the watch-tower of the wilderness' (2 Ch 20²⁴). In the other cases the article is omitted, viz. 'the Valley (bik'ah) of Mizpeh' (Jos 11²), Mizpeh of Gilead (Jg 11²⁹bis), Mizpeh of Moab (1 S 22³); but in these last two instances it would in any case be without the article as it is followed by a word in the genitive article, as it is followed by a word in the genitive.

Muzpeh (1952) is derived from 195 to look out, to view; from the same root are derived the proper names Zephath (Jg 11), Zephathah (2 Ch 14¹⁰), Ramathaim-zophim (1 S 1¹; an impossible name),* the field of Zophim (Nu 23¹⁴). The Targum translates both Mizpeh and Zophim by kmpp 'place of view,' 'watch-tower' (?).† Mizpeh is used to denote either a town (Jos 15³⁸ 18³⁶, Jg 11²⁹, 1 S 22³) or a watch-tower (2 Ch 20²⁴, Is 21³). In the two cases where it is used to denote a watch-tower, it is translated so both in AV and RV, and by LXX τὴν σκοπιάν; in the other cases the AV and RV render it as a proper name.

Mizpah is always used with the article except in Hos 5. It is used only in connexion with the land of Mizpah, near Mount Hermon (Jos 113), the site of the heap of stones of witness on Mount Gilead, and the sanctuaries of J" in Benjamin and near Shiloh. It is possible, then, that Mizpah represents an aboriginal name connected with a sanctuary, and hence the play upon the word Mizpah, and its root zāphāh ('to look out or view'), between Laban and Jacob (Gn 3146).

Mizpeh—

(a) B Massώχ, A Massωμά. The valley of Mizpeh in the Lebanon (Jos 118).

(b) Massωμά, Town of Benjamin (Jos 1528).

(c) B Massωμά, A Massωμά. Town of Benjamin (Jos 1828).

(d) Μα(σ)στιμά. Τοwn of Moab (1 8 228).

(e) Β την σχαστιάν, Α της σχαστιάς. Mixpeh of Gilearl (Jg 1129).

(f) την σχαστιάν. The watch-tower (2 Ch 2024, Is 210).

(2) Mizpah

Mispah—

(a) i μασιι ('that which is seen,' 'a vision'). The scene of the covenant between Jacob and Laban in Gilead (Gn 3149).

(b) B Mαστυμαν, Α Μαστυμάν. The land of Mispah under Hermon (Jos 113).

(c₁) Μαστικά. The Mispah of Gilead, where Jephthah spoke before the Loro, and where Jephthah's house was (Jg 111-34). Mispah near Shiloh, where Israel met before the Loro (Jg 201-3). Mispah of Benjamin, where Gedaliah ruled Israel (2 K 252-1 B Μαστικάν), Jer 408-13 411-10 [Gr. 470-15 431-10]). Mispah near Shiloh (Jg 211-5.9).

(c₂) B Μασσιμάν, Α Μαστικάν, Μασσιμά. Μίσμα ο Benjamin, where Israel met before the Loro (I S 75-16). Mispah of Benjamin, where Gedaliah ruled Israel (2 K 253).

(d) Μασφί, Mispah of Benjamin, where Gedaliah had

(d) Massei. Mispah of Benjamin, where Gedaliah had ruled Israel (Neh 319).

(e) Maroa. Mizpah of Benjamin in time of Asa (2 Ch

(197). (197). Mizpah of Gilead (Jg 1017). Mizpah of Benjamin in time of king Asa (1 K 1522). Josephus gives Μασφά (Ant. v. iv. 3, vill. xii. 4) for Mizpah of Benjamin, Μασφαθή (Ant. v. vii. 9) and Μασαθά (x. ix. 2) for Mizpah both of Benjamin and Gileague and Ant. v. vii. Gilead : see also Ant. VI. ii. 1.

These differences of name may give some indication of the views held by the LXX as to the location of the various Mizpehs and Mizpahs. The two in the Lebanon and the town of Judah have special names; the remainder, viz. Mizpah or Mizpeh of Gilead, Shiloh, Benjamin, and Moab, are given under the names of Μασφά, Μασσηφά, and Μασσηφάθ. But Mizpah of Gilead is once translated as 'the watch-tower,' and Mizpah of Benjamin is given (in 2 Ch 166) as Maσφά, and in an identical passage (in 1 K 1522) as 'the watch-tower The inference may be drawn that, according to the view of the LXX, there was a Mizpeh or watch tower' in Gilead, not far from the meeting-place ot Jacob and Laban, and this may have given rise to the play upon the word in naming 'the heap of witness' Mizpah. As Mizpeh was a watch-tower over the land of Gilead, so the Lord was 'the watch-tower' or 'witness' to the covenant at Mizpah; and thus the two names would be bound together; and when the ark of the covenant in after-ages was stationed at Shiloh, Gibeah, the meeting-place of the people before the Lord, would be the Mizpah, while the nearest high place or 'watchwhich for military purposes they would constantly have in use would be Mizpeh. Rabbins took a similar view as to the word 'Ramathain-zophim,' to which they gave the impossible translation 'Ramotha of the scholars of the prophets,' regarding the prophets as watchmen.

There are at least seven distinct places alluded to under the names of Mizpeh and Mizpah,

1. Mizpah (הַּבְּיִבְה, Samar. הַפִּצְבָה, i.e. maṣẓēbāh= the pillar). — One of the names of the pillar $(mazz\bar{e}b\bar{a}h)$ and heap of stones (gal) put up by Jacob and his brethren in the mountain of Gilead in token of God being a witness to the covenant made that day between Jacob and Laban (Gn 3146-52).* The other names were Jegar-sahadutha (which see) and Galeed, the former being the western Aramaic for the 'heap of the testimony,' the latter being the Hebrew equivalent of the same (see GALEED, GILEAD).

The name Mizpah, if it had the sense of a place where the Lord watched between two parties to a covenant, may have come to be applied to the places where the people held solemn assembly for deliberation in time of difficulty near the sanctuary of Jehovah, and it thus would be likely to be found near every place where the ark of the covenant or tabernacle remained for any time in addition to its original position in Gilead. It appears in connexion with the battles between all Israel and the Benjamites a few years after the death of Joshua, and is then evidently near Bethel and Shiloh, and again it appears in its original position some 150 years after in the time of Jephthah.

There is no record showing to what extent this ancient sanctuary in Gilead was used during the times of the Judges, when the ark and tabernacle were at Gilgal and Shiloh, but at the time that the children of Israel were oppressed by the children of Ammon, and in their misery put away their false gods, the Ammonites were encamped in Gilead and all Israel at Mizpah (Jg 10¹⁷). It is apparent from the context that this was the original Mizpah of Gilead and not that of Shiloh or Benjamin, and from the expression 'before the Lord in Mizpah' it is surmised that the ark was present with the host of Israel (Speaker's Comm. on Jg 1¹¹). If this were so, it was sent over without the consent of the tribes of Israel on the western side of Jordan (Jg 121), as Jephthah's action in fighting the Ammonites without the assistance of western Israel was called in question by them. The whole account would lead to the inference that the eastern tribes assembled as a solemn conclave at the ancient scene of the covenant between Jacob and Laban at Mizpah, and then elected Jephthah as their captain-general then elected Jephthan as their captain-general to lead them to victory against the Ammonites, without any recourse to Shiloh. He then in the spirit of the Lord passed over Gilead and Manasseh, and over Mizpah of Gilead, and from Mizpah of Gilead to the children of Ammon (Jg 11²⁸). The LXX give the term 'watch-tower' both for the Mizpah where the eastern tribes of Israel encamped (Lg 10) and for the Mizpah over which Lorbitals (Jg 1017) and for the Mizpah over which Jephthah passed. On Jephthah's return from his victory over the Ammonites he came to his house at Mizpah, which the LXX render Massayé, as they name the spot near the sanctuary where the tribes gathered before the Lord. There would thus appear, in the view of the LXX, to have been the Mizpah adjoining the sanctuary where the tribes gathered before the Lord and where Jephthah dwelt, and the Mizpah on high ground near where the tribes engaged and where Jephthah pressed the tribes encamped and where Jephthah passed over with them.

* On this passage see Dillmann's note. The name 'Mispeh' comes in very strangely. It is plain that there is an allusion to the mazzebúh of the preceding context, as well as a desire to explain the origin of a Watch-Tower in the neighbourhood. See art. JACOB, vol. ii. p. 529.

The topographical indications as to the position of Mizpah of Gilead are meagre. It was in the mountains of Gilead (Gn 3123), and it was north of the Jabbok, because Jacob crossed that torrent after parting with Laban. It was a well-indicated boundary, to be used in succeeding ages between the Hebrews and the Arameans (Gn 31ss). It was in the vicinity of a Mizpeh, watch-tower, or commanding situation (Jg 11²⁰). Beyond this there can be little but conjecture. There is one indication, however, which seems to limit the line of Jacob's journey east and west: he was coming from Padan-aram in the north-east, and with his herds and flocks would naturally travel along the level tableland to the east of the broken country falling towards the Jordan Valley, near the line of the present Derb el-Hajj, which avoids crossing the Jabbolt by making a little detour to the east. Whether he came by Damascus or by Bozrah, he would arrive north of the Jabbok by passing through the vale in which Jerash is situated. It is suggested that this is the site of the meeting of Jacob and Laban. From the abundance of its waters, enough for an enormous city, this site must from the earliest times have been a restingplace for herds and flocks on their travels. Near to these waters (1960 ft.) are the commanding situations or Mizpehs, Neby Had (2400 ft.) and Jebel Hakart (3480 ft.), and to the west are dolmens near the village of Saf. Sir George Grove has suggested that the site of Mizpah at Jerash is also identical with those of Ramath-mizpah and Ramath-gilead (which see); and this seems to be the most satisfactory identification.

2. Mizpah (луки).—The events related in Jg 19 to 21 concerning the extermination of all the Benjamites save 600 by united Israel, though placed chronologically after the time of the Judges, are, from the mention of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (20²⁸), usually considered (so far as the account is historical) to have occurred about 20 years after the death of Joshua, at a time when there were no Judges in the land and the Israelites forsook the Lord and served Baal and Astarte (2¹³). Josephus also places these events at the commencement of his account of the Judges (Ant. v.).

The tabernacle with the ark had been set up at Shiloh in Ephraim, 10 miles north of Bethel, before the death of Joshua, and remained there as its chief and permanent residence until the death of Eli; but it would appear from the account here given (Jg 20. 21) that the ark of the covenant was carried about from place to place in time of war to the spot where the people assembled, and VOL. 111.-26 in later years to where the Judge resided (Speaker's Comm. on Jg 20). The positions of the places mentioned, so far as they are at present identified, are: Gibeah (Tell el-Fal?), 4 miles north of Jerusalem; Bethel (Beitin), 6 miles north of Gibeah; and Shiloh (Seilan), some 10 miles north of Bethel. A Shiloh (Scilan), some 10 miles north of Bethel. A Levite was on his way to the house of the Lord, probably at Shiloh (Jg 18³¹ 9¹⁹), possibly at Bethel, when he turned aside to spend the night at Gibeah of Benjamin close to Ramah (er-Rām), and here his concubine was outraged to death by Benjamites of that city. This deed united all Israel against Benjamin, and they gathered together as one man unto the Lord at Mizpah (in AV it is given as Mizpeh throughout), Jg 20¹.

In order to understand the account, the question

In order to understand the account, the question 'where was Mizpah?' requires to be answered. It has usually been understood that the Mizpah here spoken of and that where Samuel gathered the people together (1 S 7) were identical. But there is no necessity for this conclusion: and the confusion of the two places renders the accounts of the occurrences unintelligible. The Mizpah of Samuel was in the heart of Benjamin near to Jerusalem, and it would have been impracticable for all Israel to have gathered together on this occasion before the Lord, at such a crisis, in the midst of the people with whom they were about to wage a war of extermination (but see Budde, 'Richter,' in Kurzer Hdcomm. ad loc.). The two Mizpahs may have been quite distinct: they were the places of assembly of the people in solemn conclave near a sanctuary or where the tabernacle and ark were, and in this particular case Mizpah would appear to have been some place of assembly between Shiloh and Bethel, probably close to Shiloh, where the tabernacle was. This is accentuated by the statement (20°) that the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel had gone up to Mizpah: suggesting certainly that Mizpah was outside the boundaries of Benjamin.

3. The Mizpah (Jos 18²⁶), elsewhere the Mizpah.—Mizpah of Benjamin is first?) mentioned in the early days of Samuel (1 S 7*). At this time Shiloh had fallen from its position as the sanctuary of J" (1 S 44, Jer 712 262) on account of the wickedness of Israel, the ark of the covenant had been captured by the Philistines, had been released by them, and abode in Kiriath-jearim twenty years (187²), during which time the children of Israel had fallen into idolatry and suffered severely at the hands of the Philistines, and then repented, the hands of the Philistines, and then repented, and at the exhortation of Samuel put away the baals and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only. Then Samuel with all the authority of judge and prophet gathered all the children of Israel to Mizpah to pray for them unto the Lord, as Joshua had gathered the tribes together to Shechem (Joe 24).

The question again arises, Where was this Mizpah where the tribes gathered together before the Lord, and drew water and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted and confessed their sins? There is diversity of opinion as to the position of Samuel's residence, Ramah or Ramathaim-zophim (?); but that which lends itself most readily to the account of Samuel's life is a few miles north of Jerusalem, either Nebi Samil or some point on bit Serusates, either trees states or some point on the high ridge north of Shafat (so van de Velde, Dillm., Tristram, G. A. Smith, etc.); and here Samuel built an altar, which may have been in connexion with the tabernacle, and this Mizpah

We can new follow the changes which, upon the views adopted in this article, took place in the position of the Mizpah. First, it named the spot of the covenant between Jacob and Laban in Gilead; secondly, we find it attached to the place of gathering of the people before the Lord in Shiloh, where the tabernacle was; then again we find the people gathering together before the Lord at the original 'heap of witness' in Gilead in the time of Jephthah; and, lastly, it names the spot where Samuel gathered Israel before the recently-erected tabernacle near Romeh to some God and resist the tabernacle near Ramah to serve God and resist the Philistines, and subsequently to choose the first king over Israel. Here the tabernacle remained for about fifty-seven years, until the dedication of the temple of Jerusalem; and in process of time the name Mizpah appears to have clung to this spot, for we find that king Asa built Geba and Mizpah (2 Ch 166); and it is to be noted that the LXX call it in one case $Ma\sigma\phi d$ and in the other $r \to r \sigma \kappa \sigma \kappa r dr$ (1 K 15²²). During the days of the temple of Jerusalem the sanctuary at Mizpah would lose prestige; but it must have retained the affection of the people, for during the Captivity, when Jerusalem lay desolate, Mizpah became the seat of government of the ruler of Judæa (Gedaliah) under

At the time of the rebuilding of the temple the district of Mizpah and men of Mizpah are spoken of, and it is alluded to as 'the seat of the governor on this side the river' (Neh 3⁷). The account (in Jer 418) of the pilgrims who were met by Ishmael out of Mizpah on their way southward from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria with offerings to the house of the Lord, shows that Mizpah was on the high road from Shiloh to Jerusalem.

In the time of the Maccabees, Mizpah (Μασσηφά) appears again as a place of solemn conclave, the Israelites assembled themselves together and came to Mizpeh over against Jerusalem, for in mizpen over against Jerusalem, for in Mizpen was there aforetimes a place of prayer of Israel' (1 Mac 3⁴⁶). The expression 'over against Jerusalem,' taken in conjunction with the fact stated in Jer 41⁵ that Mizpah was on the north road leading from Shiloh to Jerusalem, seems absolutely to fix Mizpah to a spot immediately parts of and close to Lerusalem as will be seen north of and close to Jerusalem, as will be seen also to have been the view taken by Josephus. For the relation of Mizpah to Nob, and the view held by some that the two places are identical, see art. Nob. 4. 5. The land of Mizpah (προκρή της, την Μασεύμα, terra Mispha, Jos 113). The valley of Mizpah (πυρρ connexion with the battle which took place at the waters of Merom, when Joshua led Israel against Jabin king of Hazor and the northern tribes. Joshua chased them (Jos 118) unto great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward. On his return he burnt Hazor, which, though not identified, is generally supposed to have been situated somewhat to the north of the waters of Merom (Lake Huleh). Joshua would thus, on going eastward from Zidon, have gone into the valley between the two Lebanons and have arrived valley between the two Leoanons and nave arrived at the buka or valley (bikah) of Lebanon under Hermon. We read (Jos 11¹⁷) of Baal-gad in the valley (bikah) of Lebanon under Hermon (Jos 11¹⁷), and the Hivite lived under Hermon in the land of Mizpah (Jos 11³). At the present time the only bikah or buka (Arabic) of any extent in the neighbourhood is the great plain between the two Lebanons, reaching from the foot of Hermon to Baalbek. It would therefore appear that, whether these two places are identical or not, they are both near to Hermon. If the land of Mizpah may be taken to be all the country around Hermon, then the valley (bikah) of Mizpeh may be the southern portion of the valley of the Lehanon. For other conjectures see Dillm., Jos.

 Mizpeh (πριφή, Μασφά, Mispha), a city of Judah (Jos 15³⁶) in the Shephelah or lowlands, in a group of sixteen, some of which have been identified both in the north and south of the Shephelah. It is given together with Dilean and Joktheel, neither of which has been identified; and there is no clue to its position, and no account is given. Tell es Safieh, the Blanche Guarde or Alba Specula of the Middle Ages, has a name equivalent to Scopos or Mizpeh, but it has been suggested that this is Gath (so G. A. Smith, HGHL 227). Robinson (BRP ii. 31) suggests that the valley of Zephathah, 2 Ch 14¹⁰ (same root as Mizpeh), may have been near Tell es-Safieh.

7. Mizpeh Moab (ανίο τεχιο, Μασσηφά τῆς Μωάβ, Maspha quæ est Moab) is mentioned only once (1 S 22°), as the place where the king of Moab was staying when David consigned his parents to his care. At this time the territories of Moab did not extend north of the river Arnon, the whole of the old Moabite country beyond having been allotted to Reuben. As Mizpeh means a lofty place where one can see far and wide (Gesenius, Lex.), the only suitable position in Moab appears to be the fortress of Moab (Kir of Moab), which commands the passes going down to the Dead Sea (Luhith and Horonaim). David probably brought his parents from Adullam down by the pass of Ziz to En-gedi, and thence round by the southern end of the Dead Sea up the pass of Horonaim to Kir of Moab (now Kerak). There can, however, in the absence of further information, be no certain cluste to the situation of Mizzak Moab. tain clue to the situation of Mizpeh Moab.

MIZZAH (מָנָה). — A 'duke' of Edom, descended from Esau and Basemath the daughter of Ishmael, Gn $36^{13\cdot 17}$ (A $Mo\xi\epsilon$) = 1 Ch 1^{37} (B $O\mu o\xi\epsilon$, A $Mo\xi\epsilon$). The clan of which he is the eponym has not been identified.

MNASON (Mrdour [! Cypr. spelling of Attic manborn (πνασων [: Cypr. spelling of Attic Mνήσων—Blass]; κ' Ιάσων), of Cyprus, with whom St. Paul and his companions lodged on the occasion of the apostle's last visit to Jerusalem (Ac 21¹⁶). He is described as an 'early' (ἀρχαῖος) disciple, by which we may perhaps understand one who had been a disciple from the time of Pentecost (cf. έν ἀρχῆ, 11¹⁵). Nothing further is known of him, though from his Greek name he was probably, if not a Gentile Christian, at any rate an Hellenist, with whom it would be natural and prudent for St. Paul to lodge, looking to the feelings which existed among the Jewish Christians against him (vv. 20. 21, and see Meyer). Paligion.

i. NAME.—The MT gives no etymology, but in Gn 19⁵⁷ (J) LXX adds after 'she called his name Gn 19⁵⁷ (J) LXX adds after 'she called his name Moab,' λέγουτα, 'Εκ τοῦ πατρός μου, i.e. 'ngo 'from my father.' The presence of an etymology of Ammon in the following verse favours the LXX text, which is adopted by Jos. Ant. I. xi. 5, Jerome, de Wette, and Ball, SBOT. Other etymologies suggested are ng 'D=ng 'seed of a father' (Ges. Thes.; Fuerst, HWB); or from ng 'to wish for' (Maurer, Currus. p. 130). referring to the attractive char-Cursus, p. 130), referring to the attractive character of the land. The last is the only one that is possible, and it is scarcely probable. 'Moab' serves indifferently as the name of the land or the people, the Moabites occupying Moab throughout the whole period during which they are known to history. Probably 'Moab' was first the name of the land and then of the people.

ii. Territory.—'Moab' was the high tableland east of the Dead Sea and the southernmost section of the Jordan. Its western frontier is clearly defined by these natural boundaries: to the south lay Edom and the desert; to the east, Ammon and the desert; to the north, before the conquest by the Israelites, probably Ammon, after the conquest Israel. Towards the desert there could be no clearly defined boundary, and the frontiers between Moab, Edom, Ammon, and Israel shifted with the balance of power; but, roughly speaking, the territory inhabited by Moabites, and forming the Moabite state when not encroached upon by foreign aggression, was the cultivated plateau (specially known as ham-Mishôr, 'the Level' or 'l'lateau,' HGHL 53; or Mishôr of Medeba, Jos 13*.16; or Sharon, 1 Ch 516, HGHL 548) from the southern end of the Dead Sea to a line some miles beyond its northern extremity. Kir of Moab is nearly as far south as the southern end, and Heshbon and Jazer (wh. see) are some distance beyond the northern end of the Dead Sea. This plateau is divided by the deep chasm of the Arnon. The northern part of this territory is claimed by some documents for Reuben or Gad, and was at times under the dominion of Israel (cf. below, History). The extreme area of Moab might be reckoned at 50 miles long by 30 broad, 1500 sq. miles, about as large as Hampshire, but the cultivated plateau is only about 10 or 12 miles broad. Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 124) describes Moab as 'a plateau about 3000 feet above the Mediterranean level, or 4300 feet above the Dead Sea. The western slopes are generally steep. lower formation is the Nubian sandstone above this a dolomitic limestone, with bold precipices in some places, forms the upper part of the hills, and is capped by a soft marl full of flints . . . the general aspect of the Moabite mountains rising to the plateau is barren in the extreme. sandstone varies from purple to a light tawny colour, and the ridges are divided by deep narrow ravines. . . . In spring the rounded, shapeless hills are covered with grass and wild flowers, and parts of the plateau are now sown with corn; but the number of trees in Moab might be counted with the fingers of one hand. . . . Moab is a land of streams. According to HGHL (p. 535) the plateau is broken by 'deep, wide, warm valleys,' with springs and brooks; and 'eastward the plateau is separated from the desert by low rolling hills. Conder states that gazelles, wild oxen, wolves, jackals, hyænas, vultures, and eagles are found on the plateau. But the appearance of the country to-day must be very different from that which it presented when it was the seat of a powerful and prosperous state. The prophets dwell upon the 'cities of Moab'; and in their days this land of streams was carefully cultivated, dotted here and there with fortified towns and villages. Its roads and ruins still witness to ancient fertility and populousness. Although the existing remains are largely Greek and Roman, they show the former capabilities of the country, and fairly represent the prosperity of Moab in OT times.

The population must have been considerable. Conder estimates the present population of the Belka, of which Moab is a part, at about 19,000. Hampshire in 1891 had 666,250 inhabitants. Perhaps 500,000 would be the highest possible estimate of the population of Moab in its most flourishing days. One remarkable feature of the country is its great wealth of cairns, stone-circles, dolmens, and menhirs. Conder states that 700 of these rude stone monuments were found by the Palestine Exploration Fund surveyors in 1881: he is doubtful whether as many similar monuments exist in all the rest of Palestine.

In addition to the plateau itself, Moab comprised the southern corner of the eastern part of the Arabah or valley of the Jordan, the arbôth Moab, the low hills skirting the plateau east and south, and pasture land beyond these hills out into the deserts. The climate, natural products, etc., are those of Eastern Palestine, in which part of Moab is usually included.

The following cities, etc., are mentioned as at one time or another Moabite; the names in italics are probably variants of those in ordinary type, which respectively precede them; they are sometimes placed slightly out of alphabetical order to show the connexion. Names in capitals are found only on the Moabite Stone. For details see the separate articles on these names

iii. LANGUAGE (Proper Names and Moabite Stone).—Our knowledge of the language is derived from the Moabite proper names in OT, etc., and from the Moabite Stone. Both show that Moabite is 'simply a dialect of Heb.' (Stade, i. 113). Where it differs from biblical Hebrew it agrees either with Phœnician or Canaanite, which is also very closely allied with Hebrew; or with Arabic, the language of the eastern neighbours of Moab. According to Hommel (AHT 275), the spelling on the Stone has a strong affinity with that of the Minæan inscriptions; e.g. the Moabite Mehdeba', Neboh, are more akin to Minæan than to Heb., which writes Mêdebû,

The close connexion with Heb. is shown by the following resemblances—the details of differences are given below. The forms of almost all the proper names are consistent with their being of Hebrew origin. This might be partly accounted for by the fact that, for the most part, they are known to us only from Heb. sources. But the Stone is undoubtedly a Moabite document, and almost all its words, inflexions, and idioms occur in OT. For instance, it has two characteristic Heb. idioms

(A) Proper Names.—In addition to the names of cities given at the end of the section on Territory, the following proper names are found in OT and Moabite Stone (the latter in italics). (1) PERSONS: -Balak, Chemosh-melek or Chemosh-gad, Eglon, Ithmah, Mesha, Orpah, Ruth, Sanballat (?), Shomer or Shimrith, Sihon (?), Zippor: also in inscriptions (see History), Kammusu (Chemosh)-nadab, Kmshyhy (Chemoshyehi='Chemosh gives life,' Baethgen, p. 13), Mutsuri, Salmanu. (2) DEITIES:—Chemosh, Ashtar-Chemosh. (3) the RIVER Arnon.

(B) Moabite Stone.—This Stone was a monument erected by Mesha king of Moab, c. 850, to commemorate his victories over Israel. In 1868 a Prussian traveller, the Rev. F. A. Klein, discovered Prussan traveller, the Rev. F. A. Klein, discovered the upper portion of it, about 3½ ft. high, by 2 ft. broad and 2 ft. thick, with rounded top, amongst the ruins of Dibon (Dibân). In 1869 a rough squeeze was taken by an Arab for M. Clermont-Ganneau. There is also a copy of ll. 13-20 made for him by another Arab. Then the Stone was broken up by the Arabs in the hope of making more profit out of the fragments. Two large fragments and 18 small ones were recovered. From these, with the addition of reconstructions from these, with the addition of reconstructions from the squeeze of the missing portions, a restoration of the Stone has been made, and placed in the Jewish Court of the Louvre at Paris. There is a facsimile of this restored Stone in the British Museum. The text is printed on p. 404.

Words in () represent Moabite words, some or all the letters of which are not clear enough to make it certain what they are. Words in [) represent conjectural restorations where the text has entirely, or almost entirely, disappeared. Words in ([)] represent conjectural restorations of words, in which one or more, but not all the letters, can be distinctly read. OT names are given in AV spelling; in other cases the consonants are given, without supplying vowels. Words required by English idiom but not by Hebrew are in italics. Symbols as in Notes on Text. In some cases the Hebrew order has been preserved, and the English order is shown by subscript numerals.

(d) Features in which the language of the Moabite Stone differs from the Hebrew of OT.

(a) אנך 'NK for 'I' without the final ' Y of the Heb. אנכי. As elsewhere the Stone always expresses the silent consonant of final vowels, אור can scarcely be written defectively. The same form is found in Phæn., L, s.v.

(β) The feminine singular ends in n instead of n

as in Hebrew.

(י) The plural is formed by Nun, as in Aramaic and Arabic, instead of by Mem, as in OT Heb. ארבען 2, יבן 5, יבן 5, יבן 8. So occasionally in OT.

(8) The form no 2, 8, ShTh for Heb. nur 'year,' as in Neopunic inscriptions (L, p. 379).

(c) In vy 5, 'and he humiliated,' and vy 6, 'and I humiliated,' the last radical is apparently a Waw with full consonantal force, whereas the corresponding radical in Heb. is a silent He.

(خ) The affix for 'his,' 'him,' is ה. הדולפה, 6, ארצה ה. 7, הבתה, 7, הבה 8, etc., as occasionally in Heb., e.g., הלפה 'his tent,' Gn 9²¹ (see Ges.-Kautzsch, § 91 e).

(ת) Line 8, מירבא MHDB', for Heb. מהרבא MYDB',

(θ) The form מלחחם 'fight against,' line 11 Heb. uses the Niph. (in three cases the Qal) in the sense of 'fight.'

אלחחם, if parsed as Heb., must be taken as Hithpael, the n of the prefix and the first radical being transposed, a transposition only occurring in Heb. when the first radical is a sibilant. This transposition, however, regularly occurs for all first radicals in the Arabic 8th conj. iqtatala, which is equivalent in sense to the Heb. Hithpa'el.

See, further, Driver, Sam. xciii.
(1) The inscription belongs to the primitive stage of Hebrew writing, in which doubtless most of the OT books were originally written, in which the scriptio defectiva was used, and no distinction was made between medial and final letters of alphabet. Silent consonants, however, are used for final vowels, בו 'my father,' l. 2; יחש Heb. בה, etc.; in the affixes, בין (י), l. 18, הי, l. 22; and in בין, ירבן.

(*) The following words, in addition to proper names, do not occur in the OT: מברת, 1. 9; איר, 1. 12; מברת, 1. 25 from Heb. איר, ווא (?), 1. 34. (A) According to the readings of SS in II. 11, 16,

iv. Religion. — Up to a certain point the Moabite religion was henotheistic, and the relation of Chemosh to Moab was exactly that of J" to Israel (see CHEMOSH). On the strength of a winged sun-disk on the gem containing the name Chemoshyehi, Baethgen regards Chemosh as God of the Sunshine, and a manifestation of Molech. The Greeks identified Chemosh with Ares. Sanctuaries to Baalpeor (wh. see), and possibly Nebo (wh. see), and other gods, neither destroy the parallel with Israel, nor prove that Moab failed to pay a special, unique homage to Chemosh. Even the occurrence on the Stone of a deity Ashtar (or Ishtar-) chemosh would not destroy the parallel with Israel. Ashtar-chemosh (see ASHTORETH in vol. i. p. 171a) is usually distinguished from Chemosh; and probably El Shaddai, El Elyon, Jahweh Zeba'oth, are not sufficiently similar compounds to be urged against this view. But if inscriptions of Solomon or Ahab were preserved, they might name other deities beside Jahweh. According to Baethgen, Ashtar-chemosh is a name which claims for Chemosh the attributes of Ishtar. Chemosh had his temples, priests, sacrifices, and offerings. The inhabitants of conquered cities were offerings. The inhabitants of conquered cities were 'devoted' to him, i.e. massacred in his honour (Stone, Il. 12, 17). Mesha sacrificed his firstborn to Chemosh, as Ahaz offered his son to Molech.

But there is no extant evidence that any Moabites regarded Chemosh as the one God, in a monotheistic sense; or that there was any attempt by priestly legislation to purify the ritual from superstition and immorality; or that there was any ethical or spiritual movement parallel to the minis-

v. PEOPLE AND HISTORY.—The patriarchal narratives in Gn preserve a tradition, which may be unhesitatingly accepted as historical, to the effect that Moab was very closely akin to Israel, and that up to acreain point the historical acceptance. and that up to a certain point the history of Israel is also the history of Moab. Moab is the son of Lot and the brother of Ammon, Lot is the nephew of Abraham, and accompanies him in the migration first from Ur and then from Haran. other words, Lot (i.e. Moab with Ammon), Ishmael, the Bnê Keturah and Edom, once formed with Israel that loose confederation of kindred tribes which bore the common name Hebreus, and followed Abraham from Mesopotamia into Canaan. According to these narratives, Lot shared for a time the nomad life of the other Hebrews in Western Palestine, but was the first of the allied clans to leave the confederacy. Lot settled in Sodom and Gomorrah, but after the calamity which overwhelmed those cities the Bnê Lot betook themselves to the pasture-lands E. of Jordan, and, as the separate political organizations of Moab and Ammon, occupied the territory in which they remained till they disappeared from history. Thus Moab passed from the nomad stage into that of agriculturists and city-dwellers at a much earlier date than Israel. Possibly the Khabiri of the Amarna tablets are the Hebrews at their first entry into Palestine before the confederacy began to break up.

We do not know the exact limits of the territory first occupied by Moab, but it probably stretched northward from the Arnon, along the eastern banks of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. We read in Dt 210 'the Emim dwelt therein "[in the land of Moab]" aforetime, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakim: these also are accounted Rephaim, as the Anakim: but the Moabites call them Emim.' J" gave this land to Moab as He gave the land of the Horites to Edom. In Gn 145 the Emim are at Kiriathaim, a town north of the Arnon, spoken of later on as Moabite. The statement is quite consistent with the position of ch. 14, as the birth of Moab, i.e. its first appearance as a distinct tribe, is not related till 197. If we could trust the synchronisms with Babylonian and Elamite history based on the names in 141, the incident happened shortly before the restoration of Babylonian supremacy by Hammurabi, B.C. 2200; and Moab made its appearance somewhat later (HCM p. 161 ff.). But the archæological relations of Gn 14 are still quite uncertain (cf. L. W. King, Letters, etc., of Hammurabi, Introd.). The antiquarian note, Dt 2105, is a late addition, and, according to Holzinger on Gn 145 and Steuernagel on Dt 210, the Emim are purely Introd.). The antiquarian note, Dt 2¹⁰², is a late addition, and, according to Holzinger on Gn 14⁵ and Steuernagel on Dt 2¹⁰, the Emim are purely legendary (cf. EMIM).

The OT says nothing more about Moab till the time of the Exodus. From the Amarna tablets and other Egyptian, Babylonian, and Assyrian monuments we gather that Babylonia and the Hittites exercised great influence in Syria before c. B.C. 1400; and that for some time before that date Syria was an Egyptian province, but that. date Syria was an Egyptian province, but that, apparently, about 1400, Egyptian authority was breaking down throughout Syria. Moab is not mentioned in the Amarna tablets at present published (Winckler, Petrie). It lay rather out of the way of the main routes between Syria and Egypt and the East, and especially was not on the Egyptian line of march into Palestine. Possibly, therefore, both as to politics and culture, the relations of Moab with the great empires were alight and superficial. On the other hand, Moab commanded the great routes from Western Palestine and Northern Syria into Arabia (HGHL 430, 597 ff., 626); and probably during this early period and throughout its history Moab remained in touch with its Arab kinsfolk: thus the Mesha inscription shows traces of the influence of Arabic. Yet there is evidence of the connexion of Moab with Egypt. According to Sayce (Patr. Pal. 153), Moab was included in the Canaanite province of Egypt at the time when the Amarna tablets were written; but Edom then encroached on what was afterwards Moabite territory. Ramses II. (c. 1300) fought several campaigns to restore the Egyptian dominion in Syria. In the list of his conquests on the base of one of six colossal figures at Luxor there occurs the name Muab (Patr. Pal. p. 21). Karhu, in a similar list at Karnak (Patr. Pal. p. 237), is probably the KRHH of the Moabite Stone. Other traces of Egyptian influence E. of Jordan are a monolith near the Lake of Tiberias bearing the cartouche of Ramses II., now known as the Stone of Job (see vol. i. p. 166b); and the delineation of a local deity Akna-zapu, 'Yokin of the North,' with the full face and crown of Osiris (Sayce, Egypt of the Hebrews, p. 81).

We now come to the biblical accounts of the Exodus, which include statements as to the fortunes of Moch in the period impression to record

We now come to the biblical accounts of the Exodus, which include statements as to the fortunes of Moab in the period immediately preceding the appearance of Israel in Eastern Palestine. According to these, Moab, shortly before the advent of Israel, was deprived of its northern territory, at least, by an Amorite king, Sihon; and though Israel occupied the land of Moab, it was conquered, not from the Moabites, but from Sihon. But the historicity of this account is disputed. We will first give the narrative as it stands, and then the criticism of it.

The original authority for the narrative is the section of E, Nu 21²¹⁻³¹ (Wellh. J), which contains the account of the defeat of Sihon, and the conquest of his dominions. V.²⁶, sometimes held to be a later gloss, states that 'Sihon, king of the Amorites, had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land out of his hand, even unto Arnon'; and vv.²⁷⁻²⁰ give, on the authority of 'them that speak in proverbs,' i.e. the composers or reciters of 'taunt songs,' celebrating the discomfiture of Israel's enemies, the following poem, probably taken from the Book of the Wars of J", quoted in v.¹⁴:—

'Come ye to Heahbon,
Let the city of Sihon be built and established;
For a fire is gone out of Heahbon,
A flame from the city of Sihon.
It hath devoured Ar of Moab,
The lords of the high places of Arnon.
Woe to thee, Moab!
Thou art undone, O people of Chemosh.
He hath made his sons fugitives,
And his daughters captives
To Sihon, king of the Amorites.
We have shot at them; Heahbon is perished even unto Dibon,
And we have laid waste even unto Nophah,
Which reacheth unto Medeba.'

According to Dillmann, the speakers are Israelites, who, in celebrating their victory over Sihon, describe his recent conquest of Moab. Unless v. sis a gloss, Sihon's war against Moab, and Israel's against Sihon, rest on substantially the same authority. The latter is frequently referred to by the Deuteronomic writers; it is also alluded to in P's account of the division of Canaan, Jos 13^{11, 27} (unless these verses are P's), in the late passage Jg 11¹²⁻²⁶ (R¹², Budde, Moore), in Neh 9²⁶, and in Ps 135¹¹ 136¹⁹. The poem is quoted in Jer 48²⁶ (a late addition, Corn., Giesebr.), but there is no reference to Israel's war with Sihon. Thus the tradition is comparatively early, and was continuously recognized; moreover, the narrative is not intrinsically improbable.

On the other hand, neither J nor P mentions the Sihon episode (unless Jos 13^{21.27} are rightly assigned to P²), and none of the accounts of Moab's relations with Israel suggest that Israel had avenged Moab by conquering its oppressor. Hence, though the narrative is accepted by Dillmann (on Nu 21), Cornill (Hist. of the People of Israel, p. 45), etc., it is regarded as unhistorical by Stade (Gesch. Isr. 117f.), Addis (on Nu 21), etc. According to the latter, the poem refers to the conquest of a Moabite king, Sihon, by Israel in the 9th cent. (cf. Sihon).

If we accept E's narrative, we may follow Cornill (Hist. p. 45) in reconstructing the history somewhat thus: Sihon expelled the Moabites and Ammonites from the most fertile parts of their territory. The conquered either invited the Israelites, then occupying the country about Kadesh, to come to the rescue, or welcomed them as allies when they appeared on the scene. But, after the Israelites had overthrown Sihon, they kept for themselves the territory he had taken from Moab.

Nu 25¹⁻⁸ (JE), according to which the women of Moab led the Israelites into immorality, and the Israelites worshipped Baal-peor as guests at Moabite sacrificial feasts, is entirely in accordance with E. Similarly Dt 2²⁻²⁶, in stating that J" forbade Israel to attack Moab, and that Moab allowed the Israelites to pass through its territory, and furnished them with provisions; and Jg 11²⁵ (R¹⁸?), in stating that Balak did not fight against Israel, are following either E, possibly in a fuller form than we have it, or some equivalent account. The futile attempt of Balak to induce Balaam to curse Israel occurred, according to current analysis, both in J and E, and seems also to imply that up to that point no hostilities had taken place between Israel and Moab. Possibly, however, the whole Balaam section belongs to E, with the exception of the episode of the speaking ass, which may be J, but may originally have had nothing to do with Balak or Moab (cf. Balaam and the analysis in NUMBERS). In P, Nu 318, Jos 1322, Balaam is connected with Midian, and P may have followed a lost section of J.

On the other hand, there is a series of passages which suggest hostile relations between Moab and Israel at this time. Ex 15¹⁸ (JE), the Song of Triumph after crossing the Red Sea, speaks of the dismay of the Moabites at that event. Dt 23³ states that Moab did not furnish Israel with provisions; it does not mention any war between them; and, according to Jg 11¹⁷ (R^{JE}?), the Israelites were refused permission to pass through Moab. But, curiously enough, it is in Jos 24⁹, the E-speech, that we find the explicit statement, 'Balak ben Zippor, king of Moab, arose and fought against Israel; and he sent and called Balaam ben Beor to curse you.' Perhaps at an earlier stage of the Wanderings, before Sihon attacked Moab, the Moabites feared Israel, and refused to admit them into Moab; after the conquests of Sihon, Moab was glad to obtain the help of Israel, but again became hostile when Israel refused to restore to Moab its former territory.

Whether Israel took the land north of Arnon from Sihon or from Moab, it was always debatable ground, and stimulated and aggravated the quarrels that naturally arose between neighbours. northern frontier of Moab retired or advanced as the power of Israel waxed or waned. The most important incident narrated as to the relations of Israel and Moab, in the period of the Judges, is the occupation of Jericho by the Moabites, the assassination of their king, Eglon, by the Benjamin State of the S assassination of their king, Egion, by the Benjamite Ehud, and the consequent slaughter of the Moabites and the recovery of the territory of Jericho for Israel, Jg 3¹⁹⁻³⁰ (J?, in Dt setting). The occupation of Jericho implies that Moab had reconquered the country north of the Arnon, as far as opposite Jericho (cf. EHUD, EGLON). LXX (not all MSS) and Syr. insert Moab in the post-exilic (Budde, Moore) list of the oppressors from whom Jephthah delivered Israel. The conjecture, though late was natural and probably correct. though late, was natural, and probably correct. Moab would take advantage of so good an opportunity, and was always closely connected with Ammon. The author of Jg 11¹²⁻²³ was certainly under the impression that Moab was concerned in the controversy. The Book of Ruth assigns its story to the period of the Judges, and illustrates the friendly relationships which sometimes existed between the neighbouring peoples. Perhaps the obscure verse 1 Ch 42 (a late addition, Kittel, SBOT) is intended to refer to this period. The Heb. includes in the list of Judahites 'and Jokim, and the men of Cozeba, and Joash, and Saraph, who had dominion in Moab, and Jashubi-lehem'; LXX and Vulg., followed by Kittel, read for 'Jashubi,' 'and they returned,' i.e. probably to Bethlehem when unable to retain power in Moab. Vulg. has the remarkable translation, stare fecit solem, virique mendacii, et Securus, et Incendens, qui principes fuerunt in Moab, et qui reversi sunt in Lahem; hec autem verba vetera, apparently on the lines of ancient Jewish exegesis, which sees here a reference to Elimelech, Mahlon, and Chilion of the Book of Ruth (Bertheau). But the original meaning, and intended period, and the value of the verse, are quite uncertain. Another hopelessly corrupt and obscure passage, 1 Ch 8⁸ (late addition, Kittel; according to Gray, Heb. Proper Names, the names are ancient), seems intended to refer to this period, cf. Ehud, 86, and furnishes another statement as to

Israelites, here Benjamites, settling in the Field of Moab, whether as part of an Israelite colony or as $g\bar{e}r\bar{t}m$ of Moab, does not appear. Further, the Israelites, Jg 10^6 (R^D), worshipped Moabite gods. Any account which can now be given of Moab is Any account which can now be given of Moab is necessarily one-sided. Our information is chiefly from Israelite sources; and our only Moabite document, the Mesha inscription, happens to be wholly taken up with a war with Israel. But the consequent impression that Moab was chiefly occupied with its relations with Israel would obviously be a mistake. Their dealings with other neighbours, e.g. Ammon and the nomad Arabs, must have been equally important to them—to say nothing of their own private affairs. Here and there we have a gleam of light on such subjects. In the list of Edomite kings, Gn 3631-39 (J usually, but Dillm. P), 1 Ch 145-51, we read, Gn 3635 of a Hadad ben Bedad, who defeated Midian in the Field of Moab, which suggests that at some period, probably that of the Judges (Ewald, in the time of Gideon), part of the Moabite territory was occupied by Edom. Two of the capitals of these kings, Avith and Dinhabah, have been identified with sites in Moabite territory; cf. DINHABAH. Whether the Midianites were present in 'the Field of Moab' as invaders (Moore on Jg 61) or allies is not clear. In Nu 21-25, read continuously, Midian appears in about the same district as the ally of Moab; the references to Midian may be P and RP, and yet be based on older documents. It is not clear that Moab and Midian were combined in any of the sources. To this period may also be assigned the capture of KRHH by Ramses III. c. 1280, during one of his Syrian campaigns (Sayce, Patr. Pat. p. 165).

Passing to the united monarchy, Saul to Solomon, in addition to the account of Saul's victory over Nahash king of Ammon (1 S 11), Moab, Ammon, and Edom are mentioned (1 S 14") amongst the enemies against whom Saul fought successfully; he clearly did not conquer Moab, since David's parents found an asylum there (1 S 223"s); according to Ru 418-22, Ruth the Moabitess was an ancestress of David. During the civil war between David and Eshbaal, Moab must have been able to hold its ground, or even to aggrandize itself at the expense of Israel. Hence, perhaps, David's war with Moab, in which 'he smote Moab, and measured them with the line, making them to lie down on the ground; and he measured two lines to put to death, and one full line to keep alive. And the Moabites became subject to David, and paid tribute' (2 S 8"). Part of the spoil of Moab, as of that from other conquests, David dedicated to J" (2 S 8"2). Probably instead of the 'two lion-like men of Moab,' slain by one of David's warriors (2 S 23"), we should read with Klostermann and Budde, partly following the LXX, 'two lions in their lair.' In the parallel passage, 1 Ch 112", Kittel reads 'two sons of Ariel from Moab.' Bertheau, who adopts a similar reading, understands Ariel as the name of the king of Moab (cf. ARIEL). In 1 Ch 11st, in a passage which Kittel ascribes to an ancient source, no longer extant, Ithmah the Moabite is mentioned among David's mighty men. Kautzsch and Budde ascribe 2 S 82-12 to late editors. According to 1 K 111-7.23 (D², Kautzsch), Solomon had Moabite women in his harem, erected a temple to Chemosh, and worshipped him.

How long Moab remained tributary we do not know. It is next mentioned as rebelling against Ahab; and it has been supposed that it remained subject to Solomon till his death, and was transferred to Israel after the formation of the Northern Kingdom. But the silence of our meagre and fragmentary authorities as to any prior revolt does not prove that Moab remained in subjection till the time of Ahab. The express mention of the revolt of Edom from Solomon is slightly against the supposition that a revolt of Moab at that time has been passed over. Further, the fact that Jeroboam's capital was at first E. of Jordan shows that Israel then was in strong force in the east, and makes it possible to suppose that Jeroboam succeeded in wresting the suzerainty of Moab from Rehoboam. On the whole, it is more likely that Moab recovered its independence at this time; or, if not then, soon after, at some point in the period, after Jeroboam, during which Israel was distracted by foreign and civil wars and frequent changes of dynasty. The disaster which almost blotted out Reuben as a tribe may have been suffered at the hands of Moab, at this or at an earlier date.

2 Ch 201-20 narrates a campaign of Moab, Ammon, and Edom against Jehoshaphat, in which the invaders massacre each other. The passage is probably a Midrashic adaptation of 2 K 3, and in its present form rests on no older authority than the Midrash of Kings used by the Chronicler.

The period of Omri-Ahab-Jehoram is specially important, because we can supplement the Bible account by the Moabite Stone, the text and translation of which are given above, in the section on Language. In the Moabite Stone (II. 1-8) Mesha tells us that, in the reign of his father, Chemoshmelek (?) of Dibon, Chemosh was angry with Moab, and Omri and his son oppressed Moab, subjected and occupied it forty years. This brings us to the point at which Kings first refers to Moab. 2 K 1³ states that Mesha king of Moab was rich in sheep, and paid to Israel a tribute (? annual) of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (AV), or their wool (RV): and that when Ahab died he rebelled account by the Moabite Stone, the text and translawool (RV); and that when Ahab died he rebelled against the king of Israel. According to Mesha (l. 8), the revolt took place in the middle of Ahab's (I. 8), the revolt took place in the middle of Anal's reign. Probably the war of Israel with Syria, which cost Ahab his life, afforded the opportunity for the revolt of Moab. It is not clear how we are to combine the inscription and 2 K 3. We may suppose (Cornill, p. 107; Wellh. Hist. etc. Eng. tr. p. 460) that Mesha's victories took place at the time of the revolt, before the events of 2 K 3; or that, at first, Moab simply asserted its independence and that Mesha's conquests were independence, and that Mesha's conquests were made after the retreat of Jehoram; or that the inscription is a comprehensive account of Mesha's achievements both before and after Jehoram's campaign, his reverses being ignored, just as Kings makes no mention of the loss of Israelite cities to Moab. In 2 K 3 we read that Jehoram, at the head of a general muster of Israel, and with Jehoshaphat of Judah and the king of Edom as allies, marched round the southern end of the Dead Sea, a route which suggests that Israel was very weak on the east of the Jordan; that the Moabites fell into an ambush, and were defeated; that the allies captured and destroyed the cities and laid waste the land, and at last shut up Mesha in Kir-hareseth. After an unsuccessful sortie, Mesha 'took his eldest son . . . and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great wrath against (RV), or upon (RVm), Israel; and they departed from thence and returned to their own land.' Possibly the Israelite account discripted as a defect as a voluntary withdrawel, but disguises a defeat as a voluntary withdrawal; but the prophets' accounts of the superstition of their fellow-countrymen show that they may have been afraid to press the siege after what they believed to be an irresistible appeal to Chemosh. But the retreat was a disastrous blow to the prestige of Israel. Probably the retiring army suffered heavy loss; and the Moabites would certainly be emboldened to make further additions to their territory at the expense of the eastern tribes. The relations of Edom and Moab in this narrative suggest the existence of bitter hostility, which must have led to other wars between the two neighbours. Nothing is said of Edom in the in-

The inscription suggests that the revolt arose (ll. 6, 7) through hostile measures of Ahab.* Mesha recovered the territory occupied by Omri, and fortified Ba'al-meon and Kiriathaim. He threatened the Codition the Report of the Proposition of the Pro threatened the Gadites—the Reubenites are never mentioned, and had apparently disappeared—in their long-occupied territory of Ataroth. In defence, the king of Israel fortified the city of Ataroth. But Mesha took Ataroth and Nebo, and massacred their inhabitants. The king of Israel fortified Jahaz, but it shared the fate of Ataroth. Mesha seems also to have conquered Horonaim. After his victories he fortified many cities, and provided them with a water supply, and executed other public works, largely, no doubt, by means of Israelite prisoners, as in l. 25. According to the cities mentioned in the inscrip-stretched along the whole eastern coast of the Dead Sea, from Kir in the south to Horonaim and Nebo in the north. The silence as to Heshbon may possibly be due to the loss of part of the Stone; but as Mesha's father reigned in Dibon on the Arnon, probably Mesha's conquests did not include

According to 2 Ch 24%, one of the assassins of Jossh of Judah had a Mosbite mother. The story of Elisha (2 K 1320) mentions Moabite raids in 2 K 1425 states that Jeroboum II recovered the border of Israel from the entering in of Hamath to the sea of the Arabah, i.e. the Dead Sea. Probably he recovered the suzerainty over Moab (so Cornill, p. 122, 'succeeded . . . in subduing all Moab'). 1 Ch 5¹⁻¹⁷ seems to imply a tradition of an effective Israelite occupation of territory between Jabbok and Arnon in the time of Jeroboam II. Am 2¹⁻⁸ may refer to Israelite conquests in Moab at this time, though it only refers expressly to the feud between Edom and Moab. Possibly the Israelite victories over Moab in Nu 24¹⁷ (Balaam's oracles) belong to this period, though they might refer to the wars of Omri or even David.

Another trace of the hostility of Moab to both Israel and Judah, in the period of the two kingdoms, is the unsympathetic attitude of both J and E to Moab; the most striking example being the account of the birth of Ammon and Moab.

In the period from Jeroboam II. to the Fall of Samaria, the catastrophes of Israel, especially the deportation of the eastern tribes by Tiglath-pileser, and, in a less degree, that of the inhabitants of the rest of the Northern Kingdom, left Moab free to aggrandize itself. All the evidence seems to show that, in the century and a half after the fall of Samaria, the prosperity of Moab reached its climax. Apparently its rulers were wise enough to observe the essential condition of continuous prosperity, and submitted to the suzerainty of Assyria; cf. COT ii. 49. Salmanu the Monbite occurs in the Nimrud Clay Inscription of Tiglathpileser as one of the tributaries of Assyria; and it is perhaps this Salmanu, and not the Assyrian Shalmaneser, who is to be identified with the Shalman who sacked Beth-arbel in Hos 10¹⁴ (so Sayce, HCM p. 482).

In a fragment, indeed, of Sargon II. (Kellner, Isaiah, p. 34), Moab is mentioned as allied with Assyria; but on the great Taylor Prism, which gives Sennacherib's account of his campaign against

Hezekiah and his allies, Kammusu-nadab (Chemosh-nadab) of Moab brings tribute to the Assyrian osh-hadao) of Moad brings tribute to the Asyrian king, and does homage to him. Mutsuri (probably 'the Egyptian') king of Moad is mentioned as attending the court of two successive kings of Assyria, Esar-haddon and Assurbanipal, in company with twenty-one other subject kings, including Manasseh of Judah (Sayce, HCM p. 450 ff.). In the last days of Jerusalem, Moab had transferred its allegiance to Bahvlon: Moabites fought for its allegiance to Babylon; Moabites fought for Nebuchadnezzar against Jehoiakim, 2 K 24². At the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, according to the original text of Jer 27², Moabite envoys came to Jerusalem to arrange a revolt against the Chaldmans; and later on Jewish refugees found an asylum in Moab, Jer 40¹¹; and Ezk 25⁸⁻¹¹ also implies that the prosperity of Moab continued after the fall of Jerusalem.

Much light is thrown on the condition of Moab in this period by the references to Moab in Am, Is, Mic, Zeph, Jer, and Ezk; although there is much difference of opinion as to the dates of the passages in question. For Am and Ezk, see above; it may be noted also that in Am the ruler of Moab is called בישי 'judge.' Mic 65 merely refers to the story of Balaam and Balak, probably in a different form from that in which we now have it. Zeph 28-10, which threatens Moab and Ammon because they have despised and harassed the Jews, is commonly regarded as exilic (cf. ZEPHANIAH).

The Is-Jer oracles on Moab present a very complicated question. Is 15 f. and Jer 48 are two independent editions of an older lament over some ruinous catastrophe which befell Moab. Cheyne ('Isaiah' in PB p. 168) thinks the enemy of Moab may have been either Nebuchadnezzar, Assurbanipal, or Jeroboam II. Cheyne, Duhm, Giesebrecht, etc., hold that the later editions of the lament were compiled and inserted in Is and Jer by late post-exilic writers; Duhm refers Jer 48 to the time of Alexander Jannæus and John Hyrcanus. But many critics (e.g. Cornill and Driver) regard Is 15 f. as the work of Isaiah, and Jer 48 as that of Jeremiah—substantially. In the lament the territory of Moab has reached its maximum, and extends from Jazer, Sibmah, and Heshbon to the southern end of the Dead Sea. Thus the poem is probably later than Mesha, and does not refer to the conquest of Moab by Omri, or the campaign of Jehoram; the Stone does not mention Heshbon. Hence the disaster to Moab mention Heshoon. Hence the disaster to Moab was probably an invasion by Jeroboam II., a view possibly confirmed by Is 16^{1.5}, which is often interpreted as meaning that the king of Judah was ruling over Edom; while 2 K 14^{7.12} suggest that, some time before, Amaziah of Judah had recovered the suzerainty of Edom. The lament shows that, since Mesha, Moab had made steady progress, and advanced its border beyond Heshbon; that it possessed numerous 'cities' is walled that it possessed numerous 'cities,' i.e. walled towns, and doubtless many villages; that it was fertile, well-cultivated, and, probably, densely populated; and that it had reached a comparatively high level of civilization, not very different that of Indeb Incoher was good the from that of Judah. Jeroboam ravaged the country in the same fashion as Jehoram; and perhaps some districts and cities were occupied by Israelites, but Moab as a whole probably remained autonomous under a native ruler appointed by Jeroboam. If Nu 21²¹⁻³⁰ refers to this invasion (see above), the king of Moab at this time may have been named Sihon. The author of the lament shows marked sympathy for Moab; Israel was generally hostile to the Southern Kingdom after the extinction of the house of Omri, and Moab and Judah were drawn together by a common enmity to Samaria. A token of their mutual good feeling was Solomon's temple to Chemosh, which was not interfered with till the time of Josiah. However severely Moab suffered at the hands of Jeroboam II., it recovered speedily, and became more prosperous than ever, so that Isaiah (?) and Jeremiah () do not hesitate to adapt and expand the pictures of the pride and prosperity of Moab, and the lists of its numerous cities, in their descriptions of the doom that threatened Moab at the hands, first of the Assyrians and then of the Chaldmans. The attitude of Is 15 f. is still sympathetic; but Jer expresses the bitter resentment inspired by the alliance of Moab with the besiegers of Jerusalem in 4810 'Cursed be he that doeth the work of J" negligently, and cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood.' Jer also (4811) testifies to the continued prosperity of Moab and its consequent corruption: 'Moab hath been undisturbed from his youth; he hath settled on his lees; he hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel; he hath not gone into captivity; therefore his taste remaineth in him, his scent is not changed.' Jeremiah, or an editor, has incorporated Nu 21224 as vv.421...+ Cf. Jer 926 2521 272; ISAIAH, BOOK OF; JEREMIAH, BOOK OF.

In Is and Jer we see Moab, at the height of its prosperity, suddenly seized in the grip of an over-whelming calamity: here the curtain falls upon its history. The land is still for some time called Moab, and the name lingered on even into the Christian era; the term Moabite is occasionally applied to cities or people of the district, and doubtless survivors of the old race were still to be found in survivors of the old race were still to be found in the land; but there seems no evidence of the existence of Moab as a state, even a dependent state, after the Exile, and we know that at the time of the Maccabean revolt Moab was occupied by the Nabatean Arabs (1 Mac 9²⁸⁻⁴²; Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 3, 5, xvi. 4, XIV. i. 4). A comparison of the last two passages shows that Josephus uses 'Moabites' for the Nabatean Arabs, which explains the statement in Ant. I. xi. 5, that the Moabites were still a very great people in his time. 1 Mac never names the Moabites, even in such passages as 5¹⁻⁸ (cf. Bevan, Dan. p. 199; Baethgen, Ps. p. 260). The comparative silence of post-exilic literature as to Moab suggests an early date for its disappearance; even in Neh 47 the Arabians have taken the place of Moab as the allies of Ammon. Possibly Moab, in its pride, unduly tasked the patience of Nebuchadnezzar and was overthrown, and the bulk of its popula-tion deported; then the Arabs may have occupied Moab and absorbed the remnant of the people; or the Nabatæans may have conquered Moab (cf. ARETAS). Then Is 15 f., Jer 48, if late editions of an earlier lament, may have been inspired by the report of this great catastrophe; Ezk 25⁵⁻¹¹ states that Moab shall be conquered by the children of the East, i.e. Arabs.

The post-exilic references to Moab are as follows: In the apocalyptic Is 24-27, variously dated from the time of the Exile to that of Alexander the Great, Moab is the one Gentile people mentioned by name (25¹⁰) as doomed. Unless the section is contemporary with Jer 48,‡ 'Moab,' like 'Edom' and 'Babylon,' in later times is used as a type of the enemies of God (Cheyne, 'Isaiah' in PB p. 204). Ezr 91, Neh 131 are mere references to ancient literature. Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 210 etc.) may have belonged to Beth-horon; even if he belonged to Horonaim, he may have been one of

* If Bozrah is Bosrah ssh-Sham in the Hauran, the territory of Moab had extended far to the N.E.; but cf. Bozrah.
† Unless Jer 463 'In Heshbon they have devised evil against her,' i.e. Moab, is a deliberate modification of the ancient poem, connected with the insertion of Nu 21282; it seems better to read with Giesebrecht, 'Against Heshbon they have devised its Arabian conquerors; and if a Moabite, merely an individual who survived the ruin of the state. In Dn 11⁴ Moab may be merely the country, or else combined with Edom and Ammon through the influence of older literature. Similar considerations may explain the occurrence of Moab in the late psalms (60° 83° 108°), unless the lists of peoples in these psalms are fragments from older poems. The references to Moabites in Jth are entirely unhistorical, and due to a use of older literature.

MOCK, MOCKINGSTOCK.—The verb to mock is both trans. and intrans. Used transitively it has two distinct meanings: (1) To ridicule, as 1 K 18²⁷ 'Elijah mocked them, and said, Cry aloud'; Job 12⁴ 'I am as one mocked of his neighbour' (RV 'one that is a laughing-stock to his neighbour'). (2) To deceive, beguile, Jg 16¹⁰ 'And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies,' Job 13⁹ 'As one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?' (RV 'as one deceiveth a man, will ve deceive him?'). So Shaba ceiveth a man, will ye deceive him?'). So Shaks. Rich. III. IV. iv. 87—

'A mother only mocked with two sweet babes'; and Macbeth, I. vii. 81-

The only meaning of the intrans. verb is to ridicule, as Job 21s' Suffer me that I may speak; and after that I have spoken, mock on' (from Gen. Bible; Cov. 'laugh my wordes to scorne'); Pr 1ss' I will mock when your fear cometh'; Ac 17ss' And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked.' The phrase to 'mock at' occurs in Pr 3017, La 17. Tindale has 'mock out,' Expositions 39, 'their sophistical glosses, feigned to mock out the law of God, and to beguile the whole world'; and 'mock with,' Works, i. 205, 'So shamefully doth the covetousness and ambition of our prelates mock with the law of God.'

Mock was once common as a subst.: thus in Matt. Bible, marg. note to Gn 3²² 'Here thys worde lo is taken as a mocke as it is in 1 K 18'; Joy, Apologye to Tindale, 14, 'This saith Tindale yroniously in a mok as though it were false that oure soulis as sone as we be dead shulde go to heven'; Shaks. Henry V. I. ii. 285—

'For many a thousand widows Shall this his mock mock out of their dear husbands;
Mock mothers from their sons, mock castles down;
And some are yet ungotten and unborn
That shall have cause to curse the Dauphin's scorn.'

The only example in AV is Pr 149 'Fools make a mock at sin.' Cf. He 66 Tind. 'For as moche as they have (as concerninge them selves) crucified the soune of God a fresshe, makynge a mocke of him.'

The subst. 'mocking' (=mod. 'mockery,' which also occurs) is found in Ezk 224 'Therefore have I made thee a reproach unto the heathen, and a mocking to all countries,' and He 1126 'And others had trials of cruel mockings and scourgings.' Shaks. Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 59-

We are wise girls to mock our lovers so. They are worse fools to purchase mocking so.*

Mockingstock is used in 2 Mac 7' 'to make him mocking stock is used in 2 Mac 7. to make him a mocking stock '(ἐπὶ τὸν ἐμπαιγμόν, RV 'to the mocking'), and 710 'After him was the third made a mocking stock' (ἐνεπαίζετο). So Raleigh, Hist. World, V. v. 7, 'Philip . . . was taken by the consul; made a mocking stock; and sent away prisoner to Rome.'

MODERATION.—For moderation in eating and drinking, see TEMPERANCE. The word itself occurs drinking, see TEMPERANCE. The word itself occurs but once in AV, Ph 45 'Let your moderation be known unto all men.' The Greek is τὸ ἐπιεικές νμῶν. This adj. ἐπιεικές occurs also in 1 Ti 35, Tit 32, Ja 317, 1 P 218; in the first passage AV gives 'patient,' RV 'gentle,' in the others both versions give 'gentle.' The neut. form (τὸ ἐπιεικές) does not occur again, but it is common in class. writers as equivalent to ἐπιεικέα. This subst. itself [WH ἐπιεικία] is found in Ac 244 (AV and RV 'clemency'), and in 2 Co 101 (AV and RV 'gentleness'). Both adj. and subst. occur in Apocr., chiefly of the 'gentleness' is not the exact idea. Both τὸ

But 'gentleness' is not the exact idea. Both 70 executes and excellene expressed in class. Greek the Eth. v. 4 Aristotle points out that justice is one thing, equity (irrelacea) another, and in i. 13, 17 f. he gives a full description of irrelacea as that which looks to the spirit and not the letter, the intention and not the act, the whole and not the part, etc. This is in exact agreement with what is undoubt-'becoming,' and the idea in Ph 4' may be expressed in Matthew Arnold's phrase 'sweet reasonableness,' or in a single word 'considerateness.'

In the trans. of the word two mistakes have been made. On the one hand, there was a time when the word degenerated into the expression of respectable behaviour, and respectable behaviour is always the pursuit of a middle course, in mediis tutissimus. Hence Thuc. (i. 76) makes τὸ ἐπιεικές equivalent to τὸ μετριάζειν 'moderation.' This idea was seized by the AV translators at Ph 45 (they seem to be alone in thus translating the word), and a modern translation (Ferrar Fenton, The NT in Current English) has 'good conduct.' Cf. Lightfoot on Ph 45.

On the other hand, there has been an influence on the word (perhaps on the Gr. word itself, certainly on its trans.) of $\epsilon l \kappa \omega$ to yield. Thus Moule, though he says (Camb. Bible, in loc.) that the connexion with $\tau \delta$ $\epsilon l \kappa \delta s$ 'the equitable' is more the connexion with $\tau \delta$ elects the equitable is more probable, allows $\epsilon t \kappa \omega$ a place, and in his Philippian Studies, p. 228, he translates by 'yieldingness,' explaining it to mean 'selflessness, the spirit which will yield in anything that is only of self, for Christ's sake.' This trans. is represented in Tindale's 'softenes' (followed by Cov., Cran., and Matt.), as well as by RVm 'gentleness'; Luther's Lindigkeit (followed by Weizsäcker) leans too much in this direction, and even the RV 'forbearance,' which is the favourite rendering since Light-foot adopted it. 'Gentleness' and 'forbearance' are too passive. The 'considerateness' of the are too passive. Bible, whether applied to God or man, is an active virtue. It is the spirit of the Messiah Himself, who will not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax, and it is the spirit of every follower who realizes that 'the Lord is at hand.' J. HASTINGS.

*Perhaps this is also the idea contained in Vulg. modestia, if that word is used in its earliest classical sense of 'sobriety,' moderation.' But the Rhemish 'modesty' is a mistranslation (no more than a transliteration, perhaps), for 'modesty' was never used in English in this sense. Sir Thomas Elyot uses it so in The Governour, i. 207, but he explains that he is adopting the classical sense of the word: 'In every of these thinges and their semblable is Modestie; whiche worde not beinge knowen in the englishe tonge, ne of al them which understode latin, except they had radde good autours, they improperly named this vertue discretion.' Wyclif did not adopt 'modesty,' but used 'temperaunce or pacience' (var. lact. 'tholmoundness').

The blow he struck initiated that struggle for freedom which, under the leadership of his heroic sons, forms such a brilliant chapter in the closing history of his people (1 Mac $2^{1 \cdot 18 \cdot 23}$; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1, 2; BJ I. i. 3). When Mattathias died he was buried in Modin (1 Mac 2^{70}), and here also each of his sons, with their mother, was finally laid to rest (1 Mac 9¹⁹ 13²⁵⁻³⁰; Jos. Ant. XII. xi. 2, XIII. vi. 6, etc.). Judas encamped by Modin the evening before his successful night-raid on the army of Antiochus Eupator (2 Mac 1314); and here John and Judas, the sons of Simon, rested overnight before going forth to the defeat of Cendebæus (1 Mac 164).

Simon, the last of the five brethren, built at Modin a splendid sepulchral monument, to per-methate the memory of his heroic family. 'It was petuate the memory of his heroic family. a square structure, surrounded by colonnades of monolith pillars, of which the front and back were of white polished stone. Seven pyramids were erected by Simon on the summit for the father and mother and the four brothers who now lay there, with the seventh for himself when his time should On the faces of the monument were bascome. reliefs, representing the accourrements of sword and spear and shield, "for an eternal memorial" of their many battles. There were also the sculptures of "ships"—no doubt to record their interest in that long seaboard of the Philistine coast, which they were the first to use for their country's good. A monument at once so Jewish in idea, so Gentile in execution, was worthy of the combination of patriotic fervour and philosophic enlarge-ment of soul which raised the Maccabæan heroes so high above their age' (Stanley, Hist. of Jewish Ch. iii. 318).

This famous structure continued in a state permitting recognition down to the 4th cent. of the Christian era (Williams, Holy City, i. 96), and so long there could be no question as to the site of Modin. Then all trace of the tomb seems to have been lost, and for many centuries the situation of the town was unknown. At different times the home of the Maccabees has been sought at Latrûn, at Soba, and even away to the S. of Anathoth. It is unnecessary to discuss the arguments in favour of these proposed identifications. The ancient Modin is certainly represented by the modern el-Medych, a village standing on the E. of Wady Mulaki. about 13 miles W. of Bethel, on one of the lower ridges by which the mountain range lets itself down towards Lydda. Struck by the resemblance between the ancient and modern names, and also by the name Kabar el-Yehúd, 'Tombs of the Jews,' given to a remarkable series of tombs near by, the late Dr. Sandreczki, of Jerusalem, called attention to the place in 1869; and subsequent investigation has gone to confirm his suggestion. The identification has been opposed by le Camus (Rev. Biblique, i. 109 ff.) on insufficient grounds (cf. Buhl, GAP 198).

Modin was near the plain (1 Mac 164.5); the monument built by Simon was clearly visible from the sea (1 Mac 13²⁰); and we learn from Euseb. and Jerome, that Diospolis (Lydda) was not far distant. El-Medyeh itself is hidden from the sea by the slope of the hill; but immediately to the south a rocky eminence, er-Ras, with ancient remains, commands a view of the lower hills, the plain of Sharon, and the sea, while Lydda is seen at a distance of not over 6 miles, reposing among her fruitful olives. On the opposite side of the Wady, about half a mile west of the village, there Sheikh el-Gharbdwi, claiming special interest on account of its size and construction. At one time it was thought this might prove to be the tomb of the Maccabees; but later investigation revealed its Christian origin. To these tombs Conder gives the name Kabur el-Yehud. Of the ruins 1 mile to the south, called by Sandreczki Kabur el-Yehud, he speaks as Khirbet el-Medyeh. Guérin says an old inhabitant of the village gave the name Khirbet

MOLADAH (מִילְיִה).—A city in the south of Judah, Jos 15^{26} (B Μωλαδά, A Μωδαδά); reckoned to Simeon in 19^2 (B Κωλαδάμ, A Μωλαδά) and 1 Ch 4^{26} Since in 19 (Β Κωλασαμ, Α Μωλασα) and 1 Cit 4. (Β Μωαλδά, Α Μωλασά); peopled after the Captivity by Judahites, Neh 112 (ΒΑ οπ., κοι με Μωλασά). In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomast. s.v. 'Arad') a place called Malatha is located 4 Roman miles from Arad (cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 2). This site is clearly the present Tell el-Milh, 'hill of salt,' and is thete of concept town, but the modern name has is that of an early town, but the modern name has no connexion with the Heb. Moladah, the site of which is unknown (cf. Buhl, GAP 183, who rightly points out that instead of 4 Roman miles from Arad, as Eusebius states, Tell el-Müh and Arad are double that distance apart) in spite of the identification with Tell el-Milh which is adopted by Robinson (BRP² ii. 201), Guérin (Judée, iii. 184 ff.), and others. MOLE.—Two words are trd in AV 'mole.'

1. npwip tinshemeth. This occurs twice in the list 1. het is the list of unclean creatures: (a) As the name of a bird (Lv 11¹⁸ LXX πορφυρίων, AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl,' m. 'swan'; Dt 14¹⁶ LXX 1βις, AV 'swan,' RV 'horned owl.' See SWAN, OWL). (b) As the name of a 'creeping thing' at the end of a list of lizards (Lv 11²⁶ LXX ἀσπάλαξ, Vulg. talpa, AV 'mole,' RV 'chameleon'). The authority of the LXX and Vulg. favours the rendering 'mole.' No 'mole,' RV 'chameleon'). The authority LXX and Vulg. favours the rendering 'mole.' No Palestine. The word dowdlas probably refers to the mole-rat Spalax typhlus, Pall., a rodent, the appearance and habits of which closely resemble those of the genuine mole. It is about the size and shape of a common brown rat, but with much shorter legs. The forelegs are adapted for digging. The head is flattened from above downwards, with a wedge-shaped snout, which acts as a shovel in perforating the soil, and raising the hillocks which occur every few feet along the burrow. The fur is greyish-brown. The eyes are hardly to be made out at all, being quite rudimentary. The animal is nocturnal in its habits, and seldom seen above the surface. It is called by the Arabs khuld, plainly the cognate of hôled, which EV tr. 'weasel.' See CHAMELEON, WEASEL; and Dillmann on Lv 1130

2. when the half haphor peroth (to be read happen hapharpāroth, see Dillm. ad loc.), τὰ μάταια, talpæ. This expression is tr⁴ in EV (Is 2³⁰) 'moles.' The LXX τὰ μάταια=' the vain things,' sheds no light on the meaning. But the root haphar= Arab. hafar, 'to dig or burrow,' and pāroth recalls Arab. fâr, generic for 'rats' and 'mice.' The compound name may be that of some digging or burrowing animal. There is a large number of such creatures in the Holy Land, of which we of such creatures in the Holy Land, of which we note: fam. Muridæ, the rats and mice, including numerous species of Acomys, the Porcupine mouse; Mus, the true rats and mice, of which there are a considerable number; Cricetus, the hamster; Gerbillus and Psammomys, the sand rats; Spalacida, the mole rats; Dipopida, the jerboas; Myrcida, the dormice, etc. It is most probable that cida, the dormice, etc. It is most probable that the Heb. hapharpāroth is generic for all such animals as burrow in waste places, as 'bats,' in the same passage, is generic for the well-known winged tribe of dwellers in caves and ruins.

G. E. Post. MOLECH, MOLOCH (1/20 ham-Molech, always with the article except in 1 K 117, Μολόχ, Vulg. Moloch).-The Heb. pointing does not represent the Moloch.—The Heb. pointing does not represent the original pronunciation, but is intended to suggest bösheth, 'shame'; just as -baal in Ishbaal and Meribaal was changed to -bosheth in Ishbasheth and Mephibosheth. Originally the word was simply ham-Melech, 'the king.' We find also the forms Milcom (10½), Malcam (10½), 'λμελχόμ, μελχόμ, μολχόμ, μελχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μολχόμ, μελχόμ, μολχόμ, alcan; see below.

i. Table of the occurrences of Melech, etc., as divine names.—(a) Cases in which MT uses the pointing Molech to show that it regards Melech as the name of a false god. Lv 18. 202. 3. 4. 5 Δρχων; 1 K 117 Α μελχό, Β βασιλεύς, Luc. μελχόμ; 2 K 2310, Luc. μελχόμ; Jer 32. 5 τῶ Μολόχ βασιλεί.

(b) Cases in which Melech is pointed as a common noun 'king' by MT, but is regarded as a divine name by other authorities. Is 30. EV 'the king,' with LXX and Vulg.; Is 57. EV 'the king,' with Vulg.; LXX has entirely different reading. In both, Cheyne, Duhm, Siegfried-Stade (Lex.) have Melech. In Am 712 EV 'the king's sanctuary,' so LXX and Vulg., it has been suggested that 'king' should be Melech, but this is improbable. improbable.

(c) Cases where MT points MLKM as the divine name, Milcom: 1 K 115.33, τῷ βασιλεῖ αὐτῶν; 2 K 2313 A ἀμελχόμ, Β μολχόλ.
(d) Cases where MT points MLKM as Malcam, their king'; but other authorities regard it as their king'; but other authorities regard it as the divine name, Milcom: 2 S 12³⁰ (=1 Ch 20²) AV, RV 'their king,' so Vulg.; RVm Malcam, i.e. Milcom, so LXX; 1 Ch 20² AV, RV 'their king,' RVm Malcam, so LXX and Vulg.; Jer 49¹⁻³ (cf. Am 1¹⁶) AV, RVm 'their king,' so Targ.; AVm Melcom, RV Malcam, so LXX μελχόλ, and Vulg.; Am 1¹⁵ (cf. Jer 49¹⁻³) EV 'their king' with LXX; but Aq., Symm., Vulg., and Syr. Melchom, etc.;

Am 526 RV 'your king,' so Symm. and Theod.; AV 'your Moloch,' with LXX τοῦ Μολόχ; Aq. and Syr. Malchom; cf. Siccuth; Zeph 13 AV, RV Malc(h)am, so LXX MSS ap. Field, μολόχ, μελχόμ, Vulg. RVm 'their king,' LXX B, etc.

(e) Malcan, in 2 S 1221, the reading of the Kethibh, 1222 MLKN, was probably intended to mean 'he passed them through the fire to Mclech'; but the reading 1222 malbēn, 'brick-kiln,' of the Kerê, i.e. as RVm 'made them labour at the brick-kiln,' is probably correct; so Budde, H. P. Smith, LXX πλινθεῖον, Vulg. typo laterum.

ii. Relation of the forms Melech, Milcom, ctc., to one another.—Baethgen (Beiträge, p. 15) maintains that though Milcom was originally only a dialectic variety of Molech, yet Molech and Milcom were re-variety of Molech, yet Molech and Milcom were regarded as two distinct deities, and supports his contention by the statement in 2 K 23^{10, 13} that, at Topheth in the valley of the Benê Hinnom, children were passed through the fire to Molech, while, opposite Jerusalem 'on the right hand of the mount of corruption,' the Mount of Olives, there was a high-place for Milcom. The argument implies that vv. 10-13 belong to the same source: thus Kamphausen (Kautzsch's AT) refers both to the Deuteronomic author of the pre-exilic Book of Kings. Benzinger (Könige), however, refers them to different sources, and regards Melech (MT Molech) in 10 as a title of J" (cf. below). Melech and Milcom were originally variants of the name of the same deity, they are both applied to the god of Ammon; cf. 1 K 117 (Melech here may be a mistake), 2 K 2318; but at different sanctuaries and among different peoples, one or other name may have been specially used, with the natural result that the Melech of one sanctuary or one people would be popularly distinguished from the Milcom of another. Malc(h)am and Malc(h)an (if read) are only mistaken pointings of Milcom. The deity as worshipped by different peoples would be differentiated through various causes; the sense of the special bond between the national god and the nation would encourage the view that this national god was not the same as any deity worshipped elsewhere; this view would be supported by dialectic differences between the forms of the name, e.g. the Phænician Milk and the Ammonite Milcom, and by such expansions of the name as the Phoenician Melkart (=מלך פרת Milk of the City) and the Palmyrene Malachbel; cf. below.

The references to Milcom (1 K 11⁵, 2⁵, 2 K 23¹³ cf. Am 1¹⁵ above) and Molech (1 K 11⁷) as the 'abomination' or 'god' of the Ammonites, show that Milcom or Molech was the national god of Ammon, and stood to Ammon in the same special henotheistic relation in which Chemosh stood to Moab, and J" to Israel. The analogy suggests that in practice such a relation by no means excluded the worship of other gods. But the El in the name Pudu-ilu, king of Ammon, on Sennacherib's 'Taylor Prism' inscription, is merely a general term for 'god,' equivalent to Mileom; and the same may be true of the baal in Baalis, king of Ammon, Jer 40¹⁴. Baetigen, indeed (Beitringe, p. 16), suggests that Baalis is a compound of Baal and Isis, either as a double name asserting the identity of the two, or with the meaning 'Spouse of Isis,' Isisgemahl. But Grätz explains Baalis as of Isis, Isisgemahl. But Grätz explains מריקלים of Isis, Isisgemahl. But Grätz explains מריקלים ישר of Isis, Isisgemahl. But Grätz explains מריקלים ישר of delight' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The reading בעלים Baalim, of some MSS, and of Jos. (Ant. x. ix. 2), is clearly a mistake. No details of the worship of Milcom are given; Jer 49° 'his priests and his princes' implies that the priest-bood was numerous and important. In 2 S 12° misching a falent the reference to Milcom's crown weighing a talent implies the existence at Rabbah of a great statue of Milcom from which the crown was taken. Perhaps the 'Chemarim' or priests of Zeph 14 were priests of Molech (cf. CHEMARIM). None of the passages which speak of child-sacrifice connect it either with Milcom or the Ammonites, and we do not know how far the Ammonite worship of Milcom resembled the Phoenician worship of Melech.

iii. The worship of Moloch (Melech) in Israel and the relation of Moloch to J" raise difficult questions: the following facts are clear:—

(a) There was a high-place for Milcom, the god of Ammon, on the Mount of Olives, 1 K 11^{8, 25}, 2 K 23¹³, the erection of which was ascribed to Solomon; 11^{2, 25} are regarded as Deuteronomic, but may embody an authentic tradition.

(b) 'Passing children through the fire to hamMelech' is forbidden in Lv 18²¹ 20^{2. 2. 2. 5}, Dt 18¹⁰
(Melech not named). 2 K 16² states that Ahaz
'made his son to pass through the fire,' so 21⁶ of

The Deuteronomic author of 2 K 1717 states that the Leuveronomic author of 2 K 17¹⁷ states that the Israelites of the Northern Kingdom passed their children through the fire. From 2 K 23¹⁰, Jer 7²⁰⁻²² 19¹⁻¹³ we learn that such sacrifices were offered at Topheth (wh. see), in the valley of Ben Hinnom, outside Jerusalem; cf. Ps 106^{27, 28}, Ezk 16^{20, 21} 23²⁷⁻²⁰.

(c) From Jer 195, where the children sacrificed at Topheth are said to be offered to Baal, it appears that the deity thus worshipped was known both as Baal and Melech.

(d) In Is 65 J" Zebaoth is described as ham-Melech, (d) In Is 6° J" Zebaoth is described as ham-Melech, 'the king,' and is frequently spoken of as the 'king of Israel,' Is 44°, cf. Jer 81° 'her king,' Mic 21° 'their king.' Further, the occurrence of such names as Malchiram 1 Ch 31°, Malchishua 1 S 14°, Ebed-melech Jer 39¹6, Nathan-melech 2 K 23¹¹, Regem-melech Zec 7², point to the use of Melech as a divine name. Ebed-melech, however, was an Ethiopian. Nathan-melech, a cunuch, and there-Ethiopian; Nathan-melech, a eunuch, and therefore probably a foreigner; and Regem-melech was a Babylonian Jew.

These facts are variously explained. (1) Melech and Milcom are regarded as absolutely identical, and the child-sacrifices to Melech as part of the worship of Milcom borrowed from the Ammonites. But Melech is probably to be distinguished from Milcom, cf. above; and in 2 K 16³ the practice of child-sacrifice is not said to have been borrowed from the Ammonites, but from the Canaanites, cf. Dt 12⁵¹.

2) The worship of Melech by child-sacrifice was borrowed from the Canaanites, and was distinct from the worship of Milcom. This would be supported by 2 K 16³ and by the identification of Baal and Melech in Jer 19³. Probably the Tyrian Baal, whose worship Jezebel introduced into the Northern Kingdom, was Melech or Melkarth.

(3) Whichever of the two previous views be accepted, the Melech in question was quite distinct from J". The use of Melech as a title or even name of J" no more identified Him with the Phenician Melech, than the use of the title or name Baal identified J" with the Tyrian Baal. As Schultz says (OT Theol., Eng. tr. i. 233 n.), 'In the oldest sources of the Semitic religion, the god who became J" for the Israelites may not have been different from the one who became Moloch for the Caracterists. the Canaanites. But, since the time when Israel and the Hamites separated, there was at any rate no kinship between J" and Moloch, not to speak of

(4) The Melech to whom child-sacrifices were offered was simply J" under another name (Benzinger on 2 K 23¹⁰; Smend, AT Theol. 271). When J" says, Jer 19⁵, of the child-sacrifices to Baal, 'which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind,' the statement seems to imply that those who offered these sacrifices the night that they were obeying a command of I" thought that they were obeying a command of J", cf. Ezk 23³⁷⁻³⁹. Similarly, the account of the proposed sacrifice of Isaac points to the existence of a practice of offering firstborn sons to J", which a practice of one-ring instroom sons to J, which practice was forbidden by the prophetic revelation; cf. Ex 22.28 E, and Jephthah's vow, Jg 11.21. This view might imply either that J' and Melech were originally one, and afterwards differentiated by prophetic teaching; or that two distinct deities, J' and Melech, were popularly identified. It can scarcely be that Melech was used as a mere title of J" in connexion with child-sacrifice, without any reference to the Phœnician Melech.

iv. Range of Worship.—Melech is found as a divine name, not only in Amon and Israel, but in all Semitic peoples of whose religion we have any considerable knowledge. The Assyrians and Babylonians had a god Malik; the Sepharvites had Adram-melech and Anam-melech, 2 K 17²¹. The Phenicians worshipped Melkarth = Melech Kiriath, king of the city, at Tyre, Carthage, etc. The Palmyrenes worshipped Malach-bel (Baudissin, Studien, p. 193 ff.).

It is generally stated that the Moabite Chemosh was a form of Melech (Baethgen, Beiträge, p. 238; was a form of Metech (Baetingen, Bearings, p. 2385; Movers, Phön. p. 333 f.). This seems probable on general grounds, on account of the wide extent of the worship of Melech amongst the Semites, and the connexion of Baal and possibly J" with Melech; and the intimate racial and political relation of Moab and Ammon. But the express testimony is hardly conclusive. In Jg 11²⁴ Chemosh is spoken of as the god of the Ammonites, in a passage often ascribed (Budde, Moore) to R^{JE}, who should have been well informed on the subject. But the whole passage hopelessly confuses Ammon and Moab; the reference to Chemosh may be a slip; or the passage may originally have referred to Moab and have been very imperfectly adapted to its present context; or it may be late post-exilic. Melech in l. 23 of the Moabite Stone is treated as a divine name, 'Moloch,' by Neubauer and Sayee (HCM 367, 373), but is more probably to be translated 'king' with Smend and Socin.

On Sennacherib's 'Taylor Prism' an Edomite king Malik serems is mattioned in which Malik

was worshipped in Edom.

This widespread worship of Meleck is regarded as an inheritance of the separated Semitic peoples from the primitive stock; but it can scarcely be assumed that his attributes and worship were the same amongst all the different races. Indeed, as in the case of the Ammonite Milcom and the Phœnician Molech or Melkarth, different peoples considered that they were worshipping different gods. Amongst the Greeks and Romans 'king' is not a division paymy (Recther) or 'the king' is not a divine name (Baethgen, Beiträge, p. 263), though an occasional title of various gods.

v. Attributes.—Melech, like Baal, Adon, Marna, implies the recognition of the sovereignty of the mpnes the recognition of the sovereignty of the god over his people. The offerings by fire, the identity with Baal, and the fact that in Assyria and Babylonia Malik, and at Palmyra Malach-bel, were sun-gods, suggest that Melech was a fire- or sun-god (Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia, p. 176 f.). Melkarth at Tyre was identified with Hercules, at Carthage with Saturn. Such names as Milk-baal, Milk-Astart, Milk-Osir, suggest identification baal, Milk-Astart, Milk-Osir, suggest identification with Baal (as shown otherwise), Astarte, Osiris. As in the case of Baal and other Semitic deities, Melech had a feminine counterpart Milkat, cf. Milcah, Gn 112.

vi. Worship.—Melech was doubtless worshipped in a similar fashion to other Semitic gods. feature which seems peculiar is the practice of sacrificing children as burnt-offerings, which is found amongst the Israelites, Phœnicians, and Sepharvites, 2 K 17³¹; cf. Mesha's offering of his first lorn to Chemosh.

The theory of some Rabbis, that 'passing through the fire' meant merely a ceremonial purification by walking between two fires, is contrary to all the evidence. But the case of Isaac (Gn 2210) seems to show that in Israel the child was slain before the fire was kindled. Diodorus Siculus (xx. 14) describes child-sacrifices at Carthage, at which the victim was placed on the hands of a colossal image, from which it rolled off into a pit of fire. Kinichi's description (on 2 K 23¹⁰) of the hollow brazen image of Molech within a sevenfold temple outside Jerusalem, and of the placing of the victim in the hands of Molech, is a mere mediæval conjecture based on Diodorus or on some other record of the Carthaginian sacrifices.

The object of these offerings was probably to propitiate the deity, or show devotion to him, by the gift of the most precious possession. Movers (Phon. 328-330), however, holds that the children offered were supposed to be purified from all fleshly corruption and to attain union with the deity.

In the NT, Molech is mentioned only in St. Stephen's quotation, Ac 7⁴³; cf. Am 5³⁶.

MOLID (τ')το).—The name of a Judahite family, $1 \text{ Ch } 2^{20} \text{ (B Mωήλ, A Mωδάδ)}$. Kittel (in SBOT) points out that the reading of B, namely MΩΗΛ, has originated from MΩΗΔ (Λ and Δ being often confused), and that Mωήδ, i.e. $τ_{2}$ το, the two letters r and r being similar in the oldest excitate.

*MOLLIFY (from mollis 'soft') is used literally 'to soften,' in Is 16' mollified with ointment,' and Wis 16¹² 'mollifying plaister' (μάλαγμα). Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 213, 'When they have killed a great beast, they cut out all the veines and sinewes . . . and likewise all the Suet: which done, they dive them in water to mollifie them.' The figurative use seems to be quite as old, and was common about 1611, though not found in AV. Thus Tymme, Calvin upon Genesis, p. 605 (on ch. 28), 'It may be, that he was thus sent away, that the cruell mind of Esau, by so miserable a sight might be mollified and aswaged' (Lat. ad molliticm flecteretur). So Tindale, Prol. to 1 Jn, 'The lusts of the flesh are subdued and killed, and the spirit mollified and made soft.' Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 93, 'O! hard ar the hartis whome so manyfold, most sueit, and sure promissis doith not molefie.' And in the Preface to Rhem. § 1. Money in Palestine before the Conquest. The principal weight standards of antiquity.—
The oldest traditions of the Hebrews, as these have come down to us, do not reach back to the time when trade was still carried on by the primitive system of barter. Already in the patriarchal age the existence of a metallic currency is assumed (cf. Gn 1718 'he that is bought with thy money, 7377, lit. 'thy silver,' and 23135 cited below); and rightly so, for, as we now know, the land of Canaan was even at this early period far advanced in the arts of civilization, including the use of the precious metals as media of exchange. For the century immediately preceding the Hebrew conquest we have the contemporary evidence of the Tel el-Amarna letters, which show not only that gold and silver were in daily use as money, that is, as media in terms of which all other merchandise was valued, but also that already the 'narrowing lust of gold' had asserted its empire over men (see Hugo Winckler's or other rendering, passim). The value, in other words, the purchasing power of these metals, was determined by their weight—a fact which renders some acquaintance with the metrology of the ancients an indispensable preliminary to the study of their money. Fortunately, the question of the origin and interrelation of the weight-standards of antiquity-one of the most complicated in the whole range of Oriental archæology — will be discussed in the article WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. It will suffice, therefore, in this place to sketch in the barest outline the results of the most recent metrological research, taking as our guide the elaborate treatise of the veteran metrologist, Friedrich Hultsch, Die Gewichte des Alterthums nach ihrem Zusammenhange dargestellt (Leipzig, 1898; cf. C. F. Lehmann, Sitzungsberichte der archäolog. Gesellschaft zu Berlin, 1888, and esp. the same scholar's Das altbabylonische Maas- und Gewichtssystem, Leyden, 1893; also G. F. Hill, A Handbook of Greek and Roman Coins, 1899, p. 26 ff.).

Proceeding from the simpler to the more complex, we begin with the weight-system of Egypt, a system characterized by extreme simplicity. Two weights only were in use from very early times—the ket (also transliterated kat, kite, qedt, etc.), of 140 grains, and its multiple the deben (also transliterated uten, tabnu, etc.), equal to ten ket, or a little over 1400 grains (Hultsch, 1403 5 grs.). The Rhind mathematical papyrus, which dates from the Hyksos period, contains, according to an excellent authority, the earliest reference in Egyptian literature to the metals as standards of value. 'It is not known,' says Mr. Griffith in his important essay, 'Notes on Egyptian Weights and Measures,' in PSBA xiv. p. 436 ff., 'how far back into antiquity true money, i.e. pieces of definite weight and value, can be traced. About the time of the 18th Dynasty we know that the precious metals were kept in dust, in ingots, and in ornamental forms, but more especially in rings, and it is almost certain that the important weightname uten has the root-meaning of a ring or coiled wire. It is well known not only that the metals were bought and sold by weight, but further, that goods of all kinds might be valued at a certain weight of metal in order to be ex-changed against each other.' One of the most frequently reproduced of contemporary illustrations of the daily life of the Egyptians is the weigher with his balance and scales, the stone weigher with his balance and scales, the stone weights of various animal forms (ox, or ox-head only, gazelle, etc.) in the one scale balancing in the other the rings of precious metal, which appear to have had a uniform diameter of about b inches' (Erman, Egypt, 464).

Pharaohs by the kings and peoples of Syria, the best known being that inscribed on the walls of the great temple of Amon at Karnak by order of Thothmes III. (frequently published; see histories of Brugsch, Petrie, etc., under Thothmes). From the mass of detail in this list three typical entries may be selected as having an important bearing on the topic of this section. (1) The tribute of Naharina in Thothmes' thirty-third year (B.C. 1471 acc. to Mahler's chronology) consisted, inter alia, of 45 deben 1 ket of gold; (2) that of 'the great Khita,' or Hittites, comprised among other items 8 silver rings weighing 301 deben; (3) in the thirty-fourth year 'the tribute of the princes of the land of Retennu,' or Palestine, shows, inter alia, 55 deben 8 ket of gold. From these and similar fractional weights (45 to deben, 55 to deben, and similar fractional weights (45 to deben, 55 and, since we know that the gold and silver rings were accurately adjusted to definite weights, the curious number 301 deben) metrologists have long suspected that the tribute here specified had been re-weighed before being entered as above by the Egyptian recorder, its original weight having been Egyptian recorder, us original weight having been in terms of another system and in whole numbers (J. Brandis, Das Münz-, Maas-, und Gewichtswesen in Vorderasien, 1866, p. 91 ff.; Fr. Hultsch, Griechische und römische Metrologie, zweite Bearbeitung, 1882, 374 ff. [this work to be often cited in the sequel as Hultsch, Metrol.]; id. Gewichte des Alterthums, 1898, 25 ff.). This accord weight eyestem in wei in Swije and Polecting second weight-system in use in Syria and Palestine in the 15th cent. B.C., it was inferred, could only be that known as the Babylonian system. inference was raised to a certainty by the discovery of the Tel el-Amarna clay tablets, which conclusively proved the exclusive use of the Babylonian weights by all the peoples of Mesopotamia and Syria at the date in question. + Here we find not only the sovereigns of Babylonia, such as Kallimasin (see Winckler's Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, 2^{13, 21}, 5^{24, 21}, 22) and Burnaburyash (7^{11, 14}), reckoning their gold and Burnaouryasn (7¹¹¹ ¹²), reckoning their gold and silver by shekels, minas, and talents, but also the kings of the West, such as Dushratta of Mitanni (17^{20, 21, 21}) and the king of Alashia, which is Cyprus (25¹⁰ 26² 27¹⁸ 33²—in three cases the metal

This system, which is based on the mina, with its subdivision (10th) the shekel and its multiple the talent (60 minas), was in use in Babylonia from time immemorial. From the evidence of inscribed stone-weights dating from the reigns of Gudea and Dungi, i.e. from the first half of the third millennium B.C., Dr. C. F. Lehmann has recently proved in numerous essays (see esp. Das altbabylonische Maas- und Gewichtssystem, 1893) that what may be called the common trade mina was a weight averaging 491 2 grammes=circa 7580 grains. The sixtieth part of this trade mina was the shekel of c. 126 grains, twhile the talent consisted, as above indicated, of 60 minas, or 3600 shekels. The temple accounts from Tello further show that about B.C. 2000 the shekel was sub-divided into 180 she (G. Reissner, 'Altbabylonische Masse u. Gewichte,' in the Sitzungsb. d. Berliner Akad. d. Wissensch. 1896, pp. 417-426). Side by side with the above series of trade weights was a parallel series of the same denominations, but of double the weight. The latter are known as the heavy shekel (252 grains), mina, and talent re-spectively, to distinguish them from the light shekel (128 grs.), mina, and talent first mentioned. All these were employed for the weighing of ordinary merchandise. For weighing the precious metals, on the other hand, important alterations were made in the scale. Thus, for gold, the shekel of 126 (and 252) grains; was retained, but a new mina of 50, instead of 60, shekels was created, the talent of gold, however, still comparing 50 of these programs of a 629 (19 840) prising 60 of these new minas of c. 6320 (12,640) grains, and therefore 3000 shekels, as compared with the trade talent of 3600 shekels. For silver, as money, the weights were on a different scale, being to the weights for gold just enumerated in the ratio of 4:3; in other words, the light Babylonian silver shekel = 168 grains, the mina of 50 shekels = 8400 grs., and the talent = 60 minas (with, as before, their respective heavy denominations of double these weights). It has been customary since Brandis (see op. cit.) to account for this double scale for the precious metals by the long-prevailing ratio of gold to silver in early times. viz. 40:3, which means that an ingot of gold was worth 131 times its weight in silver. The exworth 131 times its weight in silver. treme awkwardness of this proportion for every-day transactions, if the metals were to be weighed on one and the same standard, scarcely needs to be pointed out. Hence, in order that a given weight of gold might be exchangeable for a whole (not a fractional) number of bars or wedges of silver, the weight of the silver shekel (mina, talent) was raised till it stood to that of the gold shekel in the proportion of 4:3. The practical result of this alteration was that a given weight of gold was always equivalent to ten times the same weight of silver (1 gold shekel=10 silver shekels, 2 minas of gold=20 minas of silver, etc.).$

*The statement 819st is noteworthy. Burnaburyash complains that the king of Egypt had sent him nominally 20 minas of gold, but, when tested, this quantity had shrunk to 5 minas of fine gold!

† Throughout this article fractions have been avoided, except

† Throughout this article fractions have been avoided, except where special accuracy seemed to be required.

† The reader is reminded that an ounce troy weight contains 480 grains; the light Babylonian gold shekel, therefore, is slightly over † oz. troy, and only three grains heavier than an English sovereign (see Table, below).

† The equation of the two metals may be stated more explicitly thus: 1 gold shekel of 126 grs. = 126 × 13‡, or 1680 grs.

This extremely convenient ratio between the respective denominations was not, however, universally adopted in the East. The great mercantile period, they began to strike coins, employed a heavy silver shekel of circa 224 grains—hence universally known as the Phonician shekel—with cities of the Phœnician coast when, at a later its companion light shekel of 112 grains. shekel was one of the most widely spread of all the weights of antiquity, being found not only throughout Syria, but in Western Asia Minor, and even in Greece (for further details and discussion as to origin. etc.. see Weights and Measures). It origin, etc., see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). stands, as a glance will show, to the heavy Baby-lonian silver shekel in the proportion of 2:3;* consequently with gold to silver in the ratio of 13½: 1, the gold shekel of 252 (126) grains is equivalent to fifteen Phœnician silver shekels of 224 (112) grains, since 252 × 13½ = 224 × 15. On the Phænician silver standard, as on the Babylonian, 50 shekels went to the mina, and 60 minas to the talent.

In addition to all the above weights on the common standard, we find still another parallel series on the so-called royal standard—the origin of which can only be conjectured,—the latter being simply the common weights raised by a certain percentage. Thus the gold shekel on the royal standard weighs 130 (and 260) in place of 126 (and 252) grains. The first of these weights, the light royal shekel of 130 grains, plays an important part in the subsequent history of the gold coinage

The Babylono-Phonician weight-system, as outlined above, clearly stands in an intimate relation to the Egyptian. Happily, the long-standing feud between Assyriologists and Egyptologists as to the relative antiquity of the two systems does not here concern us, but the fact remains that the Babylonian gold shekel of 126 grains is exactly 15ths, the Babylonian silver shekel of 168 grains 15ths, and the Phonician silver shekel of 224 grs. ths of the Egyptian weight-unit, the ket of 140 grains—results which cannot be the 'accident of an accident.

§ 2. Hebrew money from the Conquest to the Exile. Sterling value of the shekel.—The evidence of the tribute-lists of Thothmes III. and other Egyptian monarchs, confirmed by the more explicit data of the Tel el-Amarna letters, may now be taken as proving beyond a doubt that, in taking possession of the land of Canaan, the Hebrews settled among a people long accustomed to the use of gold and silver as the recognized media of ex-change, and to the use of the balance for estimating the amount of each metal to be given or We have not yet been fortunate enough received. to recover inscribed Canaanite weights of this early period, so that one is compelled to admit at the outset that we have no direct witness to the weight of the ancient Hebrew shekel. Still the facts adduced in the foregoing section regarding the wide diffusion, in space and time, of the Babylono-Phœnician weight-system, afford at least a strong of silver, since gold was to silver in the ratio of 13½:1. Dividing this amount of silver into 10 equal parts, we see that 1 gold shekel of 126 grs. = 10 silver shekels of 168 grs. *224 (112):336 (168)::2:3.

† Professor Ridgeway, in his elaborate work, The Origin of Metallic Currency and Weight-Standards (1892), has endeavoured with nuch ingenuity and learning to prove (1) that this light shekel of 180 grains lies at the basis of all the weight-systems of antiquity, and (2) that originally 'it was nothing more than the amount of gold which represented the value of the cow, the unit of barter throughout all Europe, Asia, and Africa.' Africa.

Whatever may have been the standard of weight in use among the Hebrews before the conquest, there need be no hesitation in affirming that from that epoch onwards the Hebrews adopted the standards of the country in which they presumption in favour of our accepting it as the system by which money was reckoned in Old Testament times. This presumption is confirmed by the following testimonies of the historian Josephus. In the fourteenth book of his Antiquities he informs us that Crassus robbed the temple of a beam of solid gold 300 minas in weight, temple of a beam of solid gold 300 minas in weight, and adds the following important sentence: ' $\dot{\eta}$ $\dot{\delta}a$ $\mu r \hat{\alpha} \pi a \rho^{2} \dot{\eta} \mu \bar{\nu} \nu i \nu (x \nu i. 1, ed. Niese, § 106)$. The Hebrew gold mina, therefore, was equal in weight to $2\frac{1}{2}$ Roman pounds, or 12,630 grains (taking the libra [$\lambda t r \rho a$] according to the best authorities at 5053 grains = 327.45 grammes, see Hultsch, Metrol.' 159-161), which gives 50 shekels of 252.6 grains, the exact weight of the heavy Babylonian shekel (§ 1). In another passage of the same work, Josephus informs us that the Hebrew silver shekel is equivalent to 'four Attic Hebrew silver shekel is equivalent to 'four Attic drachma' ('Αττικάς δέχεται δραχμάς τέσσαρας, Ant. III. viii. 10, N. § 194), by which is meant, as will be shown in the sequel (§ 7), four Roman denarii of 55-56 grains each. This is in complete agreement with the weights of the best specimens of the extant silver shekels, which weigh 218-220 grains, as near an approximation as ancient silver coins in general show to the theoretical standard (in this case 224 grs.).* These conclusions are summed up in the following table, which gives the scale by which it is assumed, throughout this article, that gold and silver were waighed to the control of that gold and silver were weighed from the conquest of Canaan to the extinction of Jewish nationality, the weight of the shekel being given to the nearest large fraction :-

Notes. 1. The standard weight of the English sovereign (20 shillings) is 123-274 grains troy. The ordinary or heavy gold shekel, therefore, weighed a little more than two sovereigns.

At this point the question naturally suggests itself as to the value in sterling money of the Hebrew shekel as gold and silver unit respectively. Since the English sovereign is only eleven parts pure gold to one part alloy, the mere comparison of the respective weights of sovereign and shekel, as in the preceding table, note 1, is not sufficiently accurate for our present purpose. We prefer, thereaccurate for our present purpose. we prefer, therefore, to base our calculations on the price at which the Royal Mint buys its gold, viz. £3, 17s. 10½d. (934.5 pence) per ounce of 480 grains. This gives us as nearly as possible £2, 1s. sterling as the value of the Hebrew gold shekel. The gold mina, accordingly, we value at £102, 10s., and the talent at £6150.

The calculation of the intrinsic value of the silver shekel must be even more carefully set about. By many previous writers the important fact has been overlooked, that the silver currency of this country is but money of account, our only standard being gold. In other words, the coin which we call a shilling, of which the standard weight is

87-272 grains, is not worth that weight of silver at so much an ounce,* but has its value legally fixed as the twentieth part of the gold unit or sovereign. Hence, in order to arrive at even an approximate valuation in our currency of any weight of silver anciently used as money, whether coined or uncoined, we must know in each case the ratio then existing between gold and silver. In the period of Hebrew history with which we are now dealing, this ratio, as we have already learned, appears to have been fixed as 13.3:1, which resulted in the convenient adjustment that one gold shekel of 252 grains was equal in value to fifteen silver shekels of 224 grains (§ 1). This gives us, without further calculation, the value of the Hebrew or Phœnician silver shekel as 15th of 41 shillings, or 2s. 84d., say 2s. 9d. The same proportion holds with regard to the silver mina and The same shekel, which are 15th of the same denominations in gold, viz. £6, 16s. 8d. and £410 respectively. It will be convenient to have these values in tabular form for easy reference.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that throughout the whole period ending with the return from the Exile there can be no question of coined money. For every transaction of the least importance the balance had to be employed, and the tale of silver duly determined by weight. Thus, in the incident of Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah, though its present record may be late, we have a lifelike picture of how business was done in pre-exilic times. The price having been fixed in approved Oriental style, 'Abraham,' we read, 'weighed to Ephron the Abraham, we read, "weighted to Epiron the silver which he had named, four hundred shekels of silver, current (money) with the merchant' (קסף עקר לפני) קסף Gn 23¹⁶), i.e., as a late Targum has correctly paraphrased it, in 'good silver passing at every (banker's) table and receivable in all transactions.' The weights employed were of stone, and were kept in a bag (hence Pr 16¹¹ אַרְנִי כְּים 'the weights [lit. stones] of the bag'). From the earliest of the prophetic writings onwards, we find repeated warnings against the use of unjust weights (Am 8⁵, Mic 6^{10t}, Pr 11¹ 20^{10. 22}), and both the Deuteronomic and the Levitical codes find it necessary to issue strict injunctions against the falsification of the balance and its weights (Dt 25¹³⁻¹⁶, Lv 19^{25, 26}; cf. Ezk 45¹², to be read in the light of the Gr. text). It is somewhat remarkable, however, that we nowhere find any attempt to regulate the fineness of the silver, which clearly shows that there was as yet no thought of a proper coinage, the essential characteristic of which is the guarantee by the State of the quality as well as the quantity of the metal. It must not be thought, however, that it was necessary to have recourse to the balance for every transaction however small. On the contrary, there is ample evidence that the precious metals circulated in the form of ingots of known weight. Saul's servant, for example, had with him an ingot t of the weight of a quarter of a shekel (1 S 9°). In the case of large sums, and especially in official and legal payments where great accuracy was necessary, as well as in cases where the parties concerned were not well known to each other, the money was invariably weighed. Hence the word shakal (>pr), to 'weigh,' is used as synonymous with 'pay' (Ex 2216, 1 K 1038, Is 553 etc.). In illustration of this extensive use of the balance in the most varied transactions, it will balance in the most varied transactions, it will suffice to refer to such additional passages as 2 K 12^{10.11} RV (where the money is both 'told' and 'weighed out'), Jer 32^{9.10}, Is 46°, Ezr 8^{20.20}.

† These figures give merely the intrinsic value of the metal; its purchasing power, as compared with these sums to-day, was many times greater (see § 11).

† It is an anachronism to speak of it as a coin, as in the Internat. Crit. Comm. (1899) ad loc.

The custom of wearing ornaments of an accurately determined weight—such were Rebekah's gold nose-ring of half a shekel weight and her bracelets of ten shekels, Gn 24²²—would naturally tend to facilitate their ways or accession to more than the shear of the shekels. tend to facilitate their use on occasion as money. The 'wedge (lit. tongue) of gold of fifty shekels weight' purloined by Achan was probably an ornament of some sort (Jos 721). The ring-money so popular in Egypt, to which allusion has already been made (§ 1), does not appear to have been current among the Hebrews.* The nature of the piece of money—for such it surely must have been—called kësitah (חשידים Gn 3315, Jos 2423, and Job 4211 only) is quite unknown. From the fact that the oldest versions render it by 'lamb' or 'sheep,' it is a plausible conjecture, but nothing more, that the kësitah may have been a piece of precious metal, the value of which was in some way indicated by its having a lamb stamped upon it † (see art. KESITAH, and add to the reff. there given, Hultsch, Metrol.² pp. 460-63, who attempts to determine its value from utterly insufficient data, and Ridgeway, Metal Currency, pp. 270-72 [with illustrations], who concludes that the qesitah was an old unit of barter like the Homeric ox, and as the latter was transformed into a gold unit so the former was superseded by an equivalent of silver').

Before we pass from this section, it may be added that the predominant use of the shekel as the monetary unit in ordinary transactions has led to its frequent omission in statements of price in the OT. Joseph, for example, was sold for 'twenty (shekels, AV picces) of silver,' Solomon paid for his Egyptian chariots 'six hundred of silver' apiece (see complete list of such omissions in Madden, Coins of the Jews, p. 15). It is worthy of note, finally, that the mina (app in Ezk 4512 by AV transliterated 'maneh,' elsewhere in OT and NT 'pound') does not occur in any pre-exilic writing.‡ The price of a chariot we have just seen was '600 shekels,' not '12 minas'; Achan's wedge weighed '50 shekels,' not 'one mina,'— examples might be multiplied indefinitely,—while large sums are quoted by talents and shekels only. From among the latter may be singled out Solomon's annual revenue of 666 talents of gold (1 K 10¹⁴, 2 Ch 9¹³) = £4,095,900, as also the incredible total of David's Temple Fund, which, according to the Chronicler, amounted to the colossal sum of one thousand and twenty-five millions sterling (£1,025,000,000) !§

These stamped ingots were the precursors of true coins. (Cf. now, Johns, 'Did the Assyrians coin Money?' Expos. Nov. 1899).

B. Coined Money from the Persian Period TO THE REIGN OF NERO.

§ 3. Invention of the art of Coining. Money of Darius and his successors. The 'Shekel of the Sanctuary.'—Modern research tends to confirm the statement of Herodotus (i. 94), that coins are an invention of the Lydians. To the reign of Gyges [c. 700 B.C.] may perhaps be ascribed the earliest essays in the art of coining (Head, Hist. Numorum, p. xxxiii; to this work, to Babelon, Les Origines de la Monnaie, and the other works mentioned at the head of this article, the student is referred for full discussion of the question as to the invention of coining, the process employed, etc.). Wherein, it may be asked, does a true coin differ from the ingots of gold and silver of specified weight so long in use in the ancient world? We answer that an ingot becomes a coin when it receives the impression of an official mark—called by numismatists the 'type' of the coin—which serves as a public guarantee of its weight and fineness, and hence of its value in the currency of the country. When the last band of Jewish exiles left for the land of their captivity (B.C. 586) true coins had circulated in western Asia Minor and Greece for about a century, but there is no evidence that this economic revolution had affected Palestine. Forty years later (B.C. 548 or 548, acc. to Winckler, Untersuchungen zur altorient. Gesch. 131) Cyrus gained his decisive victory over Crosus king of Lydia, who had reorganized the currency of his kingdom who had reorganized the currency of his kingdom (Head, Coinage of Lydia and Persia, 19 f., Hist. Num. 546), introducing a gold stater, the famous spoirce or startp, of the weight of the light Babylonian gold shekel (126 grs.), and a corresponding silver stater or shekel of 168 grs. Lenormant, Head, and others consider that Cyrus continued the interest of these going from the print of Sardia. the issue of these coins from the mint at Sardis; but Babelon has shown that this view is untenable (Les Perses Achéménides, Introd. iif.), and that the royal coinage of Persia was first issued by Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 522-485). Darius' coins were of two denominations—(1) a stater of pure gold (χρυσίον καθαρώτατον, Herod. iv. 166), weighing 130 grs. and circulating throughout Asia and Europe under the designation στατήρ δαρεικός or daric; † and (2) a silver coin of almost 87 grs., known as the $\sigma i \gamma \lambda os \mu \eta \delta u \dot{\sigma} s$ or Median shekel.‡ The former was the light Babylonian shekel on the royal standard (see § 1), -otherwise one half the royal standard (see § 1),—otherwise one half of the corresponding heavy shekel (260 grs.) represented at this period by the popular gold coin known as the stater of Phocœa (Babelon, op. cit. iv f.; Head, op. cit. 506; see also footnote),—while the latter, the siglos, was one half of the light Babylonian silver shekel on the same standard. These were in all probability the first coins to circulate among the Jews. No 1 of the plate of illustrations shows a gold daric of the Persian kings, the type of which is fairly constant throughout. the type of which is fairly constant throughout. The obverse represents the king as an archer, bearded, crowned with the cidaris, and kneeling right; clad in long robe with left knee bare, he holds a bow in his outstretched left hand, and in his right a spear. * It is of great importance, in view of subsequent discussions, to observe that the word στατήρ, stater (from iστημα in the sense of 'to weigh'), is the true Gr. equivalent of the Semitic shetel, of which στηλες (see below) is a transliteration.

† The word daric (λερμική) has probably no etymological connexion with Darius (Old Pers. Darayaraus), but is rather to connexion with Darius (Old Pers. Darayavauuh), but is rather to be traced to the Assyrian dariku, applied to a piece of money in the reign of Nabonidus.

The siglos, it must be observed, is in reality a half-shekel, being τ_{hh} th of the Babylonian silver mina. Inasmuch as the term stater, as the equivalent of shekel, represents τ_{h} th of the mina, the Greeks applied the term $\partial_{x} u_{h}$, drachm, to the half-stater, or τ_{h} th part. From this point of view, the daric—while a stater or shekel on the light Babylonian standard—might be regarded as a drachm on the heavy standard (see below).

'type' but by an irregular oblong 'incuse. The type of the siglos closely resembles that of the daric, but is less constant. In sterling money the daric (130 grs. of pure gold), on the basis of calculation adopted in § 1, was worth £1, 1s. 1d., say one quinca, and, since the gold unit was equal to twenty of the silver unit * (on the basis of 13·3 : 1; cf. Xen. Anab. i. 7. 18), the siglos was worth a fraction more there a shilling

The daric and siglos, we have said, are the first coins that can possibly have circulated in Palestine, which formed part of the fifth satrapy (Babelon, op. cit. xx f.). Is there any reference to either in the Hebrew literature of the period? Our Revisers reply in the affirmative, since in six passages of the historical work Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah (see Driver, LOT's 516) they have sub-Nehemian (see Driver, LOI's 516) they have substituted 'darics' for the 'drams' (i.e. drachms) of AV (1 Ch 297, Ezr 259 877, Neh 770.71.72). The original has happe except in 1 Ch 297, Ezr 827, where we find happen except in 1 Ch 297, Ezr 827, where we find happen except in 1 Ch 297, Ezr 827, where we find happen exception. Of the remainder, Neh 7705, and its parallel Ezr 259 bring extracts from an explicit decoupant recording the contribute. from an earlier document recording the contributions for religious purposes given on the occasion of the return under Cyrus, i.e. nearly twenty years before the introduction of the daric, while Ezr 827 refers not to money but to the weight (1000 'adark(ntm) \(\) of 'twenty basins of gold.' Since, then the darkener is electly a weight and not not then, the darkemon is clearly a weight and not a coin, it scarcely can be anything but the word δραχμή, the standing designation among the Greeks for the 180 th part of the mina. This conclusion is confirmed by the following considerations: (1) Lucian's Greek text has δραχμάς throughout; (2) darkemon was the recognized Semitic transcription of δραχμή, as is proved by a Phœnician inscription from the Piræus, in which a colony of Sidonians there (prob. in the 3rd cent. B.C.) vote two sums of twenty darkemonim (ררכמנים) § each to defray the expense of a gold crown and a gilded stele in honour of a countryman, 'Shemabaal, son of Magon.'

In attempting to estimate the value of the darkemon or drachm as the weight in terms of which the contributions are entered in Nehemiah's lists, we would lay stress on the fact above indicated, that the drachm is essentially the hundredth part of the mina—in other words, a half-shekel. Now if, as we believe, the Hebrew gold shekel par excellence was the heavy shekel of 252-260 grains, and if, as is most probable, the original entries were made on the Persian or light Babylonian royal standard, of which the shekel was 130 grs. (the weight of the later daric), we can understand why a Jewish author—or, it may be, editor—to avoid possible ambiguity, should have altered the original light shekels into the equivalent drachms (either being that of the Hebrew gold mina). If this be so, the total amount of gold contributed by the Tirshatha (1000 drachms), the

these words, see sub רככון Oxf. Lex. (Brown-Briggs-Driver) and reff. there. Also Madden, Coins of the Jews, 46; Hultsch, Metrol.² 485 n. 2.

1 The interesting corruptions in the Greek text of A and B (δδο-δραχμωτιν-όδοιχε ματυμέ) seem to prove that the original here was Δήμορη darkemonim, as in the other passages just cited.

§ In line 3, owing probably to a slip of the engraver, the word is written ברכנים. On the strength of this, Ed. Meyer in his detailed discussion of Neh 770% in his Entstehung d. Judenthums, 196 ff., takes דרכנים as=gold daries and דרכנים as=Attic (silver) drachms; but it is much more likely that the same denomina-tion, viz. Attic gold drachms, is intended throughout (cf. the interesting parallels from the Greek Corpus given by Lidzbarski, Handb. d. nordsemit. Epigraphik (1898), pp. 124 and 160. The inscription itself, ib. pl. viii. 6, in square characters, p. 425. Other literature apud Bloch, Phon. Glossar. p. 6).

chief of the fathers (20,000), and the rest of the people (20,000),' is equal to 41,000 drachms, daries, or guineas.* In the same way the mina (EV pound), by which the silver contributions are reckoned, can hardly be other than the Perso-Babylonic royal mina, of which the later siglos was the hundredth part. Since the latter was in value th of the daric, its mina was equal to five daries, and the total contributions (4200 minas, Neh 771.72) to 21,000 daries, that is, to circa as many guineas.

The shekel (173 grs.) of this mina, of which the siglos is the half-shekel (see above), is perhaps intended in the reference Neh 5⁵⁰ to the table allowances of Nehemiah as a high official of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (see Babelon, op. cit. p. 6 f., for the coins of this sovereign). The satraps of the Great King enjoyed to a limited extent (Lenormant, La monnaie dans l'antiq. ii. 16f., and esp. Babelon, op. cit. xxiff.) the privilege of issuing silver (not gold) coins in their own name. With one of these, Bagoas, satrap of Egypt (c. 345-343) under Artaxerxes III. Ochus, is generally identified the Bagoaes of Josephus (Ant. xI. vii. 1, N. § 297), who under the circumstances there recorded imposed a tax of 50 shekels upon every lamb offered in the daily sacrifice. These must have been either Persian shekels, as above, or, since Bagoas' Egyptian coinage is entirely on the Phonician standard (see ap. Babelon, pp. 52-55), shekels on the Hebrew-Phonician standard (224 grs.).

Since the document known as the Priests' Code (P) is now universally recognized as having first received public sanction under the governorship of Nehemiah (c. 444 B.C.), we have reserved for this section the discussion of the monetary unit adopted therein for various important payments, viz. the so-called 'shekel of the sanctuary' ל (פיקל הַפּרָשׁ, more probably 'sacred shekel'), regarding which so much has been written and so many conjectures hazarded. The expression occurs in the following hazarded. The expression occurs in the following passages of P only: Ex 30¹⁵. ²⁴ 38²⁴⁻²⁶, Lv 5¹⁶ 27³. ²⁵, Nu 3²⁷. ²⁰ 7¹³⁻²⁶ (14 times) 18¹⁶, and in these it is used not only of silver and gold but of spices (Ex 30251.) and presumably copper (382). This confirms the impression we derive from Lv 2726 (* all thy estimations shall be reckoned according to the shekel of the sanctuary') that part of P's aim is to introduce a uniform shekel for all transactions.‡ From the numbers given Ex 38¹⁵⁶, an easy calculation proves that 3000 'sacred' shekels went to the talent. What, then, is the value of P's shekel? Let us examine (1) The testimony of the text and the versions. In four of the passages cited (Ex 30¹³ Lv 27²⁵, Nu 3⁴⁷ 18¹⁶) the 'shekel of the sanctuary is defined as consisting of 20 gerahs (אֶקְיִים צַּרָה הַיִּבֶּעָה, words which Ezekiel had already applied to his shekel (45¹²).§ Now the gerah—whether its original meaning be a seed-grain generally, or specially the seed of the carob tree (Low, Aramaische Pflanzennamen, p. 317) or the lupin (Ridgeway, op. cit. 217) —was most probably a small Babylonian weight (cf. the giru of Nebuchadnezzar's inscriptions, used in connexion with money, see Muss Arnolt, Lex. s.v.), identified by Talmudic writers with the map or obol, by which it is rendered in the Targum of Onkelos. The same identification is adopted by equivalent in the later coinage of Darius, the third the same in sterling money.

† This rendering probably presupposes that the standard weight was kept in the temple in accordance with a well-attested ancient custom. But this hardly suits the exilic or early post-exilic origin of P.

† In this, as in so much else, P continues the policy of Ezekiel, who appears to contemplate a simplification of the standard measures (4:510-12).

† Hence it is possible that the words in question are everywhere in P a gloss introduced from this passage of Ezekiel.

the LXX (είκοσι ὁβολοί).* The obol is, of course, the sixth of the Attic drachm, at this period = c. 11 23 grs., twenty of which give us a shekel of 224 grs. (cf. Josephus' statement (Ant. III. vi. 7) that the Heb. talent = 100 (Attic) minas, i.e. 3000 shekels = 10,000 drachms or 60,000 obols; hence 1 shekel = 20

(2) The testimony of the New Testament and Josephus.—In the 1st cent. the amount of the tax paid by every adult Jew for the maintenance of the temple services had long been fixed at half a shekel, which, since the tax was ultimately based on Ex 30¹²⁷ (see next paragraph), must necessarily have been the 'sacred' shekel. Now, on a well-known occasion in the life of our Lord (Mt 17³⁶⁷.), the amount due by two persons was paid by a stater, which can only be a tetradrachm of Antioch or of Tyre (see §§ 4, 7, 8), both of them slightly reduced from the standard weight of 224 grs.† Josephus, also, in his references to this tax, uses in one place (Ant. XVIII. ix. 1) the same word as the evangelist (τὸ δίδραχμον; cf. Mt 1724), in another (Wars, VII. vi. 6) the equivalent δύο δραχμάς, while in a third (Ant. III. viii. 2) he writes σίκλου τὸ ημισυ, the half-shekel. (3) The testimony of the Talmud. The Talmud repeatedly lays down the canon that all sums mentioned in the Pentateuch are to be reckoned in the money of Tyre ("78 703, see reff. in Zuckermandel, Ueber talmudische Gewichte u. Münzen, pp. 5, 15); and in particular in Bekhoroth viii. 7, with reference to the very passages we are discussing, we read that 'all payments according to the sacred shekel are to be made in Tyrian (i.e. Phoenician) currency,' in other words, according to the Hebrew-Phonician shekel of 224 grs. On the strength of this threefold testimony, we are justified in maintaining that 'the shekel of the sanctuary' is nothing but the ancient silver shekel of the country, fifteen of which (at 224 grs.) we saw (§ 1) to be equivalent to the gold shekel of 253 grs. It was 'sacred,' not only as having been associated with the payment of the priestly dues from time immemorial, but also as being the specifically Hebrew shekel, just as the Hebrew language was distinguished from all others as 'the sacred tongue (בּלֶּיםׁן תַּבֹּלֶים).' Some epithet of the kind was required in early post-exilic times to distinguish this shekel from the Perso-Babylonic shekel of 168-173 grs. (see next paragraph), which may well have been the only shekel then officially recognized in Judæa, a province of the Persian empire.

The date of the institution of the temple tax of half a shekel, above referred to, has been the subject of much discussion. It does not appear to have been contemplated by the original framers of the Priests' Code, # since we find the community, inmediately after ratifying that code, charging themselves 'yearly with the third part of a shekel for the service of the house' (Neh 10²² Heb. 31). Since the Hebrew Phænician shekel is never divided otherwise than by halves and quarters, this must be the official Perso-Babylonian shekel $(\frac{1}{3} = 56-58 \text{ grs., worth } c. 8\frac{1}{2}d.)$. At a later date, certainly before the time of the Chronicler (c. 300 B.C.; cf. 2 Ch 24³⁻⁹), the tax was raised by the

The daric and siglos, we have said, were the first coins to have legal currency in Judges. But soon after Nehemiah's time another silver coinage made its appearance. In the second half of the 5th cent. the wealthy commercial cities on the Mediterranean seaboard had begun to issue silver money under their native kings.* Aradus, Sidon, Tyre, and Gaza were among the greatest trade centres of the period. The 'men of Tyre,' we may be sure, were not the only traders that brought 'all manner of ware' to Jerusalem (Neh 1316), and the coins followed the trade. One of the earliest of these is a fine double-shekel of Sidon (423 grs.) in the British Museum (see Plate No. 2).

Of no city or sovereign, however, are the coins of such importance to the student of Jewish numismatics as those of Tyre. Have we not seen that all the moneys mentioned in the Pentateuch were to be paid in Tyrian—rather, in a wider sense, Phœnician—currency? The earliest coins of Tyre take us back to near the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., the latest date from the reign of Septimius Severus. No. 3 of our Plate shows an early, not perhaps the earliest, specimen of a tetradrachm of Tyre (a shekel of c. 220 grs.), the real 'shekel of the sanctuary.'

The reverse is of great interest as showing the range of the mercantile relations of Tyre and the resulting influence of Athens on the one hand, and of Egypt on the other (cf. Babelon, op cit. Introd. clxxxix). The influence of Athens on Palestine at this early period is still more strikingly shown by the coins of Gaza, which not only imitate the type and legend of the coins of Athens, but are struck on the Attic standard.

§ 4. Coinage of the Ptolemies and Seleucids and of the semi-autonomous cities to the time of Simon Maccabrus.—At the date of his conquest of Asia, Alexander the Great introduced his international currency in the three metals, gold, silver, and bronze.† The principal coins are the gold stater or didrachm of 133 grs. actual weight; for silver the tetradrachm (266 grs.) and the drachm (664 grs.). These weights introduce us to a new standard, the Euboic-Attic,; on which the currency of Athens was based—from this time onwards to the 3rd cent. A.D. the most widely spread of ancient monetary standards. Coins with Alexander's types were struck, even long after his death, by various cities of Syria and Palestine.

battle, Ptolemy I. finally succeeded (B.C. 301) in adding Palestine to his Egyptian dominions. The Jews were still, however, but 'a feeble folk,' content to use the coins that issued in great abundance from the royal mints at Alexandria and the cities of the seacoast. This was all the more practicable, since Ptolemy (from B.C. 305), alone among the successors of Alexander, coined on the light Phenician standard (see Poole, The Ptolemies [Brit. Mus. Cat. of Gr. Coins], 1883, Introd. xxiii f.; Head, Hiet. Num. 711 ff.; Hultsch, Metrol. 646 ff.). No. 4 of our Plate is a typical coin, a tetradrachm or double-shekel of the Ptolemies.

Tyre, which passed into the hands of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus in B.C. 275, still possessed a flourishing mint, its coins bearing as adjunct, in addition to the Ptolemaic types, the monogram of the city with the club of the Tyrian Hercules (see Poole, op. cit. Plate IV. 8). Sidon, Acco (named Ptolemais by Philadelphus), Gaza, Joppa, were all Ptolemais by Philadelphus), Gaza, Joppa, were all Ptolemaic mints,† from which, especially from the three latter, the peaceful Jewish community derived their supply of shekels. The yoke of the Ptolemies pressed lightly, for the greater part of the century (B.C. 300-200) at least, upon the Jews. According to the highly embellished story of Joseph, the nephew of the high priest (Onias II.), told in detail by Josephus (Ant. xii. 4), the tribute in the reign of Ptolemy III. Energetes did not exceed twenty shekels of silver (ib. XII. iv. 1, Niese, § 158). To obtain the modern equivalent of a Ptolemaic talent of silver (6000 drachms of 56 grs.), we must, in accordance with the principles laid down in § 2 of this article, first translate the silver into gold, which is our only standard. Now the ratio of gold to silver in the Ptolemaic system is 12½:1, eight gold drachms being equivalent to a mina (100 drachms) of silver (cf. Hultsch, Metrol. 2646 f.). We thus obtain, at the mint price of gold £3, 17s. 10 d. per oz. of 480 grs., 9s. 1d. as the value of the gold drachm, £45 for the gold mina (3 Mac 14), 83d. for the silver drachm (ib. 328), and £218 for the silver talent, twenty of which amount to £4360.
The total revenue of Ptolemy's Asiatic possession, Cole-Syria, and Phoenicia, and Judea, and Samaria amounted—if the figures (Ant. XII. iv. 4, N. 175 f.) are to be trusted—to 8000 talents, raised by Joseph to 16,000, almost three and a half million pounds sterling! On the same standard are to be reckoned the numerous other sums mentioned throughout the story.

When we reflect that the Ptolemaic silver shekel is a double-drachm or stater (of 112 grs.)the latter term, when the didrachm fell into disfavour, the Greeks applied to the tetradrachmwe understand how the Alexandrian translators of we understand now the Alexandrian translators of the Pentateuch so frequently render the Hebrew shekel, which weighed 224 grs., by δίδραχμον as well as by σίκλος, instead of by the more exact τετράδραχμον (in LXX only Job 42¹¹).‡ Similarly the beka (γρ3) or half-shekel is in the two passages where it occurs (Gn 24²², Ex 38²⁵=LXX 39²) rendered by δεσχνία.

In B.C. 198 Antiochus III. succeeded in wresting Palestine from the feeble grasp of the youthful Ptolemy Epiphanes; it now became a province of the Syrian empire. The Seleucids, like all the successors of Alexander save the Ptolemies, continued his coinage on the Attic standard, retain ing, for some time at least, even his name and types, to which the anchor was added—the family badge or cognizance of Seleucus, the founder of the dynasty. Gold coins are comparatively rare; the commonest silver coins are the tetradrachm the commoness siver come are the construction (at this period as high as 265 grs.) and the drachm, to which fall to be added bronze coins of numerous denominations.* For half a century (c. 150-100 B.C.) the Phœnician standard appears alongside of the Attic (Babelon, op. cit. clxxxiii). The mints are numerous; besides Antioch and other cities of Northern Syria we still have Sidon, Tyre,

Ptolemais, Ascalon, and others.†
Antiochus treated the Jews with great consideration, even with kindness. Taxes were remitted, in some cases permanently, in others for three years, with one-third abatement thereafter; while a grant of 20,000 drachms, in addition to allowances of wheat and salt, was made from the imperial treasury to defray the cost of the temple service (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 3, N. 138 ff.). From this time onwards to the date of the complete rupture with Antioch the taxes and other official pay-ments must have been settled in Attic drachms (see below) from one or other of the coast mints. For ordinary transactions and for the sacred dues, the former Ptolemaic currency, based on the native standard, probably still held the field. We give (No. 5) a tetradrachm of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, with whose accession, in B.C. 175, we approach a turning-point in the fortunes of the

The portrait of Antiochus is considerably idealized; the titles on the reverse show that the coin was struck about the middle of his reign (Babelon, op. cit. xxiii.), probably before he had set up 'the abomination that maketh desolate' in the Jewish temple (Dn 1131 1211).

Several of the more important cities of the Seleucid empire were about this time permitted to issue a series of semi-autonomous bronze coins, distinguished from the royal bronzes of the same minting-places by having, besides the royal portrait on the obverse, the name of the issuing city (TYPIQN, לצר אם גרנם) § on the reverse.

To the earlier part of Antiochus Epiphanes' reign belong the intrigues of Jason, brother of the high priest Onias III., who offered Antiochus the large sum of 440 talents for the high-priestly office, with 'a hundred and fifty more, if it might be allowed him . . . to set up a (Greek) place of exercise and (form) a body of youths (to be trained therein), and to register the inhabitants of Jerusalem as citizens of Antioch' (2 Mac 49). Jason in Jason in his turn was outbid by Menelaus, who offered the

§ The title here assumed by Tyre is noteworthy, 'mother (city) of the Sidonians,' a reply to the, historically more justifiable, pretensions of Sidon to be the 'mother-city of Tyre.' Similar rivalries were common in the Roman period. Also dinterest, in view of the legend on the later Jewish shekels, is that on the bronze coins of Gebal-Byblus, נבל קרשת 'Gebal the impecunious monarch 'more than Jason by 300 talents of silver' (ib. v.34). These and the other sums mentioned in 1 and 2 Maccabees (1 Mac 1128) land 1 land 2 landcasees (1 mac 11-1316. 19 1531. 35, all talents; 2 Mac 311 419 [read 3300 drachms] etc.) are to be reckoned as Syrian-Attic drachms and talents. In endeavouring to reach an approximate valuation of these sums, it must be remembered that the Syrian currency is on a silver, ours on a gold standard. The gold of the Seleucids, even in the shape of coins, was always bullion, and varied in its ratio to silver between 10: bullion, and varied in its ratio to silver between 10: 1 and 12½: 1 (see Hultsch, Metrol.² §§ 30 f.). Now, if we take the normal weight of the Attic drachm at 67:367 grs. (=4'366 grammes), we have as the sterling value of the gold drachm at the mint price 10s. 11½d., and of the talent (6000 drachms) in round numbers £3280. At the ratio of 10:1 this gives £328 for the silver talent, at 121: 1 £262, the mean value being £295, for the silver drachm 113d., which is considerably higher than the estimates of previous writers. The large sums deposited in the temple (400 talents of silver and 200 talents of gold, 2 Mac 311) would thus amount to £118,000 and £656,000 respectively, a total of over threequarters of a million.

§ 5. The first native coinage; the problem of the so-called 'Maccabæan shekels'; the bronze coins of the Hasmonæan princes.—The latter half of the 2nd cent. saw the once powerful empire of the Seleucidæ rent by internal dissensions and hasting to its fall. Already the Jews, under the brave sons of Mattathias the Hasmonaan (२०७७), had taken the field in defence of the national religion, and had proved themselves so dangerous as fees that Deputating II. (145-139/8 B.C.) record as foes that Demetrius II. (145-139/8 B.C.) recognized them as likely to prove not less valuable as allies (1 Mac 13-40). The privileges then granted by Demetrius, amounting to political autonomy under the suzerainty of Syria,—not, as is often represented, to complete independence,—were confirmed by his brother Antiochus VII. Sidetes (B.C. 138-129) in the famous rescript preserved in 1 Mac 15st. 'Now therefore,' it runs, according to the best text, 'I confirm unto thee [Simon] all the exactions which the kings that were before me remitted unto thee, and I give thee leave to coin money for thy country with thine own stamp (mojes than them them them there were sent than the stamp than κόμμα ίδιον νόμισμα τη χώρα σου), etc. Did Simon avail himself of the privilege here recorded of issuing money in his own name? This has hitherto been the quæstio vexatissima of Jewish numis-matics. For some time past, however, the attri-bution to Simon the Hasmonæan (less correctly, the Maccabee) of the well-known silver shekels and half-shekels with the legends Shekel Yisrael and Yerushalem Kedoshah, and the dates 'year 1' to year 5,' has been an accepted numismatic doctrine, so much so that very convincing reasons will naturally be expected to justify the present writer's rejection of it. These reasons may be stated here in preference to a later section. They are (1) the m preference to a later section. They are (1) the principles of the rights of coinage in antiquity. These cannot be here set forth in detail (see esp. Lenormant's classical work, La monnaie dans l'antiquité, ii. § 1, 'Le droit de monnayage,' etc.): it must suffice to emphasize the fact that the right to coin money of the standard metal, whether gold or silver, was the exclusive prerogative of the sovereign power. Just as the Persian kings, for example, guarded most jealously their exclusive right to coin gold, which was their standard, so the Seleucid sovereigns, coining on the silver standard, permitted certain privileged cities to table broaden sing only (see previous sections and strike bronze coins only (see previous section, and cf. Babelon, Rois de Syrie, exi, exliv). The resumption of a silver coinage with a special era by the cities of Phœnicia, at a slightly later period, was tantamount to the assertion of their complete independence. The admitted fact that the only other silver coins of the Jews date from a time of asserted independence, at least suggests a similar date for the shekels in question. (2) The shekels of years 1 to 5 cannot be fitted into the chronology of this period. Since Simon died in the year B.C. 135, five years backwards Demetrius II. was still on the throne. Accordingly supporters of the Maccabean theory are compelled to assume that Antiochus Sidetes was merely confirming a right that had already been usurped by Simon. On the other hand, if the dates run from B.C. 142 (see 1 Mac Whereas on the theory advocated in this article (see, further, § 9), that these coins belong to the first revolt, A.D. 66-70, we understand both why there should be only shekels of five years, and why those of the fifth year should be so rare. (3) The silver coinage ceases, ex hypothesi, with Simon. No reason for this can be given on the hypothesis we are combating. Subsequent Hasmonean princes, such as John Hyrcanus and Alexander Janneus, were men of greater wealth and power than Simon: were men or greater wealth and power than Simon: why should they have been content to issue only bronze coins, if Simon had already struck in silver? (4) There is, further, the more technical argument from the size, fabric, and style of the coins in dispute. They do not resemble the contemporary silver coins of the Selecuidæ nearly so much as they do the imporial coins of the selection and they do the imporial coins of the selection. much as they do the imperial coins of the 1st cent. A.D. (see § 9, below), nor do they show any points of contact with the types or legends of the bronze coins of Simon's successors. The palacographic argument from the forms of the old Hebrew characters is of little weight either way; Hebrew characters is of little weight either way; it is almost impossible to distinguish between the genuinely archaic and the intentionally archaistic in Semitic epigraphy. We believe, then, that if Simon availed himself of the right, which was soon withdrawn (1 Mac 15⁻⁷), of issuing coins, these can only have been of bronze. No such coins, however, can with certainty be ascribed to

The first native Jewish coinage dates from the reign of Simon's son and successor, John Hyrcanus. The earliest coins, however, that can with any confidence be said to have been struck at Jerusalem are some small bronzes—hemichalki,* according to M. Babelon—of Antiochus VII. of dates B.C. 132 and 131 (see Madden, Coins of the Jews, 76; Babelon, op. cit. Nos. 1166-7, pl. xxii. 1; Gardner, op. cit. 75, pl. xx. 14). The coins of Hyrcanus are of small size, three specimens in the British Museum averaging 28 grs., and undated. In place of a type the field of the obverse is occupied by an inscription in the old Hebrew character, see plate

The initial A of the obverse is probably the first letter of the name of his suzerain Alexander II. Zebina (B.C. 128-123), who introduced the double cornucopiæ as his monetary badge, and from whose coins it was borrowed by Hyrcanus. The earlier coins of Hyrcanus were issued, as the above example shows, in his own name and that of the heber (775) of the Jews; his later issues, however, read: John the high priest, head of the heber of the Jews (1775). The word 1777, now generally pronounced as above, has been a fruitful subject of speculation among historians and numismatists, since its precise significance is unknown. tations proposed is given by Madden (Coins, p. 77; cf. Schürer, HJP I. i. 284 f.). Only two need be mentioned here.

(1) Heber is the Heb. for the γερουσία or senate of the books of Maccabees and Judith, the later Sanhedrin (so Geiger, Levy, Madden, etc., and most recently Wellhausen, Isr. u. jüd. Gesch.

(2) Heber denotes the whole body of the people. This view has found an able advocate recently in Prof. Eb. Nestle (ZATW, 1895, 288 ff. : $n = \epsilon \theta ros$), who seeks to prove the equation stated in the title of his paper, and this other: $= \epsilon \theta \nu d\rho \chi \eta s$, a title frequently given to the Hasmonæan princes in the books of Maccabees. Neither of these views quite commends itself to the present writer. On the one hand, it is difficult to account for the mention of a body like the γερουσία, which our best authorities regard as of little or no importance at this epoch (see Wellh. loc. cit., and Holtzmann-Stade, Gesch. ii. 398); on the other hand, it is not less difficult to see why the more familiar words cg, אָרָה, etc., were passed over if Nestle is right. The LXX, we believe, supplies the key. In Pr 21st (=25st) the Heb. די הָרָר (lit. house of association, i.e. one shared with another) is rendered έν οίκφ κοινώ, while κοινωνέω and κοινωνός are elsewhere employed to render derivatives of the root non. consider, then, that the of the coins is the equivalent of the Gr. expression to κοινόν in one of its various significations. Of these the following are the most probable: (a) respublica, commonwealth, community.* τὸ κοινόν in this sense is synonymous with ἡ πόλις (Aristotle, αρ. Bonitz, op. cit.), and may be illustrated by the expressions τώ πολιτεύματι τών èν Beperkny Ίουδαίων, CIG iii. No. 5361 (date B.C. 13), quoted by Schürer, HJP II. ii. 246, and τὸ σύμπαν τῶν Ἰοππιτῶν πολίτευμα, 2 Mac 12'. In favour of this interpretation may be adduced the fact that the contemporary bronze be adduced the fact that the contemporary bronze coins of the semi-autonomous cities, as we saw above, combine the royal name with that of the people (TYPIQN, etc.; see list in Babelon, ci).

(b) Public authorities, officers of state (Staatsbehörden), perhaps the executive. In support of this rendering we would appeal to the use by Josephus in his Life (passim) of the expression το κανδυ τῶν 'Γεροσολυμτῶν, apparently in the sense of 'the executive authorities of the people of Jerusalem.' A comparison of § 52 (Niese, 266 f.) with § 60 (N. 309 f.) seems to show conclusively (1) that the κανδυ must have been a body with functions resembling those of an executive of the the constant of the functions resembling those of an executive of the δημος, and (2) that the former is to be taken as synonymous with ol τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν πρῶτοι, by which expression, at the first mention of his appointment as governor-general of Galilee (§ 9), Josephus designates the nominating body, which in all succeeding references he names τὸ κοινὸν των 'Ιερ. (c) The meaning 'confederation,' which κοινόν so frequently has in the constitutional history of the Greek states, may also be suggested; but, with our lack of knowledge regarding the constitution of the Jewish State at this period, it is best to leave the solution of the equation and = κοινόν an open question.

Aristobulus (B.C. 105-104), in his few extant coins, retains the earlier legend of his father: 'Yehûdah high priest and the commonwealth (?) of the Jews.' They were all apparently struck befine he assumed—first of the Hasmoncans—the title of king (Jos. Ant. XIII. xi. 1). The powerful Alexander Jannæus (Heb. 'Mr., contracted from '[N], [N], [N], during his long reign (B.C. 104-78) issued a plentiful supply of bronze coins. Some of these are remarkable (1) for the appearance for the first Besides these regal coins, Alexander issued a series of pontifical coins with the legend 'Jonathan (written ייתין) the high priest and the commonwealth (?) of the Jews.' On the reverse is the double cornucopiæ with the poppy head, which, like the anchor on the regal series, shows the continued influence of the Seleucid coinage. For full details of the numerous varieties of Alexander's coins as for those of John Hyrcanus, the student is referred to Madden and the other writers mentioned in the bibliography at the end of this article. The only other Hasmonæan prince whose coins are of sufficient interest to warrant mention in this sum-mary is Antigonus (B.C. 40–37), the protégé of the Parthians and the last of the dynasty. These inform us that Antigonus bore the name of his illustrious ancestor, Mattathias, and they are the first Jewish coins to show a date: we and ze, i.e. 'year (ng') one' and 'year two' of his unfortunate reign.

'The Asmonean dynasty commenced with a Mattathias, with the coins of a Mattathias the Asmonean dynasty concludes' (Madden). All these native coins, we must repeat, were from first to last of bronze, and all, with the exception of some of those of Antigonus, of very small size, viz. 2 and 3 of Mionnet's scale, i.e. about '5 and '6 in. in Further research, and in particular diameter. much patient weighing, of the extant coins will be required before we can pronounce with confidence on the denominations they represent—in other words, on their relation to the standard silver money. The smallest coins, at least, can scarcely be other than the peratah of later Jewish writings, the lepton of the NT (cf. § 8).

The money par excellence (ηρη, αργόριον) of the Jews during the greater part of the Maccabæan obtained from heathen mints, as, with the decline of the central power, the cities of the coast one after another recovered their autonomy. Tyre, in particular, began in B.C. 126—from which its new era is dated—to issue an important series of silver and bronze coins with considerable variety of types. The principal denominations were the tetradrachm or heavy shekel, and longo intervallo, the didrachm or light shekel, which was doubtless in considerable demand among the Jews for the payment of the temple tax. The weights are at first well maintained, at c. 220 and 110 grs. respectively. No. 8 illustrates a Tyrian shekel or tetradrachm of the Hasmonæan period.

In the year B.C. 37, with the help of the Roman legions, Herod, the son of Antipater, 'by birth an Idumæan, by profession a Jew, by necessity a Roman, by culture and choice a Greek, succeeded in securing the throne which Rome had promised him a few years before. Nothing could better show the condition of vassalage under which Herod held his kingdom than the fact that for all his enormous wealth, as evidenced not only by his princely gifts to foreign cities and his lavish expenditure at home, but by the great sums of coined money (dργυρίου ἐπισήμου) which he bequeathed at his death (Ant. XVII. viii. 1), he was restricted by the suzerain power to a coinage exclusively in bronze. The Hebrew of the legends is now displaced by Greek, while, in addition to the familiar Hasmonean types of the anchor and the cornucopies. we have such new types as the tripod,—another favourite Seleucid emblem,—the helmet, the Macedonian shield, the pomegranate, the caduceus, etc. One of the most interesting of Herod's coins is that represented by No. 9.

His brother, Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee (Lk 31; cf. According to de Saulcy these all bear the same date, 'year 6,' i.e. according to the Jewish method of computation the year A.D. 41-42, reckoning from the first year of Caligula A.D. 37.‡ (See No. 11.)

career of conquest in the East, they found, as the universal silver unit, the Attic drachm, now reduced to about 62 grains. The corresponding Roman unit was the denarius, also reduced from r_{i}^{i} to r_{i}^{i} of the Roman pound, i.e. to 60 grains. It followed as a matter of course that the two coins were identified, with a slight advantage in favour of the denarius. Henceforward, in Greek and Roman writers, 'Attic drachm' and 'denarius' are convertible terms (see Hultsch, Metrol. 250 f.); a tetradrachm is now, in ordinary speech, the equivalent of four, an Attic talent of 6000 denarii. Since Pompey's conquest of Syria, B.C. 65, the denarius had circulated in l'alestine alongside of the tetradrachms of Antioch and Tyre, both tariffed by Pompey at four denarii. In B.C. 15 Augustus carried through his thoroughgoing reform of the currency, retaining the gold and silver coinage in his own hands, while the senate was accorded the exclusive right of striking copper coins, the distinguishing mark of which was the letters S. C. (senatus consulto) on the reverse. The principal coins of the Augustan currency were—in gold, the aureus; in silver, the denarius; the sestertius (=4 asses or 4th denarius) and dupondius of fine brass (orichalcum); finally, the as (1th denarius) with its half (semis) and quarter (quadrans), all in copper. All government payments, such as taxes and tolls, fines imposed by a Roman court, and the like, were calculated in this ever, from the Palmyra tariff, regulating the amount of toll or custom to be paid on various articles of merchandise, that while the amounts were calculated according to the denarius and as, payment of sums under a denarius was accepted in the native copper currency † (see, further, § 8).

In A.D. 6 Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and Judea became a Roman province under an under an experience of the contraction of the contrac imperial procurator, with headquarters in Cæsarea. Neglecting the copper coins of the Herodian princes, which had merely a local circulation, we may group the principal denominations circulating in Palestine during this period as follows:—

A. Imperial aurei and denarii, with 'superscrip-tion' in Latin.

B. Roman provincial silver and copper from the mint of Antioch, to which were added, after A.D. 17, the issues of the mint set up at Cæsarea Cappadociæ.

C. Silver and copper from the mint of Tyre.
 D. Copper coins from the procurator's mint at

A. The aureus and, in particular, the denarius were the standard coins of the empire, circulating everywhere. As first fixed by Julius Cæsar, the aureus; weighed 126.3 grs. (toth of libra or pound) of pure gold. This represents, at the mint price of gold, a sterling value of £1, 0s. 6d. In Augustus' later years, however, and under his successors to the time of Nero, the effective weight of the coins never exceeds $\frac{1}{47}$ pound or 120.3 grs. (see Hultsch, Metrol. 2309 ff.), equal to 19s. 6d. 8 Under Nero the weight fell to 115 grs. (18s. 8d.). The pieces of gold swallowed by the wretched fugitives from Jerusalem at the time of the great siege were aurei, the supply of which was so great after the capture of the city that—if we can believe Josephus (BJ v. xiii. 4)—the value fell from twenty-five denarii, the legal tariff, to twelve. The denarius (δηνάριον, originally the equivalent in silver of ten copper asses,—hence its name) from Augustus to Nero weighed $\frac{1}{14}$ libra or 60 grs., and was now = 4 sestertii or 16 asses. By Nero it was reduced to or 52 grs., still retaining, however, its legal value of $\frac{1}{2}$ of the aureus. The many conflicting estimates of the value of the denarius (the penny of our EV) which are to be met with in works of repute, render it imperative to discuss this subject more fully. King James's translators give the value thus: 'The Roman penny is the eighth part of an ounce [which it was not till after A.D. 60], which, after five shillings the ounce, is sevenpence halfpenny' (Mt 18^{28 marg.}). This method has two grave defects: (1) it attempts to value the denarius in terms of a constantly fluctuating quantity, the price of silver; and (2) even at the market price of silver at any given date, by this method we should only have the price of the denarius as bullion, not as a coin with a fixed legal currency. In order to express the value of the denarius in terms of our English standard (gold), we must start from its value relative to its own gold unit, viz. as 4th of the aureus. The denarius accordingly varied in value with the aureus from 9.83d. to 9.37d. of which 91d. may be taken as a sufficiently accurate mean value for ordinary calculations.*

B. Throughout the western half of the Roman empire the denarius was the only legal silver In the East, however, the system based on the Greek drachm was continued, the coins on this standard, chiefly tetradrachms and drachms, being issued for Syria and part of Asia Minor from the two imperial mints of Antioch and Cæsarea of Cappadocia. From the former mint † were sent forth tetradrachms with Greek legends, which, though actually weighing 220-230 grs., were tariffed by the imperial government at only three denarii (see Mommsen, Röm. Münzwesen, 37 f., 715 f.; Hultsch, Metrol.² 595). Antioch, moreover, shared with Rome the honour of having a mint for the issue of senatorial copper distinguished by their Latin legends, and, in particular, by the letters S. C., within a wreath, on the obverse. The two denominations issued, which also had legal currency throughout the Syro-Cappadocian monetary province, are generally identified with the sestertius and the as (Mommsen, op. cit. 718; Madden, Coins, 301 f.). The coins of Casarea § (from A.D. 17) are principally drachms and didrachms on the Phænician standard. Vast numbers of the former must have circulated in Palestine in the 2nd cent. (see below, § 10), but they can scarcely have reached that country in any number in the time of our Lord (see drachm, next §).

C. The great mint of Tyre continued to issue silver and bronze, the former mainly tetradrachms, without interruption down to the eve of Nero's innovations, on the old Phonician standard (220-224 grs.). In Josephus' day the Tyrian tetradrachm was, at least in popular usage, accepted as equivalent to four denarii (τοῦ Τυρίου νομίσματος δ τέσσαρα: 'Αττικα: δύναται, ΒJ ii. 21. 2, N. 592). It is the stater of the NT (see next §).

In order to complete this sketch of coins circulating in Palestine in the first century of our era, a single reference must be made to the money era, a single reference must be made to the money of the numerous cities (e.g. Samaria-Sebaste and the cities of the Decapolis) to which Rome had granted the right to strike 'autonomous' bronze coins. The circulation of these, it is true, was local and restricted, yet they are full of interest to the historical student, who is referred to the classical treatise of M. de Saulcy, La Numisenssical treatise of M. de Sautcy, La Nums-matique de la Terre Sainte, 1874. § 8. Money of the New Testament.—Under this head it is proposed to bring together the references to money and coins in the NT, at the same time avoiding all unnecessary repetition. In the NT, as in the OT, 'money' is still par excellence silver as in the O1, money is some particle siver money (άργυρος, αργύριος), although all three metals are in circulation (cf. Mt 10³ χρυσόν—άργυρον—χαλκόν). Large sums are expressed in minas (μνᾶ, AV pound) and talents (τάλαντον). The latter is no longer a weight of silver, but the Roman-Attic talent, which comprised 6000 denarii or drachms (Hultsch, Metrol. 2252, and Index 'Talent'). It was thus equal to 240 aurei, or £240 (see previous §). The mina (Lk 1913-25) is the sixtieth part of the talent, 100 denarii, or £4. Of specific coins, the aureus is only indirectly referred to in the passage above referred to: 'provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses '(Mt 10°). On the other hand, the denarius (δηνάριον, EV penny) is mentioned sixteen times in all in the NT, and constantly as the dinar (ער) in the Mishna. Its value stantly as the thind (4.7) in the Mishia. Its value in our Lord's time may with sufficient accuracy be set down as 94d., as was shown in the previous section. Our Revisers unfortunately have still adhered to the ridiculous rendering 'penny' instead of admitting the more accurate 'shilling,' as or admitting the more accurace shifting, as proposed by the American translators, and retaining 'penny' for the as || and 'farthing' for the quadrans (see below). The Roman taxes were reckoned and paid in denarii (cf. τὸ νόμισμα τοῦ κήνσον, Mt 22¹⁹); the 'image and superscription' (Lk 20²⁴) of a contemporary denarius of the emperor The integral in our plate No. 12

1 'Let à scásso (Mt 10²⁰, Lk 12⁵) be translated "penny," and dynásso "shilling," except in Mt 22¹⁹, Mk 12¹³, Lk 20²⁴, where the name of the coin should be given.'

The Greek drachm (δραχμή; in later Hebrew m zúz, also κηι, by which Onkelos renders correctly the quarter of the shekel, I S 9°) is only once mentioned by name (Lk 15° 'ten pieces of silver'). Its value at this time was neither 71d. as AVm, nor 8d. as RVm, but was the same as that of the denarius in ordinary transactions. In government payments, however, as we saw above, it was tarified at # of the denarius. The 50,000 'pieces of silver' (dpyvplov, Ac 1919) at which the magical books were valued, are also to be understood as denariusdrachms,* the universal unit of calculation. a previous section it has been shown that the δίδραχμον, or double-drachm, was the Gr. equivalent of the half-shekel, the whole shekel being a tetradrachm of Tyrian currency, The didrachm was very rarely coined at this time, and indeed was at all times much rarer than the tetradrachm. Hence it must have been very common, if not the usual custom, for two persons to unite in paying 'the tribute money' (τα δίδραχμα, Mt 1721)—the annual contribution of every male adult Jew to the maintenance of the temple services—by means of a Tyrian or other tetradrachm on the Phœnician standard. This last is the stater (στατήρ, Mt 1727 AV piece of money, RV shekel +) found in the fish's mouth, which Peter was instructed to pay as 'tribute money' for the Master and himself. The contributions of Jews in foreign lands were collected and changed into gold pieces (cynyn darkônim, Shekalim ii. 1, which are not daries but aurei; cf. Bab. bath. x. 2) for convenience of transport (see, further, Jos. Ant. xviii. ix. l, N. 312, where τὸ δίδραχμον is used precisely as by St. Matthew for 'half-shekel'). After the destruction of Jerusalem the half-shekel, otherwise two drachms or denarii (δύο δραχμάς, Jos. BJ VII. vi. 6), was appropriated by the Roman authorities for the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus (Jos. l.c.). The 'thirty pieces of silver' (τριάκοντα άργύρια, Mt 26¹⁵ 27²⁶.), for which our Lord was betrayed, and it has decomposed as the control of the control are in all the circumstances more likely to have been thirty Phoenician tetradrachms—hence = 120 denarii (£4, 16s.)-from the temple treasury (cf. Zeo 1112 in LXX), than thirty denarius-drachms.

We come now to the copper coins of the NT, and find mention of three different denominations. (1) The lowest of these is the lepton ($\lambda \in \pi \tau \delta \nu$, Mk $12^{42} = Lk 21^2$ the widow's 'mite'; Lk 12^{80} 'thou shalt not depart [out of prison] till thou hast paid the very last "mite" (τὸ ἐσχατον λεπτόν = Mt 5. τὸν ἐσχατον κοδράντην, 'the uttermost farthing')). The coin mentioned in these three passages can only be the pērūtah (מְּשִׁישִׁ), so often spoken of in the Mishna as proverbially the smallest Jewish coin (so Lk 12⁵⁶). In at least two places (Kiddush i. 1, Ediyy. iv. 7) it is expressly declared to have been tariffed as ith of the Italian or Roman as (יוֹאָפָּג אַס iṣṣâr (or aṣṣâr) italki), in other words the half of the Roman quadrans. This agrees precisely with the much discussed note — whether original or marginal in Mk 12¹² λεπτὰ δύο δ έστιν κοδράντης, 'two lepta, which makes a quadrans,' as it accords with 'the unanimous tradition of the Hellenistic metrologists' (Hultsch, Metrol.² 605, n. 6). It must be sought for among the minute bronzes of the Hasmonæan and Herodian princes, some of which do not weigh more than 15 to 20 grains. Since it is it of the as, or $\frac{1}{12\pi}$ th part of the denarius, its legal value was about ird of an English farthing. The two remaining bronzes may best be examined together; they are (2) the kodrantes (κοδρύτης, Mt 5.5, Mk 124 already cited), and (3) the assarion (doodo.co., Mt 1029 are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?  Lk 126 are not five sparrows sold for two farthings? Cf. Vulg. nonne quinque passeres veneunt dipondio?). The kodrantes is passeres veneunt dipondio?). The kodrantes is undoubtedly the Roman quadrans (the fourth part of the as, value about a farthing)—from which, of course, the name is derived—since in the one passage (Mk 12¹²) the note is clearly intended for Roman readers, and in the other (Mt 5²⁸) the popular perutah-lepton of Lk 12²⁹ is replaced by St. Matthew, familiar as a tax-gatherer with the Roman system of accounting by the with the Roman system of accounting, by the lowest denomination in the Roman scale. With lowest denomination in the Roman scale. With regard to the assarion (from the Latin assarium, a by-form of as) we are on less firm ground, for, in the existing uncertainty as to how the copper of the Hellenistic system was adjusted to that of the Roman system, we must not lastily identify the Hellenistic assarion with the Roman as. The former passed into the contemporary Hebrew as the issar (von. see Mishna, passim; cf. non of the Palmyra tariff, and the assārā of the Peshitta and Palestinian Syriac, Lk 12°), and the authorities of the Mishna repeatedly refer to the dinar or zûz (the denarius-drachm) as containing 6 maoth (myp obols), and 24 issarim, from which it is evident that in the 2nd cent. at least the issar-assarion was a different coin from the as. We venture to think that the key to the difficulty is to be found in the distinction between the 'current' and 'tariff' value of a coin, to adopt expressions employed in the East at the present day. In ordinary transactions the drachm and the denarius were equal in value, the former containing 6 obols, 24 dichalki or 48 chalki, and the latter 8 dupondii, 16 asses or 64 quadrantes. Since 24 issarim-assaria also went to the denarius-drachm, we must infer that the Graco-Roman name assarion was popularly applied to the old di-chalkus. But all government dues and official payments were calculated on the Roman denariusas system (see the rescript of Germanicus Cæsar, A.D. 17-19, quoted in the Palmyra tariff δεῖ πρὸς ασσάριον ιτα[λικόν]—elsewhere els δηνάριον—τὰ τέλη λογεύεσθαι, Col. IV-41 ff.), with the proviso added that small dues amounting to less than a denarius (τὸ δὲ ἐντὸς δηναρίου τέλος) might be defrayed in the native copper † (πρὸς κέρμα = 15τη; cf. same word in Peshitta Jn 2¹⁵). Now the Romans, it will be remembered, tariffed the tetradrachm at 3 denarii (i.e. 1 drachm=# denarius); accordingly a tax of the latter amount, ? denarius, might be paid either in Roman copper, if available, i.e. by 6 dupondii or 12 asses, or 48 quadrantes, or in native copper on the drachm-system, in this case by 6 obols (a drachm), or 12 tetrachalki (half-obols), or 48 chalki. By government tariff, therefore, dupondius was made equal to the obol, the as to the tetrachalkus, and the quadrans to the chalkus. These equations are confirmed (a) by the ancient gloss: δβολόs hoc duopundium (Corp. Gloss. ii. 378, cited by Kubitschek, art. 'Aσσάριον in Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyl. vol. ii.); and (b) by the Peshitta rendering of koopdarms, viz. shamond, which is the Talmudic prop shamon. Kiddush. 12c, ‡ i.e. the eighth part (of the olod), in other words the chalkus. We assume, then, that just as in Alexandria at the present day we have the 'piastre tariff' and the 'piastre current,' the former equal to two of the latter; so in NT times there was the current issar-assarion, which was the dichalkus, and the tariff or Roman as—distinguished from the other as the issar italki of the Mishna and the Palmyra tariff; cf. $\Lambda \Sigma(\sigma t \rho \omega)$ [TI($\Delta \lambda \kappa \sigma$) on coins of Crete of the 1st cent. (Svoronos, Num. de la Crète ancienne),—which was double the value of the former. The quadrans, finally, was always a tariff coin, represented by the imperial coins of the procurators (40-45 grs.), but popularly known by the name of its tariff equivalent, the Greek chalkus (Heb. shamin).*

C. THE COINS OF THE REVOLTS.

§ 9. Coins of the First Revolt (A.D. 66-70).—In the year A.D. 66 began the struggle against the might of imperial Rome, which ended in the destruction of both temple and city, August A.D. 70. To these five years (spring 66-67 to autumn 70-71) of the so-called 'first revolt' must be ascribed the first issue of silver money from a Jewish mint. These are the famous shekels and half-shekels of which we now give the illustration (Nos. 14, 15 of plate) and description.

Obv. שקל ישראל [shekel Yisrāēl, the shekel of Israel] in old-Heb. characters. Type: a jewelled chalice with knop on stem; above the cup שה [contraction for אין עפה אין year five]; border of dots. Perusalem the holy in same characters. Type:

The shekels and half-shekels of the first year are distinguished from those of the following years (1) by the chalice having a broad projecting lip instead of a jewelled rim; (2) by the letter & alone, without w; and (3) by the scriptio defective of the reverse legend, the adjective 'holy,' further, being without the article. No Jewish coins have given rise to so much discussion, or have been assigned to so many different periods of Jewish history as these. + The time of Ezra and Nehemiah, the age of Alexander the Great, and the principate of Simon Maccabæns have all been proposed, the last in particular, by almost all recent writers on Jewish history and archaeology. The main grounds on which this date must be pronounced untenable have been given in a former section (§ 5). The explicit given in a former section (§ 5). The explicit testimony of the coins themselves, with the uniform legend 'Jerusalem the holy,' proves, according to a well-known numismatic canon, that the authority under whose auspices the coins were struck was that of an independent and autonomous city. Now Jerusalem enjoyed the requisite independence only on two occasions,; and on both the independence was not constitutional but usurped. These two occasions coincide with the first and second revolts. The latter is out of the question, since the coins of that period are now known in great detail (see next §). There remains only the period

*This explains how the quadrans does not appear in a Hebraized form in the Mishna, like the as and the dupondius ()¹¹⁷18), which the Yulgate inserts in Lk 128. The coins of Herod with a X (χαλαῦς) on the obverse within a circle (Madden, p. 111), which weigh 43-48 grs., are also probably quadrantes-chalki. For the circulation of the quadrans in the East, see the Blass-Ramsay controversy over Mk 1242 in the Exp. Times, x. (1898-99) passim.

7 Besides the discussions in the numismatic works mentioned in the bibliography to this article, see Schürer, HJP1. ii. 379ff., 2 The most recent theory of all, that these shekels were struck by 'the [hypothetical] republic of Jerusalem' set up by Gabinius, B.C. 57/6-58/2 (Unger, 'xu Josephus iv., Die Republik Jerusalem,' Süzb. d. philos-philolog. Classe d. Akad. zu München, 1897, p. 199ff.), is based on too many hazardous combinations to command our confidence.

of the first revolt, A.D. 66-70.* We maintain, therefore,—and in this contention we claim the support of a growing body of expert opinion (Im-hoof-Blumer, Babelon, Reinach, and others),—that the coins in question were struck by the same executive authority (τὸ κοινὸν τῶν Ἱεροσολυμιτῶν, Jos. Life, passim) as was responsible for the defence of the city and the general conduct of the war. This attribution is confirmed by the comparative frequency of coins of the first three years, by the rarity of coins of the fourth year, and by their almost complete absence in the fifth year (April to August A.D. 70), all corresponding in the most complete manner with the success and gradual collapse of the Jewish power in the course of the revolt. Further, the fabric and module of these shekels present a remarkable similarity to those of the tetradrachms of Nero and Vespasian, issued about the same time from the mint of Antioch.+ It is possible, as Reinach suggests, that the immediate purpose of the new coinage was to supply, for the first time in Jewish history, native 'shekels of the sanctuary' for the various religious dues. ‡

The question of the copper coinage of the two revolts is too intricate a subject for detailed discussion here (see Schürer, HJP I. ii. 383 ff. for the conflicting views of numismatists). Only two sets of bronze coins can now, in all probability, be assigned to the same period as the silver shekels. These are (1) a set of small coins distinguished by the legend חרות ציון (hērúth Ziyyôn, emancipation of zion) round a vine leaf, and on the obverse, in old-Hebrew characters, 'year two' and 'year three' (illustr. Madden, p. 206). (2) A series of copper coins of three denominations, of which the distinguishing mark is the legend לנאלת ציון (lig'ullath Ziyy'an, the redemption of Zion) on the reverse; the obverses have the following : (a) שנה ארבע חצי (year four—a half), (b) שנת ארבע רביע (year four—a quarter), and (c) שנת ארבע (year four) alone. The principal types (see Madden, p. 71 ff.) are the lulab (לולב, a sort of bouquet composed of twigs of the myrtle and willow with a palm leaf; see Lv 2300) and 'ethrog (עַתְרֹנ a citron), which were carried in either hand at the feast of Booths. The obverse of the third group (c), however, is the chalice, which serves to connect the whole series with the shekels of the first revolt. The coins just described are generally known as 'the copper shekels of the year four,' it being assumed that they represent 1, 1, and 1 shekels respectively. If this be so—the view is by no means beyond question—these coins will be specimens of 'siege money,' tokens issued by the authorities to be re-deemed by silver money after the victory—which never came.

Perhaps no coins of antiquity have been more frequently reproduced in illustrations than the numerous coins struck by Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and the Roman senate to commemorate the subjugation of Judea (see Madden, pp. 207-229; de Saulcy, Numism. de la Terre Sainte, p. 207-229; de Saulcy, Numism. de la Terre Sainte, p. 79 ff.; Pick, Zeit. f. Numism. xiv. 1887, 328 ff.). One of these, an aureus of Titus, is shown in No. 16.

§ 10. Coins of the Second Revolt, A.D. 132-135.— The history of the Jewish community in Judæa during the sixty years that followed the destruction of their temple is very imperfectly known; in particular, the antecedents of the shortlived but sanguinary rebellion which broke out in the 16th year of Hadrian's principate.* The conflicting and fragmentary evidence seems to warrant either of two alternatives. Either the Jews were goaded to revolt by coercive measures on Hadrian's part, and by the founding of Ælia Capitolina with its heathen temple, on the occasion of his visit to Jerusalem A.D. 130; † or on a former visit visit to Jerusalem A.D. 130; † or on a former visit visit to Jerusalem A.D. 130; † or on a former visit visit to Jerusalem A.D. 130; † or on a former visit visit to Jerusalem A.D. 130; † or on a former visit visi in A.D. 117 (see for this Dürr, op. cit. p. 63, following Epiphanius) the Jews had received permission to rebuild the temple, and were now incited to revolt by Bar Cochba, whose Messianic claims had been approved by R. Aktba, the most respected religious leader of the time. The founding of Ælia Capitolina would thus fall naturally after the suppression of the revolt. The numismatic evidence seems rather favourable to the second alternative.

The distinguishing feature of the silver coins of the 'second revolt' is the fact that they are all, probably without a single exception, imperial denarii, drachms, and tetradrachms from the mints of Rome, Cæsarea, and Antioch respectively, which have been re-struck with Jewish types and legends. On most of them some trace, more or less, of the original legend, and even in some cases of the head of the emperor—from Galba to Hadrian inclusive—has survived. Where such is not the case, we may assign as the cause the success of the process of re-striking rather than the use of native flans. Our knowledge of these coins has recently been enlarged by a valuable find a few miles from Hebron, which has enabled a German numismatist to undertake an exhaustive study of all the known specimens (see L. Hamburger, 'Die Silbermünzprägungen während des letzten Aufstandes der Israeliten gegen Rom' in Von Sallet's Zeitsch. für Numismatik, xviii. (1892) pp. 240–347).

short period of the revolt is very remarkable, since, according to Hamburger's data, no fewer than twenty-four different classes of silver coins have to be registered (op. cit. p. 246). From these we learn that the leaders of the revolt were the secular chief, 'Simeon, Nasi (or Prince) of Israel,' and the religious head of the nation, 'Eleazar the (high) priest.' The latter has been variously identified as Eleazar of Modein, whose priestly descent, however, is uncertain; Eleazar ben Azariah (Hamburger), and most recently Eleazar ben Harsom (Schlatter, op. cit. 54 ff.; 'assez plausible' is Bacher's verdict, REJ, 1898). The Simeon of the coin-legends can hardly be other than the pseudo-Messiah known as Simon bar

From the relative sizes (Æ 4 and 6) and weights of the bronzes with the bunch of grapes and the vine leaf respectively as obv. types (see No. 21), it is evident that the former are one half of the latter, perhaps 'current' chalki and dichalki respectively (see § 8). The types of these revolt coins, silver and copper alike, in almost all cases have a reference to some characteristic product of the country (palm, vine, grapes), or to the paraphernalia of the temple-worship (lyre, flagon, trumpets)

The fall of Bethar, the modern Bittir, a few miles S.W. of Jerusalem, where Simeon and his frenzied followers made their last despairing stand, had been preceded by the recapture of Jerusalem, on the site of which Hadrian built his new city of Ælia Capitolina. The coins commemor-ating its foundation are given by Madden, p. 249 ff., and de Saulcy, Numism. de la Terre Sainte,

Our task is done. Yet the writer cannot forbear to call attention once more to the most striking feature of Jewish numismatics, and to a reflexion which it suggests. Not once in the whole course of their history did the Jews enjoy, as a constitu-tional and legal right, the privilege of coining money in either silver or gold.—Is not this a mission of the Hebrew race lay in another than the temporal sphere, even the spiritual? 'Out of Zion' went 'forth the Law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem.

§ 11. Appendix. The purchasing power of money in Bible times. —Throughout this article an approximate estimate in sterling currency has been given of the moneys of the various standards we have met with in the course of the history of the Hebrew race. A much more adequate idea of their real value, however, would be gained if we knew their purchasing power in these ancient times. sidering the compass and variety of our Scriptures, it is somewhat remarkable how few indications are to be found of the prices of the ordinary articles of commerce. The purchase of land is probably more frequently mentioned than any other (Gn 23^{11st}. 33^{1st}, 2 S 24^{2st}, 1 K 16^{2st}, Jer 32^{5st}, Mt 27⁷), but in no case have we definite information as to the size of the ground acquired. From Is 723 we learn that a good vineyard was valued at the rate of a thousand vines for 'a thousand silverlings' or silver shekels, a sum (c. £135) which represents the yearly rent (though this is not certain) of Solomon's vineyard at Baal-hamon (Ca 811). This monarch paid '600 shekels of silver' (c. £80) for an Egyptian chariot, and a quarter of that sum for a horse (2 Ch 117); in each case, no doubt, a high price. A better indication of the value of money in antiquity is the rate of wages paid. Micah's private chaplain received but ten shekels a year (Jg 1710). He had, however, 'everything found' in addition, as had the angel Raphael when he accepted service with Tobit for a drachm a day (Tob 5¹⁴ (Gr. 15) δραχμὴν τῆς ἡμέρας καὶ τὰ δέοντά σοι). In NT times a denarius (9½d.) was a fair day's wages for a labourer (Mt 20^{2π}.). Labourers in Cicero's time got only 12 asses (c. 7d.), but soldiers received a denarius. The price of slaves naturally varied not only according to age and capacity, but also according to the supply. The normal value, also according to the supply. The normal value, according to the Priests' Code, was 30 shekels, over £4 (Ex 21^{32}). Joseph was sold for twenty (Gn 37^{28}). The former price differs but little from the average of 120 drachms in the age of the Ptolemies (Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 3). A talent was a high price even for an educated slave 'in the flower of his youth' (Ant. XII. iv. 9), while ninety slaves for that amount (2 Mac 811) represent the other extreme. The truest indication of all would be the price of the standard food-stuffs, especially wheat and barley, but unfortunately the biblical data are scanty in the extreme. In 2 K 7¹ a seah (about 1½ peck) of fine flour was sold for a shekel (2s. 9d.), and two seahs of barley at the same price. This could only be considered cheap in comparison with the previously existing famine prices (2 K 6²⁵).* Another 'famine' price is found Rev 6⁶: a choenix (about a quart) of wheat for a denarius, and three of the same measure of barley at the same price. From these two passages (2 K 7¹, Rev 6⁶) we learn this at least, that in the period of the monarchy flour was twice as dear as barley meal, while in the 1st cent. A.D. the price of wheat was to that of barley as 3:1. In any case the prices in Reve-lation are very high, about twelve times the ordi-nary prices, to judge from those of the 2nd cent. as given in the Mishna. Thus a seah of wheat is there priced at a denarius (Erubin viii. 2), about 16s. a quarter.† Little can be learned from the contradictory statements of Josephus (Wars, II. xxi. 2, and Life, 13) regarding the price of oil, beyond the fact of its extreme cheapness in Galilee during the war with Rome. The low price of the sparrow, finally, is familiar to every reader of the Gospels, two being sold for a 'current' issar-assarion, or a farthing and a half (see § 8), and five for three English farthings.

LITERATURE.—Indispensable for the study of Jewish numismatics is F. W. Madden's exhaustive corpus, Coins of the Jews, 1881, which has taken the place of his earlier work, History of Jewish Coinage, 1864. Hardly less so are B. V. Head's Historia Numorum, 1887, which covers the whole field of Greek numismatics, and Fr. Hultsch, Griechische und Römische Metrologie, 2te Bearbeitg, 1882. Other standard works are, besides the general works of Eckhel and Mionnet:—F. de Saulcy, Recherches sur la Numismatique Judaique, 1854; Cavedoni, Biblische Numismatik, trans. from the Italian by Werlhof, 1855; Levy, Gesch. d. jüdischen Münzen, 1862; de Saulcy, Numismatique de la Terre Sainte, 1874 (complement of his Recherches, dealing only with non-Jewish coins of Palestine); Merzbacher in the Zeitschrift f. Numismatik, Bd. iii.-v., 1876-78 (specially on the 'Maccabsan' shekels); Th. Reinach, Les monnaies juives, 1887: Hamburger, Z. f. Numism. xviii. 1892 (see § 10). The standard works on the Persian, Phonician, Ptolemaic, Seleucid, and Roman coins respectively are given in the body of the article.

MONEY-CHANGERS (EXCHANGERS, CHANGERS, BANKERS).—In the preceding article it has been shown how various were the standards according to which money was reckoned in the course of Jewish history. In the 1st cent. of our era, for example (MONEY, § 8), we find coins of the Roman example (MONEY, 8 8), we find coins of the Roman system (denarius, as, etc.) side by side with coins of the Greek system (drachm, tetradrachm, etc.). The Jews, moreover, according to the testimony of their own Rabbis, were required to pay the sacred dues in coins of still another standard, viz. the Phenician. When to these facts is added the circumstance that Palestine and Jerusalem, in par-ticular, were visited by vast numbers of Jews 'out of every nation under heaven' (Ac 26), each of whom required to be furnished with the current coins of the country, it will be admitted that there was great need for 'the tables of the money-changers.' The words denoting this important class of the community in NT are three in number: class of the community in NT are three in number: (1) κερματιστής (from κέρμα, a small coin, then money generally, Jn 213), Jn 214 only, AV and RV 'changers of money,' parallel to and synonymous with (2) κολνβιστής (from κόλλυβος, originally a small coin, apparently one fourth of the χαλκοῦς [Hultzsch, Metrol.² p. 228], then the 'commission' or agio paid to the money-changer), Mt 2112, Mk 1116, AV and RV 'money -changers,' Jn 216 'changers,' According to some we should distinguish the According to some we should distinguish the κερματιστής who gave small change (κέρματα) for the larger coins, copper and silver, etc., from the κολλυβιστής who 'changed foreign money at an agio (καταλλαγή), or provided gold to be remitted abroad (Smith's Dict. of Antiq. 'Argentarii'). The Jews however, expressed both words by the post-biblical ាក្នុក្ស shulhāni (from shulhān, table), which is merely the Hebrew equivalent of (3) τραπεζίτης (from τράπεζα, the table or stand at which the changer sat and on which he ranged his money, Mt 2½, Mk 11½, Jn 2½, AV and RV 'tables,' but Lk 19½ 'bank'*), only Mt 25th, AV 'exchangers,' RV 'bankers.' The business of the Jewish shulhand was threefold. (1) he shanged the larger denomina was threefold: (1) he changed the larger denominations (tetradrachm, denarius, drachm) into their equivalent in the copper money in which the minor purchases of the average household were made, or, it might be, the gold aureus into silver coin, and vice versa. (2) He exchanged all money that had not legal currency in Palestine into such as had. (3) The wealthier members of the class received (3) The wealthier members of the class received money on deposit for the purpose of investment, on which interest (τόκος, Mt 25²⁷, Lk 19²³ AV 'usury,' RV 'interest') at fixed rates was paid. They also reporting drafts on correspondents abroad. This negotiated drafts on correspondents abroad. third department will be dealt with more in detail under Usury.

The 'money-changers' are introduced in the NT, in respect of the first two departments of their business, in the incident (or incidents) of the clearing of the temple courts (Mt 21^{12π}, Mk 11^{13π}, Jn 2^{13π}.). The practice had grown up of allowing the shulhānim to set up their stands or 'tables' (¹⁷/₁) in the outer court or 'court of the Gentiles' for the convenience of the numerous worshippers, especially of these from free growing like the standard of the same and t especially of those from foreign countries—a practice which evidently led to much unseemly wrangling, and even to acts of downright dishonesty (cf. Mt 21¹³, Mk 11¹⁷, Lk 19⁴⁸). A special and important branch of the money-changer's work was the providing of the half-shekel or didrachm (MONEY, § 8) required annually of every adult male for the maintenance of the public services of the temple.

^{*} MT is here corrupt. Cheyne emends: 'A homer (10 bushels) of lentils for 50 shekels, and a quarter of a cor (2½ bushels) of carob-pods for 5 shekels, 'Expos. July 1899.
† Cf. Baba Mezia v. 1, where a kor (30 seahs) of wheat is bought for 25 and sold for 30 denarii, also 16s. a quarter. In Cicero's time wheat was sold at Rome at the rate of 3 sestertii the modius, which is under £1 a quarter.

From the Mishna treatise Shekalim we learn that one month (15th Adar) before the Passover festival accredited shulhanim set up their tables in the provinces to receive the contributions of the provincials, removing ten days later to the capital (see, further, TRIBUTE MONEY). While in their ordinary transactions the changers were probably not over-scrupulous as to the amount of commission they charged, in the case of the half-shekel the amount of the agio (μυγρ, κόλλυβον) was fixed at 4 per cent. This seems the natural inference from the data in Shekalim i. 6, 7, which we understand to mean that the price of the Tyrian tetradrachm or stater (Mt 17"), which contained 24 mooth (my;) or obols, was 25 obols, the extra obol (1 in 25, or 4 p.c.=c. 1\d.) being the agio. This we saw (Money, \(\frac{3}{2} \) was probably the usual method of paying the tax. For a single half-shekel or didrachm of silver apparently only half an obol was charged (see Shell. 1. end *). A commission of 4 p.c. seems to have been usual in secular transactions also. In Mellah vi. 4 we read of an aureus (=25 denarii) being spent, although the total of the purchases amounts to only 24 denarii. Clearly the remaining denarius was retained as agio. The changers had always to be on their guard against false money, hence the saying-

אין דֶּרֶוּ שׁוּלְטָנִי לְפּן אִיכֶּר עֵר שִׁיִּשׁל דִינְרוֹ

'it is not the custom of the money-changer to give change (lit. an issar or as) until he receives [and has tested] his denarius!' A. R. S. KENNEDY.

MONSTER.—The only occurrence of this word is in La 4, where in AV 138 tannin (LXX δράκοντες) is tr⁴ 'sea monsters,' RV 'jackals.' Post prefers voolves; see Dragon, vol. i. p. 621*. Amer. RV prefers 'monster' to 'dragon' in Is 271, Jer 5124.

The adj. 'monstrous' is applied in Wis 17¹⁵ to the apparitions which terrified the Egyptians during the plague of darkness,—'were partly vexed with monstrous apparitions (τέρασι φαντασμάτων, Vulg. monstrorum timore), and partly fainted.

A monster (Lat. monstrum, a divine omen, from monere, to warn) is anything which attracts the attention from being out of the ordinary course of nature. The 'sea monsters' above are so on account of their size, while the adj. 'monstrous' is used of the apparitions, because of their warning or ominous character. Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Paraphrase, i. fol. lxvi, 'It semeth a monstreous thing unto them which chaunced to the Prophete Jonas: they shall have a lyke monstre, but more wondre-

The tr. of Ps 716 in Pr. Bk. is, 'I am become as it were a monster unto many,' on which Davies (Bible English, 183) remarks, 'We might suppose that the Psalmist meant that he was an object of horror and detestation, but he is affirming that his preservation through so great trials and dangers appeared miraculous to many.' Driver (Parallel Psalter) translates, 'I am become as it were a portent unto many,' and in a footnote explains, 'Attracting attention on account of my extraordinary sufferings,' comparing Dt 286' (for a sign and for a portent'). So most commentators. Shakespeare often uses the adj. of that which attracts attention because of its magnitude, as I Henry IV. II. iv. 530, 'the sheriff with a most monstrous watch is at the door'; II Henry VI. IV. vil. 88, 'O monstrous coward.'

MONUMENT.—This word occurs in Is 654 'A rebellious people . . . which remain among the graves, and lodge in the monuments' (ילינו), RV 'and lodge in the secret places,' RVm 'vaults').

*See this treatise for other details, especially chs. i. and ii. B.g. the priests, but not the Levites, were exempt from the payment of commission. Again, 'if one gives [to the changer] a tetradrachm (p'2) and [after paying the half-shekel due] receives back a didrachm (לְקָלֶל), he has to pay double agio (פלע וניפל לקקל חיב לשי פול בנות) סלע וניפל ליקל חיב לשי פול בנות). VOL. 111.—28

The EV word 'monuments' means 'tombs.' The Rhemish NT often uses the word in this sense, after the Vulg. monumentum. Thus Mt 232 'You build the Prophets sepulchres, and garnish the moniments of just men; Lk 827 'There mette him a certaine man that had a devil now a very long a certaine man that had a devil now a very long time, and he did weare no clothes, neither did he tarie in house, but in the monuments.' So John's disciples (Mk 6²⁸) 'tooke his body, and they put it in a monument'; and our Lord's sepulchre is called a 'monument' in Mt 27⁵⁰, Lk 23⁵³, Jn 19⁵², Ac 13²⁰. Cf. Shaks. Tit. Andronicus, II. iii. 228—

Upon his bloody finger he doth wear A precious ring, that lightens all the hole, Which like a taper in some monumer Doth shine upon the dead man's earthy cheeks, And shows the ragged entrails of the pit.'

The translation of Is 65⁴ is uncertain, owing to the uncertainty of the reference. The Heb. word means literally 'guarded places.' The LXX renders the two clauses in one, is vein purposes and is vein evaluates an ability the Syriac follows this interpretation, which is explained by Jerome as a method of obtaining oracles in dreams by what is known as incubation (samplereal), i.e. spending the night in subterranean sacred places. W. R. Smith (RS², 1981.) points out that 'the whole N. Semitic area was dotted over with sacred tombs, Memnonia, Semiramis mounds, and the like, and at every such spot a god or demigod had his subterranean abode.' MOOLI (A Mooki, B -ei, AV Moli), 1 Es 8^{er} (LXX ⁴⁶) = MAHLI, Ezr 8¹⁸, son of Merari and grandson of Levi (see Ex 6¹⁶. ¹⁹). The LXX in all places renders יחלי in this way.

MOON.—The most common name used for the second of the great lights of heaven in the OT is קיין," written in Phoenician with the same consonants; in Assyr. irihu; Eth. wareh. The meaning of the word is regarded as uncertain, but there can be but little doubt that the root to which it belongs was originally of the class "a, as is clearly indicated by the Ethiopic, and also by the Assyrian name for 'month,' which, being transcribed in the month-name Marcheswan with a replacing the original w (m and w are interchangeable consonants in Assyrian), implies a connexion with the Assyrian word arbu 'road,' and confirms the correctness of word areu 'road,' and confirms the correctness of the suggestion of Ges. Buhl that 77; means 'wanderer,' and is connected with the cognate 77% 'to wander,' 'journey.' The less common word 777 designates the moon as 'the white one,' from the root 177 'to be white.' There is also another word, namely $77, which is used to designate the new moon (see NEW MOON, and art. FEASTS in vol. i. p. 8599). vol. i. p. 859b).

Where first mentioned in the Bible (Gn 116), neither of the above words is used, the luminary being described as 'the lesser light' (parallel with the description there given of the sun as the 'greater light'). It is described as being placed in the heavens to rule the night, and also 'for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years'; and it was apparently as a time-measurer that it was principally looked on by the Hebrews, and also, to a somewhat less degree, by the Babylonians and Assyrians, to whom the chief character of the moon was a personal one, namely, that of the representative of the moon god Sin (cf. Sennacherib = Sin has multiplied the brothers') and the moon-goddess (the moon as the consort of the sun) As. A further reference to the moon as the indicator of the (religious) festivals is to be found in Ps 104¹⁸ 'he appointeth the moon for seasons, and the sun knoweth his going down.

Notwithstanding that the bright portion of the moon's disc, being always turned towards the sun,

implied that it received its light from that body, the moon is represented in Gn 1 as having been created at the same time as the sun, and apparently as shining by its own light. It was also, with the sun, set in the heavens to give light upon the earth, and as the 'lesser light' to rule over the night, and to divide between the light and between the darkness, though this is, with reference to the moon, a very loose phrase, when we take into consideration the imperfect way in which it performs this office.

All these statements would, of course, lead one to suppose that the Hebrews had but a very imperfect knowledge of astronomy, and especially of the movements of the luminary in question, though they must have seen and noticed the regularity of its motions, and it apparently became for them, in course of time, a kind of emblem of constancy and everlastingness, hence the expressions 'peace as long as the moon endureth' (Ps 72'), and 'estab-lished for ever as the moon' (Ps 89", likewise Ps 72" as long as the sun and moon endure [lit. with the sun and in the presence of the moon] throughout all generations'

The calm, clear light of the moon seems to be noticed in the expressions 'fair as the moon, parallel to the second member of the verse, 'clear as the sun,' both being comparisons referring to the Shulammite in Ca 6¹⁰. Increase of the light of the moon to the equal of that of the sun is foretold for the day when the Lord should bind up His people's hurt, and heal their wound Is 30²⁶). The influence of the moon on persons is apparently referred to in Ps 121⁶, in the phrase, 'The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night,' where the smiting by the sun being undoubtedly sunstroke, the smiting by the moon may well be regarded as an early instance of the belief that the rays of the moon could exert an influence so baleful as to produce lunacy, or to cause that a person might become 'moon-struck.' That the moon was supposed to have this effect is hardly to be wondered at, as many people believe the same thing at the present time; and in ancient days it was supposed also that its rays could bring on epilepsy, as is illustrated by the Greek text of Mt 42 and 1715, where the original has σεληνιαζομένους and σεληνιάζεται, 'epileptic' (RV). There is some uncertainty as to what is intended by the 'precious things put forth by the moons' in Dt 33¹⁴ (AV). The phrase has been supposed to refer to the produce of the months in their order, which is not improbable. An Assyrian tablet exists in which the produce of every month is enumerated in order, and as moon and month are convertible terms it is not unlikely that something of the kind is intended here, rather than omens derived from the moon's motions, such as are so often found among the numerous astrological forecasts of Babylonia and Assyria. In fact we should probably translate 'months,' not 'moons,' although or certainly contains a play upon or; 'moon,' in poetical parallelism with sun (Driver, ad loc.).*

With the nations around the moon was

With the nations around, the moon was, conjointly with the sun and the other heavenly bodies, regarded as a deity, and divine honours were paid it as such. Among the Babylonians and Assyrians the moon, as a deity, was apparently not called irihu, but Sin (possibly also pronounced Sen), and it is this word that we meet with as the first element of the name of the well-known Assyrian king Sennacherib.† Besides this, however, he was also called Aku, and it is in all probability

*Steuernagel, who retains 'moons,' thinks the allusion is to the dew, which is traced to the moon as light is to the sun.
† With regard to the etymology of the word Sin, it has been suggested that this is for Zuen, 'knowledge-lord' (generally written En-zu-na—i.e. so as to be read Zu-en-na), one of his Accadian names.

this word that we find in the Babylonian royal name Eri-aku (Eri-eaku) or Arioch. Another not uncommon name of the moon-god among the Babylonians was Nannara, under which appellation he was worshipped at Ur (Mugheir or Mukeyyer), a city probably possessing his oldest and most renowned temple. The month Sivan was dedicated to the moon-god by the old inhabitants of Babylonia. Reference has already been made to the moon-goddess Aa, who was regarded as the consort of the sun-god Samas, and was probably the equivalent of the Ashtaroth-karnaim of the Phœnicians.†

The name of the moon-god seems to have been Sin, not only in Assyria and Babylonia, but in other parts of the ancient East also. Thus we have reference to this deity in the name of Mount Sinai, the peninsula of which, even at the end of the 6th cent. B.C., was devoted to the worship of the moon. Antoninus Martyr relates that, at the time of the worship of the deity in this district, the marble of which the idols were made changed colour, and ultimately became black as pitch, returning when the festival was over to its original hue at which he wondered greatly. This was, of hue, at which he wondered greatly. This was, of course, a symbolical festival, typifying the phases of the moon in its monthly journey, the change of the colour of the statues of the god being brought about artificially, but in such a way as to work upon the superstitions of the ignorant. The Phœnicians seem to have worshipped the new moon under the name of pin Hodesh (Baethgen, p. 61). See New Moon. The moon-god was represented either standing with his attributes, or seated upon a horse. In Palmyra he seems to have been called Yarkhibol (= Yareah-baal), and in the name Aglibol we have a reference to the moon as a 'young steer,' by the Assyrian equivalent of which it is designated in the hymn to the moon-god published in WAI iv. pl. 9. In an Assyrian inscription the name of an Arab, Aa-kamaru, leads one to ask whether we may not have here two old names of the moon deity: Aa, the Babylonian goddess of the moon as the consort of the sun-god; and kamaru, an Assyrian transcription of the Arabic kamar, 'the moon.'

With the Egyptians there were several moon-deities, all masculine. The principal of these was Thoth, the god of knowledge, an attribute applied to him in consequence of the moon's character as time-measurer (for such is the meaning of its name in the Indo-European languages). Sefekh, a goddess associated with Thoth, in all probability typified the full moon. As the wanderer, the moon was called Khunsu or Khons. Isis, Muth, and Hathor, who wear as their crowns the disc of the moon, were evidently in some manner associated with that luminary.

The worship of the moon and the other heavenly bodies is mentioned and prohibited in Dt 17. Kissing the hand on seeing the moon (undoubtedly an act of adoration) is referred to in Job 31²⁶⁷, and sacrifices made 'unto the queen of heaven' ‡ are spoken of in Jer 44¹⁷. The moon- or crescentshaped ornaments spoken of as adornments of 'the daughters of Zion' in Is 318 (cf. Jg 821.26), were hame of Camarina, apparently from the same root as the Arab. kamar (see below).

† There is also a deity named Laban, mentioned as having been worshipped in the temple of Anu, in the city of Asshur. As the moon-god was the minister of Anu, the question naturally arises whether the word Laban may not, in this passage, be another name of Sin. If this be the case, Laban would be connected with 7175.

MORDEGAI (ττιρ., Baer ττιρ: Μαρδοχαῖοι: Mardochæus, Ezr 2º Mardochæus; the name denotes belonging to Merodach, or Marduk, a Babylonian deity).—1. One of the leaders of the people at the time of the return of the exiles under Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Ezr 2², Neh 7⁷, 1 Es 5³). From a comarison of the three lists it appears probable that the leaders were twelve in number.

2. The deliverer of the Jews in the Book of He is described as a Benjamite, the son Esther. of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, one of the Jewish captives who had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar in the days of Jehoiachin (Est Mordecai lived in Shushan (Susa), the Persian capital, and brought up as his own daughter his cousin Esther, whose parents were dead (2'). When Esther was taken into the royal harem, Mordecai forbade her to reveal her connexions or her nationality (220). He was nevertheless able to remain in close communication with her, and for this purpose he was constantly at the gate of the palace. Here he discovered the plot of two eunuchs against the king, and, by informing Esther of it, procured their execution, the only reward which he himself as yet received being the entry of his name in the royal chronicles (2¹⁹⁻³⁸). When Haman [which see] was exalted to the rank of chief minister, Mordecai aroused his wrath by repeatedly refusing to bow before him; and, to avenge the slight, Haman procured from the king a decree for the destruction of the Jews, Mordecai's fellow-countrymen (3). After Esther, who had heard from her maidens of the distress of Mordecai and the Jews, had sent to inquire the mordecal and the Jews, had sent to inquire the cause, Mordecai, by means of the eunuch Hathach, informed her of the king's decree, and bade her go to the king and seek for protection for her people, reminding her that she also would be one of the victims of the massacre (4). Meanwhile, however, Haman, mortified at the continued disrespect shown to him by Mordecai, determined to anticipate the messacre and preparing a high gibbet. pate the massacre, and, preparing a high gibbet, went to the palace to obtain permission to hang Mordecai thereon. The king, who during a sleepless night had heard the chronicles read, and thus learnt that Mordecai's services remained unrewarded, consulted Haman, on his appearance, as to a fitting recompense for one whom the king

^a The interpretation of v.⁶ is disputed, the relative 'who' being referred either to Mordecai himself, or to Kish, his great-grandfather. On chronological grounds it is practically impossible to suppose that any one carried to Babylon in B.c. 597 should be living in the reign of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) 485–465. If, on the other hand, we regard the Book of Esther as being in the main unhistorical, this difficulty ceases to be of weight. Grammatical considerations do not decide the question, for, though certainly it is more natural to refer the pronoun to Mordecai, the other construction cannot be regarded as impossible, if on independent grounds we are unwilling to convict the author of a great anachronism (comp. Bertheau-Rysel, ad loc.; Kuenen refuses to lay any weight on this passage, Hist.-Krit. Binl. 1. ii. 209).

wished to honour. In consequence of his own suggestion the vizier was then bidden to conduct his enemy in honour round the city, while his friends saw in this misfortune an omen of his coming overthrow by Mordecai (5°-6). After the diagrace and death of Haman, Mordecai succeeded to his place, receiving the king's seal, being arrayed in gorgeous attire, and writing letters in the king's near to creat the king's near the k the king's name to grant the Jews permission to defend themselves; while the fame of Mordecai throughout the empire led all the Persian officials to assist the Jews (8. 9^{3L}). Finally, Mordecai and Esther wrote two letters to all the Jews, enjoining that the feast of Purim should be everywhere cele-brated on the 14th and 15th days of Adar; and that fastings and lamentation should be connected with the observance of the festival (9²⁰⁻³²). The Bk. of Esther closes with an account of the fame and dignity of Mordecai, who stood next in rank to the king, and was recognized as the protector of his countrymen (10).

The apocryphal additions to Esther in the Greek version glorify Mordecai still more. In the LXX the book opens with the description of a dream which he had concerning two great dragons, and a great river springing from a little fountain. In the last chapter Mordecai interprets this dream, explaining the river of queen Esther, and the dragons of Haman and himself (Ad. Est 11²⁻¹² 10). We find also a few more particulars regarding the conspiracy of the two eunuchs, and a prayer of Mordecai, in which he declares that his refusal to bow before Haman was prompted by zeal for the glory of God, and not by human pride (138-17). In later literature the first reference to the Bk. of Esther is in 2 Mac 1526, where the 14th of Adar is called the Day of Mordecai.

As the general question of the historical character of the Bk. of Eather is discussed elsewhere [ESTHER], it will be sufficient to add here one or two comments on the position assigned to Mordecai. There is a certain inconsistency in the representation that Esther's Jewish descent was unknown (2³⁰), whereas Mordecai was recognized as a Jew (3^{4ff.} 5¹³), and was in frequent communication with the queen (22 4), and also in the fact that the king should bestow honour upon Mordecai the Jew after the race had been proscribed. On the other hand, it is a plausible view which regards Kish (2⁵), not as the great-grandfather of Mordecai, but as his remote ancestor, the father of Saul, and holds Haman to be an Amalekite (so Jos. Ant. XI. vi. 5, 12; and Targ.); in this case the descendant of Saul is opposed to the descendant of his ancient enemy Agag. In profane history we hear of no great minister of Xerxes whom we can identify with Mordecai, but it must be admitted that the domestic annals of this reign are scanty. To connect the Jewish vizier with the influential eunuch Matacao, named by Ctesias (so Rawlinson), seems very precarious. During the last years of Xerxes, Artabanus, the commander of the bodyguard, was the chief minister.

In Rabbinical literature Mordecai is a favourite character. The late Targum on Esther traces the descent of the 'righteous' Mordecai from Shimei, who cursed David, and from Jonathan the son of Saul: he knows the seventy languages, he receives supernatural warning of the danger of the Jews, and a long description is given of the pomp and splendour bestowed upon him after he became the H. MORE.—In middle English there were two comparatives, 'moe' referring to number, and 'more' referring to size or importance; and the distinction between them was occasionally observed as late as the publication of AV in 1611. Thus Nu 22½ in the first ed. of AV reads, 'And Balak sent yet againe Princes, moe, and more honourable then they'; and 33¾ 'To the moe ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the lesse inheritance.' The Anglo-Saxon word was md, originally an adv. and connected with Lat. magis, Goth. mais, Germ. mchr. This md became in Eng. 'mo 'with subscript e (whence 'moe' and 'moo') as bdn became 'bone,' drdn 'drone,' and the like (Earle, Philology, § iii.). The spelling is capricious even in Elizabethan writers. Shaks. varies between 'mo' and 'moe'; Tindale's favourite spelling is 'moo.' Ridley, A Brefe Declaration, has 'mo' on p. 163 (Moule's ed.), 'Therfore I wyll rehearse no places of him than hertofore I have done of the other'; and 'moo' on p. 171, 'it should not nede . . . to bring in for the confyrmation of thys matter anye moo.' In AV 'mo' occurs once 2 S 5½, and 'moe' 34 times.

'More' is really a double comparative, already formed in Anglo-Sax., mdra. It is at least probable that it was originally confined to greater bulk or importance, but even early examples show that 'moe' and 'more' were used almost indiscriminately. Wright (on Shaks. As You Like It, p. 135) thinks that, as far as Shaks. and AV are concerned, all that can be asserted is that 'moe' is used only with the plural, 'more' with both sing. and plural. Modern editors of Shaks. (chiefly Rowe in 1709) and of AV (chiefly Paris in 1762 and Blayney in 1769) have changed 'moe' into 'more.' Scrivener restored 'moe' in his Camb. Paragraph Bible, but nothing seems to be gained by it. In Shaks., on the other hand, the form 'moe' is sometimes required by the verse. Thus in Much Ado, II, iii. 72—

Sing no more dittles, sing no moe, Of dumps so dull and heavy; The fraud of men was ever so, Since summer first was leavy.'

Examples of 'more' in the sense of 'greater' are Ac 19²³ 'the more part knew not wherefore they were come together'; 27¹² 'the more part advised to depart thence also.' Cf. Mt 11¹¹, Wyc. 'Trewly I say to you, ther roose noon more than Joon Raptist amonge children of wommen; forsothe he that is lesse in the kyngdam of hevenes, is more than he'; Ro 9¹³, Wyc. 'the more schal serve to the lasse'; Tind. Expos. 228, 'Locusts are more than our grasshoppers'; Shaks. K. John, II. 324—

'O, take his mother's thanks, a widow's thanks, Till your strong hand shall help to give him strength To make a more requital to your love!'

MOREH.—1. OAK(S) OF, RVm 'Terebinth(s),' AV [wrongly, with Targ. Onk.] Plain(S) OF; Gn 126 την δήνα, την δρῦν την ὑψηλήν, convallem illustrem; Dt 1120 την ηλα, τῆν δρῦν (so Sam.) τῆν ὑψηλῆν, vallem tendentem et intrantem procul; Syr. has the impossible 'oak of Mamre' in both places. A sacred tree near Shechem, mentioned Gn 126 as the scene of a theophany to Abraham, in consequence of which he built an altar there (J; but according to Ball, SBOT, 'unto the Oak of Moreh' is RJ). In Dt 1126 (late R) the Oaks of Moreh are named amongst other landmarks given to fix the position of Ebal and Gerizim.

Morch is the participle of horah, 'to give (divine) direction,' e.g. Is 91s nabb' morch sheker, 'a prophet who gives a false direction.' The oak, therefore, was connected with a sanctuary, whose priests gave oracles on questions asked by worshippers.

According to Dillm., 'Gilgal' in Dt 113' is to be taken as a common noun, 'a circle of sacred stones' or 'cromlech,' which was another feature of this sanctuary. There is nothing in the context, either in Gn or Dt, to tell us anything more of the position of the Oak of Moreh than that it was in the neighbourhood of Shechem. Buhl (GAP 202 f.) identifies 'Gilgal' in Dt with Jûlejûl, some little distance to the east of Shechem, and concludes that the Oak(s) of Moreh were not close to Shechem. But, even if the identification be accepted, Gilgal and Moreh in Dt may be independent landmarks for Ebal and Gerizim, and Gilgal not defined by Moreh. Sam. adds in Dt after 'Oak of Moreh,' 'opposite Shechem,' a gloss suggested by Gn 12⁵. It is not likely that Mabortha, according to Pliny and Josephus (BJ Iv. viii. 1), the native name for the Greek city Neapolis, which replaced Shechem, has any connexion with Moreh. Morthia also occurs on coins as a title of Neapolis (cf. Smith's DB, s. 'Moreh'), but is probably connected with the Aram. martha, 'mistress.' On the suggested identification of Moreh with Moriah, and with the sacred trees in Gn 35', Jos 24²⁶, Jg 96. 37, cf. MEONENIM (OAK OF).

2. HILL OF, Jg 7' only (π'man nga); A του βωμοθ τοῦ 'Aβώρ, B Γαβααθαμωρά, Luc. ἀπὸ βουνοῦ τοῦ 'Aμωρέ; collis excelsi. Targ, for π'man gives κ'ππρος 'that faces'). Montioned in describing the position of the camp of the Midianites on the eve of their defeat by Gideon. RV translates MT of v.1b 'and the camp of Midian was on the north side of them, by the hill of Moreh, in the valley' (RVm 'from the hill of Moreh, in the valley'). The text is probably corrupt. Moore proposes to read, 'While the camp of Midian was north of Gibeath ha-Moreh,' but suggests as a possible alternative, 'was north of him in Gibeath ha-Moreh.' Budde proposes, 'was beneath him north of Gibeath ha-Moreh.' Neither the well of Harod, mentioned as the site of Gideon's camp, nor the hill of Moreh, can be certainly identified. If 7' and 6³⁸ are referred to the same source (E; so Kautzsch, Budde), probably the 'valley' in 7' is the 'valley of Jexreel' in 6²⁸, and the hill of Moreh is Jebel Nabl Dahl, sometimes called the Little Hermon, to the N.W. of the plain of Jexreel (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 397; Buhl, GAP p. 202). Moore refers 7' to J, and 6³⁸ to E, and is inclined to connect the Hill of Moreh with the Oak of Moreh. The LXX seems to have read 'Hill of the Amorites.' See MORIAH. 'Hill of Moreh' v. Hennett.

MORESHETH-GATH (ns πτης, κληρονομίας Γέθ) is mentioned only in Mic 1¹⁴, in a group with Gath, Zaanan, Lachish, Achzib, Mareshah, and other towns of the Judahite-Philistine region. The daughter of Zion is advised to make a bridal speeding-gift (cf. 1 K 9¹⁶, Ex 18³) concerning Moresheth-gath. Micah is himself a Morashtite, that is, a citizen of Moresheth (Mic 1¹, Jer 26¹⁸), which may or may not be the same place. Moresheth gath may signify 'she that takes possession of Gath,' or 'that which Gath possesses,' or simply as a proper name, 'Moresheth of (fath,' with other possible variations. Or the word 'gath' in the combination may be the common noun 'winepress.'

In the Onomasticon, and in the Prologue of the Commentary of Jerome on Micah, Morasthi is said to be a village east of, and near by, Eleutheropolis. There is no sufficient reason for disputing this, though the site has not been identified. Or tagain, when we note that the context is full of puns on the proper names that are mentioned (19b 12a 14b etc.), we find it possible to regard Moresheth-gath as a play upon the proper name Moresheth gath as a play upon the proper name Mareshah, leading up to the statement, 'I will yet bring in to thee him that taketh possession, O lady that inhabitest Mareshah' ("), and so, virtually, as a mere variant of Mareshah. Wellhausen (Kl. Proph. ad loc.) takes m as vocative, rendering, 'Thou must let go Moresheth, O Gath,' and this is favoured by Oxf. Heb. Lex. Nowack (ad loc.) thinks that neither this nor the usual construction gives a sense quite apposite to the construction gives a sense quite apposite to the context.

MORIAH, the land of (Gn 222), or the mountain ים (2 Ch 3¹) (הַשִּׁרְיָה, הָשִּׁרְיָה: in Gn, LXX els און γηρ דיף יום און γηρ יום מון און און און און און און in 12°, and πρω κήτε in Dt 11°, are also rendered by LXX ή δρῦς ἡ ὑψηλής in Dt 11°, are also rendered by LXX ἡ δρῦς ἡ ὑψηλή], Aq. τὴν καταφανῆ (connecting the word falsely with πκη; so Aq. Symm. for πρω Dt 11°), Symm. τῆς ὁπτασίας, * Vulg. visionis, Onk. (paraphrasing) κητο νης 'land of voorship, '† Pesh. κτισική '' of the Amorites': in 2 Ch, LXX τοῦ Αμεροκ. Της πρωτέ Μορία Pesh Aμορεία, Luc. τῷ Αμορία, Vulg. in monte Moria, Pesh. as in Gn, Targ. (late) 'the mountain of Moriah,' but with a long Midrash about its being the place where Abraham and others worshipped).—What was originally denoted by this designation is very obscure. It is indeed evident that in 2 Ch 31 the obscure. It is indeed evident that in 2 Cn 3-the Temple hill is referred to; but this does not settle the sense of the expression 'land of Moriah' in Gn 22²: the Chronicler may, in common with the later Jews, have supposed that that was the scene of the sacrifice of Issac, and borrowed the expression from Gn 22²—perhaps to suggest (Baudissin, Studien, ii. 252) that the spot was chosen already by J' in the patriarchal age. In Gn, howalready by J" in the patriarchal age. In Gn, however, even supposing—what certainly seems to be implied from the terms of v.14—that the writer placed the sacrifice of Isaac on the Temple hill, he does not apply the name Moriah to it: 'the land of M.' is the name of the region into which Abraham is to go, and he is to offer Isaac on 'one of the mountains' in it. The mountain on which Isaac is to be offered does not even seem to be mentioned as a central or important one, from which, for instance, the region might have derived its name: it is merely 'one' of the mountains in a region which, so far as the terms of this verse go, might be co-extensive with a large part of Palestine. It is remarkable that, though it is here implied that it is well known to Abraham, the region is not men-tioned elsewhere in the OT. It is difficult, under the circumstances, not to doubt the originality of the text; and it must be admitted that-though it has the disadvantage of being the proclivis lectio,—the reading of Pesh. 'of the Amorites' (15¹⁶ 48²³, Jos 51 al.) has some claims to be considered the original one.

Heb. pr. names, when accompanied by the art., have the presumption of possessing, or at least of having once possessed, an appellative force: but the meaning of numb is obscure; and the etymologies that have been proposed are far from satisfactory. It is at least certain that it does not mean 'shewn of Jah' (which—cf. 1912), nymp—would be nymp), or 'vision of Jah' (which would be n'RTO), neither of which forms could pass into n'TO. For various 'Midrashic' explanations of the name, see Brishith Rabbā, ad loc. (p. 263f. in Wünsche's tr.), or Beer, Leben Abr. nach der Jüd. Sage, pp. 59, 177f.

It is held by the Samaritans (see ZDPV vi. 198, vii. 133; and above, s.v.), that GERIZIM was the scene of the sacrifice of Isaac; and the same opinion has been advocated by some modern scholars. The grounds for it are stated most fully by Stanley, grounds for it are stated most fully by Stanley, SP pp. 251 f., and Grove in Smith's DB, s.v. MORIAH: Abraham saw the spot 'afar off,' on the third day' (v.4) after leaving 'the land of the Philistines' (21³⁴)—a statement which suits the distances much better if the goal of his journey were Gerizim than if it were Jerusalem; Gerizim, moreover, is an elevation which a traveller approaching from the S. might 'lift up his eyes' (224) and see conspicuously at a distance, which is not the case with Jerusalem. In view of the rivalry which prevailed in later times between the Samaritans and the Jews, the preference of the former for Gerizim does not count for much; and with regard to the other arguments it may be doubted whether, in a narrative which cannot be by an eye-witness or contemporary of the facts recorded, the expressions used are not interpreted with undue strictness. The presumption derived from v. 14 is strong, that in the view of the narrator the Temple hill was the scene of Abraham's trial (cf. JEHOVAH JIREH; and HGHL p. 334 n.). But of course Gerizim might, equally with Jerusalem, have been (so far as we know) within the undefined limits of the 'land of Moriah,' as it certainly would be within the limits of the 'land of the Amorites.'

MORNING .- See TIME.

MORROW.—Both 'morn' and 'morrow' are formed from Anglo-Sax. morgen, the former by contraction, the latter by changing the g to w and dropping the n (whence morve=morrow); and 'morning' is the same, with subst. suffix -ing. Thus 'morn,' 'morning,' 'morrow,' and 'to-morrow' (with prep. to='for' or 'on') are all one and the same word, and have all the same meaning. They mean either early in the day = mod. 'morning,' or next day = mod. 'tomorrow.'

The word 'morrow' about 1611 usually means next day ('tomorrow'), but sometimes it is used for 'morning.' Thus 1 S 30¹⁷, Cov. 'And David smote them from the morow tyll the even'; Shaks. Lucrece, 1571—

She looks for night, and then she longs for morrow.'

In AV \(\text{\tex probable that, in every case in which 'morrow' is found, the translators intended to express what we now express by 'tomorrow.' J. HASTINGS.

MORTAR (קדקה, שְּקָבּה).—Probably the first kind of mortar may have been, as is generally supposed, two stones, between which the grain was pounded. Mortars in Syria and Palestine were anciently of wood, and the larger ones were cut out of the trunk of a tree, the sindiyan, or evergreen oak, being preferred.

The passage in Pr 2722 (on which see Expos. Times, March and April 1897, pp. 287, 336) does not, of course, refer to any custom in Syria or Palestine of pounding men in a mortar (७९२२). The reference seems to be to the custom or making kibby, a favourite dish in Syria (see MILL). The more the kibby is pounded, the more excellent it becomes Hours are spent in beating it, and certain women are celebrated for their skill in preparing it. It is very hard work, and requires strong as well as skilful arms to make it.

In Syria at the present time there are two kinds of mortars used: small ones are made of wood, and the large ones of stone. The wooden mortars and the large ones of stone. The wooden mortars are generally used for pounding coffee or spices. They are often beautifully carved, and the pestle is sometimes 2 ft. long.* The stone mortars are now preferred for making kibby; they are large and very heavy, and the pestle is a heavy block of wood.

Lifting a stone mortar with one hand and raising it above the head, was a favourite test of strength among the young men of the villages of Lebanon a few years ago. W. CARSLAW.

MORTAR (AV morter).—In Gn 112 it is said that the builders of the tower of Babel used slime or bitumen (חָבֶר) instead of mortar (דְּבָר, Arab. hummar, asphalt or bitumen).

Asphalt or BITUMEN (wh. see) is found on the Aspnart or BITUMEN (wh. see) is found on the shores of the Dead Sea, and at Hasbeyah near Mt. Hermon, but it is not used in Palestine or Syria in building. The most common material in use for that purpose is clay (wh. see), and the ordinary Arabic word for mortar is tin, which properly means clay. Walls of houses are plastered inside with clay, but the clay must be well trodden and mixed with water to a proper consistence, else, if too dry, it will not adhere, but crack and fall off. In Ezk 1310 the Arab. VS has 'dry clay' (45fal) instead of 'untempered mortar.'

Mortar made with lime is being more frequently used now than formerly. The lime is slaked in a long wooden box, and the liquid portion run off into a pit; when the pit is full, the lime is covered with sand. It is the opinion of the builders in Lebanon that the lime should remain in the pit for several months before being used. The lime in Lebanon is rich, and has no hydraulic properties; and during the rainy season a good deal of the lime in a building is washed away, even when the mortar seems to be hard. In making mortar the lime is usually mixed with ordinary clay, but a reddish clay containing some red oxide of iron is preferred. Sand is used for outside work on account of its colour.

For making plaster for coating the inside walls of houses, lime and sand are generally used now, mixed with straw or hemp cut small, instead of hair, which is never used. A cement for plastering the sides of cisterns is often made with lime, wood sahes, pounded calcareous spar, and sand. Over the coating just mentioned a finer one is put, consisting of lime and homra, which is broken pottery ground very fine. All channels for running water are coated with lime and homra.

Roofs and floors of houses are often laid with concrete, which is formed of lime, sand, and stones broken small. This has to be beaten constantly day and night till it has hardened. Some of the very old buildings in Lebanon are said to have been built with mortar in which oil took the place of water. W. CARSLAW.

MORTIFY.—To 'mortify' is to put to death. The word was once used literally, as in Erasmus, Commune Crede, fol. 81, 'Christ was mortified and killed in dede, as touchynge to his fleshe: but was quickened in spirite. In AV it is used only figuratively, Ro 813 'If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live' (cl... θανατοῦτε, RVm 'make to die,' Amer. RV 'put to death'); Col 36 'Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth' (perpusare, RVm 'make dead,' Amer. RV 'put to death'). The translation in both places comes from Tindale, and is adopted by all the versions; Wyclif's word is 'slay.' Cf. Tindale, Prologe to Leviticus, 'Baptism signyfyeth unto us repentaunce and the mortefyinge of oure unruly members and body of synne, to walk in a newe lyffe and so forth.' Fuller (Holy State, p. 70) exclaims of the ancient Fathers, 'O the holinesse of their living and painfulnesse of their preaching! how full were they of mortified thoughts, and heavenly meditations; and (p. 81) he describes St. Anthony the monk as 'having ever (though a most mortified man) a merry countenance.' Hall, Works, i. 68, says, 'If we preach plainly, to some it will savour of a carelesse slubbering, to others of a mortified sincerity. The biblical use of the word is clearly seen in Rogers, Chief Grounds of Christian Religion, one of the early Catechisms (1642): 'Q. What is Sanctification? A. The purifying of our whole nature. Q. Which be the parts of it? A. Mortifying and J. HASTINGS. quickening.

MOSERAH, MOSEROTH. — Moserah occurs Dt 106 (AB Mesasal, F Misasal, Vulg. Mosera), and is noted as the place where Aaron died and was buried. This passage is generally considered as a part of E's narrative of the journeyings. Moseroth occurs Nu 33^{10. 31} (Μασσουρώθ B v. ³⁰ and -ρούθ B v.³¹, and A in both vv., Vulg. Moseroth) as the first of the 8 stations following Hashmonah, on the route to Mt. Hor. For discussion of these names see Exodus and Journey to Canaan, vol. i. p. 805, § iii., and Driver's notes on Dt 106 in Int. Crit. Com. p. 119f. Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, p. 128) thinks that Jebel Madura is the modern equivalent of Moserah, and would make that the burial place of Aaron. A. T. CHAPMAN.

In the main, the analysis of square brackets []. B. W. Bacon in his Triple Tradition of the Exodus has been followed here, as in the articles on Exodus and Numbers (wh. see). As in art. EXODUS, corresponding features are marked with the same letter in the different documents. The eneral features of the character and work of Moses will be seen to be the same in all the documents, and are epitomized at the beginning of vii. The chief difference is in the relation of Moses and Aaron (see ii.-iv. (a)).

ii. The Narrative in J.—(a) It is doubtful whether J, at any rate in its earliest form, mentioned Aaron. Dillmann, indeed, regards the prominent position given to Aaron as a mark of J; and the analysis as given by Bacon, and in the articles AARON, EXODUS, finds Aaron in this source. But Wellhausen and Stade (i. 127) hold that J does not mention Aaron. If this is so, Moses stands alone in J, and some of the passages mentioning Aaron, given here as J, must be referred to other sources, while in other passages the references to Aaron are due to one of the editors (Holzinger, Moses feared they would not believe that J" had appeared to him. Whereupon J" gave him three signs to convince them: a rod turned into a serpent, and back again into a rod; his hand made leaveness and they rectand as his city of the first hand. made leprous, and then restored as his other flesh; water poured on the ground and turned into blood. the Egyptians seven plagues—the turning of the Nile into Blood; Frogs; Gnats (EV 'lice'); Mur-rain; Hail; Locusts; the Death of the Firstborn (for the last see next paragraph). As regards the first six—in each case Moses † asked permission for Israel to go to sacrifice to or serve J", threatening the plague as the penalty of refusal; after Pharaoh's refusal—implied, not stated—the plague happened—nothing is said of any utterance or action of Moses or J" as the immediate cause of the plague, except that J" brings the locusts with an east wind, and removes them by a west wind. In the case of the Frogs, Gnats, Hail, and Locusts, Pharaoh sent for Moses [and Aaron] and begged for his intercession to remove the plagues, promising, after an attempt to obtain better terms, to grant Moses' request. After the cessation of each plague, he hardened his heart and withdrew his promise. In the case of the Locusts, however, Pharaoh was induced by his servants to make concessions on the mere threat, before the plague was actually inflicted; he offered to let the men go, without the women and children. Moses refused, and the plague followed, Ex 714. 16. 17a. 18. 21a. 24. 25 g1-4. 8-15a. 20-53 g1-7. 13-18. 25b. 24. 25b-26. 31-34 101a. 3b-11. 13b. 14b. 15a. 15c-19

Moses answered, 'Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more, and announced that all the firstborn of the Egyptians should perish, while no Israelite should suffer anything; and that in consequence all Pharaoh's servants should come to Moses, and entreat him and his people to go. Aaron does not appear in the narrative of the plagues, the references in the present text being due to redactors, and his role is not clear; he scarcely seems to have been the brother and almost equal partner of Moses, perhaps not even the priest; but is chiefly conspicuous as opposing Moses and leading Israel in sin. He was perhaps represented as a chief amongst the elders.

(b) Moses was born of parents of the house of Levi, at a time when Pharaoh had ordered that all male children born to Israelites should be put to death. Pharaoh and throwing soot into the air. In each case Pharaoh's magicians competed with Moses and Aaron; the magicians competed with Moses and Aaron; the magicians succeeded in turning Rods into Reptiles, Water into Blood, and in producing Frogs, so that Pharaoh was encouraged in hardening his heart against the request of Moses and Aaron; but the magicians failed to produce Gnats, and said, 'The finger of God is here'; but Pharaoh still hardened his heart. In the case of the Roils, the magicians themselves the case of the Boils, the magicians themselves were smitten and fled from Moses; but J" hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not listen to Moses and Aaron, Ex 7^{8-13. 19. 20a. 21b. 22} 8^{5-7. 16-19}.

and encamped by the sea, that J' might harden Pharaoh's heart, and make him pursue Israel. All of which happened. Still, at the command of J", Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, the waters were divided, and the Israelites 'went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left.' The Egyptians pursued into the sea, but Moses again stretched out his hand over the sea, and the waters returned and overwhelmed them; while the Israelites reached the further shore in safety, Ex 14th 2. 4.8.9. 18-18. 11a-11c-22. 28. 27a. 25a. 29

(n) (o) In the wilderness the Israelites hankered after the flesh-pots of Egypt, and murnured against Moses and Aaron; J" sent them manna in the morning, and quails in the evening, Ex 161-4 4.

(q) After sundry journeys (Ex 17^{1a} 19^{1. 2a}), the Israelites came to the wilderness before Sinai. The glory of J" dwelt on Sinai, hidden for six days in a cloud, but (apparently) manifested on the seventh like fire glowing through the cloud. On the seventh day J" called Moses into the cloud (Ex 24^{105-10a}), where he received instructions as to the tabernacle and its furniture, and the priests and their vestments and duties, Ex 25¹-31¹⁷⁵ +

Moses came down from Sinai with Tables; his face shone so that he veiled he spoke to Aaron and 'the princes of the gation.' He gave the Israelites J''s d which they executed with great zeal; the cabernacle was constructed, furnished, and consecrated. The glory of J" filled it, and the cloud covered it (Ex 349-4098), Aaron and his sons were consecrated as priests, and entered upon the work of their office; but two of the sons, Nadab and Abihu, offered before J"'strange fire, which He had not commanded; and fire went forth from the presence of J" and devoured them.' From time to time J" revealed various laws to Moses at Mt. Sinai, which make up the Book of Leviticus.

Moses and Aaron proceeded to organize the nation and its worship. A census was taken showing the number of the adult males, apart from the Levites, to be 603,505; a census of male

v. Moscs in D, etc.—The additions made by the Deuteronomic writers and the various editors to the Pentateuch simply expound, interpret, and harmonize the information given by the older sources, and add nothing to our knowledge of the character and work of Moses. The various songs, though probably included in J and E, or JE, etc., are really independent sources. Ex 15²⁻¹⁸ (Song at the Red Sea) is doubtless the oldest account of the great deliverance. It states, in accordance with J, that J", through a mighty wind, which first held back and then let loose the waters, overwhelmed the Egyptians in the Dead Sea. The 'Blessing of Moses,' Dt 33, speaks of a Theophany from Sinai, Seir, Mt. Paran, of a Law given by Moses, who† was 'king in Jeshurun,' and connects Levi with Massah and Meribah, either because Levi was regarded as equivalent to Moses, or else following an otherwise unknown tradition.

vi. Moses in the OT outside the Pentateuch. In the pre-exilic prophets, Hos 12¹³, sometimes regarded as a later addition, states that J" brought up Israel from Egypt, and preserved him, by a prophet; Mic 6⁴; refers to Moses, Aaron, and Miriam as the leaders of Israel in the Exodus; Jer 15¹ couples Moses with Samuel. In the post-exilic prophets Moses is referred to in Is 63^{11, 13}, and the law of Moses in Mal 4⁴, Dn 9^{11, 15}. In the Psalter, Ps 105, 106 are a lyrical summary of the history of the Exodus; they are based on an edition of the Pentateuch, in which P had already been combined with JED, but which did not contain some of the latest priestly additions. Moses and Aaron are also referred to in 7720 as leaders of the people, and in 996-

' Moses and Aaron among his priests, And Samuel among them that call upon his name."

In Jos the Deuteronomic editors make frequent reference to the 'law of Moses,' i.e. D, which, according to them, was strictly observed by Joshua and the elders of his generation, e.g. In Sam.-Kings, the Deuteron. editors seem to hold that this law was ignored till discovered in the temple in the reign of Josiah. In Ch, the priestly edition of the history, the law of Moses, i.e. the laws of the Pentateuch, was strictly observed by all good kings from David onwards. In Jos 24¹⁻¹⁰ (E) Joshua's farewell speech gives a brief summary of the history of the Exodus, beginning, 'I sent Moses and Aaron.' There is a similar reference to Moses and Aaron in 1 S 12 (E?), Samuel's farewell speech. 1 Ch 23¹⁴⁻¹⁷ gives the sons and grandsons of 'Moses the man of God,' and states that they were reckoned with (יקראי על) the tribe of Levi.

from peril of annihilation by the Red Sea, and was governed during its sojourn in the wilderness; (b) that through him Israel received a revelation, which was a new departure in the national religion, and the foundation of Judaism and Christianity; and (c)—practically another aspect of the last point—that he originated or formulated many customs and institutions from which the later national system was developed; that thus (d) Israel owed to Moscs its existence as a nation; and (e) Moses is a unique personality of supreme importance in OT history.

The following quotations will show the extent to which the general historicity of the Mosaic narrative is accepted; in (A) are placed those which minimize the historical element; the rest in (B):—

(A) Stade, who in his GVI was more sceptical about the sojourn of the people in Egypt than in more recent utterances, accepts Moses as a real person, thus: 'Like all founders of religions, he brought to his people a new, creative idea, which moulded their national life. This new idea was the worship of Yahwe as national God' (Stammgottes), p. 130. Ct. Akad. Reden, 105 ff.

Renan, Hist. dw Peuple of Ier. i. p. 161: 'Mais ce qui est possible aussi, c'est que tous ces récita de l'Exode, où la fable a pénétré pour une si large part, solent plus mythiques encore qu'on ne le suppose d'ordinaire, et qu'il ne fallle, de tous ces récits, conserver que le fait même de la sortie d'israël de l'Egypte et de son entrée dans la péninsule du Siuai.' Of Moses he says: 'La légende a entièrement recouvert Moses... quoique son existence soit très probable.' p. 159.

(B) In Ewald's treatment of this period. Hist. of Ier. (Rng. tr.) iii 15-228, his own view of the history is partly subordinated to an exposition of the narratives in the various sources; but he clearly accepted the historicity of the leading events. Thus, of the passage of the Red Sea, he wrote: 'Whatever may have been the exact course of this event, whose historical certainty is well established, its momentous results, the nearer as well as the more remote, were sure to be experienced, and are even to us most distinctly visible.' p. 75.

Wellhausen, Hist. of Ier. pp. 429-488: 'Moses ... aw a havourable opportunity of deliverance... At a time when Egypt was scourged by a grievous plaque, the Hebrews broke up their settlement in Goshen one night in spring ... on the shore... of the Red Sea... they were overtaken by Pharach's army... A high wind during the night left the shallow sea so low that it became possible to ford it. Moses eagerly accepted the suggestion, and made the venture with success. The Egyptians, rushing after, came up with them on the shore and the pursuers were annihilated. After turning to visit Sinai ... the emigrants settled at Kadesh.' 'A certain inner unity actually substited long before it had found any outward political expression; it goes back to the tinne of Book of the Covenant. Further: 'If the events of that period are, as a whole, beyond dispute, they demand for their explanation such a personality as the sources give us in Moses,'

Cornill, Hist. of the People of Isr. pp. 41-43, writes: 'Moses, a Hebrew of the tribe of Levi, had by favourable providence had access to the learning and civilization of Egypt, and led the Israelites out of Egypt. They were overtaken by the Egyptians at the Red Sea, but 'a mighty north-east wind lays dry the shallow strait, and they go through on the bottom of the sea, into the desert, into freedom.'...'In Sinai... tradition locates the capital achievement of Moses, his religious reorganization of the people. It is one of the most remarkable moments in the history of mankind, the birth-hour of the religion of the spirit. In the thunderstorms of Sinai the God of revelation Himself comes down upon the earth: here we have the dawn of the day which was to break upon the whole human race, and among the greatest mortals who ever walked this earth Moses will always remain one of the greatest.'

Passing to details: Moses' connexion with the Levites is vouched for not only by the statements as to his birth, Ex 2º E, 6ºº P, but also from the fact that the Levites of the sanctuary at Dan claimed to be descended from Moses; and also by the designation of the Levites in Dt 33⁸ as 'the people of thy holy one,' דירח שיא, + i.e. Moses. Perhaps Mushi (Ex 6¹⁰ [P]), as the name of a division of the Levitical clan Merari, denotes another group of Levites, who at one time claimed descent from Moses. 1 Ch 23¹⁴⁻¹⁷, where it is stated that the sons of Moses were reckoned (wyr) to the tribe of Levi, is possibly a trace of some arrangement by which the Mosaic Levites were placed on the same level as the other Levites; the genealogical statement of the transaction would be that Gershom was a son of Levi and not of Moses. Cf. Levi.

The E statement (Ex 210), that Moses grew up in Egyptian surroundings, is supported by the apparent identity of his name with the Egyptian mesu; but it is not likely, as Renan (Hist. du Peuple d'Isr. i. 142 ff.) supposes, that he was greatly influenced in his work as the medium of divine revelation to Israel, by any Egyptian training. The preprophetic religion of Israel has little in common with that of Egypt. Moreover, the early narratives make it clear that the scene of what we may call his religious education was the desert between Egypt and Palestine. It was at Horeb or in Midian that God appeared to him; and the only human being by whose advice he was gnided alike in re-ligious and secular matters was his father-in-law, variously styled Jethro, the priest of Midian, Reuel, Hobab ben-Reuel, the Kenite. See HOBAB, JETHRO. It was at Horeb or Sinai that Moses received his fuller revelation; and throughout the earlier history J" is specially connected with Sinai. Thus it appears that Moses, as an exile from Egypt, found among the Bedawin of the wilderness of Sinai ; the human influences which helped to shape his subsequent teaching, § cf. art. GoD in vol. ii. p. 200°; there, too, he received the divine inspiration, which sent him back to Egypt to rescue his people. In that rescue and for the rest of his life, Moses was the mediator between J" and Israel alike in things material and spiritual. Israel, in its better moments, recognized that J' guided, protected, and championed His people through the leading and governance of Moses, and instructed them through his teaching. The tradition is equally clear that Israel had its evil moods in which it strove to shake itself free from the control of Moses, and that there were times when even he despaired of accomplishing the task which J" had laid upon him. The repeated offers of J" to annihilate Israel and make Moses the ancestor of a new nation, are probably a faithful reminiscence of importunate doubts as to whether Israel was worthy to be 'the people of J",' i.e. to receive and entertain the Divine Presence by which Moses felt himself possessed and inspired. For then a nation was a necessary correlative of a religion. Would it not be better to leave Israel to its fate and to gather round himself some new community, just as centuries later Paul turned from the Jews to the Gentiles? But Moses' intense patriotism made, such a course impossible. 'If thou wilt forgive their sin—; if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.' Again and again he returned to the task of keeping the people true to their high vocation, alike by persuasion and chastisement; while he as constantly besought J" to pardon their sin and bear with their frailty.

We may also trust the tradition that Moses led Israel first to Kadesh and then to the plains of Moab, but that he died before the invasion of The tradition of some sin, of which Palestine. exclusion from Canaan was the penalty, is too obscure to be interpreted, far less verified. The important and controlling element of Moses' work for Israel, and through Israel for the religion of the world, was the uniting of the various tribes as 'the people of J",' and of J" only, in the faith that J" could control nature and history to His purposes. The mutual loyalty of the tribes to one another had an immense ethical value, of which their common loyalty to J" was the bond and symbol. Hence an ethical character necessarily attached to J" Himself. In a primitive age a new departure necessarily had a concrete embodiment; Moses therefore provided for J" a sanctuary and a priesthood. The Tent of Meeting is mentioned by E (Nu 11 etc.); and, even apart from P, who has probably expanded ancient material, the Ark was evidently constructed by Moses; it is conspicuous in JE at the crossing of the Jordan, but entirely absent at the Red Sea. As to the priesthood, Moses clearly placed the care of the Ark and the Tent of Meeting in the hands of his own family. Joshua, indeed, was left in charge of the Tent, but only as the deputy of Moses, who was the real priest, or, as Philo says, high priest. Moses appears (see above) to have left the succession in the priesthood to his children; it is not clear how far P's statement that the family of Aaron was entrusted with the priesthood is derived from ancient tradi-tion, but the ordinary analysis supports this view by giving Dt 10^s, Jos 14^{ss} to E, but they may belong to R^p; see 'Joshua' in PB. Cf. Ark, TABERNACLE, etc.

The Pentateuch also states that Moses committed to writing certain laws and records: 'all the words of J",' Ex 24³ (E)—what these 'words' were is not stated; the ritual Ten Commandments, Ex 34² (J); the register of the Stations in the Wilderness, Nu 33¹ (R¹); 'this law,' probably the original Deuteronomic Code, Dt 31³ (R¹). The articles Exodus, Deuteronomy, Numbers explain why even these sections, at any rate in their present form, are not attributed to Moses. Yet these passages warrant us in believing that many of the laws and institutions of the Pentateuch originated with Moses, or received his sanction, or are the natural application to later times of the principles involved in his government of Israel.

It is doubtful whether we can regard Moses as an author in the literary sense. His name is indeed found in the OT in connexion with various poems, viz. Ex 15¹⁻¹⁸, the Song of Triumph at the Red Sea; Dt 32¹⁻⁴⁸, the Song of Moses; Dt 33²⁻³⁸; and some other poems in Ex-Dt; Ps 90, the Prayer of Moses; and the whole Pentateuch and the Bk. of Job have been attributed to him by rabbinical and other theories. The reasons why this ascription of these books and poems to Moses has been for the most part abandoned will be found in the articles on the several books. It is not impossible that he may have composed narratives and poems, and that portions of such work are preserved in the Pentateuch, but we have no means of identifying them.

It will be obvious that the question, 'What new elements of cult and faith did Moses add to the religion of Israel?' can be only very partially answered. Later times rightly held that, in a sense, they were his debtors for their whole treasure of religious faith and life; they were not careful to distinguish between original Mosaism and its developments; but included both alike under the formula, 'J" said to Moses.' Modern analysis has not yet succeeded in definitely and certainly separating the one from the other. It has been proposed to determine Mosaism by ascertaining the nature of the pre-prophetic religion of Israel. But our data for this calculation are inadequate; and even if it were successfully performed, we have still to discover the exact state of pre-Mosaic religion, and to establish some principle by which the credit for the advance from that to prophetic religion is to be distributed between Moses and other teachers, such as Samuel and Elijah. Moses' work was rather practical than didactic, the influence of an inspired life rather than the inculcation of abstract dogmas. He made the faith, the sanctuary, the Ark of J" the rallying-point of a united Israel. This point is rightly emphasized by E and P in their statements that it was through Moses that the name YAHWEH was made known to Israel. What there was new to Israel in this name, as compared with the divine names they had hitherto used, we cannot at present determine. But, in the natural course of things, each of the tribes of Israel would have developed, like Ammon, Moab, and Edom, its own henotheistic religion. The devotion of so great a group of tribes to J", and J" only, and the survival of this common devotion when the political unity disappeared, under the Judges and again during the divided monarchy, was a distinct step from henotheism to monotheism. Moreover, the faith that the God whose sentency was Sinai could that the God whose sanctuary was Sinai could rescue Israel from Egypt, protect and provide for them in the wilderness, and put them in possession of Palestine, emphasized the truth that J" was not the God of a country, but of a people; and the relation of a deity to a people is far more spiritual than the relation of a deity to a country—J" is of a higher order than Baal. Hence the Mosaic faith, 'J" is the God of Israel,' and the realiza-tion of that faith in the events of Israel's history during the leadership of Moses, constitute a distinct advance in spiritual monotheism.

Moses' personality cannot be exactly defined, for similar reasons. In the oldest tradition he stands in such isolated grandeur,* is so constantly thought of as the ideal ruler and prophet, that the traits of human, individual life and character are lost. Even points that seem characteristic are soon seen to belong to the Israelite ideal of the saint and prophet. His shrinking from his mission he shared with men like Jeremiah and Ezekiel. When Nu 12° (E³ or perhaps R) states that Moses was meek ('ānāw) above all other men, it means that he was unique in his piety, for to be 'ānāw came to be the characteristic grace of the godly man. On the other hand, his wife and sons vanish silently from the story, which cares nothing about his personal relations, and is in-terested only in the official successor to his leadership. The picture drawn of him in the Pentateuch is adequately sketched by saying, with Philo, that Moses is portrayed as supremely endowed with the human gifts and divine inspiration of king and

C. MOSES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The NT makes frequent reference to the history of Moses. For the most part, however, it adds nothing to the OT narrative. In some instances it follows a text differing from MT, or a tradition varying from the Pentateuch,* but these differences do from the Pentateuch,* but these differences do not affect the general history of Moses. In other cases, the NT follows tradition in obtaining new features from the interpretation of the OT narrative. The simple 100 (EV 'goodly' of Ex 20) becomes, by a development from the LXX doreios, the emphatic phrase doreios $\tau \psi$ $\theta e \psi$ (EV 'exceeding fair'), Ac 700; cf. He 1120. So, again, He 1120 'Moses, when he was grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to be evil entreated with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season: than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he looked unto the recompense of the reward. By faith he for-sook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible.' Similarly, St. Stephen (Ac 725-41), in stating that Moses 'was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,' that he was about forty when he fled from Egypt, that he spent forty years in Midian, etc., follows traditions which are an obvious deduction from the OT statement that Moses was brought up as the 'son of Pharach's daughter,' and from the chronology of the Pentateuch.

There are, however, a few statements about Moses in the NT which can scarcely be conjectural expansions of suggestions found in the Pentateuch. They are, for the most part, derived from apo-cryphal works: 2 Ti 36.5 'Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses,' and 'their folly . . . came to be evident unto all men,' is said by Origen (on Mt 27°) to be taken from an apocryphal Book of Jannes and Jambres; see Jannes and Jambres (Book OF). Jude , the contention of Michael and Satan over the body of Moses, is from another apocryphal work, the Assumption of Moses; see following article.

The NT constantly refers to the law of Moses, and to Moses as the founder of OT religion, and refers to the Pentateuch as 'Moses' (Lk 1629). His prophetical status is recognized by the quotation in Ac 3²³. At the Transfiguration, Moses and Elijah appear as the representatives of the OT dispensation, and Christ and they speak of His approaching death as an 'Exodus' (Lk 9²¹, cf. 2 Pe 1¹³). While the NT contrasts the law with the gospel, and Moses with Christ (Jn 1¹⁷ etc.), yet it appeals to the Pentateuch as bearing witness to Christ (Dt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁹ in Ac 7⁵⁷), in a way which implies that what Moses was to the old, Christ is to the new dispensation. Similarly, the comparison between Moses and Christ in He 3^{5.5} implies that, though Christ was greater than Moses, He was, in a sense, a greater Moses, and that Moses was a forerunner and prototype of Christ.

D. MOSES IN TRADITION.—An immense mass of traditions gathered round Moses. Many of these are collected in Josephus, Ant. II.—IV., c. Apion.; Philo, Vita Moysis; Eusebius, Prap. Ev. 9; in the Targums and rabbinical commentaries; and in the pseudepigraphal works ascribed to Moses.+

* 2 Co 318, He 94 (cf. Nu 1710). † See Moses, Assumption of.

Traditions are also found in the Koran, and in other Arabian works. It is possible that there may be in this wilderness of chaff some grain of fact not otherwise known; but, speaking generally, the student of OT history may set the whole on

So Canon Rawlinson, Moses, His Life and Times, Pref. iii: 'Many legends have clustered round the name of Moses, some Jewish, others Mahometan, but these are almost always worthless, and throughout the following pages, excepting in a single instance, no notice has been taken of them. The writer's strong conviction has been that it is from the Scriptures almost entirely, if not entirely, that we must learn the facts of Moses' life and deduce our estimate of his character.'

Hence, with the partial exception of the Manetho traditions preserved by Josephus, to be noticed hereafter, these legends are mostly ignored by historians. The chief exception is Stanley, who, in his Jewish Church and the article 'Moses' in Smith's DB, interweaves legends with biblical

Doubtless, however, the ideas which the Jews in the NT period had of Moses were somewhat influenced by such traditions—witness their currency in Philo and Josephus: these traditions, however, would not—and the NT shows that they did not—seriously modify the account given in the OT of the life and work of Moses. They supply details of names and numbers; narrate incidents that fill gaps in the story; and provide facts which explain obscurities. Further, by adding to the marvellous in the history of Moses, they attempt the superfluous task of increasing his unique spiritual importance. We can cite only a few examples. Thus Josephus (Ant. II. ix. x.) gives many details of the childhood and vonth of Meses examples. Thus Josephus (Ant. II. IX. X.) gives many details of the childhood and youth of Moses. Pharaoh's daughter's name was Thermuthis; the infant refused to be suckled by Egyptian nurses; he was of divine form (μορφή θεῖον); the princess induced her father to put his crown on Moses throw it down and tred on it head, but Moses threw it down and trod on it, etc. etc. An account of a successful campaign etc. etc. An account of a successful campaign against the Ethiopians, in which Moses commanded the Egyptian army, and married Tharbis, the daughter of the Ethiopian king, probably grew out of the reference to his 'Cushite wife' in Nu 12¹. The account of Moses' death (IV. viii. 49) concludes: 'As he was embracing Eleazar and Joshua, and was still talking with them, a cloud suddenly stood over him, and he disappeared down a certain valley. But he wrote in the Sacred Rooks that he died (abray rebrewra), fearing lest a certain valley. But he wrote in the Sacred Books that he died (αὐτὸν τεθνεῶτα), fearing lest men should venture to say that he had been deified (πρὸς τὸ θεῖον αὐτὸν ἀναχωρῆσαι) on account of his extraordinary virtue. Elsewhere (c. Apion. i. 26) he quotes Manetho to the effect that Moses was here in Heliandia and here the Exercise. was born in Heliopolis, and bore the Egyptian name of Osarsiph. Philo (Vita Moysis, i. 5) gives the details of his education in the learning of Egypt, Greece, Assyria, and Chaldæa. In i. 39 he has a version of the fight at Rephidim (Ex 17⁸⁻¹⁸), in which Aaron and Hur are dispensed with, and Moses' hands are miraculously upheld. In iii. 39 he speaks of Moses' prophesying his own death, by divine inspiration, while yet alive, and being buried 'not by mortal hands, but by immortal powers,' and concludes, 'Such was the life, and such the death of Moses, king, lawgiver, high priest, and prophet, as it is recorded in the Sacred Scriptures.

Although the Manetho traditions belong rather to the general history of the Exodus than to the personal career of Moses, something more may be said about them here. Josephus (c. Apion.) gives the traditions as to the Exodus preserved by

^{*} The many tedious expansions of the Bible story in Josephus and Philo, especially the speeches, which, after the manner of Thucydides, they put into the mouths of Moses and others, have of course no historical value.

Manetho, an Egyptian priest and historian of Heliopolis, during the reign of Ptolemy Philadel-phus, B.C. 285-246. In i. 28, 27, Manetho is quoted as stating that a priest of Heliopolis, named Osar-siph, afterwards Moses, raised a revolt of persons afflicted by leprosy and other foul diseases, who had been settled on the borders to deliver Egypt from the pollution of their presence. They were defeated and driven out of Egypt into Syria by Amenophis king of Egypt. In ch. 32 a similar story is quoted from Chæremon,* the leaders of the Jews being Moüses Tisithen and Joseph Peteseph. In ch. 34, cf. ii. 2, a third version of the story is quoted from Lysimachus.† According to i. 14, 15, 26, ii. 2, Manetho stated that Jerusalem was built by the followers of shepherd kings, hykos, when they were expelled from Egypt by Tethmosis; and, apparently, regards these Hykos as the ancestors of the Israelites. It has sometimes been maintained that the story of the expulsion of the lepers is a truer version of the Exodus than that given in the OT; and some who reject Manetho's main story quote his names of persons and places. It is safer to regard his and other narratives as mere perversions of the biblical account (Stade, Gesch. i. 128; Seinecke, Gesch. i. 80).

The Mussulman legends are partly imaginative but tedious expansions of the Bible narrative, probably known only indirectly; partly pure myths. Thus, when Moses struck the rock, twelve streams gushed forth, one for each tribe (Koran, ii.). Sura xviii. gives a story of the journey of Moses with el-Khidr, the Unknown, which reads like a section of the Arabian Nights. The numerous legends about Moses illustrate the fact that the Moslems recognize Moses, in common with Jesus and Mo-recognize Moses, in common with occur and all hammed, as a prophet and apostle (Koran, xix.).

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF.—The Assumption of

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF.—The Assumption of Moses [Aranylis Movotor ap. Gelasius of Cyzicum (Mansi ii. 844)] is a Jewish writing originally composed in Hebrew or Aramaic early in the 1st cent. A.D. It is extant in a Latin translation preserved in a single palimpsest MS, which was discovered by Ceriani and edited by him in Monumenta Sacra et Profana, vol. i. fasc. i. pp. 55-64 (1864). The best edition is that of Dr. R. H. Charles (1897): his division of the text into chapters and verses is here adopted, and his edition quoted by its pages [e.g. 'Charles 87' named in the text are given in brackets).—I. In the year 2500 A.M., Moses, being 120 years old, calls Joshua and appoints him to be his successor, calls Joshua and appoints him to be his successor, at the same time giving him the books, which he is to bury carefully in a safe place. II. Joshua shall give the people their inheritance (1, 2): afterwards they will be ruled by chiefs and kings, and God will fix the place of His sanctuary (3, 4), though the ten tribes will break off (5). But the people will fall into idolatry (6-9). III. Then a king from the East [Nebuchadnezzar] will burn their 'colony' [Jerusalem] and the temple, and will carry them captive (1-3). The ten tribes and the two tribes will mourn together and pray, and will remember the warnings of Moses (4-13). They will be in bondage about 77 years (14). IV. Then a certain one [Daniel] will pray for them (1-5), will be in bondage about 77 years (14). IV. Then a certain one [Daniel] will pray for them (1-5), and some of them will be allowed to return, though the ten tribes will remain among the Gentiles (6-9). V. At a later period the priests, 'slaves, sons of slaves,' will fall into idolatry and iniquity through staves, will fall into idolatry and iniquity through the wicked kings who are over them [Antiochus and the Hellenizing Priests, such as Menelaus (2 Mac 480)]. VI. Then will come kings calling themselves priests [The Hasmonæans], who also will work iniquity (1). These in turn are to be followed by a king not of the race of the priests [Herod], who will tyrannize over them for 34 years (2-6): his children will reign for shorter periods (7) and a powerful king of the West years (2-6): his children will reign for shorter periods (7), and a powerful king of the West [Varus, governor of Syria, B.C. 4] will conquer them and burn part of the temple (8, 9). VII. Here the history ends and the predictions begin: first will come rulers who will be hypocrites, gluttons, tyrannical, impious, boastful, proud This shorter is push mytheted in the MS.) VIII. (This chapter is much mutilated in the MS). VIII. Another visitation of wrath will descend upon them, and the 'king of the kings of the earth' will crucify those who confess their circumcision and give their wives to the Gentiles, and will make them carry unclean idols and blaspheme. IX. Then there will be a man of the tribe of levi whose name will be TAXO [Eleazar (see below)], who will take his seven sons into the wilderness to fast for three days and then die, rather than transgress the law of the Lord of lords. X. Then [Michael] will be commissioned to avenge the enemies of Israel (1, 2). The Most High will arise, while the earth trembles and the sun and moon are darkened, and He will punish the Gentiles; but thou, Israel, wilt be blessed and mount up to the heavens, and thou shalt see thy enemies on the earth,* and shalt give thanks to thy Creator (3-10). But now Joshua is to keep these words safe: from the death of Moses to the Advent shall be 250 'times' (11-15). XI. When Joshua hears these words of Moses, he is much grieved. What sepulchre (he says) can be fit for Moses? How can Joshua, guide the 600,000 Israelites, or defend them from the Amorites, who will attack them when Moses is gone? XII. Moses then places Joshua in his own seat, and comforts him by reminding him of the providence of God . . . (Here the MS breaks off in the middle of a sentence).

ii. DATR.-It follows from the above analysis that the Assumption was written after Herod's death, but before any of his sons had reigned so long as their father, i.e. between B.C. 3 and A.D. 30. The most probable date is soon after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. (So Charles lviii, who also examines the views of other scholars).

iii. STANDPOINT AND TEACHING.—The value of the Assumption of Moses for modern students is expressed by the title of J. E. H. Thomson's work,

 Books which influenced our Lord and His Apostles? (see Charles xxvii f.). The author is characterized by Dr. Charles as a Pharisaic Quietist. He was not a Sadducee, for he attacks the priests and expects a theocratic kingdom. He was not a expects a theocratic kingdom. He was not a Zealot, for he is significantly silent about the exploits of the Maccabees, and his ideal hero, Taxo [Eleazar], is one who will be passively faithful unto death. Nor was he an Essene, for he is keenly interested in the fortunes of the temple. 'He was a Pharisee of a fast-disappearing type, recalling in all respects the Chasid of the early Maccabean times, and upholding the old traditions of quietude and resignation' (Charles li-liv). Hence he represents that tendency in Jewish thought which was most nearly allied to primitive Christianity.* It is this which gives real interest to the investigation of the many critical difficulties

iv. The LATIN TEXT.—The Milan Palimpsest (Bibl. Amb. c. 73 inf.), our sole witness for the text, appears to date from the 6th cent.† The Assumption occupies quire xvii, the preceding quires containing the unique fragments of the Latin translation of the Book of Jubiless (wh. see). But, though the whole volume is marked by peculiarities of writing and spelling due to the scribe, the two works were not translated at the same time or place, as is clear from the divergent renderings of Greek words. The Latin vocabulary of the Assumption includes acides (ναός), arbiter (μεσίτης)‡, colonia (='a town')§, nuntius (άγγελος), palam facers (Δποκαλύπτειν), Summus ("Τψιστος), and transliterations such as acrobistia (=άκροβυστία), clibeis (θλίψιs), scene (σκηνή). Important for the date is the rare use of secus for κατά 'according to,' parallels to which occur in Clem. Rom. lat 21', and in a non-Christian inscription found at Pes-chiera (CIL v. 4017). || The MS (which is often very hard to read) was transcribed by Ceriani with wonderful accuracy. I But the Latin itself is disfigured by many corruptions, mostly due to the carelessness of transcribers, e.g. ex tribus for patribus (i. 8), sub anulo for sub nullo (xii. 9). More serious are those which rest on mistakes in the underlying Greek. Dr. Charles has detected a notable instance in ii. 7, where adcedent ad testamentum Domini et finem polluent must correspond to προσβήσονται τη ταθήκη Κυρίου και τὸν δρον βεβηλώσουσυ; here by reading παραβήσονται την διαθήκην and δρκον (for δρον) we get the appropriate sense, 'they will transgress the covenant of the Lord and profane the oath.' No doubt there are cases of still deeper corruptions which arose in the original Semitic, but these are more difficult to discover and remove.

A full discussion of all the obscurities presented by the text as we have it would be impossible here: one point, however, must be noticed, as it affects the general understanding of the book. This is the interpretation of chs. viii. and ix.,

*Comp., for instance, Mk 32 with Assump. xi. (tunc pareble regnum [Des]... et tunc Zabulus snem habebit).

 The obscure phrase in tempore tribum (iv. 9) seems to the present writer like a corruption of in tempore retributions (or retribuends): cf. Hos 97. In the same verse Schmidt-Merx and Charles have already recognized that nates is a mistake of the scribe for nationes. In the very corrupt clause at the end of viii. 5 suum looks like a mistake for suem.

describing the 'second tribulation' of the Jews. As it stands, this section comes between the death of Herod and the final judgment, but the details of the persecution notably coincide with that which befell the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, a period which is very rapidly passed over in chs. v. and vi. owing to the author's dislike of the Hasmonæans. Dr. Charles, therefore, in his Notes to pp. 28-30, supposes that the section has been misplaced, and that its real place is between chs. v. and vi. But Theophany (ch. x.) comes in well after the story of the ideal saint Taxo (ch. ix.), but very badly after the description of the wicked priests and rulers in ch. vii. In the opinion of the present writer, the difficulty disappears if we regard the author of the Assumption as having filled up his picture of the final wors from the stories of the Antiochian martyrs. Dr. Charles himself says of ch. ix. (p. 34): 'Its purpose is to indicate the line of action which the Chasids or Pharisaic party of his own time should pursue. . . . It prescribes the duty our author would enforce on the Pharisaism of his own time. Just as his complete silence as to the Maccabean uprising forms an emphatic censure of its aims, so his vigorous statement of the opposed and Chasid line of action is designed as a commendation of its character.'

The latter part of the above quotation refers especially to Taxo, who (as Dr. Charles points out, p. 35) has been evolved out of the story of Eleazar (2 Mac 61er., 4 Mac 5). His seven sons correspond to the seven sons of the widow (2 Mac 7), and his cave of refuge corresponds to those of the Chasids (1 Mac 1^{89} 2^{81}). Various unsatisfactory explanations of the origin of the name Taxo have been put forward: they are given in Charles 35 f. What has hitherto escaped observation is that 'Taxo' itself, when put back into the original language of the book, is nothing more than a slightly corrupted cipher for Eleasar. All that is necessary is to read Taxoc for Taxo. The letter may have fallen out in the Latin of the Assumption, as in ore for orbe (xii. 4), or in the underlying Greek, as in δρον for δρκον (ii. 7). Now TAXOC in the Latin implies τα Σωκ in the Greek, and this in turn implies poon in the Semitic original. This word means nothing as it stands, but if we take in each case the next letter of the Semitic alphabet, e.g. B for A, M for L, etc., we get אילעה Eleazar, the very name which of all others is most suitable.*

Thus the future anticipated in the Assumption is a period of triumphant wickedness and oppression; but just when the saints have given an example of passive endurance, at once most hopeless and most splendid, the Most High will Himself intervene and deliver His people.

v. THE END OF THE WORK.—The Milan Palimpsest breaks off in the middle of a sentence, and the question arises how much is lost. The purely internal evidence would suggest that very little is lacking. Moses has finished his prophecy and is about to die: there is nothing more to be said. With this also goes the fact that all the leaves of the quire containing the fragment of the Assumption are preserved. If the missing portion consisted of several whole quires and not merely a single leaf or pair of leaves, it is somewhat strange that the final quire of the extant fragments is intact. +

rragments is intact. \uparrow * We know from the parable in St. Luke (16^{20ff.}) that Eleazar (or, in the Greek form, Lazarus) is an appropriate name to give to the representative of the poor but pious israelite.

† The Stichomstry of Nicephorus does not greatly help us to discover how much is missing at the end. The number of $sri\chi s$ there given for the 'Ariarylus is, $s\omega' - i.s. = 1400$. If this be correct about $1000 \ sri\chi s$ are lost, equivalent to 20 leaves; but as the number assigned to the preceding work on the list (the $\Delta sabism$ Massiss) is on any hypothesis corrupt, too much reliance must not be placed on the figures for the Assumption.

But a number of Greek patristic references (collected in Charles 107-110) indicate that the book was in circulation with an Appendix containing the dispute of Michael and Satan over the body of Moses after the latter's death, followed by his triumphant 'assumption' into heaven. detail of this dispute is alluded to in the canonical Epistle of St. Jude (v.*). Especially clear is a quotation in Gelasius of Cyzicum: 'In the book of the Assumption of Moses, Michael the archangel, disputing with the devil, saith, For from His holy Spirit we all were created. And again he saith, From before God went forth His Spirit, and the world was made." The formula of quotation is identical with that used by the same author (ap.

Mansi ii. 844) for quoting i. 14 of our Assumption. It is difficult to decide whether the Latin of the Assumption ever contained the Appendix. On the one hand, it is hard to imagine how the book could have reached a Latin-speaking community without the Appendix having been associated with it. Yet the work could only have been spoiled by the addition, and there is a certain im-probability that the accidental loss of a couple of quires from the Milan Palimpsest should improve the artistic unity of the book. The interest of the Assumption as we have it is wholly taken up with the fate of the chosen people, present and future, but the Appendix is concerned with the personal fate of Moses.+

Obpasos, צ.ד.א.). The 'El'Elyōn of Gn 14 may stand in some relation to this Phœn. deity. El (God) was often distinguished by different epithets, bringing out different aspects of the divine nature, as in the patriarchal ישל או (Gn 17¹), באון ביאר (ציים או ביאר (33²⁰), אורים או (35¹¹), and in the Phœn. ביאר (CIS I. i. 8; Lidzbarski, Nordsem. Epigraphik, 419); and so the Canaanite has here his El'Elyōn. It may have been a deity whom Melchizedek recognized, in opposition to other inferior ones, as the highest, and in whose name, tradition ones, as the highest, and in whose name, tradition told, he had blessed Israel's ancestor: the Israel. itish narrator, not unnaturally, identifies him (v.22) with J". The statement, however, that a deity bearing this name was worshipped at 'Salem' has not, up to the present time (July 1899), received any confirmation or illustration from the inscriptions.

In the other passages quoted, the title seems simply to give expression to the thought that J" is the God who is supreme,—whether over the earth, as ruler and governor of the world (cf. Ps 47.2 s. sd. 83¹⁰ 97²⁰ 99³), or over other gods (95.7 96⁴¹ 97²⁰; cf. also Cheyne on Ps 7¹⁰; Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 129 f.; Smend, AT Rel.-Gesch. 470). Like God of heaven of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seem of the world of the seems of the seem of the seem of the seems of the see (LOT 519, 553), it is a title which was undoubtedly in frequent use in post-exilic times (Cheyne, OP, 26, + 27, 41, + 83 f., 164, 314, 464); but it may be questioned how far, except when found in combination with other indications, it can be used as a criterion for the date of a pealm. In its Greek form (see Hatch and Redpath's Concordance to the LXX, under $\delta\psi_{10705}$), it occurs in the Apocrypha 1 Es 2^6 6^{21} 8^{19} . 1^{21} 9^{46} , To 1^4 ; 1^{21} ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^4 ; 1^{41} ; $1^{$ Heb. form occurs in the recently discovered Heb text of this book. It is also frequent (as a title) in the Book of Enoch (see Charles' note on 993), the Apoc. of Baruch (see Charles on 171), and 2 (4) Esdras. In the Assumption of Moses it occurs 10. In Rabb. literature it is stated by Dalman (Worte Jesu, 162 f.) to be exceedingly rare.

In the NT the use of the expression is almost confined to St. Luke, the occurrences being Mk 5⁷ = Lk 8²⁸ ($vl\hat{\epsilon}$ $ro\hat{v}$ $\theta \epsilon o\hat{v}$ $ro\hat{v}$ ψ . : $ro\hat{v}$ ψ . om. in Mt 8²⁹), Lk 1²⁹ + ²⁶ + ⁷⁶ + 6²⁵ + (cf. Ps 82⁶ : not in the || Mt 5²⁶), Ac 7²⁵ + 16¹⁷, He 7¹ (from Gn 14¹⁸).

S. R. DRIVER. MOTE.—Mote is the word chosen by Wyclif and Tindale, and accepted by all the subsequent versions as the tr. of Gr. «appear in Mt 73. 4. 8, Lk 661 42 bis. The root of κάρφος is κάρφω to dry up, and it signifies a bit of dried stick, straw, or wool, such as, in the illustration, might be flying about and enter the eye. In its minuteness it is contrasted by our Lord with δοκός, the beam that supports (δέχομαι) the roof of a building. The Gr. word does not elsewhere occur in Mt, and in LXX only in Gn 811 as the tr. of 170, the adj. applied to the olive leaf which Noah's dove carried; 'plucked off' is the Eng. translation.

The origin of the Eng. word 'mote' is unknown.

It means any small particle, as Hall, Works, ii. 136, 'Our mountaines are but moates to God' Bath's Tale, 12, 'As thikke as motes in the sonne-beame.' The use of the word by Wyclif and Tindale led to its early application in the same connexion: thus Barlowe, Dialoge, 73, 'Woulde

MOTH (ψη 'dsh).—The LXX tr. this word in Ps
38 (39)¹³ dράχνη, in Is 51⁸ χρόνος, in Hos 5¹³ ταραχή, in all other instances σής. There is no reason for these variations. The Arab. 'uth is the cognate form of the Heb. word. In the NT one only is used (Mt 6^{19.59}, Lk 12³⁸). There are many species of the Timeida, or 'clothes' moths,' in the Holy Land. They are small lepidopterous insects, which commit immense havoc in clothes, carpets, tapestry, etc. In this warm climate it is almost impossible to guard against their ravages (Is 50°, Ja 5° etc.). 'He buildeth his house as a moth' (Job 2716) alludes to the frail covering which a larval moth constructs out of the substance which he consumes. 'Crushed before the moth' (Job 4¹⁹) refers to the way in which woollen stuffs are riddled by the larvæ of moths, until they become so fragile that they break down to powder at a touch (but see Dillm. and Dav. ad loc.). Moths are mentioned in Sir 19³ 42¹³.

MOTION.—In 2 Es 614 'motion' is used loosely for 'commotion' (Lat. commotio). In Wis 511 the meaning is 'movement': 'As when a bird hath flown through the air, there is no token of her way to be found, but the light air being beaten with the stroke of her wings, and parted with the violent noise and motion of them, is passed through '(βία ροίζου κινουμένων πτερόγων ; RV ' with the violent rush of the moving wings'). Cf. Bacon, Essays, p. 176, 'In Beauty, that of Favour is more then that of Colour, and that of Decent In Wis 724 'For wisdom is more moving than any motion' (πάσης γὰρ κινήσεως κινητικώτερος σοφία; RV 'more mobile than any motion,' after Vulg. 'Omnibus enim mobilibus mobilior'), the reference is to the speed of thought. Farrar aptly quotes Cowper-

' How fleet is the glance of the mind! Compared with the speed of its flight, The tempest itself lags behind; And the swift-winged arrows of light.'

The only other occurrence of the word is in Ro 75 'For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sins, which were by the law, did work in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death' (τὰ παθήματα τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν, RV 'the sinful passions,' RVm 'Gr. passions of sins': this is Wyolif's tr. 'passions of synnes,' so also Rhemish NT; 'motions' comes from the Gen. Bible). The word was often used by writers of the day in this sense of mental or ariginal impulse or egitation. It become almost by writers of the day in this sense of mental or spiritual impulse or agitation. It became almost a technical expression in Scotch Reformed religion. Thus Knox, Works, iii. 286, 'When I feele any taste or motion of these promyses, then thinke I myselfe most happy'; Livingstone (in Select Biographies of Wodrow Soc., p. 305), 'He [Robert Bruce] did goe on, and celebrated the communion to the rest with such assistance and motion, as had not been seen in that place before': Melvill had not been seen in that place before'; Melvill, Diary, 16, 'Ther first I fand (blysed be my guid God for it!) that Spirit of sanctification beginning to work some motiones in my hart, even about the aught and nynt yeir of my age'; and p. 37, 'Onlie now and then I fand sum sweit and constant motiones of the feir and love of God within me.' Cf. also Bacon, Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 38), 'There is in Mans Nature, a secret Inclination, and Motion, towards love of others'; p. 52, 'He that standeth at a stay, when others rise, can hardly avoid Motions of Envy'; and Shaks. Jul. Cæs. II. i. 64-

'Between the acting of a dreadful thing And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma or a hideous dream.'

In the Preface to AV 'motion' is used in the sense of 'proposal.' So Fuller speaks of Eliezer, Abraham's servant: 'Then concludes he, with desiring a direct answer to his motion.' Cf. Berners, Froiseart, p. 208 (Globe ed.), 'And then he said to his cardinals: Sirs, make you ready, for I will to Rome. Of that motion his cardinals were sore abashed and displeased, for they loved not the Romans.'

In the Preface to AV occurs the verb to 'motion': 'In some Common-weales it was made a capitall crime, once to motion the making of a new law.' Cf. Milton, Samson, 222-

'They knew not That what I motioned was of God.'

J. HASTINGS. MOUNT.—The subst. are muzzābh in its only occurrence (Is 29°, unless Jg 9° is another) is translated 'mount' in AV. The root of the word is lated 'mount' in AV. The root of the word is [33] 337 to set up, and means a mound or intrenchment (Cheyne), palisade (Kay), RV 'fort.'
Another word translated 'mount' is 5775 solelah, Jer 68 3224 334, Ezk 48 1717 2122 268, Dn 1125. RV retains the tr. 'mount,' but Amer. RV prefers 'mound' in all these places. Elsewhere this word is rendered 'bank' (2 S 2015, 2 K 1928, Is 3728). See BANK. Its root is 575 to cast up, heap up, and it means an earthwork or rampart.

The only other occurrence of 'mount' in the

The only other occurrence of 'mount' in the sense of 'mound,' intrenchment,' is 1 Mac 12nd 'raising a great mount between the tower and the city' (6\psi_0s, RV 'mound').

work is the same as mount=mountain, and comes directly from Lat. mons, montis. Its use to describe an earthen defence seems due to confusion with 'mound,' a native word (Anglo-Sax. mund), which meant a protection or guard, and was used of a bodyguard of soldiers as well as a defence of earth or the like. The word 'mount' has gone out of use in prose. It has given up its own proper meaning of an elevation (same root as e-min-ere to be prominent) to 'mountain' (which came into English from Lat. not directly as came into English from Lat. not directly as 'mount,' but through the Fr. montaigne, montaine; Lat. montaine, 'hilly'). And it has restored the meaning of earthwork to 'mound,' from which that was borrowed. Its use in AV may be illustrated from Hakluyt, Voyages, ii. 122, 'They raised up mounts to plant their artillery upon'; Knox, Hist. 246, 'The English men most wisely considering themselves not able to besiege the Town round about, devised to make Mounts at divers quarters of it; in the which they and their Ordnance lay in as good strength. they and their Ordnance lay in as good strength, as they did within the Towne'; and Bunyan, Holy War, 69, 'Besides, there were Mounts cast up against it. The Mount Gracious was on the one side, and Mount Justice was on the other. Further, there were several small banks and advance grounds, as Plain-Truth-Hill and No-Sin-Banks, where many of the Slings were placed against the Town.'

J. HASTINGS.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (Heb. v); Gr. spor; Celt. tor?).—In Dn 2^{st. st} the Aram. we sar is tr⁴ 'mountain.' The word v is also pretty frequently tr⁴ in AV 'hill,' as in Ps 2st and 68^{18. 18}. In most of these instances RV has with advantage substituted the rendering 'mount' or 'mountain.' See, further, on this subject, and on the distinction between 7 and aga, art. HILL. It is clear that the AV translators used 'mountain,' 'mount,' and 'hill' interchangeably. The distinction between these terms has never been clearly recognized, even down to the present day; and we cannot feel surprise that it was not so recognized by the translators of the AV. Thus, if we take the word 'mountain' to signify a range or group of high elevations, we are met by the same word as applied to Moriah, a single elevated summit amongst the hills of Palestine, the scene of Abraham's intended sacrifice, elsewhere called 'the mount' (cf. Gn 22² and 22¹⁴). Yet, upon a general comparison of the passages in which these terms are used, it appears clear that the word 'mount' is more frequently applied to some specialized summit or elevation, such as Carmel (Jos 19²⁶), Hermon (Jos 11³), Sinai (Ex 19² et passim, except v.3), and Seir (Dt 12), while 'mountain' is used to designate an extensive district of elevated ground, such as those of Moab (Gn 19³⁰), South Canaan (Nu 13¹⁷), Gilboa (2 S 1²¹).

(Gn 1920), South Canaan (Nu 1317), Gilboa (2 S 121). Amongst geographers, the terms 'mountain' and 'hill' are generally used as relative terms to designate the higher and lower elevations in special countries. Thus we apply the term 'mountain' to those of North Wales as being the highest elevations in S. Britain, though they are really lower in height than those of the Jura, which are generally called 'hills,' as being of less elevation than the neighbouring Alps. All that can be said on this point is that geographers have not be said on this point is that geographers have not settled the question at what elevation above the sea a 'hill' becomes a 'mountain.'

ORIGIN.—Without entering at any great length into the question of the mode of formation of mountains, which would be here out of place, it may be stated that in the great majority of cases they are referable to three natural modes of formation, namely (1) elevation, (2) erosion, and (3) accumulation: of these three modes we have examples in Palestine and the regions around.

1. By elevation.—Many mountain ranges owe their origin to direct elevation en masse at various ancient geological periods, above the surface of the ocean, or the general level of the adjoining lands. Some of these have been upraised at some of these have been upraised at successive intervals of time, and from very early periods have preserved their dominant characters. To this class may be referred the Scandinavian and Grampian ranges, that of North Wales, the Bavarian (or Hercynian) Highlands, and the Sinaitic group between the Gulfs of Suez and of Alcahe, This last probably rejected as part of Akabah. This last probably existed as a part of an extensive tract of continental land in Palæozoic times, and has maintained its dominant position down to the present day during the general sub-mergence of the adjoining regions in the Cretaceous and Tertiary periods. The Alps and Pyrenees received their final and probably most important upheaval in late Tertiary times.

2. By erosion.—In various parts of the globe mountain groups or ranges have been formed, owing to the erosion of valleys amongst previously existing tablelands. When the floor of the ocean has been upraised into dry land in the form of a plateau, consisting of approximately horizontal (or even inclined) strata, rain and river action sets in, owing to which channels of ever-increasing depth and breadth are eroded, thus carving the plateau into separate and independent mountain masses if the process is sufficiently prolonged. In this manner the great ranges of the Colorado in North America, the lesser group of Central and South Wales, the range of the Jura on the borders of Switzerland; and, in Eastern countries, those of Upper Egypt, Edom and Moab, and of Southern Judæa, have been formed. The Lebanon range owes its predominant position, with its culminating dome-like mass of Hermon (? Mount Hor, Nu 347.8), which formed the northern limit of the land given to Israel, to direct elevation followed by erosion, by which the deep valleys and ravines have been worn down through an original tableland in late Tertiary and post-Tertiary times. The range of Edom and Moab, stretching from the Gulf of Akabah to the shore of the Dead Sea, is doubtless originally due to the elevation of the Arabian tableland from the bed of the ocean along one or more lines of fracture (or 'fault') in the crust of the earth, but has subsequently been carved out into many distinct summits by river erosion at a period when the rainfall was more abundant than at present (see Arabah); and amongst these Mount Hor (Jebel Haroun), the scene of Aaron's death, is

3. By accumulation.—To this third class of mountains nearly all those of modern volcanic origin may be referred. During eruptions of volcances, either upon the surface of the land or upon the floor of the sea, molten lava is poured forth in sheets or streams from the throat of the crater in each case, together with solid blocks of lava, showers of ashes, and kapilli, which spread over the flanks of the mountain and adjoining tracts, and ultimately rise in piled-up masses to varying heights in the form of truncated cones or domes. The most familiar examples are the groups of Auvergne in Central France, and the isolated Mounts of Vesuvius and Etna. The regions adjoining Eastern Palestine present numerous examples of volcanic mountains. In the region east of the Upper Jordan, called in the NT Trachonitis, but now known as the Jaulan and Hauran, there are several distinct volcanic cones rising above the general surface of the country; and still farther eastwards, in the wild region of the Lejah, a grand range of volcanic mountains dominates the wide expanse of lava-fields of Bashan. features are to be observed in parts of Central Arabia, and were little known until brought to our knowledge by a recent traveller. † Here, not far from the cities of Mecca and Medina, a group of volcanic mountains rises above the expanse of the Arabian Desert, from which lava-floes descend to the plain. In all these districts of Arabia volcanic action has long been extinct; perhaps even before the appearance of man.;

From the above account it will be seen that in strictly Bible lands we have representatives of mountain forms owing their origin to the various modes of natural operations which in past ages have diversified the surface of our globe.

A few special biblical references to mountains may be noted. 'Mountain of God' (מֵל אַלְהָים) in may be noted. 'Mountain of God (מְשִׁלְּיִבְּיֹם) in Ps 68¹⁶ is general = a God's mountain, indicating greatness or majesty. On the other hand, Sinai or Horeb is called 'the mountain of God' in a special sense (Ex 4²⁷ 18⁵ 24¹⁸, 1 K 19⁸; cf. מוֹלְיִי הַ in Nu 10²⁸). The 'mount of congregation' (RV; better, 'mountain of meeting or assembly, מְיֵּבְּיִלְּיִנְיִּ in Is 14¹⁸ refers to the dwelling-place of the gods, which the Rehvelonians located in the far north which the Babylonians located in the far north. MOURNING ('23" 'mourn'; πης 'sigh or groan'; πης 'lament'; τος 'wail' (κόντεσθαι); θρηνεῖν, πενθεῖν) in Scripture is sometimes attributed in a figurative sense to Nature,—the withering of the pastures beneath and the blackening of the sky above, the wasting of the fruit-trees, and the destruction of the beasts of the field, of the fowl of the air, of the fish of the sea, being at once the effects of God's judgments upon her for man's sin and the manifestations of her sorrow and grief as the sharer of his punishment and misery (Jer 42", Hos 43", Jl 110-13"). In a like figurative sense it is attributed to nations, and especially to Israel, as when the prophet (Jl 18) summons the daughter of Zion to repentance, and bids her 'lament like a virgin grided with sackcloth for the husband of her youth'; or when, in a time of famine, Judah is said to mourn (Jer 142"), and the people assembled at the gates are in deep mourning, and sit humbly on the ground; or when, again, it is predicted (Zec 1210-14) that, in the day of the outpouring of the Spirit of grace and supplication upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, 'they shall look unto me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him as one that is in bitterness for his first-born' (RV). With a moral connotation, too, expressive of sorrow for sin, or distress for the miseries of the nation, it is ascribed to individuals, as to Daniel (103), to Ezra (104), and to Nehemiah (14), while Ahab in penitential mourning rends his clothes and puts sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasts like a man sorrowing for the dead (1 K 2127).

Mourning in the literal sense as the expression

Mourning in the literal sense, as the expression of sorrow for the dead, appears in Scripture not only with all its ordinary natural manifestations, but also with the large body of conventional and formulated grief which usage had gathered round it among the Israelites as among other Oriental peoples. However ready to submit to the will of God without murmur or complaint, the Oriental is demonstrative in the social and public manifestations of his sorrow, and has reduced the expression of his grief for the dead to a system which tends to crush out natural feeling. In Jer 16⁵⁻⁵ and Ezk 24¹⁶⁻¹⁷ together there is a fairly complete list of the mourning customs of Israel.

Weeping is the most general and most strongly marked expression of pain or mental emotion, and is the primary and, indeed, universal expression of mourning for the dead. This, like other manifestations of deep emotion, is more under control among civilized than uncivilized peoples, and more restrained among the staid and unimpassioned people of the West than the lively and excitable children of the East. 'Englishmen,' says Darwin (The Expression of the Emotions, p. 155), 'rarely cry except under the pressure of the acutest grief.' Egyptian funerals,' says Maspero (The Struggle of the Nations, p. 511),—and his description of Egyptian mourning finds frequent parallels among the Hebrews,—'were not like those to which we are accustomed,—mute ceremonies, in which sorrow is barely expressed by a furtive tear: noise, sobings, and wild gestures were their necessary concomitants. Not only was it customary to hire weeping women, who tore their hair, filled the air with their lamentations, and simulated by skilful actions the depths of despair, but the relatives and friends themselves did not shrink from making an

the equanimity of the passers by by the immoderate expressions of their sorrow.' Of weeping for the dead the books of the Old and New Testament are full. It was considered unnatural not to weep for the dead. 'Weep for the dead,' says the Son of Sirach, 'so as not to be evil spoken of' (Sir 3817). Whatever the position of woman in the ancient Hebrew cult, there is evidence that mourning was performed both for women and by women. In proof that women were mourned for, we have the notices recorded in Genesis of the care and interest taken by the patriarchs in the burial of their wives. Isaac was comforted after his mother's death (Gn 24st); and grief for a mother was always bitter (Ps 35^{t4}). We have also Barzillai's words to David (10 they compared to be a second to be a David, 'Let thy servant, I pray thee, be buried in the grave of my father and mother' (2 S 19³⁷). In NT times we have the case of Dorcas, around whose remains, in the short interval before interment, all the widows for whom she had done so ment, all the widows for whom she had done so much stood weeping (Ac 9²⁰). Abraham, as we have noted, wept for Sarah (Gn 23²); Jacob when deceived by the report of Joseph's death (37²⁸); Joseph for his father (50¹); the camp of Israel for Moses (Dt 34⁸); David and his men for Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1¹³); David at the grave of Abner, for the child of Bathsheba, for Amnou, for Absalom for the child of Bathaneba, for Amnou, for Absalom (3²⁸ 12²¹ 13²⁶ 18²⁸); the mothers of Bethlehem for their murdered innocents (Mt 2¹⁸); Jesus at the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11²⁰), where His weeping was restrained and silent ($\ell \delta \delta \kappa \rho \nu \sigma \epsilon$), and over the coming doom of Jerusalem (Lk 19²¹), where He wept aloud ($\ell \kappa \lambda a \nu \sigma \epsilon$). Walling is sometimes added Wept aloud (example). Mailing is sometimes account to weeping, to express a deeper intensity of grief, as in the case of the mourners gathered in the death-chamber of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5^{28, 29}). Wailing like the jackals, and mourning as the ostriches (Mic 1⁸), is expressive of the bitterest ostriches (Mic 1°), is expressive of the bitterest sorrow; and groaning like the bear, the dove, or the crane (Is 38¹⁴ 59¹¹), of a grief more restrained. Exclamations of grief were common along with wailing (Jer 22¹⁸, Am 5¹⁶, 1 K 13²⁰). Vociferous grief, as Maspero points out above, was specially characteristic of the Egyptians. It was heard as a great cry in Egypt that night when all the first-born were stricken (Ex 12²⁰), and it no doubt antered into the 'grievous mourning' which the entered into the 'grievous mourning' which the Egyptians made for Jacob as they escorted the remains of the patriarch to his last resting-place in the cave of Machpelah (Gn 50¹¹). Of such mourning a striking illustration is given (Ball, Light from the East, p. 119) from a wall-painting in an Egyptian tomb. In the funeral procession here represented a master of the ceremonies, followed represented, a master of the ceremonies, followed by eight women, precedes, and four men with long staffs follow the shrine; 'all making gestures of mourning by beating their breasts and their mouths while wailing (the interrupted sound has a peculiarly melancholy effect), or by throwing dust on the head.

The excitable Eastern temperament, however, was not content with weeping and wailing and exclamations of grief. Beating the breast (Is 3213, but text dubious) was one of the commonest forms of lamentation. Beating the breast and the mouth, as we have just seen, was a feature of the mourning of the early Egyptians. The bewailing which accompanied the weeping for the daughter of Jairus (ἐκῶπτοντο) probably included the beating of the breast (Lk 8³²), and so also the lamentation (κοῶπτον) made by devout men for Stephen (Ac 8³). Of Joseph it is recorded that he fell upon his dead father's face and kissed him (Gn 50¹), although this is a solitary instance in Scripture. See art. KISS. Tamar is represented (2 S 13¹⁹) as laying her hand upon her head and going her way, crying as she went. To tear the hair and the beard (Exr 9³), to rend the clothes and put on sackcloth and filthy garments (2 S 3^{31. 28}, Est 4³), to sit among the ashes (Job 2⁶), and to sprinkle earth or dust or ashes upon the head (2 S 13¹⁶, Rev 18¹⁶), were actions in which sorrow and grief more or less naturally or conventionally expressed themselves. To go bent as under a load (Ps 35¹⁴ 38^{6. 7}), to go barefoot and bareheaded and to cover the lips (Ezk 24^{16. 17}, Mic 3⁷), were less demonstrative tokens of mourning. Mutilation of nose, brow, ears, hands is mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 17) as being practised by the Scythians in token of mourning for a departed king. Such mutilation was forbidden by the law of Moses (Lv 19²⁶, Dt 14¹), although we read of making bald the hair and cutting off the beard (Is 15²), and even of lacerating the body, as a sign of vexation and grief (Jer 41⁵). Among the Arabs it was customary in mourning, especially for the women, both to scratch their faces till the blood flowed and to shave off the hair; and it looks as if, in spite of the Deuteronomic prohibitions, similar practices had come into vogue among the Israelites (Driver, Deuteronomy, p. 136). Fasting, more or less strict, seems to have been an invariable accompaniment of mourning, and mourners denied themselves recreation and other mourners denied themselves recreation and other enjoyments. When it is said that the men of Jabesh-gilead fasted seven days in grief for the death of Saul and Jonathan (1 S 31¹³), we must suppose the fast to have been less strict than usual among Orientals, and that some food was allowed to the mourning people. From the Talmud (Baba Bathra, 16a) we learn that lentils were allowed during the period of mourning. It was customary for friends and neighbours after an interval to come and comfort the mourners. was customary for friends and neighbours after an interval to come and comfort the mourners and urge food upon them (2 S 12^{15.17}), and food was also distributed at funerals (Jer 14⁷ RV, Ezk 24¹⁷, Hos 9⁴), especially to the poor (? Job 4¹⁷). 'The bread of mourners,' the bread partaken of by the nearest relatives of the deceased during the period of mourning, was accounted ceremonially unclean and defiling (Hos 94). It has been discussed whether this mourners' meal of the days of the prophets was not in some way connected with a funeral feast. The subject is obscure, but with a funeral feast. The subject is obscure, but in Dt (2614) the Israelite, speaking of the tithe, is represented as saying, 'I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I put away thereof, being unclean, nor given thereof for the dead.' If we adopt the rendering 'for the dead,' the passage may be taken as pointing to the custom for the friends of the deceased to testify their sympathy with the mourning relatives by sending bread or other food for their refreshment, as we have just observed. If we refreshment, as we have just observed. If we render 'to the dead,' the passage would rather point to the widespread custom of placing food in the grave with the dead—a custom common among the Egyptians, and found among the later Jews in 'the messes of meat laid upon a grave' (Sir 30¹⁸). See the subject discussed in Driver, Deuteronomy, pp. 291, 292. That funeral feasts became an institution of later Judaism is clear, for Josephus (BJ II. i. 1) records that the custom of giving funeral feasts 'is an occasion of poverty to many of the Jews, because they are forced to feast the multitude, for if any one omits it he is not esteemed a holy man.' To this day it is a custom among the Jews to dispense alms with a liberal hand during the week of mourning in honour of the departed.

In a time of mourning it was a good custom to send messages of condolence to the bereaved (2 S 10^{1, 2}); and friends were wont to gather to comfort them in their sorrow (Jn 11¹⁹)—a custom which prevails to this day in Syria in the bands of mourners who assemble from neighbouring villages to join in the lamentations. Funeral orations were common in later times. Elegies, as we learn from Scripture, were composed to be sung for the dead. David composed his well-known elegy to honour the memory of Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1"), and another for the gallant Abner (2 S 3"). Such an elegy was composed by Jeremiah for king Josiah, and the 'singing men and women' sang dirges for him, continued, as it would appear, through a course of years (2 Ch 35"). Of this character were the Lamentations of Jeremiah, called in the Talmud and elsewhere by the very name (m'n'p), 'elegies,' 'dirges,' full of the bitterness of grief, as they were, for Jerusalem destroyed by the Chaldæans. See Lamentations (Book of), and, on the rhythm of such kindth, POETEY. When a young person dies unmarried, modern Syrians make the funeral lamentation more pathetic by first going through some forms of a wedding ceremony.

The chief mourners naturally were the relatives of the deceased, —husband (Gn 23°), widow (Job 27°), father and mother (Mk 5°°, w), brother (Lk 7°°), sons (Gn 25° et passim). Among the well-to-do it was common to hire professional mourners. They accompanied the dead body to the grave, moving onwards with formal music (cf. Mt 9°°), and singing dirges to the dead. They were both men and women. We have already noted the presence of both in Egyptian funeral processions, and, as has been just observed, they were 'singing men and women' that lamented Josiah. It is men skilful in lamentation whom Amos (5°°) summons to pronounce a dirge over the moral ruin of their country. It is men that are spoken of in Ecclesiastes (12°°) as the wailers that go about the streets. It was male flute-players that were present lamenting the death of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9°°). On the other hand, it is the women whose profession it was (nupre) to attend at funerals, and by their skilled lamentations to aid the real mourners in giving vent to their grief, whom Jeremiah has in view when he says, 'Call for the women who chant dirges, and send for cunning (Heb. 'wise') women that they may come' (Jer 9°°). They are still required for such service, and are skilful in interweaving family references and in improvising poetry in praise of the departed. These professional mourning women are met with both in ancient and modern Arabia (Trumbull's Studies in Oriental Life, p. 153 ff.); and Maspero (Daum of Civilisation, p. 684) mentions that among the ancient Chaldeans old women performed the office of mourners, washing the dead body, perfuming it, and clothing it in its best apparel.

The period of mourning for the dead is variously given. The ordinary time, however, as we have already noticed, was seven days. All that was in a house or tent along with a dead body was unclean for seven days, and the bread which the mourners ate was, as we have seen, defiled. The period of mourning prescribed by Jewish authorities for a parent is a year. Of this time the first thirty days are considered the most important, and of these, again, the first seven are most stringently observed. The first seven days after a death are known as the Shiva, during which the mourners, as has already been indicated, are not permitted to cook anything for their own use, and are required to avoid all forms of amusement and recreation, not even listening to music. On hearing of the falsely reported death of Joseph, Jacob mourned for him many days (Gn 3734), and he himself in turn was mourned by the Egyptians threescore and ten days (Gn 508), including, however, forty days of his embalming. Herodotus (ii. 86, 88) tells us that the Egyptians had seventy-two days of mourning for the dead. Joseph's own mourning for his father is said to have lasted seven days (Gn 5010). The children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab, as they had wept for Aaron when he died upon Mt. Hor (Nu 20²⁰, Dt 34⁸). Of Judith it is said (Jth 16²⁴) that the house of Israel mourned for her seven days. 'Seven days,' says the Son of Sirach (Sir 22¹²), 'are the days of mourning for the dead; but for a fool and an ungodly man, all the days of his life.' The prescribed period of mourning for a father and mother expires on the eve of the first anniversary of the death. The anniversary itself is invariably observed with strict solemnity by the Jews. It is said that hundreds of Israelites who profess none of the orthodox beliefs of Judaism, and recognize none of its ceremonial laws as binding upon them, yet keep this anniversary, attending the synagogue for the only time in the year, and distributing money among their poor and afflicted co-religionists. The scriptural instance of commemorating the dead on the anniversary of their death is that of the daughters of Israel who went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite, and kept up the celebration four days (Jg 11²⁰).

MOUSE (1272 'akbār, µ03, mus).—'The mice that mar the land,' of which the Philistines made golden images (1 S 64 b), were probably the short-tailed field mice, or 'voles,' Arvicola arvalis, Desm., which are universal in Palestine. The kind of mouse that was eaten (Is 66 17) may be the hamster, Cricetus phaus, Pall., which is edible. The mouse forbidden as food (Lv 11 12) is probably a generic or family name. See, further, Dillm. on Lv 11 2 and W. R. Smith, RS 275. Tristram found 25 species of rats and mice, six of sand rats, three of jerboas, and four of dormice, in Pal. and Syria. Immense numbers of the warrens of these rodents are found even in the deserts. Their food is provided for them by the vast number of bulbs and corms of crocus, iris, squill, asphodel, cyclamen, erodium, etc.

On the question whether the mouse was anciently used as a symbol of pestilence, see J. Meinhold, Die Jesajaerzählungen, p. 34 ff. G. E. Post.

*MOUTH (π) the commonest term, also το 'palate,' 'roof of mouth'; Aram. το Dn 4²¹+5 t. in Dn; LXX and NT στόμα).—π ρελ, the ordinary Heb. word for 'mouth,' means also 'language,' 'corner,' 'edge,' 'skirt,' and any opening such as of a well Gn 29°, sack Gn 42°, the earth Nu 16°, a cave Jos 10°, grave Ps 141°. το λέλ, 'palate,' is used where the reference is to the sense of taste or to the interior of the mouth, as when the tongue cleaves to the roof of the mouth, Job 12¹¹ 20³, Ps 137°, Ca 7°, but in Hos 8¹ this is the word that is used in connexion with the blowing of the trumpet.

The way in which the Bible constantly uses the organ of speech in the sense of 'language' is a conspicuous instance of its employment of the concrete for the abstract. Thus enforced silence is the laying of the hand upon the mouth, Jg 18¹⁹, Job 20⁹ 40⁴, Mic 7¹⁶, Tit 1¹¹ (see Lip). So freedom of speech is the enlarged mouth, 1 S 2¹, Ps 35²¹, Eph 6¹⁹. Similarly, to receive a message or be instructed as to what to say is to have words put into the mouth, 2 S 14³, Jer 1⁹. Humiliation is the mouth laid in the dust, La 3³⁹. In this figurative usage the final form is personi-pendent agent, with feelings, purposes, and actions of its own. Thus it has free-will offerings to give Ps 119¹⁰⁸, God is asked to set a watch before it Ps 141³, it selects its food Pr 15¹⁴, uses a rod Pr 14³, and has a sword Rev 19¹⁵. Such a familiar use of personification with regard to the lips, mouth, and voice would have an influence on the Jewish mind in the discussion of such subjects as 'The angel of the Lord' and 'The voice of the Lord' (bath-kôl), and would prepare the mind to apprehend the meaning of the word made flesh. MOWING .- See AGRICULTURE.

MOZA (κήτο).—1. Son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah, 1 Ch 2⁴⁶ (B Ἰωσάν, A Ἰωσά). 2. A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8^{36.37} (Μαισά) 9^{42.48} (B Μασσά, A Μασά, Luc. Μωσά).

MOZAH (πρόη with art.; B'Αμωκή, A'Αμωσά).— A town of Benjamin, mentioned next to Chephirah, Jos 18²⁶. A possible site is the ruin Beit Mieseh, close to Kulonich (i.e. Colonia), west of Jerusalem. The Heb. Tsade becomes the Arabic Zain in some cases. The modern name means 'house of hard stone.' There is a good spring at this site. (See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.; Buhl, GAP 167; Guérin, Judés, i. 262 f.). C. R. CONDER.

MUCH is used in AV with more freedom than we now permit. It is quite common, for example, with collective nouns. These are nearly always either 'cattle,' as Ex 12²⁰ 'And a mixed multitude went up also with them; and flocks, and herds, even very much cattle'; or 'people,' as Nu 20²⁰ 'Edom came out against him with much people.' But we also find 'much goods,' Lk 12²⁹, and 'much alms,' Ac 10²⁰. Cf. Rhemish NT, Lk 10²⁰ 'The harvest truely is much, but the workemen few.'

Again, 'much' is an adv. and qualifies an adj. in Philem²⁰ 'Though I might be much bold in Christ'

Again, 'much' is an adv. and qualifies an adj. in Philem' 'Though I might be much bold in Christ' (πολλην έν Κριστῷ παρρησίαν έχων), RV 'Though I have all boldness in Christ.' Cf. Pref. to Pr. Bk. 'Here you have an order for prayer... much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the Fathers.' So Cranmer in Pref. to Great Bible, 'Concernyng two sundry sortes of people it seemeth much necessarie that some thyng be sayde in the entrie of thys booke by way of a Preface or Prologue'; and Udall's Erasmus' Paraphrase, fol. xxxiv. 'This disease [leprosy] emong the Jewes was counted muche abhominable, and is thought to be suche, that no Physician can heale it.'

that no Physician can heale it.'

In the Pref. to AV 'much' occurs in the sense of 'nearly,' 'Much about that time.' The word is often so used by Shaks., as Meas. for Meas. III. ii. 242—'Much upon this riddle runs the wisdom of the world,' and IV. i. 17—'Much upon this time have I promised here to meet.'

MUFFLERS.—This term occurs only once in the Bible, as trⁿ in Is 3¹⁹ (EV) of mby re aloth, in the midst of a list of articles of female attire and adornment. The LXX, which, however, does not apparently include all the items enumerated in the Heb. text, perhaps tr. by τδν κόσμον τοῦ προσώπου αὐτῶν; Vulg. has mitras. It is generally agreed that some kind of veil is intended (so Siegfried-Stade, Dillm., Del., Guthe [in Kautzsch's AT, 'Kopfschleier']). Delitzsch derives mby from a root [by], Aram. by 'to be loose or flaccid,' 'to hang down or hang over loosely,' and pronounces the veil spoken of to be more costly and of better quality than the ordinary one worn by maidens, which is called γw. Dillmann compares the Arab. ra'l (see also Mishna, Zabim, vi. 6, where mby is applied to the veils worn by Arab women), and describes the veil in question as consisting of two pieces, one starting above the eyes and thrown back over the head and neck, the other beginning below the eyes and falling down over the breast. See, also, art. Dress in vol. i. p. 627b.

MULBERRY TREES (1 κρ3 běkā im, κλαυθμών, dπια, pyri).—1. The Heb. word is the name of a tree (2 S 5^{24, 24} = 1 Ch 14^{14, 15}), to the identity of which we have no clue. From a confusion with the root πρη bākāh, 'to weep,' אַכְּיָה pop 'the valley of Baca' (Ps 84°) has been often tra 'the valley of weeping.' Neither of the LXX renderings supports the claim of the mulberry, κλαυθμών signifying 'a place of mourning,' and ἄπιοι 'pear trees.' The tree is supposed by different writers to have been the balsam tree (so Oxf. Heb. Lex.), the poplar (Arab. shajaret el-bok, 'the bed-bug tree'), and the pear. Abu el-Fudli mentions a tree, with an Arab. name similar to běkā'im, which has been identified with Amyris or Balsamodendron. But this tree grows only in tropical countries, and could never have flourished in the Plain of Rephaim. There is no support to the trn 'mulberry' or 'poplar.' We must therefore be content to remain uncertain as to the identity of $b\bar{e}k\bar{a}$ im, and it would perhaps be best to transliterate it. See, further, BACA (VALLEY OF).

2. Although it is thus probable that the mulberry is not mentioned in the canonical books of OT, the blood (juice) of the fruit of this tree (μόρον) is said to have been mingled with that of the grape (1 Mac 6²⁴), and shown to the elephants of Antiochus Eupator, to enrage them and excite them to war against the Jews.

3. The sycamine (Lk 176) is the 'black mulberry'

(see SYCAMINE). G. E. Post.

MULE.—Three Heb. words are tr⁴ 'mule' in AV. 1. $\nsym_7 \text{ rekesh.}$ This word (which is really a rare synonym of $\mathrm{c}:) is tr⁴ only twice in AV 'mules' (Est 8^{10.14}, RV 'swift steeds'), once 'swift beast' (Mic 1¹³, RV 'swift steed'), and once 'dromedaries' (1 K 4²⁶, m. 'mules' or 'swift beasts,' RV 'swift steeds'). See DROMEDARY.

2. $\mathrm{c}$: $\nsym_6 mtm.$$ This word occurs only once (Gn $6^{24}), and refers to something which Anah (wh. see) found when feeding his father's asses in the

see) found when feeding his father's asses in the desert of Edom. Mules would not have been a likely find in such a place. The LXX tr. it by rob 'Inuely, a proper name, showing that the signification was not understood. The Vulg. tr. it aques calidæ = RV 'hot springs.' Such springs exist at Callirrhoë and elsewhere around the Dead Sea. Callirrhoë is called by the Arabs Hamamim Suleiman='the hot springs of Solomon.' The springs below Umm-Keis (Gadara) are known as Ard el-Hamma='land of hot springs.' Yêmîm may be a dialectic modification of this local term. The Arabs attach great medicinal value to such hot springs, and such a discovery would be considered well worthy of record.

8. τρ peredh, δ ἡμίονος, mulus. This is the common word for 'mule' in both AV and RV.

It occurs once in the feminine ετης pirdûh, ἡ ἡμίονος, mula (1 K 128.28.44). Mules were forbidden (but see below) in the Levitical law (Lv 1919); but this, like many minor provisions of the law, was not in force in the era of the kings. David seems to have been the first to ride one, as also to introduce the horse (2 S 84), contrary to the previous practice of the people, and the sentiment reflected in the prohibition of Dt 17¹⁶ (where see Driver's note). Mules became common during David's reign, and were ridden by his sons (2 S 13²⁰). Absalom rode a mule in war (2 S 18³). Solomon rode one when he was proclaimed king (1 K 1²⁸). He received tribute in mules (1 K 10²⁸). The subsequent monarchs kept them (18°). The Gentiles, riding on mules, are to honour Israel (Is 66°°). The Phosnicians imported them from Togarmah = Armenia (Ezk 27¹⁴). Mules are mentioned in Jth 15¹¹. They are still used as riding animals by high functionaries. The Governor-General of the prowince of Beirût often goes to the seraglio on his spirited and sure-footed mule. The late Governor-General of Lebanon, Rustem Pasha, had a very fine riding mule, which he much preferred to a horse. Mules were also used as beasts of burden (1 Ch 12⁴⁰, 2 K 5¹⁷). A good pack-mule brings a much higher price than a pack-horse. He is longerlived, much surer of foot, and will carry a heavier burden. In the later days of the Heb. State, the law against mules (which may have been interpreted as forbidding the breeding but not the use; see Dillm. on Lv 1919) seems to have been quite disregarded, as so strict a legalist as Ezra allowed his returning people to bring 245 of them from Babylon (Ezr 28; see Ryle's note). They are now universally used in Bible lands. G. E. Post.

MUNITION is used in AV in the orig. sense of the Lat. munitio (from munio, to fortify), a fortified place of defence, a stronghold or entrenchment. The places are Is 29° all that fight against her and her munition' (20° x2°, RV 'her stronghold,' which is Coverdale's word); 33'8 'his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks' (so RV, Heb. 1975); Nah 2¹ 'keep the munition' (so RV, Heb. 1975) with Amer. RV 'fortress'); l Mac 14¹° 'He receited victuals for the cities and set in them provided victuals for the cities and set in them all manner of munition' (ξταξεν αὐτὰς ἐν σκεύεσω ὁχυρώσεως; RV 'furnished them with all manner οχυρώσεως; RV 'furnished them with all manner of munition,' RVm 'Gr. implements of munition 'i, also marg. of Dn 11^{18, 38, 39}. Cf. South, viii. ser. 5, 'No defence or munition can keep out a judgment, when commissioned by God to enter.' This meaning of the word is retained in AV from the Geneva Version; in 1611 the commoner meaning was that of the Fr. munition, i.e. military stores, provision for an army or fortress. Thus Shaks., K. John, v. ii. 98-

'What penny hath Rome borne, What men provided, what munition sent, To underprop this action?'

i. OCCASIONS WHEN USED.—The most cursory glance at the books of the OT shows the devotion of the Hebrews to the art of music. It is unlikely that it was so predominantly a sacred art as would at first sight appear from the Bible. The sacred writers look at everything more or less from a religious point of view; but we have quite sufficient evidence that music was loved by all classes of the people, and was practised in the home and in the fields. The favourite instruments had been invented long before the institution of the national religion and its ceremonies (Gn 4²⁰); Laban the Syrian was aggrieved that Jacob had stolen away without the usual song of leave-taking (Gn 31²⁷); and Job (21¹²) refers to the performance of music as a common feature in an unsophisticated prosperous life (cf. Nu 21¹⁷). In the headings of some of the psalms we have probably traces of popular secular songs: thus Ps 45 is to be sung to the tune of 'The Lilies,' 60 to that of the 'Lily of the Testimony,' etc. We have references also to vintage songs (Is 65⁶; cf. title of Ps 57. 58. 59. 75), which would not always be as sacred as Isaiah's (Is 5), and to music performed at feasts (Am 6⁶), and at processions (1 S 18⁶). Wherever there was a dance, or wherever two or three joined together in some common occupation, the movement would suggest rhythm, and rhythm melody. Dancing and music emerged spontaneously, and were practised together under all sorts of conditions. The Hebrews. See Lamentations (Book of).

But the consecration of music to the service of religion led to its being developed and cultivated with greater zeal and earnestness. Even if we cannot accept all the details in the statements of the historical books, at least as applying to the dates to which they are referred, they are not altogether valueless. We may allow for exaggerations in respect to figures, and we must transfer descriptions of the worship in the first temple to that of the second, but the tradition reveals the fact that sacred music was raised by the Israelites to the dignity of an art, and was

It is in Chronicles that we have the fullest account of the musical arrangements in the temple service. According to 1 Ch 15¹⁶⁻²⁴, David organized the Levitical chorus and orchestra. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan (? Jeduthun) were appointed chief conductors (under the king himself), giving the beat with their cymbals; seven Levites played on nebels moby by, i.e. of a high pitch (?; see p. 460^b), while six accompanied on kinnörs, whose description is quite uncertain (nyrryty, lit. 'on the eighth'). The whole of the choristers and players were divided into 24 classes, and are said to have been 4000 in number, with 288 leaders. Even the name of the director of the choral rehearsals is given. Although such minute details must be unistorical, one feature is probably correct for all periods of the history, i.e. the large proportion of experts (arrap) compared with pupils (arrap). The whole of these forces were employed to add extraordinary impressiveness to the ceremonies at the consecration of Solomon's Temple (2 Ch 5¹²).

After idolatrous kings had occupied the throne, Hezekiah and Josiah made it an important part of their task to restore 'the instruments and songs of David.' Among the exiles who returned from Babylon, and took part in consecrating the foundations of the second temple and the walls of Jerus., were the descendants of the great Levitical choristers (Neh 12⁸⁷), and in vv. 48-47 we are informed that from that time divine service was regularly performed as instituted by David, the people contributing the necessary support for the singers.

ii. NATURE OF HEBREW MUSIC. — We know nothing whatever of the nature of the music performed by these singers and players. What ancient instruments have been preserved have either been too frail to admit of being handled, or have refused to emit any sound. Besides, even if we could reproduce the ancient harps and flutes, etc., we should require to know the method of blowing or of tuning them. Nor can we learn anything from the music still performed in the synagogues. It is possible that the trumpet-calls now in use originated at an early date, but that does not take us far. The hymn-tunes are certainly comparatively modern, and their composition shows traces of the country and period in which they have originated. Of a musical notation there is no trace. Much ingenuity has been lavished on the attempt to interpret the accents from a musical point of view. It has been suggested that they were signs of musical phrases, or that they were even a kind of figured bass; but these are only far-fetched guesses. Not only were they of late origin, but their purpose was wholly different. They are guides to the proper recitation or cantillation of the text. Even to this extent they do not furnish any reliable information as to ancient usage: meant to preserve tradition, they are themselves subject to tradition, and are interpreted differently in different synagogues.

of the chramstance, it is possible to form only a very general and vague idea of the character of Hebrew music. It was evidently of a strident and noisy character. The melody was apparently often reduplicated in octaves. Harmony in our sense of the term was almost certainly unknown, though it does not follow that the accompaniments were wholly unisonous. It is hardly possible to conceive of players on harps and lyres not adding something of the nature of a chord. They could not fail to discover that certain notes produced a pleasing effect when played together or in arpeggios. The psalms show by their construction that they were intended to be sung antiphonally,—in some cases (e.g. Ps 13. 20. 38 etc.) by two choirs, in others by a choir and the congregation, the part taken by the latter being limited to the singing of a simple constantly recurring phrase or refrain (e.g. Ps 136. 1181-4). The leaders would possess the tradition of the music, and would impart it to the general body of the chorus.

The psalms must have been chanted, but it is most unlikely that the chants bore any resemblance to what we understand by the term. Our irrational and exceedingly artificial method of rushing over any number of syllables on a fixed note would hardly commend itself to a people to whom their sacred songs formed a living expression of their deepest feelings. The elaborate provision made for instructing the chorus suggests the existence of a system, which, along with a certain uniformity, admitted of some flexibility in its application. We can quite well imagine a chant which would allow of a greater number of notes being used in the longer verses, and which would vary slightly in character with the changing sentiment of the text. In point of fact, however, this is wholly conjectural, and the vocal method of the Hebrews is a lost and unknown art.

iii. MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—We know a little more about the instruments employed by the Hebrews. It is true that the OT, while it contains numerous references to them, gives us no definite information as to their form or construction, and that this defect is not supplied by the existence on Jewish ground of any sculptures or pictures, such as have been found in Egypt or Assyria. It is also true that the inferences drawn from etymology, the translation of Heb. names in the Greek versions, the statements of the Church Fathers, and the records of ancient nations, fall very far short of affording us definite and precise information, and have given rise to an endless diversity of opinion on almost every detail. Yet in spite of this we can form a general idea of the nature of a Jewish orchestra, and of the construction of the instruments of which it was composed. We consider them under the usual division into String, Wind, and Percussion Instruments.

l. Stringed Instruments.—Of these the kinnōr and the nebel (RV 'harp' and 'psaltery') are the most important, and may be described as the favourite national instruments. The kinnōr is indicated as having been the older, and is said to have been invented by Jubal, the second son of Lamech (Gn 421). It is the only stringed instrument mentioned in the Hexateuch. The nebel first occurs in 1 S 105, where it is found among the instruments played by the prophets who met

There is now a general consensus of opinion that these were species of the lute or lyre and the harp, but there is no agreement as to which was which, and many scholars have given up the attempt to distinguish between them, contenting themselves with describing the various instruments to which the names may have been applied. In any case, even if we attempt to reach greater precision, we must admit that we come very far short of certainty, and that a considerable proportion of our conclusions is more or less conjectural.

It is clear, however, that the kinnor and the nebel were not identical, and that the names were not used indifferently for the same instrument. They seem to be confused in one or two places in the LXX (cf. Ps 149°); but in the great majority of instances the is rendered by $\kappa \theta d\rho a$ or $\kappa \iota \nu \iota \rho a$, and by $\psi a \lambda \tau \tau h \mu a \sigma$, $\nu d \beta \lambda \sigma$. The few cases in which they are identified can be satisfactorily accounted for by supposing that the translators were not musical experts, or felt that in the particular passage the difference was trivial. But the great mass of evidence shows that they were different, and were known to be different.

Before trying to distinguish them, however, we may note certain common features. They were mainly, if not exclusively, used to accompany vocal music. They were par excellence the ve '72 (Am 65). They are said to have been the sole accompanying instruments in the temple service, though this is doubtful. Their use was associated principally with joyful and exultant strains (the captives hung up their kinnörs in their time of dejection, Ps 1372), but it is perhaps straining poetical language unduly to confine it exclusively to those.

In 2 Ch 911 it is said that the nebel and kinnör yander Solemen, were constructed of alternate.

In 2 Ch 9¹¹ it is said that the nebel and kinnor under Solomon were constructed of almug or algum, a wood which it is impossible to identify with any certainty, but which was at all events very valuable and much sought after (see art. ALGUM TREES, and Cheyne and Hommel in Expos. Times, viii. 470, 525). According to Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 8), the framework was fitted with electrum, i.e. either a mixed metal or amber, which in any case could have served only for decorating the body of the instrument. The strings (0'12) were originally made of twisted grass or plant-fibres, then of gut, and in later times of silk and metal.

fied with a number of instruments: the tanbur or tinbur, a kind of guitar; the lute (al-'ood), which is closely allied to the guitar; the trigon, a small, easily portable triangular harp; a large harp provided with 47 strings; and the lyre. We can at once delete several of these if we remember the limit of the li hints given in the OT. The kinnor was portable: it was played during marches and processions, and was hung upon the willows by the Babylonian captives. It was therefore not a harp of the larger sort. As against the view that it was a trigon, it is urged that the latter could not have been the favourite instrument of a people so musically gifted as the Jews. It was small, and from its construction weak in tone, and would have contrasted unfavourably with the larger and fullertoned harps and citterns which intercourse with other nations had rendered familiar. The guitar or lute, again, is open to several objections. It is not known to have been current among Semitic nations in early times. We have a representation of one lute-shaped instrument in Nineveh; it has a small oval body and a very long neck, exactly like those depicted in Egypt; but this one example, most probably derived from Egypt, does not furnish adequate support for the theory that the lute was familiar to the Semitic peoples, and may therefore have formed the model of the kinnor. Besides, it is hardly conceivable that such a slim long-necked instrument could have been easily portable, and a favourite for processional music.

But the strongest evidence we have for the nature of the kinnör is to be found in the LXX. The translators, except in a very few cases, render rim by $\kappa\iota\theta d\rho a$, or by $\kappa\iota\nu \theta a$, which is explained by Greek writers as equivalent to $\kappa\iota\theta d\rho a$. Unless we suppose that the LXX wrote in utter ignorance of the shape of the kinnör, this fact is decisive against either the lute or the harp. It would have been impossible for even the most careless or inexpert writer to confound the lute with its long neck and finger-board, or the harp, with the kithara or the lyre. It is probable that the kinnör presented differences from the kithara, but it is unnatural to suppose that these should have been so great as to make the rendering of the LXX wholly inappropriate.

Now numerous lyre-shaped instruments, i.e. instruments with resonance-body at the base, side arms of wood, and cross-bar at the top from which the strings descend to the sound-box, or stringholder resting on it, are found on the monuments. A very ancient one is depicted in an Egyptian tomb, and dates from the 12th Dynasty. It represents a Semitic immigrant with an eight-stringed kithara, which he holds in a horizontal position under his right (?) arm; he plucks the strings with the fingers of the left hand, while he uses a plectrum with the right. The body of the instrument is really a quadrangular-shaped board with the upper half cut out. There is also a picture of a player on the kithara, accompanying two harpists, in a grave at Thebes belonging to the period between the 12th and 18th Dynasties. Here, again, we have the ruder form characteristic of the Semitic kithara. Later the kithara becomes quite common, and is more artistically constructed. It generally has a square, sometimes an urnshaped sound-box, from which rise arms of various design and thickness, bound together by a wooden cross-bar. These arms are often of different lengths, and the cross-bar therefore slopes downwards, thus serving to give the strings their proper pitch. The strings radiate from the sound-box in the form of a fan, and vary in number from 3 to 12.

The kithara was, however, not properly an Egyptian but an Asiatic instrument. We have already seen that the oldest known to be depicted in Egypt was played by a Semitic immigrant. The very earliest representation of a stringed instrument is that discovered at Telloh in Southern Babylonia. It is of a large size, but the frame shows a sound-body beneath, on which are set the two upright posts and the cross-bar of the lyre. The number of the strings is great enough to suggest that a harp was meant, but the model, which is exceedingly rude, is that of the kithara. Many specimens have been also found at Khorsabad, Kouyunjik, and Nimrud, which strongly resemble those of the immigrant Semites in Egypt. They are, however, more fully developed and have a larger sound-box at the base. They differ in form and in number of strings at the same period. A twelve-stringed kithara, shown on a bas-relief at Khorsabad, is remarkable for its rectangular form and the exceptional fulness of its sound-box.

The evidence of Jewish coins also points to the similarity of the kinnor to the kithara or lyre. The representations of instruments found on them are unmistakable. The strings are fixed in a strong oval body resting on a kettle-shaped or vase-like sounding-box; the frame is simple and nearly square. The projecting arms are curved and joined by a cross-bar to which the strings, which vary in number from 3 to 6, are fixed. The figures thus resemble the Greek lyre or kithara. It is not likely, however, that they simply depict foreign importations, and that they cannot therefore be relied upon as evidence for the ancient kinnōr. Oriental conservatism was at its strongest in matters affecting the cultus of the Israelites, and though the kinnōr may have been modified in certain details, it is unlikely to have been wholly supplanted. We may assume with great probability that these coins represent Jewish instruments, and in that case the biblical kinnōr.

We may then sum up, following Weiss. The ancient versions render kinnōr by kithara: the kithara was of Asiatic origin, was introduced by Semites into Egypt, and was in common use in Western Asia; and the representations on Jewish coins of the 2nd cent. before Christ clearly resemble the Greek kithara. The view is therefore very credible, that we should regard the ancient Heb. kinnōr as a simple and primitive form of the

(b) The nebel. If we suppose the kinnor to have been a lyre, then it almost necessarily follows that the nebel was a harp. We can hardly imagine this instrument, so familiar to all early nations, to have been absent from the Jewish orchestra. Many other suggestions have been made, mostly based on the etymological meaning of the word (by 'a' skin or bottle'). It has been identified with the bagpipe, with some sort of wind instrument, and with the lute, guitar, or mandoline; but none of these suppositions is satisfactory. The lute was held to be supported by reference to the Egyptian nfr, which denotes a lute with two or three strings and a very long neck; but the identification of nbl with nfr is now abandoned, and the lute, as has been said, is not known to have been a popular semitic instrument. A somewhat more likely supposition is that the nebel was a kind of dulcimer. This instrument occurs in a monument of the time of Assurbanipal (B.C. 668-626), on which is depicted an Assyrian orchestra of 11 performers. Of these, 7 are harpists, 2 flautists, one a drummer, and one a dulcimer player. This dulcimer is said by some to have been the nebrl, the chief reason being that its Arabic name, santir, is a corruption of the Greek psalterion, which in turn is the equivalent of the Heb. nablion or nebel. But psalterion was a general name for several kinds of instruments, and was especially applied to every stringed instrument which was played upon with the fingers of both hands, instead of by one hand and a plectrum held in the other. Therefore the Greek name for a harp was also psalterion. The Greek translation does not, therefore, decide in favour of the dulcimer, and the very fact that psalterion was a generic term would make it particularly appropriate as a designation of the harp, which varied so much in size and shape. That a corruption or derivative should be applied to a stringed instrument of another kind is quite intelligible. The description of the nabla by Ovid (Ars. Am. ii. 327), the statement by Josephus (Ant. VII. xii. 3) that the nebel had 12 strings and was played without plectrum, and, as we shall see, the distinction drawn by the early Fathers between instruments with a sound-body below and those having a resonance-board above the strings, all point to the harp.

The Egyptian monuments present us with a great variety of harps. The earliest form shown is very primitive; it is in the shape of an archer's bow, possesses no sound-box, and has but a limited number of strings. As early as the 5th Dynasty, however, improvements began to be effected; the upper part, to which the strings were affixed with pegs, was broadened and developed into a sound-body, and the frame began to be more or less elaborately ornamented. While playing, the musician knelt, and the frame rested on his shoulder. As time advanced, harps were still further developed. The lower part of the frame was converted into a sound-body, which was broadened at the base so that it could rest on the ground unsupported by the player. Some harps were placed on a stool, or raised upon a stand or limb attached to the lower part. The players of these large instruments stood during the performance. While we cannot deny the possibility or even the probability of the Hebrews having been familiar with such harps, they were not the common or popular nebels, which were easily portable.

large instruments stood during the performance. While we cannot deny the possibility or even the probability of the Hebrews having been familiar with such harps, they were not the common or popular nebels, which were easily portable.

Now, smaller portable harps did exist in Egypt in a great variety of forms. One is bow-shaped with a transverse string-holder; a second has a quadrangular flat-shaped sound-box pierced with holes, while the strings are stretched from a string-holder resting on the sounding-board to a post rising at right angles from one end of the latter; and a third, ornamented with a bird's head, is quite triangular, the upright post being at once string-holder and sound-box. Another instrument is very common in Upper Egypt. It resembles a mandoline, with the neck bending abruptly upwards from the sound-body; the strings, which are from three to five in number, are not attached to the body of the instrument itself, but to a string-holder attached to its centre. At the upper end of the neck are pins for stretching and tuning the strings.

We might have regarded one or other of these smaller harps as furnishing the model of the nebel but for one fact. They all have the sound-box at their base. But we have already come to the conclusion that the kinnör had its resonance-body beneath; and if we are to follow the description given by the Fathers (Augustine on Ps 42, Jerome on Ps 1493, Isidore Etym. III. xxii. 2), who distinguished between instruments with the sound-body beneath and those possessing it above, we must look for a harp that satisfies the latter condition. And this we find, again among a

Semitic people, in Assyria. On the bas-relief at Kouyunjik there are seven of these harps. They are portable, are triangular in shape, and are supported by a belt worn by the player. The resonance-frame slopes upwards and forwards from the player and is pierced by holes, and the strings descend from it to a bridge or string-holder beneath which they fall. The performer plays while marching, using both hands without plectrum. While, of course, certainty is out of the question, this Assyrian harp seems to satisfy the requisite conditions best, and is most likely to have been the biblical nebel.

It is highly probable that there were different species of kinnors and nebels, but whether these are designated in the OT or not is unknown. In one case this is almost certain. The thry transfer of Ps 33³ and 144°, or simply thry Ps 92°, was in all likelihood a ten-stringed harp.

The meaning of the word new (Gittith) in the headings of Ps 8. 81. 84 is wholly obscure. The LXX and Vulg. suggest the rendering 'Song of the vintage'; but it may be derived from Gath, and may refer to a mode, or singers, or instruments named after that town. Ewald understands it to be 'the March of the Gittite guard.'

The meaning 'Gittite instruments' is rendered not improbable if we translate http://yr (1 Ch 15²⁰) and 46 times in Ps) with Wellhausen 'on Elamite instruments.' This term is, however, more generally taken to mean 'with women's voice' (lit. 'on or acc. to damsels'; RV 'set to' by as name of a tune, which is quite possible), i.e. soprano, and to refer to instruments of a higher pitch.

Něginōth (נְנִינוֹת) has sometimes been taken to denote a particular kind of instrument, but it is a general term for string music. In Ps 682 we have 275 contrasted with 044, i.e. the singers with the players.

(c) This division of the orchestra is supplemented by instruments which occur only in the Book of Daniel (3⁵⁶). These are the pṣanṭērɨn (Υτριρη, the kitharis (τητρ), and the ṣabbekha (κριρ). The pṣanṭērɨn * is the Greek ψαλτήριον, and that is all we know definitely about it. It has been identified by some with the magadis, but this is itself only a general term for an instrument (most commonly, however, a lyre) which could be played in octaves; and with a dulcimer because of the retention of the word in the Arabic santir. But psanterin may just as well have kept its original force, and have denoted a harp played with both hands. There is nothing to lead us to identify it with the dulcimer represented on Assyrian monuments. The kitharist is the Greek κιθάρα.

The sabbekha t is the Greek σαμβύκη. But the sambuca is itself a word of very varied import. Stainer (Mus. of the Bible, p. 39) concludes that it was a large and powerful harp of a rich quality of tone, perhaps similar to, if not identical with, the great Egyptian harp. Weiss (Mus. Inst. p. 67) goes to the opposite extreme, and holds that it was a small trigon characterized by a high shrill tone, and used to accompany female voices. (Hist. of Mus. p. 255) summarizes the various meanings given to the word in Greek writers: it was either a trigon, a barbitos or many-stringed lyre, a lyrophænix or Phænician lyre, a Greek lyre, a magadis, a pipe, a dulcimer, or a siege-ladder; in short, anything made of elder-wood. It was not, however, a 'sackbut,' i.e. a trombone.

2. Wind Instruments.—(a) Of these the one in most general use was the flute or halil (חַלִּיל). It has been denied that it was ever used to accompany sacred song, but this is very doubtful. In 1 S 10⁸ and 1 K 1²⁰ it is played in descending from and ascending to the High Place, and its tones accompanied the festal processions of pilgrims from the country (Is 30²⁰). In the second temple it was played before the altar on twelve days: the day of killing the first and that of killing the second Passover, the first day of unleavened bread, Pentecost, and the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Erachin ii. 3, Succah v. 1). While the singers required to be Levites, other distinguished Israelites might perform on the instruments. The flute was also used at marriage feasts and funerals: in the time of Christ, even the poorest were expected to provide two flautists at a funeral.

• In Dn 35. 10. 15 the word is spelt בְּסָנְמָרִין, in v.7 בְּסָנְמָרִין

Flute-like instruments date from the very earliest times. From the first, two kinds are met with—the long flute, played by blowing in one end and held straight before the player, and the oblique flute, played by blowing in a hole at the side. Both these kinds are depicted on the Egyptian monuments. Double flutes are also shown in the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments; they were probably preferred as giving the performer a greater range or compass. The material of which flutes were made was at first the reed, then wood of various kinds, and lastly bone and ivory.

Wood-winds were of two kinds: those with and wood-winds were of two kinds: those with and those without reeds or vibrating tongues. The former are represented by the oboe and clarinet, the latter by the flute proper. From specimens found in Pompeii and elsewhere it is known that the Greeks were familiar with reed instruments, especially those provided with a single tongue, and therefore of the clarinet class. If we are to trust the evidence of ancient myths (cf. legend of Apollo and Maraysa) the Greeks awad this instrument to and Marsyas), the Greeks owed this instrument to the Phrygians, who may have acquired the double flute from the Assyrians.

Whether the hall was a single or double flute, or a flue or reed pipe, we do not know. It is certain that the Hebrews had every opportunity of becoming acquainted with all these kinds, but we have no information on the subject. In any case, the number of notes was limited to those produced by stopping the holes with the fingers, as the keyed flute is entirely a modern invention.

It has been held by some that nekeb (52; Ezk 2812 AV and RV 'pipes') designates the double flute; but this is inconsistent with the context, and is altogether erroneous. A. B. Davidson renders the word 'grooves.

Again, nëhiloth (יויילייוי) in the heading of Ps 5 is a term of very uncertain meaning.

a term of very uncertain meaning.

(b) The ugab (2y or 2y) is a somewhat uncertain term. The LXX renders the word variously, $\kappa\iota\theta d\rho a$ (Gn 4^{21}), $\psi a\lambda \mu ds$ (Job 21^{13} 30^{21}), and $\delta\rho\gamma a\nu a\nu$ (Ps 150^{4}). It is not a general term for a musical instrument ($\delta\rho\gamma a\nu a\nu$), as we can see from the context. Some writers think it to have been a syrinx or Pan's pipe, others a bagpipe. But we have really no evidence in support of either view. If ny means to blow in (which, it must be confessed, is pure conjecture), then the noun would denote wind instruments in general, and this gives a good sense in all the above passages. Thus Jubal (Gn 4²¹) is the inventor of string and wind instruments, and in Ps 150 minnim and ugab represent the same divisions of the orchestra.

(c) Mashrōkithā (אַדְּרוֹקִים) is another of the instru-ments mentioned in Dn (3^{5, 7, 15}). The name is derived from a verb meaning to hiss, and is therefore applicable either to the oblique flute or Pan's pipe. Of course the hissing effect is more pronounced in playing the syrinx, and it is most probably the instrument meant.

(d) The symphonia (πμεριο) is also mentioned in Dn (3^{5, 15}) alone. The Greek συμφωνία, from which this word is derived, did not originally denote an instrument, but a concordant interval. Tradition applies it to the bagpipe. Originally the form of this instrument may have been developed from the double flute, one of the pipes being shorter and being used for the melody, while the longer furnished a droning bass accompaniment. We are told by Athenæus (Lib. x. p. 439) that Antiochus Epiphanes used to dance to the sound of the symphonia. To this day the Italians have a bagpipe called zampuqna or sampogna, and a chifonie or called zampugna or sampogna, and a chifonic or symphonic was an instrument of the same class used in the Middle Ages. In Rome this instru-ment was introduced in the time of the Empire under the name of tibia utricularis or chorus, and soon became highly popular. Seneca (Ep. 76) is indignant at the applause bestowed on a bagpipe player.

(e) The horn (who shophar, processes, and so confused with hazozerah except where they occur together, when we is rendered cornet [see Driver, Joel and Amos, p. 146]) originally consisted of a ram's horn. It was afterwards sometimes made of metal, but the actual ram's horn was always retained for certain purposes. It had a loud piercing tone, was of limited compass, and was wholly un-suited to concerted music. It was used to summon the people to attention, and for making signals. The first mention of it in the OT is at the giving of the law (Ex 19). Its blasts proclaimed the year of Jubilee (Lv 25°). The 'blowing' (הִרנִינָה), commanded in Nu 29¹, was probably performed on the shophār, as it is still employed at that festival. It was also blown at the feast of the New Year and on fastdays. In time of war the $sh\bar{o}ph\bar{a}r$ summoned and assembled the army (Jg 3^{27} and often), and the prophet foretold that it should announce the recall of the people from exile (Is 2713).

MODERN BHÖPHÄR

The shophar is retained in the service of the on New Year's Day (except when that happens to be a Sabbath), at the conclusion of the Day of Atonement, on the 7th day of the Feast of Tabernacles, and during the entire month of Elul, after the recital of the supplications. The modern shophār is a real ram's horn, curved at the end, but otherwise straightened by heat otherwise straightened by heat.

(f) The trumpet or hazozérah (תְּצְּבֶּה) is the only Heb. instrument of which we have an indubitably authentic representation. On the Arch of Titus two specimens are depicted along with the golden Table of Shewbread. Some little difficulty has been caused by their not tallying perfectly with the description given by Josephus (Ant. III. xii. 6). He says that the trumpet (assira) was nearly a yard long, a little wider than a flute, with a slight expansion near the mouthpiece, to catch the breath, and ending in a bell, just as in the war-trumpets. This description corresponds with the form of trumpet shown on a coin of the time of the emperor Hadrian, which bears the inscription לחרות ירושלם 'Deliverance of Jerusalem.' The instruments on the Arch of Titus, of which we do not see the mouthpiece, are very long, being supported by rests, and gradually swell out into a long and not very wide bell. See, further, TRUMPET.

The Silver Trumpets are said to have been made by Moses of beaten silver (Nu 10²); they were blown by priests; and they belonged to the sacred vessels. The nature and meaning of the signals is indicated in Nu 10³⁻¹⁰.

3. Percussion Instruments.—(a) The toph (rs) or tabret is first mentioned in Gn 31.7. The LXX and other Greek versions render this word by $\tau \dot{\nu}_{\mu \tau a \nu o \nu}$; in Arab. we have duf, in Spanish a dufa. This instrument was a small hand-drum. The dufof the Arabs is made of a circle of light wood, over the edge of which is stretched a piece of goat-skin. The wood is pierced with five openings, in which thin metal discs are set, in order to give greater effect to the drum-beat. The duf is about 10 in. in diameter, and 2 in. in depth. It is usually played by women to accompany their dances and processions at weddings and public festivals.

The hand-drum is frequently represented both in Egyptian and Assyrian propurants. Some times we have an approach to the modern use of the drum. In some cases it is attached to the player by a belt fastened round his waist, while his hands act as drumsticks. One form of this instrument is slightly bulged, like a little barrel. Perhaps the rudeness of the drawing alone accounts for its somewhat square appearance.

ASSYRIAN HAND-DRUM

The modern Egyptian table are of two kinds. The one is like our common military drum, but not so deep; it is hung obliquely. The other is not so deep; it is hung obliquely. The other is a kind of kettledrum, of tin-copper, with a parchment face; it is generally about 16 in. in diameter, and not more than 4 in depth in the centre, and is beaten with two slender sticks. (b) Cymbals are mentioned in the OT under two names, meziltaim (ne) and zelzelim (n'); the latter only occurs in 2 S 6 and Ps 150. In Zec 14 the RV translates con many by the bells of the horses, but there is no absolute necessity for departing here from the commoner rendering. The departing here from the commoner rendering. Egyptians at the present day decorate the breastleather and head-stalls of their horses with coins and other ornaments, and a metal disc would be better suited for inscriptions than a bell. The word used elsewhere for a bell is pags. In 1 Ch 15¹⁹ we are told that cymbals were made of brass.

Two varieties of cymbals have been found in Egypt and Assyria: the one similar to a modern soup-plate, but having a somewhat larger rim; the other conical in form, with a handle at the peak. The flat cymbals have a hole through which a thong or cord was passed, and were played by clashing the instruments together sideways: of the second kind, the one was brought down on the top of the other. In Egypt, Greece, and Rome, as well as among the Hebrews, the cymbals were used by the conductor to mark the time.

It has been supposed that the אלצלי of Ps 150° (AV 'loud cymbals') were castanets, or metal discs fixed to two fingers of one hand; but this is by no means certain, though such castanets are

(c) The měna'an'im (crypur) are mentioned in 2 S 65, where the RV renders 'castaneta,' and in marg. sistra. The latter suits the root-meaning, and is supported by the Vulg., where we have systra. The sistrum consisted of two thin metal plates, bent together at the top, and fitted with a handle at the bottom. The plates were pierced with holes, through which rods were passed having rings at their ends. This instrument was used in Egypt to call attention to the various acts of public worship, or to scare away malign influence.

Egypt to call attention to the various acts of public worship, or to scare away malign influence.

(d) The word shaltshim (n+) occurs, evidently as an instrument of some sort, in 1 S 18. It can hardly mean a trigon (but see Wellhausen, 'Psalms' in PB 230, and references in Driver, Joel and Amos, 236 n.); but what it does mean we do not know. We have no evidence of the existence of the triangle (to which it has been referred) in Assyria or Egypt.

MUSTARD (σίναπι, sinapis).—The conditions to be fulfilled by the mustard are that it should be a familiar plant, with a very small seed (Mt 1720, Lk 176), sown in the earth, i.e. annual, growing larger than garden herbs (λάχανον, olus, Mt 1321), having large branches (Mk 4³²), or, in the more exaggerated language of Luke (13¹⁹), becoming a 'great tree,' attractive to passing birds. The wild mustards of the Holy Land, Sinapis arvensis, L., the field mustard or charlock, and S. alba, L., the white mustard, are familiar weeds, growing in every part of the country. They would have been called sirax: in the time of Christ, as they are now called khardal=sinapis. The cultivated mustard is Sinapis nigra, L. The seed is well known for its minuteness. The plant grows to a size larger than the garden herbs, with which it is compared. The mustards are annuals, reproduced with extraordinary rapidity wherever the seed finds a lodgment, a particular which seems to be implied in the parable. In fat soil they often attain a height of 10 or 12 ft., and have branches which attain a far less size than these are called shajar='tree' by the Arabs. One of the many examples of this is in the plants of the Borraginaceous genus Arnebia, which are only a shajaret el-arneb='the rabbit tree.' It would not seem at all strange to any native to speak of a mustard plant as shajaret el-khardal='mustard tree.' Finally, they are favourites of the birds, which alight upon them to devour their seeds. The Greek word κατεσκήνωσεν does not refer to nesting, but to a temporary rest. We may, then, justly conclude that the traditional and obvious interpretation meets all the reasonable demands of the passage.

Owing to the expression 'great tree' (Lk 1319), some have sought for an arboreal plant. Salvadora Persica, Garcin, has been suggested by Royle, on the authority of Ameuny, who states that this plant is found all along the banks of the Jordan, near Damascus, and is called by the Arabs khardal = 'mustard.' We unhesitatingly reject this plant for the following reasons. (1) It is not found in the localities mentioned, but only around the Dead Sea. It would have been quite unknown to most of the hearers of the parable, and to them only by chance. (2) We have not heard it called khardal, and doubt the fact of its being generally known by this name. But, admitting that it is known locally by this name, as attested by Ameuny, it would not have suggested itself at once to the simple hearers of the parable. (3) Its seed is never sown in gardens, while it is expressly stated that the mustard seed was so planted (Lk 1319). (4) It is a perennial shrub, and therefore not a plant conspicuous by its rapid propagation from seed, a point of prime importance in the parable. (5) Although a taller plant than the mustard usually is, it would not suit the literal requirements of a 'great tree.' It is a shrub, seldom more than 6 to 8 ft. tall, and grows in thickets. It would require as much exaggeration to call it a 'great tree' as to so designate the mustard. (6) Salvadora Persica could, by no stretch of the imagination, be called an herb, while of mustard it is expressly said that it is μεῖζον τῶν λαχάσων, 'the greatest among herbs' (Mt 13³²). G. E. myndus (Mórðos) was a city of Caria, situated on the extreme western extremity of the peninsula on whose southern coast lies Halicarnassus. It plays very little part in ancient history; and its only importance seems to have lain in the silver mines beside it, which were worked in ancient and in mediæval times. From them the site derives its modern name, Gumushli. It was one of the places to which letters in favour of the Jews were sent by the Romans about B.C. 139, 1 Mac 15²²; cf. DELUS, COS, CNIDUS, HALICARNASSUS. This fact proves that Myndus must have been a self-governing and independent city at that time, and not one of the cities of the Carian confederacy; see CARIA. It also shows that Jews went there, and the silver trade would naturally attract persons with their financial instincts. On the site, see Paton in Journal of Hellenic Studies, 1887, p. 66; 1896, p. 204.

MYRA (Μόρα or Μόβρα), a city of Lycia.—The name is used in neuter plural, Ac 276, where, however, many authorities have feminine singular. The same doubt between neuter plural and feminine singular exists in Ac 211, where the Western Text adds after Patara και Μύρα, et deinde Myram; some MSS Μύραν in Acta Pauli et Theclæ, 40 (but et Μόροις, al.); the form in Strabo p. 666 and Ptolemy v. 3, 6, is Μύρα, of doubtful gender and number: but Pliny Nat. Hist. xxxii. 2, 17, Ptolemy viii. 17, 23, use the plural form; Athenseus ii. 53, p. 59, CIG 4288, and Basil Epist. 218, have et Μύροις: the Byzantine lists frequently have gen. Μύρων, probably never Μύρας. Many late writers, Theophanes pp. 465, 483 (de Boor), Glykas p. 587, Basil Sel. Vit. S. Theclæ, i. p. 272, Cedrenus pp. 511, 512, Zonaras iii. p. 589, use the plural form; and Malalas varies, p. 365 τη Μυρα, p. 448 τα Μυρα. Constantine Porph. de Them. i. p. 36 avoids the name, but says it is called from the sacred μύρα (suggesting thus the reason why the Christian writers preferred the neuter plural form); Stephanus mentions that both the feminine and the neuter forms were in use; but there is hardly any authority for Μύρα fem. sing. in any case except accus.; and even there it is inferior. The literary form therefore was certainly τὰ Μύρα, but there was evidently also a popular form την Μύραν (with which compare Λόστραν - Λόστροις Αc 146. 161. 2, Clupeam-Clupeis Wölfflin's note on Cæsar Bell. Afr. 3, 1), which has given rise to the modern Dembre. In the words where double declension exists, the tendency to acc. sing. fem. and plural in other cases is marked.

Myra was not one of the greatest cities of Lycia in the Greek period, but rose to importance under the Empire, and became the capital of Lycia under the Byzantine Empire and in the ecclesiastical organization. The reason for its growth lay in the development of navigation. In the older system of sailing by hugging the coast from point to point, Myra was merely one out of many coast towns, and had nothing to give it special importance. But as the bolder method became common of running direct between the Lycian and the Egyptian coasts, keeping off Cape Akamas, the western point of Cyprus, the two harbours that were found most convenient were Myra at the north end of the course and Alexandria at the There had been an immense development of trade between the East Ægean coasts and Egypt under the Ptolemies (compare Paton-Hicks, Inscriptions of Cos, p. xxxiii): under the Roman rule Egyptian export trade was diverted towards Italy and Rome (which was to a considerable extent fed on Egyptian grain). As the prevailing wind in the eastern Mediterranean is westerly, the corn-ships for Rome could not make a direct voyage towards the west, but had to use the protection of the irregular coasts of Asia Minor and Crete and the local coastwinds. For that purpose they must either take the long circular course round the Syrian coast, or sail direct across to Lycia; and the steadiness of the western winds tempted to the direct crossing.

Examples of this direct course, showing that it was regarded as quite usual, are—(1) the Alexandrian corn-ship (Ac 27²⁸) for Rome, which St. Paul found in Myra, Ac 27²⁸; (2) an ideal voyage, founded, of course, on contemporary facts, is described in Lucian's Navigium s. Vota.: an Italian corn-ship, sailing from Alexandria, sighted Akamas on the seventh day, but the strength of the west wind prevented it from clearing the cape, and it had to run for the Syrian coast (Cyprus offering no harbours, but only open roadsteads); in ten days from Sidon the ship reached the Khelidonian Islands east from Myra (compare St. Paul's fifteen days, according to the Western Text, from Cæsarea to Myra), and afterwards it failed to 'keep the proper course in shelter south of Crete' (Ac 27'), and ultimately on the seventieth day from Alexandria took refuge in the harbour of Piræus, where its great size attracted many visitors, and gave the opportunity for Lucian's Dialogue; (3) Gregory Nazianzen, sailing from Alexandria direct for Greece, ran across the Parthenic Sea (the Levant, defined by Ammianus xii. 15, 2, as another name for the Issiac Sea), till he came near Cyprus, 'and under Cyprus cut the wave in a straight course for Hellas' (Carmen de'vita sua 128 ff., Orat. xviii. 31); he set sail in November, and apparently took twenty days to Rhodes (Carmen de rebus suis 312).

November, and apparently took twenty days to Rhodes (Carmen de rebus suis 312).

The maritime importance of Myra continued into the Middle Ages. Tomaschek quotes from the pilgrim Sæwulf the description of it as portus Adriatici (i.e. the eastern half of the Meditarranean, compare Ac 2721) maris, sicut Constantinopolis est portus Ægæi maris.† The town by the harbour, strictly speaking, was Andriake, while Myra was 20 stadia or 2½ miles inland; but commonly the port town is called Myra. It was a well-protected harbour; but storms in the neighbourhood are mentioned, such as that which destroyed the Arab fleets in A.D. 807 (Theophanes, p. 483, de Boor); compare others mentioned in Acta S. Nicolai (under Constantine), and in Lucian's Navigium at the Khelidonian Islands.

As Myra was at one end of an unusually long sea-course, the sailors paid and discharged their vows there to the deity that protected their course. The ancient name of this deity is not known: Tozer, in a note to Finlay's History of Greece, i. p. 124, suggests Poseidon. The Christians put in his place St. Nicolas, who was bishop of Myra under Constantine; and that saint became the great sailors' patron for the Levant, as St. Phocas of Sinope was for the Euxine. According to the story, Nicolas was born at Patara and buried at Myra; and the pilgrim Sæwulf touched at these two ports on his return from the Holy Land, just as St. Paul did in the Western Text of Ac 211.

MYRRH.—Two words in Heb. are rendered in AV 'myrrh.' 1. 10 m0r. The LXX tr. it variously: $\sigma\mu\delta\rho\nu\alpha$ (Ex 302 etc.), $\kappa\rho\delta\kappa\nu\sigma$ (Pr 7^{17} B), $\sigma\tau\alpha\kappa\tau\eta$ (Ca 113 etc.). The Arabs call it murr. It is a gum resin from Balsamodendron Myrrha, Nees, a shrubby tree, which grows in Yemen and the adjacent regions of Africa. The leaves are ternate, with obovate, obtuse leaflets, denticulate at tip, and the fruit ovate, smooth, somewhat larger than a pea. Murr occurs in pieces of irregular form, composed of more or less agglutinated tears, usually covered with the dust caused by their attrition. The colour varies from pale reddish-yellow to red or reddish-brown. The odour is balsamic, and the taste bitter and acrid. Myrrh is astringent, stimulant, and antiseptic. It is used in medicine as an astringent and emmenagogue, and its powder is an ingredient of many dentifrices. The tincture is used in gargles, and the powder as a stimulant to foul and indolent ulcers. It was one of the gifts of the Magi (Mt 2¹¹). It was used as a perfume (Ps 45⁵, Pr 7¹⁷, Ca 1¹³ 5⁵), for the purification of women (Est 2¹²), for any substitution of women (Est 2¹²), and a substitution of women (Est 2¹²). for embalming (Jn 1989), and as an anodyne (Mk

2. 27 lût, στακτή, stacte. This Heb. word is the same as the Arab. lådhan or ladhan, and the Gr. λήδανον or λάδανον, Lat. ladanum or labdanum. Anourous of Accasor, Lat. tadanum or tabdanum. This is a resinous exudation of various species of Cistus ('rock rose'), particularly C. villosus, L., which grows abundantly along the coast and in the mountains of Syria and Palestine. It is a low shrub, of the order Cistinæ, with pink, rose-like flowers, in umbel-like cymes. The leaves are elliptical to obovate-oblong, and more or less wavy. A drink like tea is made from the somewhat aromatic leaves. The exudation is sometimes collected from the beards of goats. In Cyprus men with leathern breeches go through the ladanum thickets, and the resin which adheres to their garments is scraped off and moulded into rolls. It is also collected by a kind of rake or whip, with a double row of leather thongs. It has rubefacient properties, and was formerly a constituent of warming plasters. Lôt is mentioned only twice (Gn 37²⁸ AV and RV text 'myrrh,' RVm 'ladanum,' 43¹¹ AV and RV 'myrrh'). Στακτή is mentioned in Sir 24¹⁵. The Turks still value it as a perfume. G. E. Post.

MYRTLE (בְּיָבֶה hadas, hence בְּיָבֶה Hadassah, the Jewish name of Esther).—The Arabic has three words for the myrtle, rihan, 'as, and hadas, the last of which is identical with the Hebrew. Hadas occurs six times in the OT. In three of these (Neh 815, Is 4119 5513) the LXX has μυρσίνη, in the rest δρέων=' of the hills' (Zec 18.10.11, where the translators must have had the reading στης instead of crannel. The myrtle, Myrtus communis, L., is an evergreen shrub, usually from 3 to 4 ft. high. Occasionally, in moist soil, it attains a height of 8 ft. It flourishes from the sea-level to an altitude of 4000 ft. The southernmost range of Lebanon is called Jebzl Rihân, from the abundance of this shrub on its flanks. It grows on bare hillsides and by watercourses in beautiful green clumps.

Being so low a shrub, it is quite improper to speak of it as forming groves. A variety is cultivated, especially in Damascus, which often reaches a height of 10 or 12 ft., but never attains the proportions of a tree. The translation 'myrtle trees' (Zec 1c. 10. 11) is unwarrantable, as the original has not the word trees in (const.), but simply are in myrtles.' The flowers are white, about an inch broad, and of a delicate, pretty structure. The berries are first white, and then turn to a bluishblack. They are sweetish astringent in taste, and are much liked by the natives, who call them hanblas, a corruption of hab el-as ('the berry of the myrtle'). The leaves are lanceolate, dark green, and fragrant, especially when pressed and rubbed between the thumb and fingers. The natives use them as follows:—(a) The dried leaves are pounded in a mortar, sifted, and the powder mixed with oil is used to anoint the bodies of young infants, or the dry powder is dusted over the surface to toughen the skin, and prevent excertations from the friction of the clothing. (b) The beds of infants are sometimes stuffed with the dried leaves, from a belief in their medicinal vol. III. -30 in the markets, but the writer has never seen the flowers sold, nor has he heard of fragrant water being distilled from them, as alleged by some.

G. E. Post. for the north-western part of Asia Minor, bordering on the Hellespont and the Propontis, and bounded east and south by Bithynia, Phrygia, and Lydia. The Troad is sometimes included in it, and sometimes distinguished from it. Under the late Roman empire the name fell into disuse, and Hellespontus was substituted for it as the title of a province in the fourth and following centuries. The boundaries were vague and undeterminable; and the uncertainty led to the proverb xωρίs τὰ Μυσῶν και Φρυγῶν, applied to what cannot be defined. Of places mentioned in the Bible, Assos and Troas were in Mysia, ADRAMYTTIUM on the border between it and Lydia. It formed

Mysia is mentioned only in Ac 16^{7.8}. St. Paul, with Silas and Timothy, being prevented by the Spirit from preaching in Asia, turned northward with the intention of entering Bithynia, with its great, populous, and civilized cities, hardly inferior even to Ephesus; but when they came so far north this use of $\kappa a \tau d$ compare Herodotus i. 76, Thucydides vi. 65 and 104, Ac 27°; but see Blass on Ac 16⁷⁶), they were ordered not to enter Bithynia; and they then turned towards the west, passing through but not preaching in Mysia, till they reached the coast at Troas.

A tradition existed that, on this journey through Mysia, Paul and Silas had founded a church at a place named Poketos, between the Rhyndacus and Cyzicus, as is mentioned in the Acta S. Philotæri (Acta Sanctorum, May 19). This is hardly consistent with Ac 167, but is not absolutely contrasistent with Ac 16', but is not absolutely contradictory, as, though not regularly evangelizing in Mysia, it is clearly possible that Paul and Silas might convert individuals on the way either at Poketos or at Troas. But the tradition is late, for the Acta Philetæri profess to be only of the 4th cent., and may be later. An ancient Mysian tradition existed, assigning to a certain One-siphorus the evangelization of part at least of Mysia. One-siphorus was martyred at Parium Mysia: Onesiphorus was martyred at Parium under the proconsulate of Adrian, and this date is a strong proconsulate of Adrian, and this date is a strong proof of trustworthiness, for Adrian was actually proconsul of Asia about A.D. 109-114. It is unlikely that the recollection of so obscure an officer could have been correctly preserved except in a true old tradition: see Expos. Times, 1898, p. 495.

MYSTERY.—The term 'mystery' opens up a wide and interesting, though somewhat obscure, field of inquiry to the Christian theologian. Much of it is, however, extra-biblical, and must therefore rather be indicated than discussed in this place. We shall consider, first, the NT use of the word μυστήριος; second, the chief features of the Greek mysteries; and, third, the question how far the latter influenced the language of the NT.

i. NT USE OF THE TERM Μυστήριον.—The meaning of this word in classical Greek was anything hidden or secret, especially in the plural τὰ μυστήρια, the sacred rites above referred to, from which all who had not passed through a ceremony of initiation were excluded. The root verb μύω is formed by that act of closing the lips which it primarily by that act of closing the lips which it primarily signifies (though it is applied also to the closing of the eyes), and appears alike in the Latin mutus, and our own (colloquial) 'mum.' 'Mummery' is a curiously parallel formation to the Greek 'niystery.' They find their point of contact, doubtless, in the mystery-plays of the Middle Ages. The verb μυέω, most frequently met with in the passive, means to initiate into the mysteries, —οι μεμυημένοι are the initiated, cf. 3 Mac 2³⁰,—and then generally to instruct. St. Paul says, Ph 4¹² μεμύημαι, RV 'I have learned the secret.'

That which is hidden or secret may, it is evident, be (1) absolutely so, that is, in its own nature inaccessible or incomprehensible, or (2) completely hidden, that is, as yet unrevealed, or (3) partially or comparatively secret or obscure, due to some want of clearness in the medium of communication, as when the expression is figurative instead of being literal.

The first of these, which is emphatically the modern signification of 'mystery,' as that which cannot be known, is practically foreign both to classical and biblical Greek. With regard to it, Cremer (s.v.) quotes two remarks of the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Ran. 459, Av. 1073) bearing out this statement; and though Lightfoot on Col 126 apparently finds this meaning in two passages (1 Co 15⁵¹, Eph 5⁵²), of which the one seems to fall under (2) and the other under (3), he admits that the 'idea is quite accidental, and must be gathered from the special circumstances of the case, for it cannot be inferred from the word $(\mu\nu\sigma\tau\eta\rho\rho\sigma)$ itself.' This is not, of course, to say that in religion, in the Christian religion itself, there are no difficulties, nothing transcendental or mysterious in the ordinary sense. On the contrary, such difficulties must ever attach to man's thoughts of the infinite and the divine, but it is not upon these elements that the attention of the biblical writers is concentrated. If they are thought of at all, it is rather as the of seeing through a glass darkly, until the time when man shall know even as also he is known. In the third of the significations noted above, μυστήριον, it has been remarked (Thayer-Grimm, Leaven, s.v.), like n; and in Rabbinic writers, denotes the mystic or hidden sense, that which is conveyed in a figure, parable, or vision.

"It is plain,' says Principal Campbell (Dissertations on the Four Gospels, ix. pt. i.), 'that, in this case, the term \(\text{most.pio}\) is used comparatively; for however clear the meaning intended to be conveyed in the apologue, or parable, may be to the intelligent, it is obscure, compared with the literal sense, which, to the unintelligent, proves a kind of veil. The one is, as it were, open to the senses; the other requires penetration and reflection. Perhaps there was some allusion to this import of the term when our Lord said to his disciples, "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but to them that are without, all these things are done in parables' (Mk 41). The apostles were let into the secret, and got the spiritual sense of the similitude, while the multitude amused themselves with the letter, and searched no further.'

Thus we have the 'mystery of the seven stars' (Rev 12°) and the 'mystery of the woman' (Rev 177). The difficulty or obscurity is here of a subjective character, while that in the case of the second of the three senses which we have distinguished, and which is the most prominent throughout the NT, is objective. In the case of the latter, μωστήριον is correlative to ἀποκάλυψι, the secret to the discovered or revealed. In so far as revelation has taken place, the 'mystery' is a knowledge of that which had been secret but is so no longer; while yet unrevealed, ἀποκάλυψι is a possibility only which awaits the time at which it shall become actual and the hidden pass into knowledge. The latter sense is naturally most conspicuous in the passages of the Apocr. in which the word occurs, whether referring to the secret purpose or will of men (To 12⁷⁻¹¹, Jth 2², 2 Mac 13²¹) or of God (Wis 2²²), or simply to secrets in general (Sir 22²² 27¹8. ¹¹². ²¹¹). In the NT the same meaning is perhaps conveyed in 1 Co 13² 14², while in 1 Co 15⁵¹ μωστήριον ὑμῖν Μγω we see the mystery in the act of passing out of the one stage into the other. The great 'mystery' of the NT is the Divine plan of salvation, hitherto hidden from the world, but now made known in Christ (cf. Ro 11²⁵, Eph 6¹⁹, Col 1²⁵, 1 Ti 3⁹⁻¹⁶). In this sense the apostles and ministers of Christ become οικουδμος μυττηρίων θεοῦ (1 Co 4¹; cf. Col 2³ 4³, also [WH] 1 Co 2¹). It is the 'mystery of his will' (Eph 1⁹), the 'mystery of God, even Christ' (Col 2³ RV), the 'mystery of Christ,' that is, respecting Christ (Col 4³), the 'mystery of the gospel' (Eph 6¹⁹), but everywhere it is the 'dispensation of the mystery which from all ages hath been hid in God who created all things' (Eph 3⁹). It is noteworthy that, out of 26 (or 27) occurrences of μυστήριον in the NT, 10 should be within the comparatively brief compass of Eph and Col. The saving purpose of God, hitherto a mystery because unrevealed, is still such where it is not yet received, as by those destitute of πίστις or εὐσέβεια (1 Ti 3⁹⁻¹⁶), or in so far as it has not been grasped, e.g. in its extension so as to include the Gentiles (Eph 3⁵⁻⁴). Nor is the term confined to Divine secrets. 'It expresses sometimes those of a different and even contrary nature. Thus the apostle, speaking of the antichristian spirit, says, 'The mystery of iniquity doth already work' (2 Th 2⁷). The spirit of antichrist hath begun to operate; but the operation is latent and unperceived' (G. Campbell).

An interesting point, and one full of significance for the history of the Church, is the Vulg. rendering of µωστήρων by sacramentum. This is found in Dn 218 48, To 127, Wis 222, Eph 19 33 9 532, 1 Ti 316, Rev 129. Upon Eph 522 is founded the doctrine that marriage is a sacrament. The association of ideas connecting the two words appears to be the reference to religion and the use of the symbol, whether in word or deed. Solemnity, awe-in-pining quality, marked both the mystery and the sacramental rite, whether we derive the latter from its legal or its military reference. Both came to be used in a very general and indefinite way, until the ecclesiastical signification of sacramentum became fixed. Their primary application, however, was obviously the reason why 'sacrament' was first used of baptism and then transferred to the Lord's Supper, while with µωστήρων the opposite process took

ii. THE GREEK MYSTERIES. — As the higher thought of Greece found expression in its philosophy, so, though all may not be true of them which the later writers report, it may be said that its deeper feelings found expression in the Mysteries. In these there was, first of all, an element of tradition; they gathered up reminiscences of nature-worship, — man's witness to his sense of dependence upon his natural environment,—and particularly those elements of it which still survived in village custom and observance. But they seem also to have fixed attention upon problems of which nature-worship offered no solution-those suggested by the enigma of death, a certain sense of sin, the thought of an offended Deity, the need of purification. It is still a question how much in the development of these institutions was of native growth, how much was derived from foreign sources, and still more what these foreign sources were. Leaving such discussions aside, and also the tempting subject of Orphism, which is . credited with two great contributions to religion -the belief in immortality, and the idea of personal holiness' (L. Campbell), we note Lobeck's division of the multitude of rites which passed under the name of Mysteries into (1) civic mysteries, (2) fanatical rites, whether public or private, and (3) occasional functions, designed to meet individual and special needs.

Belonging to the first class, and under the patronage of the Athenian state, were maintained two forms of the worship of Demeter, the earth-

mother - the Thesmophoria and the Eleusinia. The former were so called from the ancestral The former were so cannot from the ancestral precepts $(\theta \epsilon \sigma \mu o i)$ by which the observances were strictly regulated. They constituted a festival of seed-time, lasted four days, were essentially a country rite; and those who took part in them were married women, the fruitfulness of married life being here, as elsewhere, associated with that of the real. The most remarkable and elaborate of of the soil. The most remarkable and elaborate of all the mysteries were, however, those celebrated at Eleusis, certainly in the beginning of the 6th cent. B.C., and perhaps at a much earlier period. They gathered up almost all the elements belonging to such rites which elsewhere are found separately; with the worship of Demeter they combined that of Dionysus; and some of their most profound and interesting features were probably derived from the kindred Orphic Mysteries. The Eleusinia included two annual celebrations—the Lesser Mysteries held at Agræ, a suburb of Athens, in the month Anthesterion (roughly corresponding to February), and the Greater observed at Eleusis in the month Boedromion (September). The latter, the month Boedromion (September). The latter, therefore, was the autumn festival, the hiding away of the seed; the former, the spring festival, celebrating its reappearance; the interval between the two being mythologically represented as the sojourn of Persephone, the daughter of Demeter, in the under-world. Every one who desired to be initiated at Eleusis had to pass through the ceremonies at Agræ, and probably a cycle of at least four stages, including two visits to each place, had to be observed. This might be spread over several years, so that it was said: παῖς μύστης καὶ ἐπόπτης ἀπήρ—it bridged over the passage from youth to manhood. The more important Mysteries (those at Eleusis) were under the control of a body of magistrates, but the active direction was taken by the lepopdarns, who must be a descendant of Eumolpus, the Thracian bard, to whom the origin of the Mysteries was traditionally attributed. Candidates for initiation, having already qualified at Agree, were called $\mu \omega \tau a \tau$, and the leader or instructor of a group of such candidates was the $\mu \omega \tau a \tau a \gamma \omega \gamma \delta s$. The privilege of participation, at first μυσταγωγός. The privilege of participation, at first confined to Athenians, was afterwards extended to all, women as well as men, except slaves, Persians (the hereditary enemy, specially excluded), and infamous or criminal persons. They took an oath of secrecy, were subjected to certain ceremonial restrictions in respect of diet and behaviour, and received some sort of instruction which prepared them for the experiences which lay before them. In the ceremonies themselves, which lasted nine days, from the 15th to the 23rd of the month, four acts were distinguished: (a) $\kappa a \theta a \rho \sigma is$, the preliminary purification; (b) $\sigma \omega \sigma \tau a \sigma is$, the rites and sacrifices which preceded and prepared the way for the actual celebration; (c) $\tau \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \tau \gamma$ or $\mu \omega \gamma \sigma is$, the initiation properly so called; and (d) $\epsilon \sigma \sigma \tau \tau \epsilon ia$, the last and highest grade of initiation' (Gardner and Jevons). Secrecy characterized only the last two stages. One of the most interesting features of the occasion was the sacred truce which was proclaimed at the beginning of the festival, and which them for the experiences which lay before them. claimed at the beginning of the festival, and which was usually observed, though circumstances led to its abandonment during the latter portion of the Peloponnesian war. In the celebrations themselves, only two points can be absolutely fixcu—the purification known as ἄλαδε μύσται ('To the sea, O mystæ'), which took place on the 16th of the month, and the day of Iacchus, the 20th; other features are more or less hypothetically placed (Mommsen, Feste, p. 207).

The probable order was as follows. On the first

The probable order was as follows: On the first day, called αγυρμός, the assembling, the μύσται joined the group to which they were to be attached, and received the instruction already alluded to. On the second (the 16th) they went in solemn procession to the seacoast and bathed in the purifying waters. The third, fourth, and fifth days were occupied with various sacrifices, processions, and feasts. The last of these was known as 'the day of the torches,' because in the evening, just before sunset, the great procession of the mysta, each group led by its δηδούχος, or torch-bearer, set out for the temple at Eleusis, where they seem to have spent the night in visit ing the places associated with the wandering of Demeter in search of her daughter Persephone.

This procession divides what may be termed the Athenian from the Eleusinian section of the Mysteries. The sixth day (the 20th) was specially sacred, and bore, as we have seen, the name of Incchus, who was identified with Bacchus (Dionysus), and represented as the husband or (Dionysus), and represented as the husband or son of Persephone, his statue being borne in the procession. The next two nights were occupied with the higher stages of the symbolical ceremony. These included a further purification, a progress through darkness unrelieved by either moonlight or torchlight, whence the myster passed into the light of the first of the first that is the stages of the symbol into the light of the first of the first that is the stages of the symbol into the light of the symbol into the light of the symbol into t into the lighted interior of the Great Hall of Initiation, where they were allowed to see and handle certain sacred objects which none but the έπύπται (those who had received final initiation, έποπτεία) ever beheld. It seems certain that there were some representations of a dramatic character illustrating the myths of the deities involved miracle plays, as we might call them, in which the more profound lessons which those in charge meant to convey were communicated. The return to Athens was made in a jesting mood, both on the part of the mystæ themselves and on that of the general population, which may have been due to the reaction from the strain and solemnity of the preceding days. The ninth day was termed πλημοχόω from certain peculiar libations with which the rite was brought to an end. Associated with the rite was brought to an end. Associated with these libations was one of the mystical formulas which were imparted in the course of the proceedings, were esteemed specially sacred, and throw light upon the original character of the festival. The ninth day formula was $\delta\epsilon$, $\kappa\epsilon\epsilon$ —the first a prayer for rain, the second for fertility; but the most notable of these sayings was that connected with the 'communication of the sacred things' (παράδοσις τῶν ἰερῶν)—'I have fasted: I have drunk of the potion: I have taken out of the casket, and after having tasted I have deposited in the backet. I have taken out of the casket, and after having tasted I have deposited in the basket: I have taken out of the basket again, and have put back into the casket.' again, and nave put back into the casket. The combination of sight and sound, of rhythmic movement, sacred association, mystic formula, and, above all, the obligation of secrecy, must have been deeply impressive, especially after being long looked forward to, and being made the object of careful preparation.

Later writers exaggerated many of the features of the Mysteries, whether as Christians they regarded them with suspicion and detestation, or in a wider interest supplemented by the help of imagination what history had left vague and obscure.

'High authorities,' it has been said (L. Campbell, p. 284), 'whose gravity and depth of mind cannot be disputed, bear witness with one voice to the elevating influence of the Eleusinian Mysteries. Sophocles dwells emphatically on the incomparable happiness of the initiated both in life and after death; and Plato, who had a far clearer vision both of God and immortality than any child of Eumolpus, can find no more fitting vehicle for his most transcendent thoughts than the imagery which he borrows from the contemplation of the Mysteries.'

This is not incompatible with the view that little or nothing of positive doctrine was conveyed in the Mysteries, from the symbolism of which each man was left to take what he would, according to the dictum attributed by Synesius to Aristotle—'He is of opinion that the initiated learned nothing precisely, but received impressions, and were put into a certain frame of mind.' Much has been done by excavations and the careful examination of contemporary inscriptions to throw light upon this interesting subject, but much more in this direction must be accomplished before we can claim to tread with confidence in a region the character of which rendered it peculiarly liable to be misunderstood and misrepresented.

iii. THE MYSTERIES AND THE NT.—That the writers of the NT have derived much of their language and imagery from the Greek Mysteries, and that a consideration of the different shades of meaning in which μυστήριον is employed in the NT indicates that they have in this reference their unifying element, has been maintained with much ability and ingenuity by A. S. Carman in a paper contributed to the Bibliotheca Sacra for October 1893. The allusions which he recognizes in Scripture are to the following features of the Mysteries:—

'The word μωστέριον and other derivatives of the verb μίω; the word τιλιτή, or the allied adjective form τίλιος with the idea of maturity or perfection; the word isservia and its derivatives with the associated idea of a personal experience of the Divine fellowship; certain specific allusions to the contrast of light and darkness with the derived ideas of enlightenment, illumination, and the like; the term silence; the ideas of reservation and revelation of religious truth; ideas associated with the office of hierophant, kerux, mystagogue, and the like; and certain formal uses of the expressions touch, taste, handle, behold,—associated with the mystic paradosis' (p. 623).

Carman refers to similar allusions in classical writers and the Church Fathers, but especially in the works of Philo Judæus, and then examines the principal passages of the NT, printing in italics the words in which allusion is supposed to be detected, as in the following example: He 6¹⁻⁵ 'Let us press on unto perfection. For as touching those who were once enlightened and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost and tasted the good word of God,' etc., where, on this assumption, reference is made to 'the perfective aim of the rites, the characteristic idea of enlightenment, the symbolic tasting, and the participation in the Divine nature' (p. 636).

The attempt thus to trace in the apostolic language direct allusion to the Mysteries is pronounced by Anrich, in his careful and scholarly treatise on the connexion of the Mysteries with Christianity, to be 'wholly unsuccessful' (p. 143 note). This writer regards the approximation of Christianity and the Mysteries, both in idea and usage, as having been introduced by the Gnostics, whose position in this respect Clement of Alexandria and Origen sought to legitimate in a modified form within the Church. For the pre-Gnostic use of μυστήριον and allied terms and ideas he turns with Hatch (Essays in Biblical Greck, pp. 57-62) to Jewish literature, especially the apocryphal books of the OT. In these the plans of a king or general are termed uvoripa ; they are his secrets, in so far that no one knows about them until he communicates them to (Anrich, p. 144). 'This,' says Hatch, 'was a strictly Oriental conception. A king's "counsel" was his "secret," which was known only to himself and his trusted friends. It was natural to extend the conception to the secret plans of God' (p. 58). Hatch applies this conception to the explanation of the various passages in the NT, and finds it sufficient in every case except the two passages in Rev (120 177) and Eph 524, where he has recourse to the 'light which is thrown backwards on the NT by Christian writers of the 2nd ent', (p. 59) in which light warefaces is were the cent.' (p. 59), in which light μυστήριον is seen to have a certain parallelism to $\sigma \dot{\nu} \mu \beta o \lambda \sigma$, $\tau \dot{\nu} \pi \sigma$ s, or $\pi a \rho a \beta o \lambda \dot{\eta}$.

It is doubtless an excellent rule to interpret NT language by reference to the LXX wherever pos-sible; it is to adduce a known cause where others, however plausible or probable, have about them more or less of uncertainty. But may not the latter be unduly and unnecessarily ignored? If a writer under 'the constantly deepening impression produced by prolonged study of the subject that such allusions colour a large portion of those writings of the NT which had Gentile environment' is apt to push his theory too far, in accounting, for example, for the allusions in Eph and Col by the association of Ephesus with the impure rites of the predominant Diana-worship and the fact that Philippi was 'built upon the Thracian frontier, in the pathway of the original course of the Mysteries of Dionysus, and probably also of those of Demeter, as they spread throughout Greece' (Carman, p. 634; cf. Anrich, p. 144 note), may not another whose immediate object is to demonstrate the influence of the LXX underestimate indications of other influences? At least a side reference to the heathen Mysteries could scarcely be denied except upon the supposition, in itself somewhat unlikely, that the NT writers, and particularly St. Paul, were so ignorant of the Mysteries that the term had only its LXX association for their minds, or that the Mysteries had altogether failed to colour imagery drawn from them the language of the time. The cautious words of Kennedy (Sources of NT Greek, p. 109) should be borne in mind: 'Several of the biblical meanings, though apparantly moulded by the Greek of the OT may have ently moulded by the Greek of the OT, may have been common enough in the spoken language as found in Egypt. Asia Minor, and Syria. When it found in Egypt, Asia Minor, and Syria. When it is borne in mind that there are literally almost no remains of the later spoken language except the LXX and the NT, in addition to the Comic writers, the supposition gains colour. At any rate, it shows us that we are not at liberty to make dogmatic assertions even in that sphere of the NT vocabu-lary where the influence of the LXX appears most powerful, the sphere of religious and theological terms.' That a writer like St. Paul, who alludes to the Greek games, the Greek theatre, the Roman camp, should have passed over a phenomenon which offered so many suggestive points of view as the Mysteries, is almost incredible. Hatch himself, in his Hibbert Lectures, ascribes to them great influence upon the language and institutions of the early Church. Clement of Alexandria sees and makes explicit use of the parallelism (Protrept. ch. xii.). Lightfoot (on Col 1-6) holds that there is a connexion between the language of St. Paul and the Mysteries, though he dwells on the 'intentional paradox,' that while 'the heathen mysteries were strictly confined to a narrow circle, the Christian mysteries are freely communicated to all.

If Lightfoot were right in finding in Col traces of an incipient Gnosticism, and if, as Anrich says, the relation between the Greek Mysteries and Christianity began with Gnosticism, the special frequency of reference to the Mysteries in Col and Eph, already noted, would acquire a new significance. But it is fair to say that the present trend of opinion is to follow Hort in giving a Judaic rather than a Gnostic interpretation to the heresies referred to in these Epistles. The tendency to regard the Mysteries as ignored in the NT is possibly due in part to a disinclination to find in them any formative influence upon primitive Christian institutions. For such influence at this early stage it is not contended here; later, as Cheetham remarks (Mysteries, p. 74), the concern is not with words, but things. But, as he also says, 'when Mysteries were everywhere found, their terminology naturally came to be commonly employed, and to be applied to matters altogether foreign to its original usage. The question is whether the analogy between the experiences of Christians and those who had undergone the mystic initiation was sufficiently close and striking to account for the former being expressed to some extent in terms of the latter even in the apostolic age. It must be admitted that the balance of authority on this point is somewhat doubtful; we must wait, as already remarked, for further light from inscriptions and other sources upon the usage of the time before it can be definitely decided. Meanwhile it cannot be called illegitimate, as it certainly is an enrichment of NT language, to surround such words as μιστήριον, τέλειος, ἐπόπτης with associations derived from so important an element of contemporary Greek life as the Mysteries.

LITERATURE.—A great deal has been written upon this subject. Its modern treatment dates from the publication of the Aglaophamus of C. A. Lobeck in 1829. One of the most recent books is Canon Cheetham's Hulsean Lectures—The Mysteries, Pagan and Christian, in the preface to which a good account of the most important works is given. Special reference may be made here to W. M. Ramay's article in Enoyel. Brit., 9th ed., to the chapters on the Mysteries in Gardner and Jevons' Manual of Greek Antiquities (1898); in Jevons' Introduction to the History of Religion (1896); and in Professor L. Campbell's Religion in Greek Literature (1898). NAAM (cm).—The eponym of a Calebite family, 1 Ch 4¹³ (B Νόομ, Α Νάαμ).—See GENEALOGY, IV.

NAAMAH (πρη ' pleasant'; Νοεμά).—1. Sister of Tubal-cain, daughter of Lamech and Zillah (Gn 4²²; Josephus, Ant. I. ii. 2). 2. One of Solomon's Josephus, Ant. I. ii. 2). 2. One of Solomon's Ammonitish wives, and mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14²¹· [B* Μααχάμ, A Νααμά] ²¹ [Gr. 12²⁴, B Νααμά], 2 Ch 12¹³ [Nουμά]). According to the second Greek narrative, which follows 1 K 12²⁴, she was the daughter of Ana, i.e. Hanun, son of Nahash, king of the Ammonites (2 S 10¹⁻⁴, where, however, B reads Αννών). If Rehoboam were forty-one at his accession (1 K 14²¹), and not sixteen as in the second Greek account, Naamah must have been married to Solomon before the death of David. married to Solomon before the death of David.

N. J. D. WHITE. NAAMAH (πτη, ; Νωμάν; Lue. Νομά; Vulg. Neema).—A town of Judah in the lowland or Shephēlah, named in conjunction with Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Makkedah, and forming one of a group of sixteen (Jos 15³⁷⁻⁴¹). There is no notice of it elsewhere. Zophar the Naamathite (πτη, μπ) is mentioned in Job (2¹¹ etc.), but there is nothing to compact him with this town. to connect him with this town.

It is proposed to identify Naamah with Naneh (SWP ii. 408); Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Makkedah being respectively identified as Katrah, Deján, and el-Mughár ('the caves'), villages on the northern border of Judah near Ekron and Jabneel. Na'neh is a small mud village on low ground 6 miles south of Ludd (Lydda).___

C. WARREN. NAAMAN (μει; BA Ναιμάν; Luc. Νεεμάν; NT Νεεμάν (TR), Ναιμάν (WH)= 'pleasantness,' perhaps the name of the god Adonis [Lagarde, Sem. i. 32], cf. ενεμι γει 'plantings of Adonis,' RVm of Is 1710, where see Dillmann-Kittel's note).*—1. A Syrian warrior known to us only through the remarkable cure of his leprosy by the prophet Elisha, recorded in 2 K 5, and referred to by our Lord as a rebuke to Jewish exclusiveness, and an illustration of the anomalous manifestations of divine mercy (Lk 4:7). According to the Midrash, Naaman was the man who at the battle of Ramoth-gilead 'drew his bow at a venture' (1 K 22s), and inflicted on Ahab his fatal wound—a tradition apparently accepted by Jos. (Ant. VIII. xv. 5), who describes * Compare further the name אָטָן (Naomi) in the Book of the archer in question as παι̂ς δέ τις βασιλικός τοῦ Αδάδου, 'Αμανός ίνομα. But this identification may have been a mere conjecture, due to the statement in 2 K 5¹ that 'by Naaman J" had given deliverance (אָשׁהָרִי) unto Syria,'—an expression which may naturally be held to refer to the battle of Ramoth-gilead, since the issue of that engagement is ex-pressly attributed in 1 K 22²⁰⁰⁷ to the counsel of J" (although G. Rawlinson [in Speaker's Comm.] would rather connect it with Syrian successes against Shalmaneser II. [Anc. Mon. ii. 344, 301]), on the general principle recognized (nearly a century later) in Am 97.

With regard to the date of Naaman's visit to Israel as a suppliant for 'deliverance' of another sort, the sequence of the narrative would lead us to suppose that Ben-Hadad was king of Syria at the time; but no indication is given of the interval that had elapsed since Ahab's death, to enable us to determine who was king of Israel. Ewald us to determine who was king of Israel. Ewald (HI 4) prefers the reign of Jehoahaz, and Schenkel (Bib.-Lex.) that of Jehu. But the general view that Jehoram was king seems more probable, in view of the recent Syrian raids (2 K 5²), the precarious friendship between the two kings (vv. 5²), and the prevalence of recapions and whethirs (v. 5²). and the prevalence of paganism and unbelief (v.26b,

The miraculous character of Naaman's cureexposes it in some degree to the objections taken to Elisha's life as too 'thaumaturgic.' Nöldeke. (Schenkel's Bib.-Lex.) comments on the absence of. antecedent faith on the part of the sufferer, and sees no sign of spirituality in his conversion; but it is. only the outstanding features of the incident that have been preserved to us, and on the whole the miracle must be acknowledged to be one of the most dignified in the life of Elisha. Even assuming that there was an ancient Semitic belief in the efficacy of. running waters as a cure for leprosy, we find something analogous to this in the miracles of the NT (Jn 96, Mk 822). The narrative is 'thoroughly inakeeping with the state of things in the time of Elisha' (Kittel, Hist. of Heb. ii. 279). Its portrayal of Naaman's character is natural and lifelike. It does not conceal his pride and irritation at the slight offered to himself (2 K 511) and to his country. (v. 12 Damascus being famous for its noble streams), which was designed doubtless to induce a more humble and reverent spirit in his approach to the God of Israel (cf. vv. ^{5. 6. 9}). Yet on the whole it depicts a manly and attractive character, which won for him the sympathy of the little Jewish maid who was the first to suggest his cure at the hands of Elisha, the warm friendship of his sovereign, who spared no expense (the gold and silver sent with Naaman are generally estimated at upwards of £10,000) and lost no time in seeking to obtain the remedy, and the affectionate de-votion of his servants, who were anxious for his welfare and knew how to appeal to his better judgment. One of the most striking features of his character is his sense of gratitude (cf. the healing of the ten lepers in Lk 17¹¹⁻¹⁹), which led him to retrace his steps from the Jordan to Samaria, a distance of nearly 30 miles, to thank and reward his benefactor, and to devote himself henceforth to the worship of the God of Israel, which he does with a strength and decision of faith that has scarcely any parallel in the language of Gentile converts in the OT. This was a fulfilment of the hope expressed by Elisha (2 K 5⁸), and justified the lofty attitude which he had assumed towards Naaman when he communicated with him only by messenger, bidding him wash seven times in the Jordan, showing, by this abstention from personal intercourse as well as by his refusal of the gifts customary at heathen oracles (Herod. i. 14. 50) and not forbidden to the prophets of $J''(1 \times 9^{8-9}, 1 \times 14^{2t}, 2 \times 4^{42}; \text{ ct. Mt } 10^8, \text{Ac } 8^{20})$, how little he had in common with the artful and obsequious sorcerers familiar to Naaman and his master (2 K 56. 11).

There are two points in which Naaman's conduct has given rise to controversy, viz. (1) his request for two mules' burden of earth to carry away with him for the purpose of offering sacrifice to J"; and (2) the desire to be forgiven when he attended his royal master as heretofore in the temple of Pinnon and bowed down with him. With regard Rimmon and bowed down with him. to the first, Naaman simply shared the universal belief of those days, that the god of each land could be served only on his own soil; cf. the complaint of David (1 S 2619) that he was being driven out to serve other gods. Further, the transporta-tion of earth from the Holy Land in the Middle Ages for the Campo Santos of Italy; the erection of a Jewish synagogue (to which Calmet refers in Comm. Lit. vol. ii.) at Nahardea in Persia, composed entirely of stones and earth brought from Palestine; and even the preference shown for water from the Jordan in Christian baptism, are instances of a similar feeling in later times. to the latter point, when we bear in mind that the obeisance in the house of Rimmon, on the part of Naaman (which he wished to be condoned), was purely external, arising out of his official position and his personal relation to the king ('he leaneth on my hand,' cf. 2 K 7". 17), we see that it does not really imply any attempt to dissemble his convictions, and that his appeal to Elisha may be more reasonably attributed to a sensitive conscience than to a spirit of compromise. There is therefore no warrant for drawing a parallel be-tween Naaman and those who from worldly motives profess a faith and conform to a worship in which they do not believe - a view which has led to much irrelevant discussion. See, further,

art. ELISHA in vol. i. p. 695*.

In many respects the story lends itself with singular aptitude to the illustration of evangelical and sacramental doctrine; and the passage has been frequently so employed in homiletical litera-

2. According to Gn 46^{21, 26} (cf. Nu 26⁴¹), one of 'the sons of Benjamin' who came with Jacob into Egypt, but more precisely designated in Nu 26^{28, 40} and 1 Ch 8³⁶, cf. ⁷, as a son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin, and as head of 'the family of the Naamites' (Nu 26⁴⁰, where 'Eg, is probably a textual error for 1771; so Sam., cf. LXX Noeulei). See Naamite.

NAMMATHITE (1993), δ M(ε)ιναίων βασιλεύς, δ M(ε)ιναίως). — The description of Zophar, Job's friend, in Job 2¹¹, 11¹ etc. The name is unknown elsewhere, the rendering of the LXX being hypothetical only. The name Na'amah ('pleasanttown'?) is not infrequent in Syria and Palestine of later days. It indicates a town in the Shephēlah in Jos 15⁴¹.

W. T. DAVISON.

NAAMITE (7935).—The patronymic of a family descended from Naaman, who is represented Nu 26^{40} as a grandson of Benjamin, but in 46^{11} as son, though the LXX agrees with Nu (see NAAMAN, No. 2).

NAARAH (πης) 'girl').—1. One of the wives of Ashhur the 'father' of Tekoa, 1 Ch 4^{st.} (B Θοοδά, A Nοορά, Luc. Νοορά). 2. A town belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, Jos 16⁷ (πητε), with π locals; B al κῶμαι αὐτῶν as if for πιπε, A Νααραθα, Luc. Αναιραθά). AV has Naarath (so also Dillm. and Buhl). The same place is called in 1 Ch 7.2 Naaran (γιε); B Νααραάν, A Νααράν). According to the Onomusticon (Lagarde, 283. 142), there was a village Νοοράθ 5 Roman miles from Jericho (cf. the Νεαρά of Jos. Ant. xVII. iii. 1). This would suit well the rune el-Aujs situated on the river of the same name. Guerin places the site farther up the river at es-Sâmis.

NAARAI (מולב); B Naapai, A Noopi).—One of David's heroes, I Ch 11⁸⁷, described as the son of Ezbai. In the parallel passage, 28 23²³, the name is Paarai, who is called 'the Arbite' (מַרְאָתָּ). It is impossible to decide with any confidence between the rival readings מַרְאָרָ and מַרְאָרָ, or to say what is the relation of מַרְאָרָ to מָרָאָרָ. See Arbite, Ezbai, Paarai, and cf. Kittel's note on I Ch 11²⁷ in SBOT.

NAARAN, NAARATH.—See NAARAH, No. 2.

NAATHUS (A Naa θ 's, B $\Lambda d\theta$ os), 1 Es 9^{51} .—One of the sons of Addi. The name seems to correspond to Adna in Ezr 10^{34} . The form in B is due to confusion of A and A, and to attaching the initial N to the preceding word ('A $\delta\delta\epsilon$ i\nu').

NABAL (\forall \text{, Naβάλ}).—S. of Hebron lies one of the few fertile stretches of Judæa, where the soil, less stony than usual, succeeds in covering the limestone skeleton of the country (cf. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. p. 305 f.). In this district, which was settled by the clan Caleb, were clustered Maon, Ziph, and Carmel, on the last of which Nabal lived as a sheepmaster. So it can be understood why, according to Jos. (Ant. VI. xiii. 6), he was a Ziphite, according to 1 S 25³ (LXX) a Carmelite, according to v.³ a Calebite. His shepherds drove the flocks (3000 sheep and 1000 goats), at the suitable season, to pasture on the uplands of Carmel. Annually the sheep-shearing was celebrated with a feast 'like the feast of a king', 'v.³8. The farmer was of considerable wealth, but of a surly and niggardly temper.

In the desert adjoining this district, David, seeking refuge from Saul, arrived. Living in the wilderness of Maon (so read with LXX for Paran. v.1), he and his men subsisted by levying blackmail from the sheepmasters of the richer plateau above them. From these they exacted a certain tribute in return for their services in protecting the grazing flocks against the wandering Bedawin of the desert. Accordingly, at one of the shearing-feasts 10 men ppeared from David's camp to require this tribute. But Nabal was 'flown with insolence and wine,' and sent back an insulting taunt about the increase of masterless men in the district. His servants, knowing their master's intractable character too well to interfere directly, appealed to his wife, who had woman's wit enough to see and instantly to set about averting the danger. Abigail, having loaded several asses with (probably) something more than the expected tribute, set of to seek David. She met him already on the way to execute signal vengeance. Her subtle flattery (which suggested that one so 'senseless' [nābāl, see Driver, Par. Psalt. 457] was not worth his anger), her gifts, perhaps herself, softened the leader, and he returned to his camp gratefully acknowledging that she had saved him from a crime. In the morning the shock of discovering what peril he had run, following on his over-night debauch, frightened Nabal into some kind of fit, from which after a few days he died. Thereupon Abigail became wife to David.

NABOTH (Mai, Naboubal).—A native of Jezreel, who in the time of Ahab owned land near that town. At that period Jezreel was the residence of the kings of Israel (1 K 18²⁶, 2 K S²⁶), having probably risen into importance through Ahab's policy of allying himself with Phenicia. Naboth's land, which he cultivated as a vineyard, lay close to the royal palace (1 K 21¹, Heb.) or threshing-floor (ib. LXX). The statements are compatible, since the palace at Jezreel was near the city wall (2 K 9²⁶). On this piece of ground Ahab cast covetous eyes, since it lay convenient to his own property. Accordingly, he approached Naboth with the offer either to purchase his vineyard or to exchange it for ground of similar value. But, whether he was attached by sentimental ties to his family property, or whether he was governed by an unwritten custom that land should descend in the same tribe and house (cf. Nu 36), Naboth declined the proposal (1 K 21³). Ahab, himself a Hebrew who understood his people's temper, was about to desist, however unwillingly (v. 4); but Jezebel, a foreigner with Phenician ideas of royal authority, overruled him to grasp with the strong hand. She used his authority to have Naboth falsely accused of speaking evil of God and the king, and stoned to death by the local authorities (v. 5³⁶). The deed made a lasting impression upon the popular mind. Elijah pronounced doom upon the tyrant (v. 20³⁶); and the deaths of Joram and Jezebel, which took place at the hands of Jehu near this very spot, were regarded as Divine retribution upon the guilty house (2 K 9^{26, 361}). In 1 K 22²⁸ (R) and by Jos. (Ant. VIII. xv. 6) it is even stated that, when Ahab's body was brought home from Ramoth-gilead, his blood was washed from the chariot by the pool of Jezreel.

This incident has many points of interest. It gives a tantalizingly inadequate glimpse into the existence of local tribunals in Israel at that period. It serves to prove the power of local customs, which none but the strongest kings dared override (contrast Josiah's conduct, 2 K 23). It shows how the opposition against Ahab's house arose from social as well as religious feelings, and that prophets like Elijah were influenced by such feelings. It gives too one of the sources from which sprang such condemnations of the kingdom as 1 S 8¹⁰⁵.

NACON.—The threshing-floor of Nacon ([12] [7]; B ἄλω Νωδάβ; B^b ἀλῶν (sic) 'Ωδάβ; A ἀλωμένος Ναχών; Vulg. area Nachon) is mentioned as the place where Uzzah the priest was slain for laying hold of the ark, when it was being brought from Kiriath-jearim to the 'city of David': owing to this mishap, the spot was re-named Perez-uzzah by David (2 S 6⁶). Klostermann, however, comparing the use of the word Nacon ([12] 7 k RVm² 'to a set place') in 1 S 23²², treats it as an appellative, and renders 'to a fixed threshing-floor'; but this is very improbable. On the analogy of other placenames (see Wellh. and Driver on 2 S 6⁶), the second word should be a proper name; possibly, the parallel passage (1 Ch 13⁹) has preserved the more original form, viz. Chidon ([12] [7]]; B τῆς ἄλωνος; A adds Χειλών). See Chidon.

NADAB (μτ.).—1. (Ναδάβ) the eldest son of Aaron (Ex 6-3, Nu 3² 26⁶⁰ [all P], 1 Ch 6³ [Heb. 5⁹] 24¹). Along with his father, his brother Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel, he accompanied Moses to Sinai, and 'saw the God of Israel' (Ex 24^{1, 91}. [probably J]); was admitted, along with his three brothers, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar, and three brothers, Abinu, Eleazar, and Thamar, and their father Aaron, to the priestly office (Ex 28¹ [P]); and on the very day of his consecration (Lv 10^{1.27}, compared with ch. 9) he and Abihu perished (Lv 10^{1.27}, Nu 3⁴ 26⁶¹ [all P], 1 Ch 24²) for offering 'strange fire' (ΤΙ ΕΝ, LXX πῦρ ἀλλότριον), i.e. strange to the requirements of the law. Wherein the transgression of Nadab and Abihu is supposed to have consisted is not clear. It is often suggested to have consisted is not clear. It is often suggested that 'strange' fire means fire taken from a common source instead of from the altar (cf. Lv 10¹², Nu 17¹¹ (פֿתב ונייי)), but, as Dillm. remarks, in that case we should expect in Lv 10¹ not רָבָּרְ בֵּי אֲשׁ וְבִּי אָשׁ וְבִּי אָשׁ should be taken in the sense of הַדְּאֵי 'an offering made by fire,' in which case the offence may have lain in presenting an unauthorized (cf. אַרָר הַאַנָּה , which he commanded them not,' v.') offering. It is possible at the same time, but not certain (see Dillm.), that the writer may have had in view the prescriptions of Ex 30^{75.34th} regarding the offering of incense. In v.⁶¹ (which, however, probably belong to a later stratum of P) Aaron and his surviving sons are forbidden to mourn for the victims of the Divine judgment. There is not the slightest warrant for the idea (found in the Midrash and in Aphrantes, Hom. 14, and repeated even in modern times) that the prohidrink by priests on duty implies that Nadab and Abihu were intoxicated when they committed their fatal offence. Any superficial plausibility which this notion might derive from the context is entirely taken away by the circumstance that v. 8f. are really a fragment, having no connexion with either v. 66. or v. 5.

A Jerahmeelite family name, 1 Ch 2^{20, 20} (Nαδάβ).

social as well as religious feelings, and that prophets like Elijah were influenced by such feelings. It gives, too, one of the sources from for two years (c. 915-914 B.C.), 15²⁵. While engaged NADABATH (A $Na\delta a\beta d\theta$). — An unidentified town (?), east of the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of which a wedding party of the sons of Jambri was attacked, and many of them slain, by Jonathan and Simon the Maccabees, 1 Mac 9^{976} . Josephus (Ant. XIII. i. 4) gives the name as $\Gamma a\beta a\theta d$ (cf. & $\Gamma a\beta a\delta d\nu$); Syr. has Nabath; Vulg. Madaba (i.e. Medeba), as in preceding verse.

NAGGAI (Ναγγαί, AV Nagge).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3²². It is the Greek form of the Heb. name #11 Nogah (which see).

NAHALAL (γ/γη, in Jg 1²⁰ γ/γη Nahalcl).—A town of Zebulun (Jos 19¹⁵), given to the Levites 21²⁵. Its inhabitants were not expelled by the Zebulunites, but were made tributary, Jg 1²⁰. In all these three passages the LXX readings are corrupt (Jos 19¹⁵ [where AV has incorrectly Nahallal]: B Βαιθμάν, A Νααλώλ; Jos 21²⁵: B Σελλά, Α Δαμπά; Jg 1²⁰: B Δωμανά, A Έναμμάν). The place seems to have been unknown in the 4th cent. A.D. A suitable site is 'Ain Māhil, north of Nazareth, on the hill which formed the limit of Zebulun to the east, above the plateau of Tabor belonging to Naphtali. Another site which has been advocated (e.g. by Schwarz, Knobel, van de Velde), is Ma'lul, a village west of Nazareth, and on the south border of Zebulun. The towns of Zebulun are so little known that either site becomes possible. The substitution of M for N is not uncommon.

NAHAM (1073). — The father of Keilah the Garmite, 1 Ch 419 (Β Ναχέθ, Α Ναχέμ, Luc. Ναρύμ)

NAHAMANI (ઋτι).—One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community, Neh 7⁷ (B Ναεμανεί, Α Ναεμανί, Luc. Ναιμανί), omitted in the parallel passage Ezr 2². In 1 Es 5⁸ he is called Eneneus (RVm Enenis; B Ένηνις, Α Έννήνιος, Luc. Νεμανί).

NAHARAI () $\Gamma \in \Lambda \omega \rho \in \mathcal{R}$, Naarai).—The armourbearer of Joab, a native of Beeroth (2 S 23^{37}). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{39}) the name is written Nahari () $\Gamma : B$ Na $\chi \omega \rho : A$ Naa $\rho a \in AV$, RV Naharai), the form given by the AV at 2 S 23^{37} .

NAHASH (#n, 'serpent,' Naás).—It is probable that all the passages in which this name is found refer to the same individual. He was king of the Ammonites at or before the beginning of Saul's reign, and did not die until David had been some years established at Jerusalem (2 S 10¹, 1 Ch 19¹). Such a length of reign is quite possible even if we accept the tradition that Saul reigned forty years (Jos. Ant. VI. xiv. 9, Ac 13²¹), but there are many indications that this estimate is excessive. It was 'about a month after' Saul's election by lot at Mizpah (1 S 1027 LXX, reading קבורש for הבחרים, so Mizpah (I S 102 LXX, reading and for any, so Jos. Ant. VI. v. 1) that Nahash made that attack on Jabesh-gilead which called forth all Saul's latent capacities as a leader, and thus vindicated to all Israel the choice of the Lord. The later narrative, on the other hand, implies (I S 12¹²) that the attack of Nahash had been the immediate cause of the people's demand for a king. This discrepancy may be solved, of course, by supposing that Samuel refers to Nahash as having been a standing menace to Israel, and that the invasion of 1 S 11 had been preceded by many similar incursions. Josephus (Ant. VI. v. 1) takes this view, and says that Nahash was in the habit of putting out the right eyes of all Israelites beyond Jordan that came into his power, 'that when their left eyes were covered by their shields they might be wholly useless in war.' The same writer asserts (Ant. VI. v. 3) that war.' The same writer asserts (Ant. vI. v. 3) that Nahash was slain on this occasion; but that is merely his inference from the completeness of the Ammonite defeat. We are not told anything more about Nahash until the notice of his death (2 S $10^{1.2}$), where we learn that he had 'shown kindness to David in time past,' probably after he left Achish (1 S 21^{16}), and because they were both Saul's enemies (so Jerome, Qu. Heb., in loc., and 1 Ch 19^{2}). Again, when David was at Mahanaim, 'Shobi the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon' was one of those who befriended him (2 S 17^{27}). There seems no reason why we should suppose with Ewald (HI iii. 185) that this should suppose with Ewald (HI iii. 185) that this Nahash was only a member of the royal house, and not the king himself. These two notices seem to indicate some special connexion of Nahash with David, and lend some confirmation to Stanley's theory that the mother of David and his brothers had been originally wife of Nahash the king, and mother of Abigail and Zeruiah (2 S 1725);* see JESSE. It is fair to add that Wellh. (Text d. BB Sam. p. 201), followed by Gray (Heb. Prop. Names, 91), regards $\vec{v}_{17}$ no as a textual error introduced from $\vec{v}_{17}$; which itself he thinks probably stood originally in the margin. Budde (SBOT, ad loc.) is inclined to think that Wellh. may be correct aloriginally in the margin. Budde (SDOT, an ioc.) is inclined to think that Wellh. may be correct, although he himself emends on to w. (Jesse), which agrees with the facts (cf. 1 Ch 2¹⁶) and is supported by Luc. 'Ierral. N. J. D. WHITE.

NAHATH (mg).—1. A 'duke' of Edom, Gn 36^{12} (A Nάχομ. $D^{\rm ell}$ E Νάχοθ) 17 (A D Νάχοθ, Ε Νάχωρ) = 1 Ch 127 (B Νάχος, Α Νάχεθ). The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been traced. 2. A Kohathite Levite, 1 Ch 281 (Bo 110) (BA Καῶαθ, Luc. Νάαθ), called in v. 24 Toah, and in 1 S 12 Tohu. Kittel (on 1 Ch 28 in SBOT) holds this last to be most probably the original form of the name (so also Driver, Text of Sam. p. 3). As Kittel points out, wa might readily be corrupted into either may or nor, and the latter again into nor. 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, who was one of the overseers, under Conaniah and Shimei, in charge of the oblations and tithes and dedicated things, 2 Ch 313 (B Máεθ, A Náεθ).

NAHBI (τρ., B Nαβεί, A Nαβά).—The name of one of the twelve men sent by Moses to spy out the land, Nu 13¹⁴. He was the representative of the tribe of Naphtali.

NAHOR (τ'π; ; LXX and NT Ναχωρ: in AV Jos 24°, Lk 3³4, Nachor).—1. The grandfather of Abraham, son of Serug, and father of Teraḥ (Gn 11²¹-²²

1 Ch 125, Lk 334). 2. Grandson of the preceding; son of Terah, and brother of Abraham and Haran (Gn 11²⁶. ²⁷ P; cf. Jos 24²). In Gn 11²⁶ (J) he is said to have married Milcah, the daughter of his brother Haran; and in 22²⁰⁻²⁶ (J) twelve on an oroner maran; and in 22. [J] twelve sons of Nahor are enumerated, viz. eight by Milcah: Huz,—i.e. 'Uz, RV Uz, the people of Job's fatherland,—Buz (the tribe of Elihu, Job 32.], Kemuel (the father of Aram), Chesed, Hāzo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel (father of Laban and Rebekah; cf. Gn 24. [29]; and four by a concubine Re'umah: Tebah, Gaḥam, Taḥash, and Ma'acah. In 24. [1] the city in Aram-naharaim to which Abraham's servant goes to find a wife to which Abraham's servant goes to find a wife for Isaac, i.e. (27. 294) Haran, is called the 'city of Nahor'; and in 31. (JE) Laban, in concluding of Nahor'; and in 31³³ (JE) Labar, in concluding the covenant with Jacob, on the borders of Gilead, appeals to 'the God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor,'—the God, that is, or rather, perhaps, the gods, of their respective ancestors,—to judge between them. These are all the passages in which Nahor is mentioned. His 'sons' are certainly in several cases (see Buz, 'Uz, Aram, Hazo, Tebah, Ma'acah, Chesed),† and probably in most, not individuals, but tribes (cf. Ishmael, vol. ii. p. 503°, 504°; Jacob, p. 533°–534°); he is thus the unit from 504°; JACOB, p. 533b-534°): he is thus the unit from which were derived by the Hebrew genealogists a group of Aramæan tribes, resident on the E. or N.E. of Canaan, just as other groups of tribes were derived from Ishmael (Gn 25¹²⁻¹⁸), or from Abraham's concubine Keturah (25¹⁻⁴). Whether Abraham's concubine Keturah (251-4). Whether or not Nahor was an historical individual, must remain an open question: his relationship to Abraham, whether real or assumed, served in either case as a measure of the degree of relationship which was held to subsist between the tribes referred to him and the descendants of Abraham cf. above, U.cc.). If the name be not that of an individual, it will naturally be that of a lost tribe, resident once about Haran in Mesopotamia, of which the 'sons' of Nahor were regarded as offshoots, and recollections of which were preserved by the Hebrews (cf. Ewald, Hist. i. 310 f., 268 f.): in this case, the marriage of Nahor with his niece Milcah will represent the amalgamation of two kindred tribes (Dillm. on Gn 11²⁹, who compares 16¹ 21¹ 36²⁸). As contrasted with Abraham, the ancestor of the Israelites (and Edomites), Nahor appears as the ancestor of a group of Aramean tribes, the most prominent members of which (on account of their connexion with Isaac and Jacob) are LABAN and Rebekah. The contrast between the are LABAN and Rebekan. In econtrast between the two parallel branches appears plainly in Gn 31ss (quoted above), and Jos 24s 'Your fathers dwelt of old time beyond the River, even Teral, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor: and they served other gods.' The allusion in the last cited passage is to the common home of the proceedings of the Abrahamidm and Malorida. ancestors of the Abrahamide and Nahoride, beyond the Euphrates, i.e. in Aram naharaim, or 'Mesopotamia,' between the Euphrates in the upper part of its course, and the Habor (now the Khabour), in which was the ancient and important 'city of Nahor' (see above), the site of which is well known (see HARAN). There seems, it may be added, to be much probability in Dillmann's view (on Gn 1122.31 121; cf. 24.17) that, according to J, Haran was the native and not merely the adopted home of Nahor and Abraham (cf. above, vol. i. p. 152).

* The verb 'judge' is in the original a plural (though this, in view of Heb. usage, does not absolutely settle the question); cf. also Jos 24^{2 cnd}. The words 'the God of their father' (i.e. of Terab), which in the Heb. follow awkwardly after 'judge' are not in LXX, and are very probably a gloss, designed to identify expressly the God of Abraham with the God of Nahor.

† In the genealogical scheme of P (Gn 11^{22 23}), Aram (the Syrians) and 'Uz are placed differently.

NAHSHON (ἀντρ.) [meaning doubtful] LXX and NT Ναασ(σ)ών), brother-in-law of Aaron, Ex 6²³ P, descendant in the 5th generation from Judah, 1 Ch 2⁹⁶, and prince of the tribe of Judah, Nu 1⁷ 2³ 7^{12, 17} 10¹⁴ P, is mentioned as one of the ancestors of David, Ru 4²⁰, 1 Ch 2¹⁰⁶, and of Christ, Mt 1⁴, La 2²⁸. i. NAME AND PLACE IN CANON.—The Book of Nahum occupies the seventh place in the list of the so-called 'Minor Prophets' in the second division of the OT Canon. Its twofold title (Nah 1') at once indicates the subject-matter of the book, 'the oracle' of (concerning) Ninevelh (RVm),' and furnishes us with the sum of our knowledge regarding its author, 'the book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.' In our canonical Scriptures Nahum is not elsewhere mentioned; in extra-canonical Jewish writings he is referred to in 2 Es 1⁴⁰ and by Josephus, who gives (Ant. 1X. xi. 3, Niese, § 239 ff.) a free rendering of Nah 2⁶⁻¹³, and assigns to him an impossible date (see below).

Several persons bearing the name Nahum are known to later Jewish history—among them an ancestor of Joseph of Nazareth (Lk 3*), and a well-known teacher of the 2nd cent., 'Nahum the Mede' (for whom see Bacher, Die Agada der Tannaiten, i. p. 359), more than once cited in the Mishna (Shabb. ii. 1, etc.). Another Nahum is there described as a scribe or copyist (7)???—!ibellarius, Peah, ii. 6). Traces of still another have been discovered by Clermont Ganneau (Épigraphes heb. . . . sur des ossuaires juifs, in Rev. Archéol. Ser. III. t. i. No. 41). The name appears, also to have been pear type repeats the also, to have been not uncommon among the Phœnicians (see Bœckh, CIG ii. 25, 26; CIS i. No. 1234. 18).

Nahum (can, nahhum—in some codices and editions less correctly can nahum—LXX and NT Naoύμ, in Josephus and CIG (above) inflected Naoύμος, -μου, Vulg. Nahum) signifies primarily 'full of consolation or comfort, 't then, perhaps, 'comforter, consoler' (Jerome, consolator), and is probably contracted from the fuller form πρημ 'J" is full of consolation' (cf. πτημ Nehemiah, and the full of consolation' (cf. הְּהָהָוֹ Nehemiah, and the later Jewish name שיבות, Clermont Ganneau, Sceaux et cachets israelites, No. 42 [1883]).

ii. The Prophet's Birthplace.—Of the personality of the prophet, as has been said, nothing whatever is known ‡ beyond the description of him in the title of his book as the Elkoshite (ψηρίκη, LXX Έλκεσαῖος, Vulg. Elcesœus), that is, in all probability, as a native of Elkôsh.§ The OT, unfortunately, gives no clue to the situation of Elkôsh. Four sites have been proposed at a continuous situation of the structure of the situation of the structure of t various times and with varying degrees of probability. (1) As a product of medieval fancy, we

* This rendering of  'utterance, oracle' (cf. the common expression אָלָא מְּלָא ' to lift up the voice') is certainly preferable to the AV and RV rendering 'burden.'
† The form naḥḥūm is intensive (see Gesenius-Kautzsch, Heb.

Gram. 1898, § 84b, g), from the intensive stem of DRI 'to comfort, console.' The common adjectives [13] 'full of pity,' [217] 'full of compassion,' support by analogy the rendering given above, in preference to an original substantival signification, comfort' (so Orelli and others). From the same root are derived several other proper names, such as Nehemiah, Menahem, Nahman, etc.

'The numerous legends that gathered round his name have been collected by Carpzov in his Introductio, iii. 386 ff.

may dismiss the identification of Elkosh with the Christian village of Alkúsh, about 27 miles (c. 43 kilometres)* due North of Mosul, where the tomb of the prophet is still shown (see Layard's description in Nineveh and its Remains (1849), i. 233). This identification, according to Assemani, does not date beyond the 16th cent. of our era, and is, moreover, easily accounted for by the subject-matter of the prophecy, just as the tomb of Jonah, whose book also deals with Nineveh, is shown at Nebi Yunus to the South of Mosul. (2) Equally inadmissible is the view of Hitzig and Knobel, that Elkosh was the original name of the town which in the 1st cent. bore the name of Καφαργαούμ (so the best authorities, see CAPERNAUM), i.e. probably care the village of Nahum, since, apart from the somewhat precarious etymology, there is nothing in the genuine portion of the Book of Nahum (see below) to suggest a Galilæan origin for its author. The suggest a Galilean origin for its author. objection of the Sanhedrin, moreover, expressed in the words, 'Search and see that out of Galilee ariseth no prophet' (Jn 752 RV), could scarcely have taken so emphatic a form had Capernaum been associated in the popular mind with our Nahum. (3) A similar objection applies to the identification, dubious on other grounds, which we owe to Jerome. In the prologue to his commentary on Nahum, he writes: 'Helkesei + usque hodie in Galilæa viculus [est], parvus quidem et vix ruinis veterum ædificiorum indicans vestigia; sed tamen notus Judais, et mihi quoque a circum-ducente monstratus.' The hamlet which was pointed out to Jerome by his guide as the ancient Elkosh is generally identified with the modern Elkôzeh in Northern Galilee, a short distance to the north-east of Ramieh. (4) Inasnuch as the date of Nahum's prophecy—long after the fall of the Northern Kingdom (see below)—rather points in the direction of a Judæan origin, the most probable location of Elkôsh is that furnished by a collection of traditions known as the Lives of the Prophets, formerly ascribed to Epiphanius, from A.D. 367 bishop of Constantia, the ancient Salamis, in Cyprus.

of Constantia, the ancient Salamis, in Cyprus. This curious wo:: exists in a double form, Greek and Syriac. The former was first published as a genuine work of Epiphanius by Torinus in 1529, in more recent times by Migne (vol. xliii.), Tischendorf (Ancedota Sacra, etc., 1855, 21861), Hall (Journ. of Soc. of Bibl. Exequesis, June 1886, p. 29 fl.), and, from two fresh MSS, Nestle (Die dem Epiphanius zugeschriebenen Vikes Prophetarum in doppelter Recension.; pp. 16-35). As to the Syriac form of these traditions, we find them not only appended to the respective prophets in Paul of Tella's Syriac translation (616-617 A.D.) of Origen's Hexaplar text of the Greek OT (see Ceriami's Codex Syro-hexaplaris Ambrosianus photolithographice editus in his Monumenta Sacra, etc., vol. vii. 1874), but in a more or less independent form in various quarters (see Budge, The Rook of the Bee [1886], 74ff.; Nestle, Syriac Grammar [1896], Chrestomathy, 80ff.; translated, Budge, ibid. 69 ff.; Hall (from a Philadelphia MS) in Journ. of the Soc. of Bibl. Exeg. [1887], 28 fl.).§

The portions of the Vitæ Prophetarum relating to Nahum have been edited in Greek and Syriac with full critical apparatus by Nestle (op. cit. 43f.). The former, in the oldest MS from 'the 6th or 7th century,' begins thus: Ναούμ άπὸ Ἐλκεσὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰσβηγαβαρίν φυλής Συμεών, which corresponds to the Syriac: 'Nahum was from Elkosh (in the country) beyond Bêth Gabrê (בית נברא) of the tribe of Simeon.' Now Beth-Gabre, the Betogabra of

Ptolemy, is beyond question the modern Beit-Jimen, the ancient Eleutheropolis—about halfway, as the crow flies, between Jerusalem and Gaza-an identification confirmed by the variant בית חורים (= Home of the Free) found in some of the Syriac MSS (Nestle, op. cit. 44, and the Chrestomathy, p. 89). Unfortunately, the uncertain authorship of the work in question prevents us from regarding the above statement as a genuine local tradition, as would have been the case had the Lives of the Prophets been a genuine work of Epiphanius, who was born near Eleutheropolis, and there ordained a presbyter. Still we do not and there ordained a presbyter. Still we do not hesitate to characterize this tradition as the most credible of the four here adduced. Nahum was thus, it is allowable to infer, a fellow-countryman of Micah, whose native place, Moresheth (Mic 11), according to Eusebius and Jerome, lay a little to the east of Eleutheropolis.

iii. CONTENTS OF THE BOOK OF NAHUM.—The genuine oracle of Nahum is preceded by a psalm (12-21.3) which still bears manifest traces of an original alphabetic or acrostic arrangement (see next section). It begins by asserting the qualities and attributes of J" as 'a God jenious and avenging' (12; cf. RVm), passing into a fine description of the effect on the world of nature when J appears for judgment on His enemies (vv.3.6.8).* To those, however, who truly wait upon Him, t J" is true and faithful (v. 7). In the second part of the psalm (v. 2011), where the original alphabetic arrangement has largely disappeared, and where the present text is in some places extremely corrupt, the poet announces the destruction of the enemies of Judah; the yoke that has pressed so long and so heavily on the necks of God's people shall be broken, the enemies gods cast down, and they themselves brought to an utter end. Already the bearer of the glad tidings is speeding over the hills of Judah (1¹⁵ [Heb. 2¹]); the linal restoration of J"s land and people is at hand (2' lieb. 3), ‡
In chs. 2''. 3-3''9 we have the genuine 'oracle concerning Nineveh.' It consists of two parts, corresponding to the present division of the chapters. (a) The first part may be described as a triptych, in which, with a few bold and effective strokes, the prophet artist has painted in succession the siege, the capture, and the final overthrow of Nineveh, with its resulting desolation. First of all he portrays the approach of the besiegers in scarlet uniforms and with steel-mounted $\|$ chariots (21.3), then the stubborn fights in the outplaces and broadways without the walls (v.4). On this follows ¶ (v.5) the hurried muster of the troops within, the rush to the walls to place in position the engines of defence (?; see MANTELET). But the immediate source of danger is elsewhere, for the protecting dams and sluices are burst open (v.6); the result is panic in the palace, which is immediately stormed, and the queen (?)* captured and carried off amid the lamentations of her maids (v.7). vain is every effort to rally the panic-stricken defenders (v.); the city is given over to be looted by the victors (v.). The final tableau shows the climax of the catastrophe. Nineveh has disappeared! Where stood the queen of cities there is now a 'wild and weary waste' (if thus we may imitate the alliteration $(b\bar{u}k\bar{u}h\ \bar{u}m\bar{e}b\bar{u}k\bar{u}h\ \bar{u}m\bar{e}b\bar{u}k\bar{u}h)$ of the original, v.¹º); to the prophet's unfeigned delight, the Assyrian, once brave as a lion and as cruel, has passed away for ever (v.¹¹m².).

(b) In ch. 3 the prophet, enamoured of his theme, returns to fill in certain details of the overthrow of this 'city of blood' (v.1), and furnishes us with a graphic word-picture of the final attack (vv. 2.3)-

'Hark! the whip! Hark! the rattle of the wheels;
And (see!) the prancing steeds and the bounding chariots,
The horsemen charging (?),
And the flash of the swords and the glint of the spears,
And the masses of the slain and the heaps of the dead.'

And why has this fate overtaken Nineveh? Because of her unprincipled diplomacy, her harlotries, and her witchcrafts (v.4). As punishment, she will be exposed like a vulgar adulteress to the gibes and insults of the nations she has so long oppressed (vv. 5. 6). The prophet further dwells complacently on the thought that, in Nineveh's hour of doom and shame, there will be none to comfort her or to bewail her (v.?). Let her not think she will fare better than No-amon, the mistress of Upper Egypt (v. 8t.). With the measure who rewith also are a crueities unways habite. wherewith she nieted out cruelties unspeakable to the Egyptian capital, it shall be measured to Nineveh in her turn (v. 10). For her fortified outposts, with their elleminate defenders, already fall before the invader as readily as ripe figs fall into the mouth of one who but shakes the laden fig-tree (v.¹²). Now is the time to prepare for the siege. 'To the mortar-tub and the brick-mould' is the prophet's sarcastic call (v.¹⁴)! The countless merchants of the city, a heterogeneous and unpatriotic throng, vanish as locusts vanish with the morning sun. And thus, to the accompaniment of a universal song of joy on the part of all that have suffered at her hands, the city of blood makes her final exit from the stage of history (v.19).

iv. Integrity and Authenticity BOOK. - Until a very few years ago the authenticity of all three chapters of the Book of Nahum was regarded as beyond suspicion, even by scholars was regarded as beyond suspicion, even by scholars so 'advanced' as Kuenen (Onderzoek², ii. § 75), Wellhausen (Skizzen u. Vorarbeiten² [1893], p. 155), and Cornill (Einleit.² 1892, p. 188). Since 1880, however, in various publications (ZDMG xxxiv. 559 ff., Carmina Vet. Test. metrice, 212, etc.) Bickell in this following out indications given by Frohnmeyer and Franz Delitzsch-had maintained that Nah 12-5 was in reality an alphabetic poem, whose original structure was easily recoverable by means of various slight alterations and transpositions (see esp. ZDMG, ut supra). In 1893 a more successful attempt was made on the same lines by H. Gunkel in Stade's ZATW (xiii. 223 ff.). In this essay Gunkel succeeded, in the present writer's opinion, not only in proving more conclusively than Bickell had done the existence in vv.2-9 of a clearly designed acrostic arrangement for the first half of the Hebrew alphabet (* to 5), but in establishing a strong probability that the same arrangement for the second half (o to n) originally appeared in the verses following (122-23 of the Hebrew numeration, see footnote above). Bickell has since issued a much improved edition of his restoration (Bitrage zur Semit. Metrik, 1894, being an off-print from the Sitzungsberichte of the Vienna Academy of Sciences), which in its turn has suggested to Gunkel a few emendations, incorporated in a note to his Schöpfung u. Chaos (p. 120 f.). Finally, Nowack in his commentary (see the Literature at end of article) has adopted, and in some points has still further improved upon, the results of his predecessors. As regards the opening verses at least (vv.²⁻⁹), the changes which the acrostic scheme demands are not more numerous or more radical than those required in several of the other alphabetic poems of the OT, as we propose to show (see small type below). An alphabetic psalm, however, must by its very nature be complete; hence we do not hesitate to affirm that in Nah 12-23 we have the remains of an acrostic psalm, of which the first nine verses (x to v) have suffered little, the next four or five (' to) considerably more, and the rest (o to n) so much that their restoration can never be more than an academic exercise, —words which A. B. Davidson has applied rashly, as we think, to the whole of ch. 1. Each of the twenty-two verses consisted originally of two lines each, each line containing, as a rule, three or four accented words.

 The word of the original, הְעֶב, is still unexplained (AV, RV as a proper name, Huzzab, but see margins). The Targum has already מלכתא 'queen.' See art. Huzzab. The following העלתה should perhaps be read העחלה and understood as a loan-word from Assyrian, like The Si7 and prob. Think it. = massaru, 'watcher' (see Jensen's review of Billerb. and Jerem. in Theol. Lattg. 1895, p. 507). It would then correspond to the Assyr. etellitu, 'a lady (of rank).' See P. Ruben, Academy, 1896, p. 202, and more in detail PSBA xx. (May 1893) p. 173 ff. 'An Oracle of Nahum'; cf. Expos. Times, vii. (1896) p. 568, viii.

The following brief note will sufficiently indicate the plan of the pealm: the M-verse consists of v.2a of the MT, i.e. of two lines of four words each, vv. 25 3 (mar) being probably part of the D and I verses introduced here by an editor to qualify the general statement in v.2 (Nowack). The I-verse, two lines of three words each, extends from בסתבה to end of v.2; the 1-verse =v.4a also of six accented words. At v.4b a 7 is needed, and here the VSS certainly had two different verbs, which renders the first NGK suspicious; read perhaps of Gray, Oheyne) or The π • verse = v.54, 1 = v.5b; for 1 it is only necessary to transpose אין to the head of Ga and read ילפניו ; n=6b, n=7s. For 'we would propose to read y7" (cf. Ps 1386), or, as hitherto proposed, delete ו of רוע in v.7b. Now in all or, as hitherto proposed, delete 1 of 977 in v.75. Now in all these ten verses, involving only one serious interference with MT, we have surely something more than chance coincidence, namely, a conscious design which cannot be explained by the fact that the author allowed himself here and there and perhaps half accidentally to follow the alphabetic order (Driver, Expos. Times, ix. (1897), p. 119—review of Nowack's Kleine Propheten).

Regarding the author of this psalm, we can only say that he lived at some period of the post-exilic history,† when the yoke of the heathen pressed heavily on the people of God, whose coming to judge the oppressor and vindicate His own could not be long delayed. The poem, it was felt at a later period, fitly expressed the general principle of God's avenging justice, of which the destruction of Nineveh was the most striking concrete illustra-tion. Accordingly, it was prefixed as an appropriate introduction to the genuine 'vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.

v. Occasion and Date of Chs. 2 and 3.—The prophecy itself provides us with two fixed points between which its date must fall. These are the capture of No-amon (Thebes, 38s.) and the downfall of Nineveh itself. Regarding the former event, our terminus a quo, there need be no hesitation in identifying it with the capture and destruction of the capital of Upper Egypt by Assurbanipal in B.C. 664-663 (see Schrader, COT ii. 149 ff.; Tiele, Bab. Assyr. Geschichte, ii. 149 ff.). An event of such far-reaching consequences for the Western world would long remain fresh in the minds of men, so that it is quite unnecessary, because of its mention by Nahum, either to assign the prophecy to a date B.C. 660 (so Schrader, loc. cit., and Orelli), or with Wellhausen (Skizzen, etc. v. 160) to suggest whether the prophet may not refer to some later capture, regarding which history and tradition are alike silent.

*The English-speaking student will find a very lucid account of the proposals of these scholars, with some original suggestions, in G. Buchanan Gray's article, 'The Alphabetical Poem in Nahum,' Expositor, Sept. 1898.

With regard, in the next place, to the terminus ad quem, we are now in possession, since 1895, of native cuneiform testimony to the manner and date of the final overthrow of Nineveh. In the course of his excavations in a mound near Hillah (Babylon), Father Scheil came upon a semicircular stele of Nabonidus (B.C. 555-538), now in the Imperial Museum at Constantinople (publ. by V. Scheil in Maspero's Recueil de Travaux, etc., 1896, livr. 1, 2; L. Messerschmidt, Die Inschrift der Stele Nabona'ids, 1896; summary by Johns in Expos. Times, vii. (1896), p. 360f.; also, with illustrations, by C. J. Ball in Light from the East, 1899, p. 212 ff.; cf. A. B. Davidson, Nahum, etc. 137 f.). In this inscription it is expressly stated that 'the aid of the king of the Umman-manda folk'—that course of his excavations in a mound near Hillah aid of the king of the Umman-manda folk'—that is, either the Medes alone, or a mixed folk of which the Medes were the predominant constituent was invoked by Marduk, the great god of Babylon, in order to avenge the insults offered to him by

The date of the fall of Nineveh is also, for the first time, fixed for us within narrow limits. col. x. Nabonidus informs us that the temple of the moon-god Sin at Harran (which had been destroyed by the Medes about the same time as Nineveh) was restored by him fifty-four years after its destruction. This restoration, as we know from another inscription, took place in the third year of Nabonidus' reign (B.C. 553). Hence we obtain 607 as the date of the destruction of Harran and—since Nineveh was doubtless the last to fall before the Medes — B.C. 606 as the nearest approach to the date of the fall of Nineveh.

the Assyrians in the days of Sennacherib. The Medes alone are credited with the destruction of the cities and temples of Assyria (column ii.), which agrees with the well-known statement of Herodotus (i. 103 ff.).

These, then, are the two fixed points, viz. B.C. 664-663 and B.C. 606, between which the proplicey of Nahum must be placed. The upper limit, it will be seen, is fatal both to the earliest tradition known to us, according to which Nahum prophesied 115 years before the fall of Nineveh (Jos. Ant. IX. xi. 3), and to the conclusions of older scholars, such as Pusey, Nägelsbach, etc., who placed the prophecy in the reign of Hezekiah or the earlier years of Manasseh.

Another factor, which was of the greatest moment in former attempts to fix more definitely namely, the supposed references in ch. I to the political and religious condition of Judah under the later Assyrian kings.† This chapter, we have seen reason to believe, is no part of the genuine prophecy of Nahum-a conclusion which disposes at once of the views of two groups of scholars-(a) those who, like Kuenen (Onderzoek, § 75), Cornill (Einleit. 2188), and Wildeboer (Die Litteratur d. AT, 1895, pp. 194, 197), lay stress on the fact that the yoke of Assyria was still heavy on the neck of Judah (113), and are therefore compelled to postulate a date c. 624, after which time the power of Assyria rapidly decayed, and Josiah was able to extend his borders at her expense; and (b) those who, like Robertson Smith (art. 'Nahum' in Encyc. Brit.'), basing too exclusively on ch. 1, consider that the prophet had in his eye no particular assailant of Nineveh, but based his prophecy solely on the general principles of the divine moral government. With ch. I falls also the hypothesis advanced by the present writer in 1891 ('The Burden of Nineveh' in Good Words, 1891 ('The Burden of Nineven in Good Profue, 1891, 741 ff.)—and by H. Winckler independently in 1892 (Altest. Untersuch. 1892, 124 ff.)—based on a study of the relations between Assyria and Judah during the period in question, that the prophecy is to be placed c. 645 B.C., near the close of the rebellion of Samas-sum-ukin, viceroy of Babylon, against his brother Assurbanipal.

* See Messerschmidt, p. 71 (a general term for northern peoples, including the Medes); Del. HWB p. 87b. According to Ball, op. cit. p. 208 n., the Umman-manda are the 'Medes' of Astyages, who appear, he adds, to have been Iranian Scythians' (?).

† Such references were found in vv.9.11 (the 'wicked counsellor'), 13 (the heavy yoke [of Assyria?]), 15 (the religious zeal of the Jews (under Josiah?)), etc., see the commentaries.

If, then, as we believe, chs. 2 and 3 alone constitute the genuine prophecy of Nahum, the task of determining its date is very materially simpliof determining its date is very materially simplified, for the situation portrayed in these chapters is scarcely open to doubt. It is the moment between the actual invasion of Assyria by a hostile force and the commencement of the attack on its capital. The 'mauler' or destroyer (adopting with most moderns Michaelis' reading 750 for 750) is already on the march (21 [Heb. 2]); the frontier textures here opened their enter to the feet (212) fortresses have opened their gates to the foe (3¹², where note the tenses). The latter, it is clear where note the tenses). The latter, it is clear (314.18), has not yet begun to invest the city. Such was the situation when Nahum received the prophetic impulse to proclaim to the 'city of blood' (31) that the cup of her iniquities was full to overflowing. It is needless to attempt to disentangle the statements of classical historians as to the various attacks which Nineveh had to meet during the last years of her existence. The whole of the genuine prophecy palpitates with the conviction that the 'utter end' of the Assyrian is at hand. The closing verses of the prophecy, in particular, are strangely out of place, if the writer has in view any other but the final attack by the Umman-manda of Nabonidus' stele. B.C. 608-607, therefore, we consider to be the date of the vision of Nahum, an approximation as close as is attainable in the case of any book of the OT.

Nothing in these chapters, we may add, compels us to believe that Nahum was himself an eyewitness of the scenes he so vividly portrays. Communication, easy and frequent, had long existed between Nineveh and the tributary West-land, whose inhabitants were therefore well acquainted with her situation and defences. Such an acquaintance, joined to a poet's intuition and a seer's prophetic insight, is sufficient for all the facts.

vi. GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF CHS. 2 and

3.—The most striking characteristics of the poetry of Nahum are its intense force and its picturesqueness. Although, as Dr. Pusey has remarked, it is only in the original that 'the grandeur, energy, power, and vividness of Nahumcan be fully felt,' still even in an English dress no one can be insensible to the onward rush of the movement in 2^{1-y} , the graphic word-picture of 3^{2-3} , the aptness and force of the figures of the lion and his cubs (2^{11.5}), and of the locusts' flight (3¹⁷), the pathos of 3¹⁸, and similar features. 'Of all the minor prophets none seems to reach the sublimity, the fire, and the daring spirit (audaces spiritus) of Nahum,'—such is the judgment passed on our prophet by Bishop Lowth in his classical work on Hebrew Poetry.

'Of all the prophets,' writes a more recent authority, 'he is the one who in dignity and force approaches most nearly to Isaiah' (Driver, LOI's 336; cf. Kirkpatrick, Doct. of the Prophets, p. 250). It is unfortunate that in several passages even of the genuine prophecy the text is uncertain. The use by the prophet of so many apparently technical terms (cf. G. A. Smith's list, The Twelve Prophets, ii. 89) further helps to obscure his meaning.

The direct teaching of the book is mainly confined to ch. 1. Its leading thought we have already seen to be the attribute of J' as 'a God jealous' (cf. Ex 205 344, Dt 42) and avenging, who, though He suffer long, will assuredly 'take vengeance on his adversaries' (cf. Is 348 634, Dt 3226). The elaboration of this aspect of the Divine nature serves to throw into higher relief the assurance that follows-

'The Lord is good to them that wait upon him (LXX).'
'In the day of trouble will He deliver them.'†
'(Yea) the Lord knoweth them that put their trust in him.'

Passing to chs. 2 and 3, we note one important respect in which Nahum differs from all his predecessors in the prophetic office. His mind is so full of the iniquities and impending punishment of Nineveh, that he has no thought for the short-comings of his own people. In this he presents a striking contrast to his contemporaries, Zephaniah and Jeremiah. Nahum's heart, it has been said, 'for all its bigness, holds room only for the bitternesses, the baffled hopes, the unappeased hatreds of a hundred years' (G. A. Smith, op. cit. ii. 90). In ch. 3, especially, the prophet's indignation burns with a white heat as he lays bare the moral gangrene at the heart of the Assyrian nation, the moral atrophy which was the real source of the weakness that made its sudden and complete weakness that made its studen and complete collapse without a parallel in history (cf. Strabo, xvi. 1. 3: η μεν οῦν Νὲνος πόλις ἡφανίσθη παραχρῆμα, κ.τ.λ.). Wanton bloodshed, inhuman cruelty, commercial immorality, bad faith in her political relations,—in his denunciation of these Nahum gave voice less to his own personal conviction than to the outraged conscience of humanity. Assyria in his hands becomes an object-lesson to the empires of the modern world, teaching, as an eternal principle of the divine government of the world, the absolute necessity, for a nation's continued vitality, of that righteousness, personal, civic, and national, which alone 'exalteth LITERATURE.—The older commentaries are discussed by O. Strauss (see below); list of titles at close of art. 'Nahum' in Kitto's Biblicial Cyclop.' (1866). The chief modern commentaries are those on the Minor Prophets generally by Ewald, Pusey, Keil, Hitzig-Steiner's (1881), Orelli (in Strack and Zöckler's series, Eng. tr., T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh), Wellhausen (translation and critical notes in Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, pt. v. 3rd ed. [1899]; A. B. Davidson, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (in Cambridge Bible 1896—the best English commentary's Nowack (1897); G. A. Smith, The Twelve Prophets, vol. ii. (1898). To these may be added Farrar, Minor Prophets ('Men of the Bible' series), and Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets (2nd ed.). A detailed commentary on the military references is supplied by the monograph of Ad. Billerbeck and Alf. Jerenias, 'Der Untergang Nineveh's und die Weissagungsschrift des Nahum von Elkosch,' in Delitzsch und Haupt's Beiträge zur Asyriologie, Bd. iii., 1898, pp. 87-188. A complete monograph, though now largely out of date, is that of Otto Strauss, Nahumi de Nino Vaticinium (1853).

In Jer 17¹ the word refers to the diamond point of the graver or stylus. 2. 70; Arab. valad, a pin or peg of wood, a tent peg. In Syria tent pegs are usually of oak, very roughly shaped and pointed. It was with one of these that Jael treacherously murdered Sisera, Jg 4^{21ff.} (see Moore, ad loc.). In Ex 27¹⁹ it is said that the pegs of the tabernacle were of copper. In old houses in Lebanon wooden pegs are driven into the walls of rooms, so that articles may be sus-pended on them. Sometimes the pin is drawn out by the weight of the article hung on it, having been driven into a mass of clay, used as mortar, between the stones of the wall. NAIN (Natr).—This place is mentioned only once in Scripture, in Lk 71. The site of the ancient village is well authenticated; it is occupied by the modern Nein, a squalid, miserable collection of mud-hovels, situated on the north-western edge of Jebel ed-Duhy, or the 'Little Hermon,' where the hill slopes down into the plain of Esdraelon. The mountain is called Jebel ed-Duhy from an unknown Mohammedan saint, whose wely or sacred place is on the summit of its conical peak. Around the village are numerous rubbish heaps and stony ruins, which indicate that at one time it must have been a place of much greater importance. It does not seem to have ever been a walled and fortified place, for no indications of a wall can be seen. But Conder (Tent-Work, p. 122) supposes that by the phrase 'gate of the city,' in the Gospel narrative, we are to understand merely the ordinary entrance among the houses by the open path, just or the 'gate of the pass,' where no gate or wall actually exists. Stanley (SP p. 357) says that 'no convent, no tradition, marks the spot.' But he must have overlooked the rude little mosque so prominent, among the houses extended another. prominent among the houses, strangely enough called the 'Place of our Lord Jesus Christ,' which, from the significance of its name, must indicate the previous existence on the spot of a Christian the previous existence on the spot of a Christian chapel, which disappeared at an early period. The rough steep path leading up to the village is unchanged since that memorable day when our Lord traversed it with weary feet, and met the funeral procession of the widow's only son. And behind it, in the face of the rocks that processing them the winged side of the hill promotifile. ject from the rugged side of the hill, may still be seen shadowy holes and caves, which doubtless mark the old place of sepulture to which the young man's dead body was being carried on its bier. No grander view can be obtained anywhere in Palestine than that which stretches around Nain, from its green nest on the mountain side, amply justifying its descriptive name, if this is to be derived (with the Talmud) from a Hebrew word cw., signifying 'beauty' or 'pleasantness.' Within the circle of the surrounding hills some of the most stirring events in Old Testament history have occurred. Below is the extensive plain of Jezreel, which was the great battlefield of Palestine from the days of Nebuchadnezzar to those of Napoleon. Right across are the uplands of Nazareth; to the left are the bare limestone ridges of Gilboa; away in the distance is the white range of Carmel, with a blue gleam of the Mediterranean at its foot; while far up in the north is the snowy top of great Hermon, dominating all the wide view.

The story of Nain has been told in the simplest and most touching manner by the evangelist. Every word is a picture: the desolation of the widowed mother, the compassion of Jesus, the significance of His action in touching the bier, and so becoming ceremonially unclean through this forbidden contact with death, showing that He raised the young man to life not by His absolute power as God, but by the power of His own suffering and death; the pathetic deliverance to the mother of her son, for she needed him most, instead of asking him to forsake all and follow

201 in which Duvid and Sanual took refuse 201, in which David and Samuel took refuge, when the former was pursued by Saul. This is really all that can be said about it: what the nature of the locality was, is entirely uncertain. It is an old explanation, not out of harmony with the context, that the term denotes the home, or comobium, of the prophets (cf. Targ. בית אולפוא 'house of instruction,' or school): but the philo-logical basis of this interpretation is very insecure; for m; (of which my might be a fem. form) does not mean 'habitation' in general, but denotes in particular an abode of shepherds or sheep (see esp. 2 S 78; and cf. Is 65¹⁰, Jer 33¹²), or a country habitation, or domain (Job 5³⁴, Is 32¹⁸, Jer 10²⁵ 25³⁰ habitation, or domain (3013-, 18 32-, 3et 10-25-etc.), and is only applied figuratively to other kinds of abode, in poetry (Ex 15¹³, Is 33²⁰, Jer 55⁷), or elevated prose (2 S 15²⁰): hence it is doubtful whether a word closely allied to this would have been chosen to denote a residence of prophets in a village or town. The absence of the art., not merely in the vocalized text (1 S 19¹⁸ etc.), but in the consonantal text (201), is also an objection to its being supposed to have had an appellative sense. Under the circumstances, we must be satisfied to know that Nawyath was the name of a locality in Ramah: the original signification of the name, and also the nature of the place denoted by it, are both uncertain. (Ewald's attempted justification of the rendering school, Hist. iii. 49 f., is far too conjectural to be probable: see Driver on 1 S 19¹⁸). S. R. DRIVER.

NAME in EV corresponds to the Heb. co, Aram. co, and Gr. ενομα. The Hebrew word is of very ancient and obscure origin. Redslob (ZDMG, 1872, pp. 751-756), tracing it to the root εμως to be high'), argues that its fundamental sense is height, and hence (1) a monument

(Gn 114, 2 S 10¹³, Is 55¹³) or mausoleum (Is 56³), (2) excellence, majesty. c.g. Ps 54¹; and that 'name' in the sense of a mere token of distinction represents the last stage in the impoverishment of the original idea. Others (c.g. Lagarde, Bildung der Nomina, p. 160; W. R. Smith, Kinship, p. 213) connect it with the root wim, which gives sign or token as the original meaning. In view of this uncertainty, it will be wise not to base too much in our discussion of the term on the etymology. The Greek term as used in NT has many meanings that are foreign to classical usage, but are due to the direct or indirect influence of the Hebrew term.

In discussing the present subject we have to consider, firstly, the significance of the term and the ideas expressed by it; and, secondly, the various customs connected with the giving of names.

I. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TERM.—1. In in-numerable passages alike in OT and NT the term is used as by ourselves in reference to words by which persons, places, or objects are designated and distinguished from others. It is also by a familiar reputation or fame; see e.g. 18 1830, 28 79 2313, and in consequence of is sometimes translated in EV by 'renown' Gn 64, Nu 162, or 'famous' 1 Ch 524, Ru 411 (cf. Job 308 'base' = Heb. of '72 = lit. nameless); it may even by itself and unqualified mean a good reputation, e.g. Pr 221, Ec 71, Sir 4112; or, on the other hand, a false reputation, Rev 31. But the more peculiar senses of the term are due to the close relation that was supposed to exist between the name and the personality. It is a widely-spread belief among primitive and less developed peoples that one who knows a person's name has power over the bearer of the name; hence the reluctance to give a stranger one's name. It was but a modification of such belief that made the Hebrew frequently use 'name' as almost an equivalent of the 'personality' or 'character' or nature of the person or thing named; and consequently, when a writer wishes to express forcibly the nature of a person or place, he says he will be called so-and-so, or his name will be so-and-so. Thus when in the future Jerusalem is purged from injustice she will be called 'the city of righteousness' (Is 125); when J" returns to the deserted city after the Exile, its name will be 'J" is there' (Ezk 4836). The nature of Egypt is summed up in the name that is given her, 'Rahab that sitteth still'; and the meaning of Is 96 is that the child will actually be all that the name 'wonderful,' etc., implies; cf. further Pr 21²⁴, Is 63¹⁶, and probably Is 62² 65¹⁵. Again, the Greek hr/ματα is actually rendered by 'persons' in Ac 11s, Rev 112, where the sense closely resembles that of the original term in Nu 12 26c, Rev 34, in which cases EV adopts 'names' as its rendering. For instances from Gr. papyri see Deissmann, Neus Bibletudies 24 f Bibelstudien, 24 f.

2. It is not difficult to understand how 'name' may express the idea of authority (see e.g. Ex 5⁻², 1 K 21⁸, Est 3¹², Jn 5¹³), but it is perhaps through this sense that a phrase arose the meaning of which is much less immediately obvious, especially in the EV. In Hebrew we frequently read of some one's name being called over something ('b' בַּבֶּי בִּבְּיִבְּי בִּי בְּבָּי בִּבְּי בְּבָּי בַּבְּי ַּבְּי בַּבְי בַּבְּי בַּבְּי בַּבְי בַּבְּי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְּי בַּבְי בַבְּי בַּבְי בַבְי בַּבְי ַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בּבְי בּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְיב בּי בּבְי בַּבְ בַּבְי בַּבְ בַבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְ בַּבְ בַּבְ בַּבְ בַּבְ בַּבְי בַּבְי בַבְ בַּבְי בְּבָּי בְּבָּי בַּבְ בַּבְי בַּבְי בַבְי בַּבְ בַּבְי בְבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְ בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַבְ בַּבְי בְּבָּי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְ בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְי בַּבְ בַ city, and his name be called over it, i.e. lest the city pass under his authority and not David's (2 S 12.8). 'All the nations over which J''s name was called '(Am 912) are all the nations which had once owned J''s authority, i.e. had once formed part of the dominion of Israel—the people of J''. Israel in its confession (Is 6319) says—We are become as they over whom thou never barest rule; as they over whom thy name was not called, i.e. as they who have ceased to be regarded as thy people and subject to thy authority. Women have the name of their husbands called over them, i.e. become subject to their authority at marriage, Is 4¹. With regard to the precise sense of 'name' in the phrase there may be difference of opinion: thus Driver (Deuteronomy, p. 306) interprets Joah's saying thus, 'lest I gain the credit of having captured it [Rabbah], and it be counted as my conquest.' But the meaning of the whole phrase is quite clear: in the further words of Driver, 'the phrase expresses . . . the fact of ownership—whether acquired by actual conquest or otherwise (cf. Ps 491² (11))—coupled at the same time with the idea of protection: and occurs frequently, especially with reference to the people of Israel, Jerusalem, or the temple. The passages are: Am 91², Jer 710.11.14.30 149 1516 . . . 25.20 3231 3415, 1 K 832 (=2 Ch 633) 60 (all D²), Is 6319, 2 Ch 714, Dn 932.19.' Cf., in the Apocrypha, Bar 215.26, 1 Mac 737, and in NT Ac 1511 (cited by St. James from Am 912), Ja 27. We may allude to one other passage where 'name' probably means 'authority,' viz. Is 2612 (cf. 6319). The words rendered by EV, 'by thee only will we make mention of thy name,' should contain an antithesis to the first part of the verse, 'O LORD our God, other Lords beside thee have had dominion over us,' and consequently must be translated 'but thee, (to wit) thy name (authority), alone will we (in future) mention (i.e. acknowledge)'; for the construction in the Heb. cf. Dillm. in loc.

3. We may pass on now to some of the special ideas that are expressed by the phrase 'name of J''' in the OT, 'name of Jesus,' etc., in the NT. The name of J'' as equivalent to the person of J''represented as the subject or the object of various actions: thus, for example, it sets men on high (Ps 201). It is loved (Ps 511), praised (Ps 717), sanctified (Is 2923); it is described, e.g., as being glorious, feurful (Dr 2923), highly (1 Ch 2918), everlasting (Ps 13513). But in particular the 'name of J"' is used as a succinct expression for the re-vealed character of God for all that is known of him. Hence such frequent expressions as to declare (7, e.g. Ex 9¹⁶ 22²²), or to know (y2; e.g. Is 52⁶, cf. 64²) the name of J". J" acts for his name's sake (e.g. Ezk 20⁹) when he so acts that his hitherto revealed nature is not belied; e.g. when he vindicates his power by bringing the people out of Egypt. Wherever J' records his name, according to the early law book (Ex 20²⁴), there men are to build an altar to him: what was meant by this 'recording of his name' may be seen by examining the various narratives of the building of altars, i.e. of the observations of this law (see e.g. Gn 12⁷ 22⁹ 26²⁴, Jg 6²⁴ [in the light of the preceding narrative], 1 S 14²⁶); it was the indication, by a theophany or by some great success or de-livery or the like, of the divine presence and favour; in other words, it was a self-revelation of J" to men. From the time of Deuteronomy onwards Jerusalem became the one special seat of the divine presence in Israel; there, therefore, he and very often); hence the temple is a house for J''s name, 2 S 7¹³, 1 K 8¹⁷⁻²⁰ etc.; and even earlier the supremacy of Jerusalem among the shrines of the S. kingdom had become so great that Isaiah (187) speaks of Zion as the place of J"s name, unless, with Cheyne (Introd. to Book of Isaiah, p. 313), we regard this verse as post-exilic.

4. Of the numerous shades of meaning connected with and probably springing out of the usage just noticed, we may refer to one or two. 'Tho name of J"' itself becomes a term to express a theophany in Is 30" (alio, according to Cheyne, post-exilic), where it is described 'as coming from far, burning with his anger, and in thick rising smoke,' etc.; with this passage we may perhaps compare 591. In Is 482 the term is probably used in the transferred sense of the praise which the divine self-manifestation calls forth from men; note the parallel clause and a similar transference of meaning in the parallel phrase 'glory of J"' (see GLORY or J"1, ad fin.). In Zec 14" (cf. Is 565) the name of J" is the manner in which men recognize the divine self-revelation—in other words, the worship of J"; Hitzig rightly interprets 'his name shall be one' as meaning that the unity of J", which already exists in reality, will then also be acknowledged and recognized on earth.

But in virtue of its most characteristic and frequent usage 'the name of J"' belongs to a series of phrases, to which the 'glory of J",' the face of J",' the angel of J" also belong, by which the Hebrews endeavoured to distinguish between the Deity in himself and the Deity as manifested to and coming into relation with men; or, in earlier times, between the Deity conceived as manifested to sinal, and on the other hand as accompanying his people in their journeyings. In the latter case, however, it is the 'angel of J"' that most frequently figures, and we need call attention only to one peculiar passage (Ex 2321) in which both phrases are combined, and 'the name of J"' is said to be in the angel; the meaning of this appears to be, that though the angel is not J" in his fulness (cf. v. 311), yet J"'s nature is so far in him that what would offend J" will offend him. To the OT usage of the term 'name of J"' we have a parallel, striking at once in its similarity and its dissimilarity, in Phenician. In an inscription (CIS 318) from Sidon we find mention of 'Ashtoreth the name of Baal ('yz be namy),' i.e. an Ashtoreth distinguished from other Ashtoreths by the fact that she was regarded as being a manifestation or representative of Baal. In this case, as in the parallel case of 'Tanith the face of Baal ('yz p nn),' Phenician, in striking contrast to Hebrew, has made of the representation or manifestation a new and distinct deity.

5. Finally, in our survey of OT usage we have to notice that in Lv 24¹¹⁻¹⁶ the name (ng) is used as a substitute for J" according to a practice which became very customary in post-biblical Hebrew. It is, however, probable that we owe this usage to the scribes and copyists rather than to the author of the section in question (cf. Geiger, Urschrift, 273 f.).

6. When we turn to NT we find, as we should expect, that in several instances 'the name of the Lord' occurs in actual quotations from OT (see e.g. Mt 12³¹ 23³⁹, Ac 2²¹, Ro 15⁹, He 2¹²), and that in others the phrases are of the same or nearly the same character as those current in OT (e.g. Mt 6⁹, Jn 17^{6, 20}). The question is how far does OT usage serve to explain the NT term where, owing to new circumstances and conditions, it has to express ideas in large part new? Is it necessary to presuppose entirely different modes of thought to explain the NT term; or is it possible to explain its new meanings as the natural development out of the old?

Clearly, phrases which differ from the OT equivalents only by the substitution of 'Jesus' for 'J"' may be similarly interpreted unless cogent reasons for the contrary be forthcoming:

hence, e.g., 'to prophesy in the name of Jesus' corresponds in NT to prophesy or speak in the name of J" in OT. Such a phrase as 'to believe in the name of Jesus' differs somewhat more from OT usage, and yet is certainly in line with it. It very significantly alternates in the same writer with the phrase 'to believe in Jesus' (see e.g. Jn 1¹² 2-3 3¹⁶; 3¹⁶. ¹⁸ 6⁶⁰); i.e. the name of Jesus is a parallel term to the word 'Jesus' itself, and is most appropriately used in the present phrase because 'the name of Jesus' briefly sums up the personality of Jesus as made known; to believe in his name is to believe in and accept his claims.

NAME

But a very different mode of interpretation has been recently advocated by Conybeare. Briefly stated, it is an assimilation of 'the use of the name of Jesus Christ to ancient magic' (JQR ix. 66); or again, in Conybeare's own words, 'Why did Jesus instruct his disciples to cast out demons in his name? Why do we end our prayers with the formula in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord? Why did the Christians glory in the name? Why were they persecuted for the name? The answer to all these questions is furnished by ancient magic' (ib. 581). 'In or by the name of Jesus Christ our Lord' is a 'theurgic formula,' and its use was due to the fact that Christians shared the ancient but still prevalent belief that a god or demon must come when his name is correctly pro-

Conybeare has clearly shown that this magical view of the name was held by several of the early Fathers as well as by non-Christian and pre-Christian Greek and Latin writers; he has also collected much comparative evidence of the general existence of such a belief relative to names. Further, it may be admitted that in some cases and by some people the name of Jesus may have been regarded as possessing magical efficacy—see e.g. Mt 7²², Ac 4⁷; and again that the 'names' referred to in Eph 1²¹ (and, therefore, probably also in Ph 2⁹) are names of angels, but that the reference s 'to the use in exorcisms of names of angels and patriarchs' is far from obvious. It is impossible here to discuss the very numerous passages concerned in detail; but the general reasons which appear to the present writer cogent against admitting Conybeare's mode of interpreagainst admitting Conybeare's mode of interpre-tation, except in a few isolated passages, may be briefly stated thus: (1) It is obviously inapplicable in many cases, e.g. Mt 18⁵. (2) A number of the phrases, as we have already seen, are identical with, a number more are closely similar to, those found in the OT. The OT terminology may and probably should be traced back ultimately to the magical view of 'name,' but in itself expresses an immeasurably higher type of ideas. But the influence of the OT on both Jesus and the disciples was obviously so great that we have a right in ambiguous cases to adopt the higher interpre-tation suggested by OT usage rather than that suggested by popular Jewish and Greek super-To take a single instance, the analogy of OT instances would lead us to infer from the fact that Simon was surnamed 'Rock,' and the sons of Zebedee 'sons of thunder,' that the names were given because the persons in question possessed qualities described by these new names; and this is surely far more reasonable than to infer 'that the new names were supposed to impart to them (Simon and the sons of Zebedee) new qualities, or fortify their moral characters.' It is unquestionably a right principle to interpret the NT in the light of contemporary ideas; but it is a wrong application of this principle to neglect the most potent of these ideas—those, namely, of the OT.

(3) The magical significance attached to the names by early Christian Fathers, which at first sight most favours the theory, is explicable by a misunderstanding, under the influence of Greek superstition, of a terminology which must have been but half intelligible to Greeks and Latins.

II. CUSTOMS CONNECTED WITH THE GIVING OF NAMES.—1. Personal. A child received its name most frequently from the mother (Gn 4²⁵ 16¹¹ 19²⁷. 29^{321. 35 * 30⁶ 8. 11. 13. 18. 20. 21. 29 35¹⁸ 38⁴¹, Jg 13²⁴, 1 S 1²⁰} -all the foregoing are early narratives; 1 Ch 4º 716), but frequently also from the father (see especially Hos 1.4.6.9, Is 6.3, and in P Gn 5.3 1615 1719 21², but also in early narratives, Gn 4²⁸ 5²⁹ 35¹⁸ 41⁵¹¹, Ex 2²³, Jg 8³¹; cf. further 1 Ch 7²³, Job 42¹⁴). In Gn 38³, 2 S 12³⁴ the text varies (between 'he,' i.e. the father, and 'she,' i.e. the mother, 'called'). More rarely and under exceptional circumstances the child received its name from others; compare in this connexion the stories of Moses receiving his name from Pharaoh's daughter (Ex 210), Ruth's child from the mother's women neighbours (Ru 4¹⁷), Solomon from a prophet (2 S 12²⁵). In some cases the verb which refers to the naming of the child has an indefinite subject; so certainly in Gn 25²⁶², perhaps also in some of the cases referred to above as instances of naming by the father. † In most of the cases just cited 'naming' is immediately connected with birth, and we may perhaps infer that the name was, as a rule, in early times given immediately after birth, as is said to be the case with the modern Arabs (cf. Lane, Arabian Notes, ch. iv. n. 4). In later times the name was given at circumcision, i.e. on the 8th day after birth (Lk 150 2"); but of this particular custom we find no trace in OT except in so far as the change of Abraham's name in connexion with the institu-tion of circumcision may point to it (Gn 17 (P)). In the earlier period the name was chosen on account of its significance, and recorded some circumstance connected with the birth, some natural feature of the child, or the parents' wish concerning it, or their gratitude to God for the gift of This is clear from the meaning of the names (see following art.) and also from the numerous narratives cited above, which are good evidence as to general custom, though as accounts of particular instances they are mostly legendary rather than historical. The custom which was already frequent in the time of Christ (Lk 1^{5,9}) of naming children after a kinsman, most generally the grandfather, cannot be traced back with any certainty before the 3rd or 4th cent. B.C. The only early evidence for kinsmen even bearing a common name is 2 S 21⁷¹; 2 S 13¹ 14²⁷; 2 S 3², 1 K 15²; 1 K 22²⁶, 2 K 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸⁻²⁶; 2 K 11² 8²⁶, 1 K 2²⁶. Of these five instances it will hardly be questioned that some are mere coincidences. Further, in only one instance, the third, is the relation of the two persons concerned direct; in others it is lateral, the cases being those of cousin or nephew and uncle. On the other hand, in the numerous early genealogies which we possess, we find no trace of the custom of naming after ancestors: thus no two kings of Judah (21 in number, and all of the family of David), and no two kings of the same Ephraimite dynasty, bear the same name, nor does the same name recur in any other early genealogy (see Zeph 1¹; Zec 1¹; Jer 41^{1, 2}; 1 S 9¹ 14³; 2 K 9² 22³; cf. v. 1² and Jer 41² 22¹⁴). On the other hand, from the 4th cent. B.C. and onwards the custom became prevalent, not only among the Jews, but also among the Phonicians, Nabateans, and Palmyrenes.

For sake of distinction, the father's name was sometimes added; as in the case of David, the son of Jesse; and occasionally a person was called Syntax, $ 108a.

[•] Also, no doubt, Gn 2934, where we ought to read הַרָאָה = she called (so Ball in SBOT).

† On the cause of the ambiguity in these cases, of. Davidson, simply son of so-and-so, often in contempt (e.g. But the familiar Arabic custom of making actual proper names out of such combinations as father of so-and-so, or son of so-and-so, did not exist among the Hebrews. Nor, again, have we any evidence that anything strictly corresponding to our family names was in use; though, of course, there were clan names, and a man might be described as being the 'man' or 'son' on the sol described as being the 'man' or 'son' of such and such a clan (Jg 101). A woman did not change the description 'wife of so-and-so' was often added (Gn 12¹⁷, Jg 4⁴). Is 4¹ does not refer to such a custom: for its interpretation see above I. 2. It is not therefore to the family name, but to the memory of a deceased person, that the term 'name' refers in the very frequent phrases 'to blot out' or 'to take away' the name (with reference to childless people; cf. e.g. Nu 274, Dt 25d.7, 1 S 2421; cf. in Aramaic, CIS ii. 113); it is the memory, not the actual name, of an ancestor that posterity preserves (cf. Is 56°).

Several instances are recorded of change of name in mature life. But most of these instances are of a special character, and it is therefore difficult to feel sure that the custom was at all frequent. Thus we find (a) three or four instances in the legends of the patriarchs, Gn 32²⁶ (J) 17⁵ 15 35¹⁹, Nu 13¹⁶ (P); (b) two instances of the names of kings of Judah being changed (by their Babylonian) conqueror) on their accession to the throne (2 K 2334 2417); (c) instances of Hebrews resident in a foreign country taking names of that country (Gn 41^{46} , Dn 1^{6l}); (d) some instances in NT of new names given denoting some striking quality of the person in question (Mk 3^{16, 17}).

On the other hand, after the contact of the Jews with the Greeks, it became quite common for a man to adopt a Greek as well as a Jewish name; in these cases a Greek name similar in sound or significance to the Jewish was often adopted, e.g. Jakim changed his name to Alcimus (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 7; 1 Mac 7°), and Saul to Paul. Peter is the Greek name with the same signification as Cephas in Aramaic. This was one cause of the custom unknown to early times of a man being referred to by two names at the same time, e.g. Thomas Didymus, Simon Peter, John Mark. In thomas Daylins, Sinon Feet, John Mark. In other cases the second of two names may denote a man's city, e.g. Judas Iscariot (=m¬p¬r¬s; cf. Pirke Aboth, 1^{2, 4, 5} 3⁹⁶ etc.).

2. Cities.—Of the customs connected with the periods of cities we know little beyond what can naming of cities we know little beyond what can be inferred from the meaning of the names (see following art.). But we must note that certain narratives trace back the names of cities to their founders or captors (Gn 4¹⁷, Nu 32¹², Dt 3¹⁴, Jos 19⁴⁷). But these are for the most part, if not entirely, name-myths. How far it points to a custom it is difficult to feel sure, because we are ill informed as to the extent to which the place ill informed as to the extent to which the place names of the OT originated with the Hebrews. The Shemer after whom Samaria was named was probably a clan rather than an individual (Stade in ZATW, 1885, p. 165 ff.). In one instance the new name given by a king of Judah to a conquered town (2 K 147) was that of an old town of Judah. It cannot be inferred from 1 S 1228 that it was customary to name a city after its conqueror (see above, I. 2). In the Greek period, Hebrew (Semitic) names of places as well as of persons gave place to Greek names, e.g. Beth-shan became cythopolis (Jth 3¹¹; cf. Jg 1²⁷ LXX); but in this, as in so many similar instances, it is the Semitic name which has subsequently survived (mod Reice(n))

NAMES, PROPER .-- How much a name meant to the Hebrews is indicated in the article NAME. The importance attached to names makes the study of them a valuable means to appreciating the religious and social ideas of the Hebrews. An historical study of them enables us in some measure to trace the growth of ideas; a comparative study of Hebrew and other Semitic names brings to light many similarities and some dissimilarities in the Hebrews to their Semitic kinsfolk. In the present article it will be unnecessary to examine these names in any exhaustive manner; but, so far as space allows, the attempt will be made to indicate the large classes into which great numbers of names naturally fall, the degree to which the meaning of the names is ambiguous, the points of similarity and dissimilarity in Hebrew and the cognate languages, and the history of ideas and their prevalence, so far as the existing data permit these to be traced in the proper names. The meanings of particular names must be sought for under the several articles.

Proper names fall into two main divisions, according as they are names of persons or names of places. Of these the names of places are, generally speaking, much more ambiguous and difficult of interpretation. But the place names of the OT are also in all probability—once again speaking generally—more ancient than the personal names. It will be convenient, therefore, to deal with them first. It must not, however, be supposed that, in thus dividing the subject, any assumption is made that place names were always independent of personal names, or that the latter were derivative from the former. As a matter of fact, there are probably instances of both kindspersonal names that were originally names of places; place names that were originally names of persons. But certain broad differences in character between personal and place names do suggest that in the main the two classes grew independently of one another. And this is particularly true with regard to names of individual persons, if certain phenomena are rightly interpreted as pointing to the derivation both of some place names and also of some names of individual persons from clan names. But this is an obscure subject, which cannot be discussed here.

I. PLACE NAMES.—1. Obviously, the name of a place may have been long in existence before its first mention in extant records. All names of places in the Bible may therefore, except in those cases in which we have definite evidence to the contrary, have been in existence before the Israeltish conquest of the country. In other words, they may have originated with the Canaanites or other early inhabitants of the land, and not with the Israelites. In several cases we are not left to mere conjecture on this point. We have direct evidence of the pre-Israelitish existence of many names familiar to us in the OT. Thus the Tel el-Amarna tablets mention Aijann, Hazor, Jerusalem, Lachish, Megiddo, Zorah, and others; the list (15 cent. B.C.) of Tahutmes III.'s conquests includes Abel, Ain, Gath, Migdal, Mishal; and other early Egyptian lists, Beth-anath, Luz, and Secu. The significance of these lists is not exhausted by the actual number of OT place names which they record, and thus directly prove to be pre-Israelitish. For, in the first place, the mention of Jerusalem proves the biblical writers (Jg 19¹⁰, 1 Ch 11⁴², Jos 15⁸ 18¹⁶. ²⁹) ill informed in believing that name to be of Israelitish origin, and consequently lessens our confidence in their testimony relative to other names. And, secondly, some of the names actually found in these early records are typical of large classes of OT names. The consequence is, that it is only in the case of a very few names indeed that we can feel confident that they were of Israelitish origin. They must not therefore be indiscriminately used as evidence of Hebrew belief or custom. Fortunately, many of the place names refer to abiding features of the place, not to the changing customs of the inhabitants. To some of these we may turn first.

2. Many names refer to the physical features of the town or its surroundings. Ramah, the name of several places, means 'height'; Geba, Gibenh, and Gibeon mean 'hill.' Other names of similar significance are Jogbehah (\sqrt{a})= 'to be high'), Sela (= 'the cliff'), Shechem (= 'the shoulder of a hill'). A low-lying situation or the neighbourhood of some hollow seems to be referred to in Beth-emek ('house of the valley'), Horonaim ('the two hollows'), and perhaps Beten (lit. = 'the belly,' so Arabic بطر,). The nature of the soil gave rise to other names: Argob indicates a rich and earthy soil; Ekron, 'barren'; Horeb and Jabesh, 'dry'; Carmel, 'garden-land'; Abel (in several compounds), 'a meadow.' The numerous compounds with English Resulting Carpling land to the present of the compounds. with En ([7]) and Bccr ([32]) imply the presence of a spring; Hammath, Hammoth-dor, and Hammon, of hot springs. The 'white' cliffs of the range are probably commemorated by the name Lebanon; the duskiness of its waters by Kidron; the blackness of the soil by Hauran. But these and other names (Hachilah, Zalmon, Adummin, Mê-jarkon) which may refer to colour are more or less ambiguous.

3. A very considerable number of place names are names of plants, or are compounded with such names. The shrubs or trees referred to in such names are the acacia (Abel-shiftim, Beth-shiftah), the apple-tree (Beth-tappuah, En-tappuah, and Tappuah), the palm-tree (Tamar, Baal-tamar, Hazazon-tamar), the terebinth or oak (El-paran = Elath, Elah, Eloth, Elim, and Elon), the pome-granate (the Rock of Rimmon, and probably also En-rimmon, Rimmon, Rimmon perez, and Gath-rimmon), the cucumber (Dilan), the olive-tree (the rimmon), the eucumber (Duan), the onve-tree the Ascent or Mount of Olives), the vine (Abel-cheramim, Beth-haccerem, Eshcol, and probably Sorek and Masrekah), the juniper (Rithmah), the gadātree (Ezion-geber), the almond tree (Luz), the balsam-tree (valley of Baca), the sycamore-tree (Gimzo), thorn-bushes (Alad, Shamir and perhaps Seneh).

Another large group consists of names of animals, or words derived from animal names, viz. Aijalon (the stag), Lebaoth, Laish (the lion), Beth-nimrah (the stag), Lebaoth, Laish (the lion), Beth-nimrah (the leopard), Ophrah and Ephron (the gazelle), Arad (the wild-ass), Hazar-shual, the land of Shual and Shaalbim (the fox), Zeboim (the lywena), Telaim and Beth-car (the lamb), Parah (the cow), En-eglaim, Eglon (the calf), Hazar-misah (the horse), En-gedi (the kid), Beth-hoglah (the partridge), Etam (birds of prey), Ir-nahash (the serpent), Humtah (the lizard), Zorah (the hornet), Alrabbim (scorpions), Gudgodah (the cricket). The derivation of a few of these is uncertain, but in most of them it is unmistakable. It is easy to understand how trees which always occupy the same position may have given a name to a place; it is less easy to feel sure that the other places derived their names from the abundance of animals in their vicinity. In recent times several scholars have been inclined to seek the origin of these names in totem clans.

4. Characteristics of a place more liable to change; e.g. its size, the occupation or cultus of its inhabitants, have given rise to other names. In these cases we can only be sure that the place corresponded to what the name says about it when the name was given; in other words, we can only be sure, in the case of all names about the date of whose origin we are uncertain, that the name was true to the place in an indefinite past.

The various compounds with Hazar or Hazor, Ir, and Kiriath indicate the character of the city at the time when these names were given, but clearly the Hazor of Jg 4¹⁷ (cf. Amarna tablets, 154¹¹) had grown into something more than a Hazor, i.e. a fixed settlement as contrasted with the mere encampments of nomads, but also as contrasted with the walled cities. Again, the various Gaths appear to have derived their names from the existence in them of a wine-press:

Rabbah from its large, Zoar from its small size;
En-mishpat from having been a place for settling disputes.

5. But most important of the names due to characteristics liable to change are those referring to religious belief and practice. Thus several names of places preserve the names of various deities that were at some time worshipped in Canaan. Thus sun-worship has left its mark on Beth-shemesh ('temple or house of the sun'), Enshemesh ('spring of the sun'), The ascent of Heres (i.e. 'the sun'), Timnath-heres ('portion of the sun'); moon-worship, according to some, on the sun'; moon-worship, according to some, on Jericho (אַרְתַּי, אַרָּהַי, בּרָה הַיִּבְי moon') and Lebanon (אַרְבָּר, בּרָה הַיִּבְי moon'), שני הייבר בי moon'). We can trace the worship of Babylonian deities not only in the Sinaitic peninsula where Sin and Sinai record the worship of the Babylonian moon-god Sin, but also in the land of Israel and its immediate proving the state of the sta imity. Nebo, the name of a Babylonian deity, is also the name of a town (Nu 32³) and a mountain (Dt 32³⁰) of Moab, and of a town of Judah (Ezr 2²⁰); the worship of Anath, the female double of Anu, is reflected in Beth-anath, Beth-anoth, and Anathoth; the name of the Babylonian Bel is, perhaps, to be found in Ebal (Academy, June 27, 1896) and 'Aρβηλά (= Heb. אָרָקְה in Nu 3411; Academy, July 4, 1896). The name of the goddess Ashtoreth appears in Ashteroth-karnaim and Be-eshterah; of the god Dagon in Beth-dagon. An old divine name (familiar in Arabic) is perhaps to be found in Kishon and Elkosh (ZATW, 1897, p. 349).

A large number of names of places refer to the worship of a god by a general title, especially Baal or El, e.g. Baal-meon, Baal-hazor, Penuel, Jezreel. A peculiar feature of the compounds with Baal is that they are not as they stand properly names of places at all, but titles of deities ('owner of the township Meon,' 'owner of the palm-tree'). They have arisen by abbreviation, their original form having been Beth-baal-meen (which also actually occurs Jos 1317, Mesha Inscr. l. 30), Beth-baal-tamar, etc. In some cases, however, Baal was omitted and Beth retained, and thus we find Beth-meon (Jer 482). It is quite possible, therefore, that some of the numerous compounds with Beth which are not now of manifestly religious import were so originally. Names of the type Jezreel, Jahneel are probably to be translated 'Let El sow, build,' El being the genius of the place.

II. PERSONAL NAMES.—1. Personal names are either simple or compound. The latter in Hebrew generally consist of two, and only in a very few

(probably late) names of three elements. greater number of the compound personal names and in this respect these differ from place names —are sentences, i.e. they make some statement or express some wish, generally of a religious character. The simple names, many of which are very obscure, and also the compound names which are not sentences, generally refer directly or metaphorically to some personal feature or circumstance attending the birth. Some apparently simple names appear to have arisen by abbreviation from compound names, e.g. Nathan (from Elnathan or Nathanel), Shama (='he heard,' from Elishama = 'God heard'). The explanations of names found in the OT (a.g. Ch. 222 425 EM 1201 2020 Years Committed on the Committed of the committed of the 'God heard'). The explanations of names found in the OT (e.g. Gn 3²⁰ 4²⁰ 5²⁰ 16¹¹ 32²⁰, Jg 6²⁰, 18 1²⁰, 1 Ch 4²) do not generally coincide with their true etymological meaning, but arise from some similarity of sound to a word that gave what appeared subsequently a suitable significance to a man's name. Thus Noah (12) cannot be derived from the root beginning with a similar sound which is used in the explanation of it (upp; Gn 529). The value of these narratives lies chiefly in the evidence they afford as to the kind of idea which names were generally selected to express. Thus the explanation of Esnu (Gn 25^{23}) indicates that the personal features of the hill of Land (Gn 25^{13}) indicates that the personal features of the child, of Jacob (Gn 25.6) that the circumstances of the birth, of Ichabod (1 S 421) that the state of public affairs at the time of the birth, might suggest the choice of a child's name.

2. In classifying the personal names into their chief groups, it will be convenient to follow as far as possible at the same time a chronological order. As we have seen, simple Israelitish names are comparatively more frequent in earlier than in later times. Their origin, too, for the most part goes back to the early period. Most of the apparently simple names that can be first traced in later periods are really abbreviated compound names.

Jg 29-16, six or eight only are compound, the rest are simple. Several, though apparently personal, were perhaps really clan names. In 2 S 9-20 (time of David) the compounds number 22, the simple names 23. On the other hand, among the names of Jeremiah's contemporaries (3-4 centuries later than David) the compound are several times as numerous as the simple names. Among the simple names of the time of the Judges and David we find the following:—(a) Several names of animals—Deborah ('bee'), Gaal (probably 'beetle'), Tola ('worm'), Caleb ('dog'), Nahash ('serpent'). Names of this class very rarely appear in the later periods, except that at the time of Josiah we find four (Huldah = 'the weasel,' Achbor = 'the mouse,' and Shaphan (2 persons) = 'the rock badger'); all of these are names of unclean animals, and may be due to a recrudescence of ancient superstitious practices of which we certainly find traces somewhat later; cf. Is 66¹⁷ (sacrificial eating of the mouse). In any case strictly personal names of this class are not numerous as compared with the clan and place names, and some of them may be indirectly derivative from a totem stage of society. Otherwise we may explain these personal names as the attempt to express metaphorically some characteristic of the child, or the hope that as it grew up it would possess the characteristic of the child, or the hope that as it grew up it would without much difficulty account for Deborah ('bee'), Zibiah ('gazelle,' cf. the comparison Ca 29 4⁵), but not very obviously for some others. For names of this type among other Semitic peoples, cf. (for the Arabs) Hammer-Purgstall, Ueber die Namen der Araber, pp. 3, 4.

(b) Names of trees.—Tamar ('the palm-tree'),

(b) Names of trees.—Tamar ('the palm-tree'), the name of two women; cf. the comparison in Ca 7ⁿ. Similar comparisons are to be found in Arabic poetry. Elah (2 K 15³⁰, 1 K 1⁶) and Elon ('the terebinth or oak-tree'), Hadassah (Est 27 'the myrtle'), Keziah ('cassia'), and perhaps Solomon (cf. Wellh. Is. u. jüd. Gesch. 2 p. 103, n. 1) are other instances. For Arabic instances, cf. Hammer-Purgstall, op. cit. p. 3.

(c) Other early simple names are Barak ('lightning'), Lappidoth ('torches'), Samson (derived from shemesh = 'sun'), Zadok ('just'), Barzillai

B. CONPOUND NAMES.—The most numerous of these in OT are the compounds with Yah (= Yahweh); but they are not the earliest. The earliest are compounds with 'ab(i) ('father'), 'ah(i) ('brother'), 'anm(i) ('kinsman'), 'El(i) ('god'). Of these classes compounds with 'ab, 'ah, and 'amm (='kinsman') are not only early, but they seem to have ceased to be formed soon after the time of David, and fell wholly into disuse before the close of the Exile. On the other hand, compounds with 'El, though found in the earliest periods of which we have records, for long furnished fresh formations, and were in frequent use after the Exile. Each of these classes requires some separate discussion.

(a) Compounds with ab, ah, and amm.—Interpretations of particular instances must be sought under the several articles. All that need be attempted here is to indicate the different views that have been held as to the relation of the two elements in the compounds, and as to the more precise significance of the term of kinship. In a name like Abinadab, are the two elements related to one another as construct and genitive, or as subject and predicate? In the former case, is the second element the name of the actual son of the person named, or of a quality, so that the whole name is equal to an adjective? In the latter case, is the i of 'abi (: of 'ze) a binding vowel, or the lst personal suffix? In other words, does Abinadab mean 'father of Nadab,' or 'father of generosity' fis. (generous'), or 'the father is generous,' or 'my father is generous'? Every possible answer has been given by one or another at one time or another. Against the view that the relation between the two elements is that of construct and genitive, the following objection among others may be urged— (1) 'ab, 'ab, 'amm all denote a male kinsman, but the names compounded with them are used indifferently of men and women; examples of such names of women—Abigal, Abital, Abishag; (2) in some cases the elements appear in reverse order, e.g. Ahijah and Joah, Eliab and Abiel. There is little doubt that the relation is predicative; the names are sentences. It is a much more nicely balanced question to decide whether the i in 'abi, ahi, ammi be the binding vowel or the personal suffix; but in the judgment of the present writer the evidence inclines in favour of the former alternative.

A further ambiguity attaches to the names compounded with 'amm. That element has often been rendered 'people.' But the parallelism of several of these names with the compounds with 'ab, 'ah (e.g. Ammiel, Abiel, Hiel), which is even more prominent in Sabæan proper names, the certainty that 'amm had the sense of 'kinsman' in Semitic, and survivals of this meaning in Hebrew, have led most modern investigators to the conclusion that in several compounds (e.g. Ammiel, Elium, Amminadab) 'amm means kinsman. Yet a third view is that 'Amm is the proper name of a deity (cf. e.g. Sayce, RP, 2nd series, ii. 123f.).

In the case of all these names there has been some difference of opinion as to whether the term of kinship refers to the human kinsman (father, brother, uncle), or whether it is a divine title. Opinion prevails in favour of the second alternative. It seems not unlikely that names of this very early type, which are widely distributed over the Semitic field, originated in totemistic conceptions. It is remarkable that they disappear in the course of Hebrew history, though they continued in use to a late period among, e.g., the

(b) Before dealing with compounds with 'El, we may briefly refer to a class of names which appear to have been adopted for a time by the Hebrews from the Canaanites among whom they settled, but to have been again almost entirely discarded soon after the time of David. These are the compounds with Adon (Adoni-bezek, Adoni-zed-k, Adonijah, Tob-adonijah, and Adonikam); Baal, which has sometimes been mutilated by the scribes into Bosheth = 'shame' (e.g. Meribbaal, Eshbaal); Melech (e.g. Abimelech, Elimelech, Malchiah). The main question in the case of these names is whether Baal, Melech, Adon are titles applicable to any gods, and therefore to J", or proper names of distinct detties. The question is of considerable historical importance; for if it be answered in the latter sense, the names are evidence that Saul and David and Jonathan were worshippers of and David and Jonathan were worshippers of other gods beside J"; since each of these princes gave names of this class to their children (see Ishbosheth, Beeliada, Mephibosheth). This view was vigorously maintained by Kuenen, and has recently been revived by Hommel and Kerber; but the trend of scholarly judgment has been against it, and, in the opinion of the present with justice. At the same time there can writer, with justice. At the same time there can be little question that the ultimate entire disappearance of the Baal names and almost entire disuse of the compounds with Melech was due to the idolatrous significance which became attached to these words (cf. Hos 2¹⁶ [Heb. ¹⁸]).

(c) Compounds with El.—These names have been found in almost every Semitic language and dialect. They reach back to a remote antiquity; they continue in use to the latest period. It is possible that they were first used as place and clan names; but some of our earliest names of Hebrew individuals are of this type (e.g. Eliah, Nu 16^{1b} (J), Elkanah, 1 S 1¹). In the case of these and the compounds with Yah, it is important to observe certain differences in the formation of the observe certain differences in the formation of the Thus, in the earliest times, compounds in which the divine name is the first element exceed in numbers those in which it forms the second element; this gradually changes until, from the times of Jeremiah onwards, the names in which the divine name forms the second element are many times as numerous as those in which it forms the first. We might perhaps attribute this change, which has the effect of removing the emphasis from the subject to the predicate, to the growth of the monotheistic idea—it being no longer necessary to emphasize what god was referred to when only one was believed in—and the desire to emphasize the activity or quality of God referred to by the predicate. At the same time it must be borne in mind that a similar tendency is (according to Hommel) to be traced in the names of the Sabæans and Babylonians who remained polytheists. In the history of the compounds with 'El, it is to be remarked that at first they outnumbered the compounds with Yah, that from the time of David to the Exile they were quite eclipsed by the compounds of Yah, but that after the Exile they regain much in popularity, especially in certain circles [cf. the priestly list in Ezr 10¹⁸⁻²²; the list of angels in Enoch, ch. 6 (Greek text, ed. Charles, p. 64): the list of princes in Nu 1⁵⁻¹⁶ (P), in which several of the individual names are ancient, but which, as a list, is a late artificial compilation].

(d) Compounds with Yah before the time of David are very few, and are confined to families !

more or less closely connected with the worship In the time of David they grow frequent, and thenceforward never lose their popularity, but gradually drive out almost all other compounds save those compounded with El, so that in the post-exilic period, and indeed as early as Jeremiah, Hebrew names consisted for the most part of (1) compounds with the divine proper name J", or (2) the divine title 'El, which had now lecome a virtual equivalent for J", since J" was regarded as the only true God, or (3) truncated names—verbs where the implicit explicit was God. verbs where the implicit subject was God. Special features of interest in names of this class are their rare occurrence among names of women, their almost invariable use for heirs to the throne, whether of Judah or Israel, their rare use as place names (Ananiah and Jeshua being almost the only instances). - An important question connected with the class is whether the names were peculiar to Israel. We find one or two foreigners with names of this type mentioned in OT. But Uriah th: Hittite may have adopted this name on taking up his residence among the Hebrews; Tobiah the Ammonite lived at a time when the worship of J" may have passed from Israel to some of the neighbouring peoples (cf. the case of the Samaritans). The decision really rests with the Assyriologists, who are not as yet agreed whether the -ia at the end of a great number of Assyrian proper names be a divine name or not.

It remains to add that many of the individual names can be paralleled in several other languages, especially those which refer to the gift of J'' or God (El); the thought that the god worshipped has given (viz. the child) is expressed in many Hebrew names, e.g. Elnathan, Nethanel, Jona-than, Nethaniah, Jehozabad, Zebadiah; and also in many names of other peoples, e.g. in the Phænician Eshmuniathan ('Eshmun has given'). the Assyrian Assur-ah-iddina ('Asshur has given a brother'), the Sabean Wahabailu ('God has given'), and the Palmyrene Zabadnebo ('Nebo has bestowed'). Nor is this parallelism contined nas bestowed). Nor is this parametrism comment to names so early in use as some of the Hebrew names just cited. Corresponding, for instance, to Bezalel (perhaps='in the shadow of God') we have the Assyrian Ina-silli-Bel ('in Bel's shadow'). But however great this similarity between the class of ideas expressed by the later Jewish names and by other Semitic names may be,—and it is certainly great,—they differ in this very important respect, that the Jewish names refer to one God only, viz. J", and that by means of the proper name J" or the one general term El only.

Much that has been said on the relative prevalence, at different periods, of different types of names, depends on the conclusion established by the present writer elsewhere, viz. that lists of names in P and Chronicles cannot, unless they are independently supported, be cited as evidence of early custom. Hommel's Ancient Hebrew Tradition has in no way affected this conclusion, except in so far as it has by certain analogies confirmed it; for it has not addressed itself to the data on which the conclusion rests. To the character of the individual names in these writings it is impossible to refer at length. But the names recorded only by P contain two classes of which no instance is found elsewhere in OT, viz. compounds with the divine name Shaddai and compounds with Tur ('Rock'), which appears to be a divine title. Hommel has discovered analogous names (e.g. Suri-addana, cf. Jchoaddan) to the latter class in some South Arabian names of the 8th cent. B.C. or somewhat earlier. The compounds with Shaddai (Ammishaddai, Zurishaddai, Shedcur) still remain absolutely private. absolutely unique. It is a pure hypothesis of Hommel's that an Assyrian name which has been transliterated Ammisatana, but by others (e.g. Sayce in PSBA, Nov. 1897, p. 292) Ammiditana, has anything to do with Ammishaddai.

NANEA (Navala, 2 Mac. 113-15).—A goddess wor-

NANÆA (Navala, 2 Mac 113. 15).—A goddess worshipped in Syria, Persia, Armenia, and other parts of Asia. Various forms of the name occur, such as Annitis (Strabo, xv. 733), Anaaa (ib. xvi. 738), Anais (Clem. Alex. Protr.pt. p. 19). By the Greeks this goddess was identified sometimes with Artemis (so Plut. l.c.; Paus. iii. 16. 8), sometimes with Aphrodite (so Clem. Alex. l.c.). She seems to have represented the productive powers of nature, and in many places leριδουλα of both sexes were consecrated to her worship. In 2 Mac 190-17 we have a legendary account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is said to have attempted to plunder a temple of Nanæa in Persia, and to have been treacherously killed in the temple by the priests. This temple may be identified with the temple of Artemis (Polyb. xxxi. 2; Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 1), or Aphrodite (Appian. Syr. 66), in the province of Elymais, upon which Antiochus made an unsuccessful attack; but the statement that the king met his death here is certainly untrue (see also I Mac 61-4). The plea alleged to have been made by Antiochus, that he wished to marry the goddess Nanœa, may be illustrated by the conduct of M. Antonius at Athens (cf. Rawlinson, Speaker's Comm. ad loc.).

NAOMI (τρη; LXX B Νωεμείν, A Νοεμμείν) and Νοομμεί(ν). Luc. Νοομί).—The wife of Elimelech the Ephrathite, of Beth-lehem-judah, who was driven by famine into the land of Moab. There her husband died, and she was left with her two sons, who married two Moabite women. On the death of her sons, she determined to return to her own country, the land of Judah. On the way she bade her daughters-in-law go back, each to her mother's house, while she expressed a hope that they might each find another husband. Orpah followed her mother-in-law's advice, but Ruth in loving terms declared that she would not be separated from Naomi. The return of Naomi was a matter of surprise to the people of Bethlehem, and they said, 'Is this Naomi?' Her answer included a double play of words on her own name, 'Call me not Naomi ('pleasant'), call me Mara ('bitter'): for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me . . . why call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified ('ānāh) against me' (Ru 1²⁻²¹). For the rest of her history, and how she became the nurse of Ruth's child by Boaz, see under RUTH.

NAPHISH (ψτρ). — A son of Ishmael, Gn 25¹⁵ (A Ναφές, D Ναφέθ)=1 Ch 1³¹ (BA Ναφές) 5¹⁹ (B Ναφεσαδαίοι, A Ναφσαδαίοι). The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been traced. In the last cited passage (1 Ch 5¹⁹) we are told that along with others of the Hagrites this clan suffered an overwhelming defeat at the hands of the transJordanic tribes (possibly in the time of Saul). In all probability it is their descendants who are mentioned amongst the Nethinim in Ezr 2⁵⁰ as 'the children of Nephisim' (RV, following Kethibh τρτρ; β Ναφεισών, Α Νεφουσείμ) or Nephusim (AV and RVm, following Kere τρτρ; β). In the parallel passage (Neh 7⁵²) the reading is Nephushesim (RV, following Kethibh τρτρ; β Νεφωσασεί, Α -είμ) or Nephishesim (AV and RVm, following Kere τρτρ; γ). The reading in 1 Es 5³¹ is Naphisi (Β Ναφεισεί, Α Ναφισί). See, further, Wellhausen-Bleek ⁵, p. 585.

NAPHTALI (ἐμετ, Νεφθαλείμ) was the fifth son of Jacob, and the second borne to him by Rachel's handmaid Bilhah, Gn 30π. He was thus full brother to Dan, with whose descendants his were afterwards closely associated.

The information regarding Naphtali given in Scrip. is extremely scanty, and it is not greatly augmented by tradition. Targg. Pseudo-Jon. and Jerus. say that he was swift of foot, and that he was the first to tell Jacob that Joseph was alive. This may be due, however, to a certain understanding of Gn 49²¹. When the family went down into Egypt he had four sons (Gn 46²⁴). The Targg. above cited say that he was one of the five whom Joseph presented to Pharaoh (Gn 47²). According to 'The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarche,' he died in his 132nd year. Like all his brethren except Joseph, he found sepulture in the land of Egypt.

died in his 132nd year. Like all his brethren except Joseph, he found sepulture in the land of Egypt. According to the figures given in Nu 1⁴² 2⁵⁰, when the people were numbered in the wilderness of Sinai, the tribe of Naphtali occupied the sixth place with 53,400 men over 20 years old, 'able to go forth to war.' Before entering Canaan Naphtali had fallen to the eighth place with 45,400 (Nu 26⁴⁵⁻⁵⁰). The position of Naphtali in the march through the desert was with Dan and Asher, on the north side of the tent of meeting (Nu 2²⁹). These three together formed the 'camp of Dan,' numbering in all 157,600 fighting men.

When the host moved forward, they acted as rearguard, setting forth 'hindmost by their standards'

With the probable exception of Barak, Naphtali added no distinguished name to Israel's historic roll. The prince and representative of the tribe in the wilderness of Sinai was Ahira' ben Enan (Nu 1¹³ 2²⁸). He having perished in the desert, the prince chosen to represent Naphtali in the division of the land was Pedahel ben 'Ammihud (Nu 34²⁸). The Naphtalite Nahbi ben Vophsi went with the spies from the wilderness of Paran (Nu 13¹⁴). At the close of David's reign, Jeremoth ben 'Azriel was over the tribe (1 Ch 27¹⁹). The mother of Hiram, the cunning artificer in brass, whom Solomon brought from Tyre, is claimed for Naphtali in 1 K 7¹⁴, but in 2 Ch 2¹⁴ is given to Dan. That Barak belonged to Naphtali has been questioned on the ground that Jg 5¹⁵ seems to associate him with Issachar; but, owing to the confusion of the text (Moore, Judges, in loc.), this point is extremely doubtful, and it is natural to infer, from his residence in Kedesh (Jg 4⁴) and his influence with the mountain tribes (Jg 4¹⁰), that he was connected with Naphtali.

Naphtali was the last but one to receive his portion in the land of promise (Jos 19³²⁻³⁹). This involved no disadvantage; the district that fell to him included some of the finest land in Palestine, rich and beautifully diversified. On the east it was bounded by the Sea of Galilee and the Upper Jordan. Josephus (Ant. v. i. 20) says it reached east-ward to Damascus. This is improbable, and lacks corroboration. The northern border coincided with that of Israel's possession; while west, south-west, and south, Naphtali marched with Asher, Zebulun, and Issachar. These marches cannot be traced with certainty; but recent identifications of ancient sites, due chiefly to Col. Conder, make possible an approximation (see names of cities in Naphtali). Beginning at the confluence of Wady el-Birch with the Jordan, the line might run westward, following the northern side of the valley, including Adami the northern side of the valley, including Adami (ed-Damieh, about 10 miles north of Beisân), to Tabor, the lower slopes of which are probably indicated by Aznoth-Tabor, 'the ears of Tabor.' It would then run northward by way of Ziddim (Hattin) and Hukkok (Yakûk) to Hannathon (Kefr Andn); thence turning westward, taking in the lands of Ramah (er-Râmeh), until it touched the border of Asher whence runing northward to the border of Asher, whence, running northward to almost opposite Tyre, it turned eastward, and again northward, dividing with Asher the districts now known as Belâd Beshârah and Belâd esh-shukif, the larger portion of which fell to Naphtali. These boundaries include the land lying around the springs of Jordan. This, however, soon passed to Dan (Jos 1947) by means of the raid described in Jg 18, which Naphtali does not seem to have either resisted or resented, possibly because of the close kinship of the tribes. Laish, held by its Phænician inhabitants until attacked by Dan, and Hazor, which is subsequently found in the hands of Jabin, must be added to Beth-shemesh (not yet identified) and Beth-Anath ('Ainitha, 6 miles W.N.W. of Kedes), as cities out of which Naphtali did not drive the Canaanites. Kedesh in Galilee (Jos 207; see KEDESH NAPHTALI) was set apart as a city of refuge, and this city, along with Hammoth-dor and Kartan, with their suburbs, was given to the Levite family of Gershon (Jos 21st, 1 Ch 67s).

The lofty region to the north-west of the Sea of Galilee formed by far the larger part of the territory of Naphtali. It is in every sense a pleasant land—a country of healthful air and noble scenery. It is plentifully watered, and, compared with the rest of l'alestine, well wooded. Olive and lemon trees are specially abundant, while the fig, the mulberry, and the apricot are general. The vine is cultivated on many a sunny slope, and wide reaches of plough-land in the valleys yield fine crops of wheat and barley. The villages which dot the landscape give evidence of all the comfort and prosperity possible under the present government. Jebel Jermuk, cut off from the Safed hills by the tremendous gorge of Wady Leimun, is the highest mountain in Western Palestine, reaching a height of nearly 4000 ft. To Naphtali also belonged the plain of Ijon, now Merj A'yūn, in the valley west of Hermon, and the upper valley of the Jordan, from the springs to the Sea of Galilee, both containing much excellent arable and pasture land. As if this were not enough for one whom the Lord blessed with such goodwill (Driver, Deut. p. 413), to Naphtali were assigned the broad fertile terraces by which the land lets itself down from Tabor to the Sea of Galilee, the fruitful level stretches before Hattin, and the Plain of Company to the sea of the and the Plain of Gennesaret, a tract of unequalled richness and luxuriance on the north-west shore of the lake. To this, doubtless, allusion is made in Dt 33", where c should be rendered 'sea,' not 'west,' and is certainly the Sea of Galilee. The region has always been famous for its productiveness, 'inso-much that it invites the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation' (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). It was one of the districts from which Solomon drew provisions, presided over for this purpose by the king's son in-law Ahimaaz (1 K 415). 'To the inhabitants of such a land the more luxuriant vegetation of the hot lands on either side spread its temptations in vain . . . It is luxury where luxury cannot soften. On these broad heights, open to the sunshine and the breeze, life is free and exhilarating.

"Naphtali is a hind let loose."

This beautiful figure (Gn 49°1) fully expresses the feelings which are bred by the health, the spaciousness, the high freedom, and glorious outlook of Upper Galilee' (HGHL¹ 420). The reading, 'Naphtalı is a stretched out, i.e. slender, terebinth,' adopted by Ewald (Hist. of Israel, tr. ii. 291), Dillmann (Genesis, ii. 472), and others in preference to MT, is rejected by Delitzsch (Genesis in loc.), with apparently good reason. The figure of a slender tree seems to suit neither the territory nor its inhabitants. The latter appear to have been frou the first a robust and numerous people; while neither in shape, nor in the character of its products, is the land at all open to such a description (HGHL¹ 420, note). Delitzsch further points out that thy, in the meaning of stretched, slender, is uncorroborated and linguistically improbable. MT is supported by the Targg. and Sam., and is altogether appropriate to people nurtured amid the freedom of the mountains. 'He who giveth goodly words' seems to mark out Naphtali as possessing, in special measure, the gift of eloquence. Of this, however, there is no extant evidence.

His position as a border tribe exposed Naphtali to constant peril from marauding bands, and inroads of hostile neighbours. In conflict with those who sought the spoils of his fair territory, no doubt, was developed that alert, eager, fearless, warlike spirit, which shone so conspicuously under the leadership of Barak and Deborah (Jg 5¹⁸), and which made the men of these uplands so formidable in later days. A thousand captains and a contingent of 37,000 men 'with shield and spear' were sent to David at Hebron (1 Ch 12²⁴). In Tiglath-pileser's first raid against Pekah, Naphtali fell into the hands of Assyria, and the people were taken into captivity (2 K 15²⁹; cf. 1 Ch 5²⁸, Is 9¹). The heroic zeal and bravery of the inhabitants of this region in the war of independence was worthy of the greatest traditions of the past (see GALILEE). Josephus, whose knowledge was intimate, testifies that they were 'inured to war from their infancy,' 'nor hath the country ever been destitute of men of courage' (BJ III. iii. 2). Much of our Lord's ministry was fulfilled within the borders of Naphtali; and of those chosen to be His courpanions and witnesses, the chief were natives of this soil.

There are but two towns of any consequence in the territory of Naphtali to-day, both 'holy cities' of the Jews: Tilerias, on the western shore of the Sea of Galilec, with about 5000 inhabitants, where the tombs of Maimonides, Rabbi Akiba, and other great ones are shown, the ruins of the ancient city stretching 2 miles to the south; and Safed, with over 20,000 inhabitants, crowning the mountain north of the sea, dominated by the 'castle hill.' The castle itself, dating from Crusading times, was finally wrecked in the earthquake of 1837, which wrought such havoe both in Safed and in Tiberias. At Meirin, a few miles north-west of Safed, are the ruins of an ancient synagogue, and the tombs of Hillel and Simeon Bar Yochai. This is a popular Jewish place of pilgrimage. Of the villages representing ancient cities, er-Rameh is perhaps the most prosperous; and on the ridge north of er-Rameh stands the hamlet of el-Bukra, the highest place of human habitation in Palestine, whose Jewish inhabitants claim to have held it in unbroken possession since Joshua's conquest.

broken possession since Joshua's conquest.

Naphtali, Mount ('אַפָּרָן אָרָ, ἐν τῷ ὁρει τῷ Νεφθαλεί, Jos 20') was the northmost of the parts into which the central range of Western Palestine was divided, named after the tribes that mainly occupied them—Mount Judah, Mount Ephraim, and Mount Naphtali. It is a mistake in either case to translate 'hill-country' (see, however, Driver in art. HILL-COUNTRY). The rendering 'mount' or 'mountain' is in accordance with immemorial usage in these lands. The modern Jebel Safed corresponds generally with the ancient Har Naphtali, and Jebel Nablus with Har Ephraim: the name in each case is taken from the seat of government in the district. No one thinks of translating Jebel Libnûn (Mount Lebanon) by 'the hill-country of Lebanon,' although the scenery there is as diversified as in any district in the southern range.

MAPHTUHIM (crust, Neφθαλ(ι)είμ, Nephtuim, Nephthuim) is given in Gn 10¹³ and 1 Ch 1¹¹ as the fourth 'son' of Mizraim. Nothing definite is known of a place or people bearing this name. One view, as old as Targ. Jon., transposes the first two consonants, reads Pentaschænum, identifies with Néφθυs, and puts the situation N.E. of Egypt. An attempt to find an Egyptian etymology takes na as the plural article and Ptah as the god's name, thus yielding naptah, with a meaning 'they of Ptah,' an appropriate name for the district about Memphis, the centre of the Ptah cult. This name, however, does not seem to have been in actual use, in native documents, to denote a place or people. The Ethiopian capital, Napata, mentioned by Ptolemy (iv. 7, 19) is a tempting parallel, but would be more likely to be assigned to Cush. The certainty of Pathrusim being the Egyptian peters or 'southern land' led Erman to suggest a corruption from creeks for petemhi 'northern land.' If we are to admit corruptions, we may compare the Assyrian form Nathu, given in Assurbanipal's Annals (Col. i. 94, 99), as a district, probably in Lower Egypt. This seems to represent the Egyptian n-idhu, 'the marshes,' and is used in opposition to Patrusi. Herodotus (ii. 165) gives this name as Na $\theta\hat{\omega}$, and indicates that there were two such districts. The disappearance of p may be compensated by the change from t to t in the Assyrian spelling. NAPKIN is the EV tra in Lk 1920, Jn 1144 207 (in Ac 1912 [the only other occurrence of the Gr. word] 'handkerchief') of σουδάριον, which is really a Lat. word sudarium * (from sudor, 'sweat'). The name refers to the use of this article to wipe off perspiration from the hands and face (cf. Quintil. vi. 3). In Lk 19²⁰ the man who had received the one pound, wrapped his lord's money in a sudarium, which may here mean either a species of head-dress like the Arab. kûfiyeh, or a towel or the like (the reader will recall instances in the Arabian Nights Tales of the wrapping up of money in a linen cloth and then concealing it, and also of the carrying of it in the folds of one's turban). The same uncertainty attaches to the meaning of the handker-chiefs (σουδάρια) which are said to have been brought in contact with the person of St. Paul and then used for the healing of the sick, Ac 1912. The face of the dead was bound up with a napkin, Jn 114 (Lazarus) 207 (Jesus). See, also, art. Dress in vol. i. p. 627^b. J. A. Selbie. in vol. i. p. 627^b.

NARCISSUS (Naprissos).—In Ro 1611 St. Paul salutes, among other Roman Christians, those 'of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord.' The name was common, especially among slaves and freedmen; cf. CIL vi. 4123 (in the household of Livia), 4346, 5206 HELICONIS NARCISSI AVGVS-TIANI: 22875 NARCISSVS · AVG · LIB.; but it is best known as that of the notorious freedman of Claudius, who had been put to death by Agrippina shortly after the accession of Nero, some three or four years before this letter was written (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1; Dio Cass. lx. 34). It was an obvious suggestion that the reference was to members of his household, but the fact that he was already dead when the letter was written seemed to make this impossible. Bishop Lightfoot has, however, suggested that the identification is still possible. When Narcissus was put to death, his property would be confiscated and become the property of the emperor, and his slaves would swell the imperial household, but be distinguished as the Narcissiani. We find servants of Livia called Macenatiani, as having come from the household of Macenas (CIL vi. 4016, 4032); we find also Amyntiani (4035; cf. 8738), Agrippiani, Germaniciani. The same explanation is given for the household of ARISTOBULUS (wh. see). The form Narcissianus occurs, but apparently not necessarily with this meaning, Murat. p. 1150, 4:TI · CLAVDIO · SP · F · NARCISSIANO. The following inscription is later, CIL vi.: D.M | T. FLAVIVS · AVG. LIB | NARCISSVS · FECIT · · · , and lower down : T. FLAVIVS AVG · LIB · FIRMVS · NARCISSIANVS · · · REFECIT. It may be possible to work this point out more completely when vol. vi. of the Berlin Corpus of Inscriptions is finished. An inscription quoted by Plumptre (Biblical Studies, p. 428) is of doubtful genuineness. The later traditions about Narcissus are quite valueless. He is made by Pseudo-Hippolytus (de LXX Apostolis, p. 955, ed. Migne), bishop of Athens, and is commemorated on Oct. 31.

NASBAS (B Naσβâs) occurs only in To 1118 'And Achischarus and Nasbas his brother's son came,' namely, to the wedding of Tobias the son of Tobit. The AV gives in the margin the suggestion of Junius: 'Achischarus, who is also called Nasbas' (i.e. 'Αχιαχαρ δε και Ν. for 'Αχιάχαρος και Ν.). The MSS and Versions offer the following variants (cf. Ball, Variorum Apoctypha): κ' A. and Nabad his cousins' (but a second hand corrected o ἐξάδελφοι into the singular); cursives 'A. and Nabas his cousins'; Itala 'A. and Nabal his maternal uncle' (Cod. Sangerm. 15: 'Achiacar in Navis soceri illius'); Syr. 'A. and Laban, his sister's son' (125 omitted in the Thes. Syr. col. 1886); Vulg. 'Achior and Nabath the cousins of Tobias.'

The question whose brother's or sister's son Nasbas was, whether of Tobit (so Vulgate and others) or of Achiacharus, which could not be settled by the data in the Book of Tobit, is now decided in favour of the latter view through the newly published Story of Ahikar and his Nephew. For there can be no doubt as to the identity of these personages; and it is now also certain that we must find the same person (Nasbas) in the Aman of the received text of To 14¹⁰ (see art. Aman in vol. i. p. 79 and correct there, that the Syriac spells 'Akab' [23v] not 'Ahab'); cf. further, Ball, Variorum Apocrypha, where the Sinaitic Text (ἐν τῷ ποῆραί με ἐλεημοσύνην) must be translated: 'because he gave me alms,' not 'because I did alms.'

The original form of the name is most probably Nadab, though it is not easy to say on palæographical or other grounds how all the variants could arise, especially the received form Nasbas. See J. R. Harris in the Introduction to The Story of Ahikar (London, 1898, pp. xxix, xlv).

NATHAN (p) '(whom God) gave'; Na$\(\text{A}\ell\).—1. Successor of Samuel in the line of prophet statesmen (Sir 47\). When first introduced into the history (2 S 7\)-\(\text{1}\), 1 Ch 17\(\text{1}\)-\(\text{15}\) he is already David's chief spiritual adviser (cf. 1 K 1\)\(\text{2}\) Ker\(\text{2}\). The incident is a remarkable one, whether we regard it as indicative of the prophetic as contrasted with the priestly policy in religious affairs (Ewald, $HI$ iii. 131), or as marking an epoch in the development of the Messianic ideal. The transfer of the seat of government from Hebron to Jerusalem was the first step towards the unification of the kingdom. It only remained to centralize the religious system as well, and so render Israel completely homogeneous. The building, therefore, of the temple at Jerusalem was something more than an expression of fervent piety; it was a stroke of far-reaching policy. At first, indeed, it was not altogether successful; but after the fall of the Northern Kingdom the temple became so inextricably associated with the religion of the Hebrews as to involve in its own ruin the system which it was designed to consolidate and preserve. The prophet historian represents Nathan's purely human impulse as favourable to the project. That very night, however, a Divine revelation warned him that the time was not yet ripe for this innovation, and bade him communicate to the king a consolatory promise, which is one of the most important Messianic prophecies in the whole OT. The conception of the Son of David, whose kingdom should have no end, struck the imagination of every subsequent Messianic prophet, and is the nost prominent

The significant variafeature in NT retrospect. tions of the Chronicles in this speech need not here be indicated. But Nathan fulfilled the prophet's truest function in that scene in which his idyllic parable awoke the conscience of his friend and master (2 S 12¹⁻¹⁸, Ps 51 title). As we read the words of restrained emotion in which Nathan lays bare the meanness and seltishness of David's sin, we feel that their effect must have been, in great measure, due to the peculiarly intimate relations of the king and the prophet. Doubtless it was a consolation to Nathan to be commissioned subsequently (2 S 1225) to bestow on the first child of the now forgiven union his name 'in religion,'
'Jedidiah, after the meaning of Jah' (Ewald, HI
iii. 168). The infant thus favoured was afterwards to owe his crown to the prophet's astuteness and promptitude. It was Nathan that first detected the plot of Adonijah, and suggested and carried through the plan of action by which it was baffled, and he took a leading part in the joyous coronation ceremony that followed (1 K 1). One is toom ted to expense that the for-seeing and enlight. tempted to suggest that the far-seeing and enlightened statesmanship which marked the early years of Solomon's reign was a result of the teaching of Nathan. It is significant that his son Zabud was selected by Solomon as a special priest and 'king's friend' (1 K.4°). The Chronicler ascribes to Nathan histories of David (1 Ch 29²⁰) and of Solomon (2 Ch 929). It remains to add that Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 S 17¹², 2 S 21²¹, 1 Ch 20⁷ 27²⁸) identifies Nathan with David's nephew Jonathan. He says that he is called Nathan as a prophet, but Jonathan as a warrior, and that when called by the former name his father is not mentioned, since he was not

2. Son of David, born at Jerusalem (2 S 5¹⁴, 1 Ch 14⁴). According to 1 Ch 3⁶ he was third son of Bathshua (Bathsheba), Solomon being fourth. But we should naturally infer from 2 S 12²⁶ that Solomon was the first son of Bathsheba's that lived for any time. The princely family of Nathan is mentioned in Zec 12¹⁸ as a specific division of the house of David. St. Luke (3²¹) traces the descent of our Lord from David through Nathan rather than through Solomon, as is done by St. Matthew.

3. Father of Igal (2 S 23²⁶), or brother of Joel (1 Ch 11²⁶), who was one of David's heroes. The text of Chronicles is preferred by Rawlinson, but seems a corruption of that of Samuel.

4. A Judahite (1 Ch 2²⁶). 5. One of the deputation sent by Erra to request Iddo to provide Levites, etc., for the temple (Ezr 8¹⁶, 1 Es 8²⁴).

6. One of those who had taken strange wives (Ezr 10²⁶), called in 1 Es 9²⁴

Nathanias.

NATHANABL (Ναθαναήλ, equivalent to μης ['God has given'; cf. the names Dorotheus, Dositheus, Theodore], Nethunel [which see], Nu 18 etc.).—A man of Cana of Galilee (Jn 212), whom Philip, after having himself been called by Christ, induced to come into the Master's presence (Jn 145π.). Our Lord describes him as 'an Israelite indeed,' i.e. one who valued the spiritual privileges, and sought to realize the ideal life of an Israelite; and as a man 'in whom there is no guile,' i.e. not sinless, but sincere and candid, open-minded, and single-hearted, one who was free from the guile of Jacob before he attained to the nobility of Israel. Nathanael showed his candour (1) by not allowing himself to be deterred from coming to see Jesus through his natural reluctance * to accept Nazareth, an insignificant townlet, mentioned by no prophet, as the place whence the expected Messiah would come forth; (2) by at once surrendering his prejudice when adequate evidence of Christ's supernatural power was received. His eventual faith in the Messiahship of Jesus could hardly have been due to the mere fact that Christ, unseen by Nathanael, had beheld him under the fig-tree, even assuming that he was seen there engaged in devotion or religious meditation. Christ alludes, doubtless, to some recent crisis or special incident in Nathanael's spiritual experience which had taken place while he sat under the fig-tree—an awakening, perhaps, to a higher ideal of life and duty, or a successful struggle with some strong temptation, or a devout longing for the coming of Messiah and His kingdom. He who had then not only seen, but seen into him, must be 'He that should come,' the Son of God (in Messianic sense, cf. Ps 27), and the (spiritual) king of Israel (Is 97).

The name of Nathanael occurs only once again in the Gospel history, namely, in Jn 212, where he is one of the seven to whom the risen Jesus manifested Himself at early dawn after a night of fruitless fishing. One expects to find Nathanael included (like the other disciples who were simultaneously called) among the Twelve apostles. Aug. (Hom. vii. on the Gosp. of Jn.) accounts for his non-selection by the assumption that Nathanael was learned in the law, and that Christ 'desired to transform the world through unlearned 'apostles. Somewhat similarly, Gregory the Great (Mor. 33. 21) represents our Lord as 'passing over Nathanael in order to show, by the choice of apostles who had nothing praiseworthy of their own, that their sufficiency came not from themselves, but from above.' The now widely accepted + identification of Nathanael with Bartholomew is not known to have been adopted until the 9th cent., by the Nestorian Elias, of Damascus (Assem. B.O. iv. p. v). ‡ To the considerations already adduced under BAR-THOLOMEW in favour of this suggestion, may be added (1) Nathanael's apparent inclusion (Jn 21°) among the 'disciples,' by whom, in the context (Jn 20° 214), the evangelist seems to mean apostles; (2) the fact of most of the other apostles bearing two names, and, in particular, the parallel case of Levi, who is so called in Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷, and whose other name, Matthew, signifies 'gift of Jehovah,' almost equivalent to Nathanael. The identification, however, cannot be regarded as more than a plausible conjecture, against which the absence of any hint of the identity in any early writer tells strongly, although not decisively. Nathanael has also been identified with (1) the triend of Cleopas in Lk 24 (Epiph. Hær. 23, without reason given); (2) Matthew (Thoma in Genes. d. Jn. Ev.), a supposition negatived by the diverse circumstances of Nathanael's call; (3) John himself (Spaeth in Hilg. Zeitsch. 1868), Jn 21² being treated as a mistake of the alleged 'supplementer'; (4) Matthias (Hilg. NT extra Can. iv., and, doubtfully, Jn. Lightf. Com. Ac. in. loc., who elsewhere, in his Comm. on

*Some early writers, however (e.g. Cyril of Alex. Comm. in a Co.), interpret Nathanael's words in Jn 146, not interrogatively, but as an acquiescence in Philip's statement contained in v.45. Augustine (in loc.), while giving both interpretations, appears to prefer 'From Nazareth some good might come,' and deduces from the answer that Nathanael was a learned man, who had 'looked well into the prophets,' and perceived a hidden reference to Nazareth in their writings.

† Among others, by Ew., Mey., Lange, Keim. Wesl., Newm., Alf., Tren., Millig., Farrar, Westcott. The Apocr. Judicium Petri represents both Bartholomew and Nathanael as apostles.

‡ Elias is followed by Ebedjesu and other Nestorians (Ass. iii. 306). In the West the suggestion is found first in Rupertus of Deuts (12th cent., Com. in loc.), but did not excite much attention until the 16th cent., when it was approved by C. Jansenius (Com. p. 142), and condemned by Baronius as 'levis conjectura' (1.123).

Mt. and Jn., prefers to identify Nathanael with Bartholomew); (5) Simon the Cananæan, from a misinterpretation of this surname, as if 'of Cana and (6) Stephen, owing to Jn 1⁵¹ and Ac 7⁵⁶ (both the last conjectures mentioned by Chemnitius, Harm. Evan. 312; cf. Lipsius, Apocr. Apos. iii. 152).

NATHAN-MELECH (קֹרְבִילְהְיּ: Eng. as Vulg.).—An official in the reign of Josial, whose name is used to designate one of the halls or chambers (מֹשְבִילִייִ) of the temple (2 K 23¹¹; see EUNUCH). Gifts and offerings were received in these chambers of the second of bers (Neh 10²⁰ (⁴⁰)), and they may have been assigned particularly to the control of those whose names are attached to them (Jer 35⁴ 36^{10, 11}). In the 'hall of Nathan-melech' Josiah deposited the horses of the sun (? a group of statuary) which he removed from near the temple entrance (2 K 2311; translate, 'and he removed the horses . . . to the chamber of N.'). The express identification of the chamber suggests that it was a permanent repository for these horses rather than an 'office' to which they were handed over. Regarding its situation in the temple area, see PARBAR. The name יוויכלה 'Melech gave,' is exactly paralleled by יוויכלה and יוויכלה 'J' gave,' 'El gave.' It is not necessarily a recognition of an idol god Melech (Molech), for Melech, 'king,' was no doubt a title of J". But the name may be a trace of the idol-worship of the 7th cent. (Gray, Heb. Proper Names, pp. 146-148). In the LXX 150 does not seem to have been taken as part of the proper name (Luc. Ναθάν εὐνούχου τοῦ βασιλέως; Β Ναθάν βασιλέως τοῦ εὐνούχου). W. B. STEVENSON. NATIONS.—See GENTILES, GOIIM, RACES.

NATURAL.—Two different Greek words are thus rendered in AV and RV, which it is necessary here rendered in AV and KV, which it is necessary here to distinguish. 1. φυσικός, 'that which is according to the nature' (φύσις) of any organism, which is the outcome of its constitution. Thus St. Paul contrasts ή φυσική χρήσις with that which is παρά φύσιν (Ro 1²⁶); and in like manner the 'natural branches,' οι κατά φύσιν κλάδοι (Ro 1²¹), are contrasted with the graft from a foreign steek. It is trasted with the graft from a foreign stock. It is plain that it is impossible to decide finally whether or not any process is or is not φυσικός, unless we understand thoroughly the constitution of the φύσις. It is only because we assume that we certainly know the true τέλος of sex, that we unhesitatingly condemn as 'unnatural,' abominable practices like those condemned by St. Paul (Ro 128), despite the fact that they are widely prevalent in various parts of the world. Science assures us that they contradict the 'constitution of human nature,' the pious of man, and conscience acquiesces in the decision.

There is, however, little dispute as to what is unnatural for man, i.e. that which contradicts the whole system of man's nature, and is not merely repugnant to certain elements of it. But when we ask questions about the distinctions between what is natural and what is supernatural in the universe. difficulties emerge. Certainly (see NATURE, p. 493^b), if we understand by φόσις 'the sum of all that is,' nothing is strictly supernatural. But science usually employs the word 'nature' (described in art. NATURE, § 1) as equivalent to the complex of phenomena, the sum of material forces. And we have not yet exhausted the meaning of 'nature' in this sense, for we are not omniscient. Many things once considered supernatural are now found to be strictly the results of 'natural' processes, of hitherto undiscovered laws of the physical universe. The progress of science largely consists in en-larging the domain of 'natural' law. Hence of a given event, seemingly anomalous, it may be impossible for the observer to say with confidence that it is not the result of unknown natural law, and that it must be referred to supernatural intervention. The degree of confidence with which this can be asserted in any particular instance must be measured by the completeness of our knowledge of the circumstances and of the agents. And Butler's observation is profound, 'that there may be beings in the universe whose capacities and knowledge and views may be so extensive as that the whole Christian dispensation may to them appear natural, i.e. analogous or conformable to God's dealings with other parts of His creation; as natural as the visible known course of things appears to us. For there scarce seems any other possible sense to be put upon the word, but that only [of] similar, stated, or uniform' (Anal. I. 1 sub fin.). This, however, is only a speculation; the fact remains, that of certain alleged phenomena our knowledge of nature assures us that they are not in accordance with its ordinary laws as known to us, and that they must therefore be classified as supernatural. The classification is provisionally necessary, although it may not be scientific sub specie aternitatis. See MIRACLE (p. 383) for a fuller discussion of this point.

2. ψυχικόs is twice rendered by 'natural' in the RV, and twice by 'sensual.' The mind of man is frequently spoken of in the NT as twofold (see PSYCHOLOGY), embracing the πρεθμα or roos, the higher faculty which he enjoys as made in the image of God, and the ψυχή, the lower element which he shares with the beasts. The wisdom which is 'earthly' and 'devilish' is also ψυχική (Ja 318), and the ψυχικό are described by St. Jude (Ja 3¹⁸), and the ψυχικοί are described by St. Jude (v. ¹⁹) as πνεῦμα μή έχοντες. In like manner St. Paul says of the ψυχικός that 'he receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God' (1 Co 2¹⁴), and he contrasts the σῶμα ψυχικόν of this life with the σῶμα πνευματικόν of the life to come (1 Co 15¹⁴). 'The natural man' and 'the natural body' are alike of the earth, earthy. It is questionable if the Revisers were well advised * in retaining the word 'natural' in these last passages as the rendering of the contracts. in these last passages as the rendering of ψυχικός; 'sensual' gives the meaning better, and the old rendering suggests to the reader a quite unwarrantable antithesis between the 'natural body' and that which is presumed to be 'supernatural.

J. H. BERNARD. NATURAL HISTORY.—In entering on the study of the natural history of the Bible we have to con-

1. That, with the exception of Solomon † (1 K 433), the authors of the several books were in no sense naturalists. The allusions by 'Solomon' to objects of nature are so few and general as to give the series of t us no idea how far he had reduced his knowledge to a scientific form. There is no evidence in the Scriptures written after his day that he formulated and gave to the world a scientific treatise on these subjects. The imperfect descriptions of natural objects given by the Gr. and Rom. and Arab. naturalists many centuries later, make it quite improbable that any treatises of Solomon on plants and animals were such as, had they been preserved, would have enabled us to identify with accuracy the objects alluded to.

* They have also retained the rendering 'his natural face' for vè *piesur vin priesur airei (Ja 123), although they render the Greek literally in their margin.
† Supposing we have any productions of his pen in the OT, which is denied with practical unanimity by modern scholars.

Apart from the question of the degree of knowledge of natural history possessed by the writers of the Bible, their allusions to natural objects are, for the most part, incidental and general, not scientific. Even in the lists of clean and unclean animals in Lv and Dt a large proportion of the names refer to classes and genera, such as the 'falcon, after its kind'; 'the raven, after its kind'; 'the heron, after its kind'; 'the heron, after its kind,' etc. etc. It is clear from this that the class or genus was in the mind of the writer, and not an individual species, except in those cases in which there was but one well-known species in Bible lands, as the camel, the coney, the swine, etc.

NATURAL HISTORY

3. The Heb. literature is confined to the can-onical books. We have no sidelights from other books in that language to aid us in determining the objects referred to. In the case of objects mentioned but once or a few times only, it is often difficult or impossible to be certain as to what was intended. The LXX gives the judgment of its translators as to the Gr. equivalents in their day. This opinion may not be always well founded. And it is still more probable that in many cases they used a text very different from the MT. The cognate Arab. often sheds light, but in the more difficult cases it is of the least value.

4. The books of the Bible were written by numerous authors, in various parts of the East, and through a period of at least 1000 years. Any one who has endeavoured to collect the common names of plants and animals in any country, but especially in Bible lands, has been struck with the fact that a given name refers to different objects in regions not far apart. For example, in Lebanon the word kaikob is used for several species of maple. In Gilead it is used for Arbutus Andrachne, L., a tree known in the rest of Pal. and Syria as kotlib. The word ballút is properly an acorn, but it is used also for the Portuguese Oak, Quercus Lusitanica, Lam., and another species of oak, Q. Cerris, L. Again, the same object has often different names in regions within Bible lands. The cedar of Lebanon has three names within the limits of N. Lebanon, 'arz, 'ibhul, and thub. The term 'arz is also used for the Aleppo Pine. Again, some generic names, as Oak, have no names in Arabic. Some of its species have names, as sindian for Q. coccifera, L., mallúl for Q. Lusitanica, Lam., look for Q. Look, Ky., ballút for Q. Cerris, L. It is by no means impossible that the Syria as kotlib. The word ballút is properly an Cerris, L. It is by no means impossible that the names of plants changed, either by the introduction of foreign terms, or the adoption of local designations into general literature. It may thus happen that a certain name, as cedar (Lv 144), refers to a plant different from that to which it was applied in later times. There may be many such cases.

5. It is certain that the writers of the Bible were not more precise in their designation of objects of natural history than writers in general literature to-day. When speaking of grass, lilies, mustard, thorns, thistles, owls, bats and other sorts of natural objects, of which there are numerous species, belonging perhaps to several genera, writers of the Bible must not be understood as having in mind a particular species. An attempt to find for every allusion to natural objects a particular species, results in confusion of thought, and endless and insoluble controversy. In many cases where individual species are intended, decisive evidence is not to be found as to what the species is. In such cases we have adopted the plan of presenting the evidence for one or more interpretations, and making no attempt at a decision. Fortunately, these are usually the less important animals and plants.

6. In some cases popular errors as to species appear in the EV. Such is the application of the term 'mole' (Lv 1130) to the mole rat, Spalax typhlus. There are no true moles in Pal. and Syria. But the spalax has the aspect and habits of a mole. Some imaginary animals, as the satyr, are spoken of in the Bible. It is as idle to look for their equivalents in nature as it would be when mentioned in profane literature. But some such monster is a conception well-nigh universal among mankind. In so far as possible it has been the aim of the author in these articles to give the evidences which establish or vitiate the claims of the names adopted in AV and RV, rather than the numerous and conflicting opinions of scholars. Those who may wish to enter into that phase of the question may easily find the topics in the indices of the large number of books on ancient and biblical natural history. Among the principal ancient and mediaval authors who have written on these topics are Pliny, Dioscorides, Theophrastus, Galen, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Herodotus, Abu el-Fudli, Avicenna, and Ibn el-Bitâr. Their testimony, as well as that of others, has been summed up in the erudite works of Bochart (Hierozoicon), Celsius (Hierobotanicon), Rosenmüller (Natural History of the Bible), Hiller, Royle, Ursinus (Arbor. Biblic.), Many naturalists have written of the Fauna and Flora of Bible lands. Prominent among them are Hasselquist, Russell, Ehrenberg, Hemprich, Michaelis, Schweinfürth, Ascherson, Hooker, Carruthers, Wood, Tristram, Houghton, and Boissier. Allusions to natural objects are frequent in all the standard works of travel, especially in Burckhardt, Robinson, Thomson, and Tristrain.

Pal. and Syria are at the meeting-point of three continents, Asia, Africa, and Europe. Their animals and plants connect the Fauna and Flora of all. Furthermore, their surface is greatly diversified. Lebanon is over 10,000 and Hermon over 9000 ft. above the sea. A number of peaks of Amanus and Akher Dagh are nearly as high, as also the higher mountains of Sinai. The Jordan Valley is from a little below to 1294 ft. below the Mediterranean. In the 50,000 square miles between Sinai on the S., Taurus on the N., the sea on the W., and the Syrian desert on the E., are maritime plains, seaward and landward mountain slopes, alpine summits, tropical valleys, the quagmires and marsh thickets of the Hûleh, the salt lakes and marshes of Aleppo and Palmyra, the rolling plateaus of Moab, Gilead, and Bashan, the ancient lake bed of Cæle-Syria, and the arid Syrian desert. The natural result of these great diversities of surface and climate is a large number of species and varieties in proportion to the

A. ANIMAL KINGDOM.—i. MANMALS.—Tristram (Fauna and Flora of Pal.) gives the number of manimals in the Holy Land at 113. This number, which has been considerably augmented by subsequent discoveries, is very large in proportion to the size of the country. A number of those mentioned in Scripture, as the lion, the unicorn, and the wild ox, are now extinct. The larger carnivora, once so numerous, are now rare. The leopard is found only in lonely retreats, while the bear is confined to alpine Lebanon and Antilebanon. The hart is no longer found in Pal., but still exists in Amanus. The pygarg (Antilope Addax, Dt 145) is now no longer found, or only on the borders of the desert. Others of the Scripture mammals which remain have become very scarce, as the wild goat, the coney, and the roebuck. The last is likely soon to become extinct. The following is a complete list of the scriptural and apocryphal mammals:—Antelope (RV; = Wild Ox, AV), Ape, Ass, Wild Ass, Badger (AV; = Seal or Porpoise, RV), Bat, Bear, Behemoth, Boar, Camel, Cat, Cattle, Chamois (Wild Sheep), Coney,

ii. BIRDS.—The order of the creation of birds in the Mosaic cosnogony (Gn 120, 21, 22) corresponds with the order of their geological appearance, which is in the cretaceous period, after the reign of the reptiles. The aquatic species were the first to appear.* Birds are generally more highly organized than reptiles and tishes on the one hand, and less so than the higher mammals on the other. They all have feathers, and are oviparous. Hence they are readily distinguished, and seem to have been recognized by 'Moses' as a well-marked class. Some have thought that bats were included in OT among the birds, as they are mentioned at the end of a list of birds (Lv 11¹³⁻¹⁹). But it is not clear that the writer so understood the matter, as the bats come between the birds on the one hand, and insects and rentiles on the other. The exclusion of the unclean birds in the lists of Lv 11 and Dt 14 implies that other birds were eaten. Of those that were eaten, however, only one, the quail, is mentioned by name. 'Fatted fowl' (1 K 4²) is doubtful. It may perhaps be inferred that doves were kept for food in later OT times (Is 60°), and hens in NT (Mt 23°), also that sparrows were sold for food (Mt 10²⁹, Lk 12°). The numerous allusions to fowling imply the use of hirds so caught sions to fowling imply the use of birds so caught for food. The Bible alludes to the migration and singing of birds (Ca 2^{11, 12}, Ec 12⁴, Jer 8⁷), also to their nesting in the temple (? Ps 84³). Pigeons, swallows, sparrows, and other birds find a secure sanctuary now in churches, but esp. in mosques. The Israelites were forbidden to take the mother bird with the young (Dt 22^{a.7}), perhaps because the mother at such times will not avail herself of her power of concealment and flight. The object of the law was to cultivate a merciful regard for the maternal instinct, not merely to preserve game (another possible explanation is quoted by Driver, ad loc.). Allusion is made to the forsaking of the nest (Pr 27⁸), also to flight (Hos 9¹¹, Ex 19⁴, Dt 32^{11, 12}). More than 350 species of birds have been brilliant plumage, as the Garrulous Roller, the Bee Eater, the Hoopoe, several Kingfishers, the Sun Bird, the White-throated Robin, Tristram's Grackle, the African Darter, etc. But the chief ornithological characteristic of the country is the large number of birds of prey, esp. of the larger kinds, as vultures, eagles, falcons, buzzards, and the fishing water fowl, as pelicans, cranes, herons, cormorants, darters, etc. The coast species resemble those of the maritime regions of the Mediterranean basin. The mountain systems of Lebanon and Antilebanon, with their continuations southward, parallel to the coast, divide the maritime region from that of the Syrian and Arabian deserts. The avifauna is nearly identical in both the mountain chains. That of the deep cleft of the

*With this statement in the text the reader will do well to compare Driver's art. 'The Cosmogony of Genesis,' in Expositor, Jan. 1886. There on p. 28 a table exhibits the order of appearance thus: according to geology, Fishes, Reptiles (in Carbon. period), Birds; according to Gn, Fishes of all kinds and Birds, Reptiles (27).

Jordan and Dead Sea contains a number of Indian and Ethiopian species. The following is a list of Scripture birds:—Bittern (AV;=Porcupine, RV), Cock, Cormorant, Crane (RV;=Swallow, AV), Cuckoo (AV;=Seamew, RV), Dove, Eagle, Fatted Fowl (?), Gier Eagle (AV;=Vulture, RV), Glede, Hawk, Hen, Heron (AV;=Ibis, RVm), Hoopoe, Ibis, Kite (AV;=Falcon, RV), Lapwing, Night Hawk, Osprey, Ossifrage (AV;=Gier Eagle, RV), Ostrich, Owl, Great Owl (AV;=Arrowsnake, RV), Screech Owl (AV;=Night Monster, RV; this refers to a fabulous being, see art. LILITH), Little Owl, Horned Owl (RV), Partridge, Peacock, Swallow, Swan (AV;=Horned Owl, RV), Turtle Dove, Vulture,—in all 34, exclusive of duplicates. Many of these are generic or ordinal terms, including a lawge appropries

iii. REPTILES.—These form a class in Scripture, being mentioned in Gn 714-21, 1 K 43, Hos 218, and clsewhere, by the side of beasts, birds, and fishes, though naturally not a class in the scientific sense of the term, coextensive with the class of 'Reptiles' of modern naturalists. The four living Orders of Reptiles, Testudinata or Chelonia, the Turtles; Loricata or Crocodilia, the Crocodiles; Sauria, the Lizards; Ophidia, the Scrpents,—are all represented in the biblical Fauna. The following reptiles are mentioned in Scripture:—Adder, Arrowsnake (RV; = Great Owl, AV), Asp, Basilisk, Chameleon, Cockatrice, [Dragon, i.e. sea monster, or in Ps 913 a land serpent], Gecko, Leviathan, Lizard, Monitor (if this is the meaning of kōāḥ in Lv 1120, see CHAMELEON), Serpent, Viper,—only 12; but several of these are generic or ordinal, and include large numbers of species. There are probably not fewer than 100 species of reptiles in Pal. and Syria.

iv. Amphibians.—These include Frogs, Toads, Newts, and Salamanders, all of which are represented in the Holy Land. The Frog, however, is the only member of the class mentioned in Scripture.

v. FISHES.—The class of Fishes is recognized in Scripture, but includes cetaceans and many reptiles. They were brought in on the fifth day, with other oviparous creatures, before the viviparous animals of the sixth day. No species of true fish is mentioned by name in the Bible. The only attempt at classification is into clean and unclean, the former having fins and scales, the latter not. The excluded families are the Silurida, the Sheath fish; Railda, the Skates; Petromyzida, the Lampreys; Squalidæ, the Sharks; and Muranidæ, the Eels. Solomon 'spake of fishes' (1 K 4³³). Fish were especially abundant in the Nile (Nu 11°, Is 19°) and the Sea of Galilee. A number of the species in this lake are identical with those in the Nile, a fact noted by Josephus (BJ III. x. 8). They also abound in the Jordan and its affluents, and the streams which empty into the Mediterranean, —in all, 33 fresh-water species. The Mediterranean coast species have not been fully studied. They are, however, very numerous. The Dead Sea has none, a fact noted by Ezekiel (4710), who illustrates the vivifying power of the holy waters illustrates the vivilying power of the no., descending from the altar by the fact that they can be a beginning to the warm with fish. The Arabs have a prejudice against eating fish, hence the immense shoals in the interior waters. On the contrary, the people of the maritime regions are exceedingly fond of them, and the fishing industry is a large one at all the seaports. The government gains a considerable revenue from the tax on fish.
vi. JOINTED ANIMALS.—(a) Insects.—The Holy

vi. JOINTED ANIMALS.—(a) Insects.—The Holy Land is emphatically a land of insects. They number thousands of species, and have as yet been very imperfectly studied. Those mentioned in Scripture are: Ant, Bee, Beetle (AV; = Cricket, RV), Cankerworm, Caterpillar, Crimson (= Cochineal), Flea, Fly, Gnat, Grasshopper, Hornet, Lice, Locust, Moth, Palmerworm, Scarlet (= Cochineal), Wasr—in all, excluding duplicates, 16, of which, however, a number are generic or ordinal. (b) Scorpions.—Of these there are several species, none of which are distinguished by name. (c) Spiders.—Of these also there are numerous species, and countless individuals.

vii. MOLLUSKS.—Of these there are large numbers, both of land and water species. Few of them are mentioned in Scripture. The Snail, Onycha, [the operculum of several species of Strombus], Pearl [the product of diseased action in some species of Meleagrina], and other bivalves, Purple [an extract from a species of Murex], make up the meagre list of this immense sub-kingdom.

viii. WORMS.—Of these only the Horseleech, an Annelid, and the generic expression Worms, are given. The sub-kingdom is very extensively represented.

ix. CELENTERATA. — The Mediterranean Sea contains an abundance of species of Sea Anemones, Jelly Fishes, and Corals. Only the latter are mentioned in Scripture, with no intimation of species.

tioned in Scripture, with no intimation of species.

x. PORIFERA.—The Sponge is once mentioned (Mt 27481) in connexion with the crucifixion of our Lord. The allusion is undoubtedly to the common familiar to all sponge so familiar to all.

B. VEGETABLE KINGDOM: BOTANY.—The Flora of Pal. and Syria is exceedingly rich and varied, owing to the same causes which have been alluded to in connexion with the Fauna. In the region bounded by Akher Dagh on the N., Sinai on the S., the Mediterranean on the W., and the Syro-Arabian desert on the E., are 124 Orders, 850 Genera, and about 3500 Species of Phænogams and Acrogens. The experience of the writer leads him to believe that there are still many new species to be discovered in the mountains of N. Syria, and in the districts E. of the great north and south cleft of the Orontes, Cœle-Syria, the Jordan Valley, and the 'Arabah.

Syria and Pal. may be divided into six botanical regions. (1) The Maritime Plain. Its Flora resembles that of the other coasts of the Levant, but with a few species not elsewhere found. (2) The parallel mountain chains E. and W. of the great cleft, from the level of the Maritime Plain to an altitude of 4000 ft. These chains begin with Amanus, the northernmost peaks of which are divided from Akher Dagh by the valley of the Ak-Su, and the southernmost from Mt. Cassius by the valley of the Orontes. Mt. Cassius is the outlier of the Nusaireh chain, which extends from the valley of the Orontes to that of the Nahr el-Kebir (the ancient Eleutherus), which separates it from Lebanon. Lebanon extends from the Eleutherus to the Leontes. S. of the Leontes the hill-country of Galilee, Samaria, Judæa, and et-Tih constitutes a more or less continuous chain, separated from Sinai by the sandy plain of Debbet er-Ramleh. A parallel chain, E. of the great cleft, begins with Kurd Dagh, and extends southwards under the names of Jebel Bil'as, Antilebanon, Hermon, Gilead, Moab, and Edom, to the Red Sea at Akabah. A break occurs in Jaulan, where a tableland, dotted with extinct volcanoes of no great elevation, divides Antilebanon from Gilead. This plain is terminated on the E. by the range of Jebel ed-Druz (Hill of Bashan). These mountain ranges have a characteristic flora, and each section of them has its peculiar species. It would carry us far beyond the limits of this article to enumerate them. (3) The alpine summits of these ranges, principally those of Akher Dagh, Amanus, Cassius, Lebanon, and Antilebanon, have a flora remarkable for its specialization, and having little of the palæarctic character. (4) The tablelands of Aleppo, Cole-Syria, Damascus, Hauran, Gilead, and Moab. These have also many distinctly characteristic plants. (5) The deserts bordering these, and extending southward into et-Tîh and Sinai. These have already furnished a notable addition to the Flora, and doubtless contain many undiscovered species. (6) The chasm of the Jordan and Dead Sea, in which a tropical climate prevails, and where a

The most numerous Orders are Ranunculaceæ, The most numerous Orders are Ranunculaceæ, 12 genera, 75 species; Cruciferæ, 72 gen. 240 sp.; Sileneæ, 10 gen. 129 sp.; Leguminosæ, 56 gen. 423 sp.; Umbelliferæ, 73 gen. 190 sp.; Compositæ, 115 gen. 457 sp.; Borragineæ, 26 gen. 110 sp.; Scrophulariaceæ, 17 gen. 131 sp.; Labiatæ, 31 gen. 207 sp.; Chenopodiaceæ, 24 gen. 64 sp.; Liliaceæ, 22 gen. 124 sp.; and Gramineæ, 92 gen. 238 species. Ranunculus has 33 sp., Silene 61, Trigonella 37, Medicago 26, Trifolium 56, Astragalus 124. Vicia 31. Galium 39. Anthemis 28. Arigonella 31, Medicago 20, Trifolium 56, Astragalus 124, Vicia 31, Galium 39, Anthemis 28, Verbascum 40, Linaria 24, Scrophularla 19, Veronica 24, Salvia 39, Stachys 25, Euphorbia 41, Allium 42, Cyperus 15, Carex 18. As might have been expected from the dryness of the climate, Ferns are few, being represented by only 15 gen. and 25 species. The Orchids are of the smaller kinds, numbering 11 gen. and 37 species. numbering 11 gen. and 37 species.

The following Scripture plants cannot be determined with certainty, viz.: Algum (almug), baytree (not a tree at all), box, cockle, cypress, gall, fir, gopher wood, hemlock, oil-tree, pannag, poplar, sweet cane, and vine of Sodom.

The following are generic or ordinal, viz.: Bramble, brier, bitter herbs, bulrush, bush, flag, grass, hay, herb, lily, melon, nettle, oak, oil-tree, pulse, reed, rush, thistle, thorn, vetches (RVm for nettles), willow.

The plants which may be known with a fair measure of certainty are distributed in 35 Orders, as follows :- Ranunculacea, fitches; Crucifera, mustard; Capparideæ, caper; Cistineæ, ladanum; Malvaceæ, cotton; Linaceæ, flax; Vitaceæ, vine; Rutaceæ, rue; Anacardiaceæ, balm, balsam, bdellium (?), frankincense, myrrh, nuts (pistachio, Gn 4311), teil-tree, terebinth; Leguminosæ, beans, juniper (retem), husks (carob), lentils, shittim wood (acacia), rye (kirsenneh); Rosaceæ, almond, apple, hazel (almond); Myrtaceæ, myrtle; Lythapple, hazel (almond); Myrtacez, myrtle; Lythrariez, camphire (henna); Granatez, pomegranate; Cucurbitacez, cucumbers, gourd; Umbelliferz, anise (dill), coriander, cummin, galbanum; Valerianacez, spikenard; Compositez, wormwood; Styracacez, styrax; Oleacez, olive; Aquilariacez, lign-aloes; Ebenacez, ebony; Solanacez, mandrake; Labiatez, hyssop, mint; Chenopodiacez, mallows (saltwort, RV) (malluah); Laurinez, cassia, cinnamon; Utticacez, fiz, sycamine, sycomore, Platamon; Urticaceæ, fig, sycamine, sycomore; Plata-naceæ, chestnut (plane-tree); Juglandaceæ, nut (walnut); Coniferæ, ash (oren), cedar, thyine wood; Palmeæ, palm; Iridaceæ, saffron; Amaryllidaceæ, rose of Shavon (narcissus); Liliaceæ, garlic, leeks, onion; Gramineæ, barley, millet, spelt, tare, wheat.

Of the above 65 species, 35 are cultivated plants. The foregoing analysis makes it clear that the Hebrews did not study plants as closely as animals, a fact illustrated among the Arabsof the present day.
G. E. Post.

NATURE.—Few words have been the source of so much confusion in theology as the word nature, for few words have been employed, as this has been, for a long period in two or three distinct, though related, senses. It will be best to begin our discussion by distinguishing between these different meanings.

1. The word 'nature' is commonly used in scientific investigation to describe the sum-total of physical forces-the whole range of the coexistences and sequences of phenomena. In this view it includes the entire domain of the inorganic and organic, the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. Thus we speak of 'students of nature,' of 'natural science,' or natural philosophy, meaning thereby to describe those departments of human ing thereby to describe those departments of numan knowledge which are concerned with the material universe. Nature, in this sense, includes man in respect of that side of his life which he shares with the lower animals. The science which has to do with the diseases of his body is, par excellence, 'Physic.' And the progress of physiology suggests that not only the disorders of his body, but come at least of the meldines of his body. but some at least of the maladies of his mind, are subject to physical law, and may be made the subject of scientific investigation like any other physical process.

2. Man, however, is possessed of a unique faculty which he does not share with the other inhabitants of this earth—the faculty of self-determining reason and of conscious will. To be able to make a moral choice is his supreme prerogative. He is not altogether the victim of breeding and of circumstance; he is a free agent. And this freedom of his enables him, within certain limits, to initiate movements in the visible order, and to control and guide the material forces of the universe. If we are to regard man in this point of view as a part of nature, we must widen our conception of nature, which will now include not only the kingdom of law, but the kingdom of freedom. Nature, in this second and enlarged sense, does not exclude the possibility of free will; it takes in the moral world; it recognizes moral no less than 'physical' law.

3. The word is often used in yet a larger sense.

Nature is regarded as the sum-total of all that is, or was, or shall be. It is the All, the Universe. And, so defined, it is not exclusive of God, for (to the believer in Him) He is the ens realissimum, the most certain and the most real existence which we can conceive. Nature, in this view, is the kingdom of God, in whom and from whom it draws its life. All its operations are the manifestations of His ceaseless and omnipresent activity. If we use the word consistently in this its largest the word consistently in this has largest sense, it is plain that we must abandon the term supernatural. Nothing can be supernatural, nothing can be 'beyond' or 'above' nature, if nature is the sum of all that is. See NATURAL.

So far we have only attempted to define the various connotations which the word 'nature' may have. And it is to be observed that in whatever sense the word is used the idea is constantly personified, and attributes and operations are ascribed to nature which strictly are proper to persons. When we speak of 'bountiful' nature, we may be thinking of it in sense (1) or in sense (3), and we may have no intention to include or to exclude the idea of God as the Bountiful One. Thus Christ said, 'the earth beareth fruit of herself' (αὐτομάτη, Mk 428), not meaning thereby to suggest that the harvest is not the gift of God. And, on the other hand, it is not to be presumed that every form of the hard, it is not to be presumed that every form of the hard is the same to mean the same to the same that the same than the same th words which seems to recognize providence or compassion in nature is intended to suggest a Personal and Benevolent Will behind it. For example, some recent theological writers have argued as if they and have identified 'God' not with the Personal Author and Governor of nature, but with the order of nature itself. This is to introduce a grave ambiguity into our theological nomenclature; but that our idea of nature is necessarily affected and coloured by our idea of God, and that a definition of nature is hardly complete which does not convert to the mind support of the mind to the mind some clear view concerning its relation to God. Something, therefore, must be said on this head.

Atheism dismisses the question by refusing to admit that it has a meaning. That there is no God, that there exists nothing but the successions and coexistences of phenomena, is the principle of speculative Atheism. Theoretically, there is no reason why Atheism should not recognize the free agency of man, and so admit the idea of nature in the second sense above described; but, as a matter of fact, Atheism is usually based on philosophical materialism, which can find no place for free will within its borders. That nature is self-created and self-acting is its fundamental thesis. Such a conception is utterly irreconcilable with religion in any true meaning of that ill-used word, and must not be further dealt with here.

But, granting the existence of a Supreme Person whose mind and purpose the operations of nature reflect, in what relation do we conceive Him to stand to the visible order of the world? answer suggested by the first page of the Bible and by the first article of the Christian creeds is that He is its Creator, the Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible'; cf. Gn 1¹, Ex 20¹¹, Is 66¹, Jer 32¹⁷, Ac 14¹⁸, Rev 4¹¹. The various 'proofs' of the existence of God, in particular that known as the 'cosmological' proof, are concerned with the justification to the intellect of this instinctive belief of mankind, which was present to the Hebrews, as it seems to have been present to the Rebrews, as t seems to have been present to every primitive race of men (see GoD). But this conception of God as the Creator of nature is not by itself a satisfying or complete conception of the Supreme. God is not to be regarded, if we are to follow Scripture, only as an Infinite and All-holy Being on whom the world depends for its creation. Reason certainly requires us to believe that the Creator of nature transcends nature; but the heart is not satisfied until it recognizes God not only as the Great Artificer, but as the present source of the world's life, as having entered into history, as never abandoning the universe which He has made. No one really cares to speculate about a Being who is relegated to an ever-receding past, an absence Creator, pursuing (as it has been said) 'an eternal policy of non-intervention.' And yet such barren Deism is the logical outcome of exclusive attention to that conception of the Supreme which regards Him solely as transcending nature. This was the especial fault of most of the English theology of the 18th century, that it did not realize that (as Butler put it) God is no less nature's Governor than it Author. than its Author.

It is thus apparent wherein the imperfection in Paley's famous illustration of the watchmaker and the watch consists. An artificer having once constructed a machine and set it going, leaves it to its own devices; the more perfect the machine is, the less will interference be necessary. But that is not a complete account of the relation of God to nature. The analogy breaks down hopelessly in this respect, that nature is not only the creation of God; it is also the sphere of His constant and beneficent activity. 'Of him,' but also 'through him and unto him are all things' (Ito 1136). And this conception of God as a Spirit dwelling in nature and manifesting Himself through nature is frequently expressed in Scripture. 'Whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence?' asks the Psalmist. 'If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in Sheol, behold thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me' (Ps 1397-10). Again, to the Psalmist

God is the continual spring of life: 'Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die' (Ps 10429). So also Elihu declares, 'The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life' (Job 334). This conception of God, widely different from that taught by the Deism of the last century, is the conception which the progress of natural science and our increased knowledge of the secrets of nature is bringing more and more into prominence. That God is in nature as well as above nature, that He is at once an Indwelling Spirit and a Transcendent Personality, is the true theistic doctrine of science. Nature does not work independently of Him; all its operations are due to His ceaseless activity. He upholds 'all things by the word of his power' (He 13). The course of history is not a blind mechanical process of evolution; 'the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men' (Dn 417).

This is well said in one of the authorised Homilies of the Church of England: 'It is not to be thought that God hath created all this whole universal world as it is; and thus once made, hath given it up to be ruled and used after our own wits and device, and so taketh no more charge thereof; as we see the shipwright, after he hath brought his ship to a perfect end, then delivereth he to the mariners, and taketh no more care thereof. Nay, God hath not so created the world, that He is careless of it; but He still preserveth it by His goodness; He careless of it; out the still stayeth it in His creation. For else, without His special goodness, it could not stand long in this condition.'

Now, the problem which presents itself here is so to guard our language that it shall not be open to the charge of confounding God with nature. It is hard to steer clear of both Scylla and Charybdis, to avoid Deism on the one side, Pantheism on the Greek philosophy furnishes us with instructive illustrations of the difficulty of avoiding fatal error in this matter, if we attempt to construct our theology without the aid of revelation. If the Epicureans, with their conception of gods who lived at ease a life of undisturbed and dignified repose, went off in the direction of Deism. the Stoics, with their doctrine of God as the soul of the world, were Pantheistic. And this is really a more serious error than the other, because it effectually banishes all true religion. For religion involves belief in a Person, who not only is in constant and intimate relation to nature, but who This is also enters into communion with men. This is impossible if God be identified with nature, for with a mere abstraction no fellowship can be sought, and to it no worship can be addressed. Pantheism is as impotent as Deism to satisfy the intellectual and the emotional cravings of mankind.

Pantheism is a vague word, and requires closer examination than we have yet given it. Something has been said above of theories which resolve God into the complex of material forces, which identify God and nature, indeed, but by the identify God and nature, indeed, but by the elimination from the idea of God of its distinctive features, reason, intelligence, personality, goodness, and the like. Such theories, though from one point of view 'Pantheistic,'—for the only Supreme which they recognize is the Universe of Being,—are, from a truer point of view, 'Atheistic,' for they do not admit the existence of any spiritual being higher than ourselves. But idealist philosophies, such as that which was unfolded in the system of Spinoza, do not thus begin and end with the material forces of the phenomenal world; they begin and end with God, in whom as the Great All-pervading Spirit they find the explanation of all existence. Spinoza does not resolve God into nature, but he exalts nature to God, he treats all the operations of nature as the manifestations of supreme spiritual substance. For him, nature is the development of freedom, or, to use his own remarkable language, the processes of the universe are the exhibition of the natura naturans (or God) unfolding itself (or Himself) in the natura naturatu (or nature). It is plain that, on such a system as this, the 'laws of nature' are absolutely binding on the Divine Life; for the operations of these laws are the manifestations (and the only possible manifestations) of that Life. We have here, indeed, a spiritual interpretation of nature presented to us; every movement in the visible order is, as it were, a sacrament of the Divine Life. But such a doctrine is widely removed from Theism; for while it speaks of a Divine Life, it leaves no room for a Divine Reason, and Will, and Personality. The relation of the Supreme to nature is conceived in such systems rather as the relation of the vital principle to the living plant, than as the relation of the directing mind to the field of experience in which it operates. Certainly, this latter analogy is not complete or final. Our minds produce effects in the physical order only through the medium of our bodies, and even thus only within certain or our bodies, and even thus only within certain limits and under certain conditions; the power of supreme mind over the universe, which is the sphere of its manifestation, cannot be conceived as other than absolute (see MIRACLE). But yet is the analogy true so far as it goes, and it is in harmony with the few hints which Scripture offers John's Gospel speak of the creation of all things as the work of the Logos, and of Him as the Life of the world and the Light of men (Jn 1¹⁻⁴). Life of the world and the Light of men (Jn 1¹⁻⁴). The Logos is not a mere name for the impersonal order of nature; He is the Directing Intelligence which set in array its forces, and continues to guide and control them in their energy. And of the life of man St. Paul quotes with approval the saying of Cleanthes, 'We are also his offspring,' and declares, 'In him we live, and move, and have our being' (Ac 17²⁸). This is the rational and Christian view of nature and of humanity, and it is as widely divergent from humanity, and it is as widely divergent from Pantheism on the one hand as it is from Deism on the other. An important conclusion is thus reached. Theology, no less than science, leads to the conception of the Unity of nature. It is not a mere aggregate of independent forces; it is a totality, which is conceived as One because of the Unity of the Intelligence which created and governs it. Each part ministers to the welfare of the whole; in its growth only the 'fittest' survive, because, were it not for the elimination of the 'unfit,' nature would be not Cosmos but Chaos. It would be 'without form and void,' as in the at would be 'without form and void,' as in the days before the Divine Spirit moved upon the face of the waters (Gn 12). Nature is One, because of the Unity of its Author; 'I am J" that maketh all things' (Is 4424; cf. Rev 411). But unity does not necessarily involve uniformity. The Unity of Nature is an axiom of science and of religion; the Uniformity of Nature, i.e. the rule that 'the same physical causes will always produce the same physical causes will always produce the same physical effects,' far from being an axiom, is nothing more than an empirical maxim, convenient for scientific investigation, which has been found to hold good in an enormous number of instances, but which has no a priori necessity and no rational guarantee of universality. Nature is, indeed, governed by law and not by caprice: that we know and are assured of. But such a formula does not settle the matter. A wise and prudent man's life is also governed by law and not by caprice, and yet the intervention of his moral reason of his power of choice disturbs from time reason, of his power of choice, disturbs from time to time the semblance of uniformity in his conduct. For him the same physical antecedents do not always issue in the same physical consequences, because moral considerations—non-physical motives—may sway him now in this direction, and now in that. Thus in the case of man, who is a part, and an important part, of nature, the rule of uniformity does not hold absolutely. And when we remember that the Divine Will must be, at the least, as independent of physical law as is man's will, we see no ground for regarding the 'Uniformity of Nature' as a constitutive principle of the Cosmos. It is nothing more than a convenient way of saying that God's laws are general laws; that He does not depart from the usual methods of His rule, without the gravest reasons for intervention. See MIRACLE.

Such conceptions, such problems, are too abstract to occupy the mind of primitive piety. And, as a matter of fact, the word 'nature' does not once occur in the OT. The Hebrews saw the hand of Jehovah everywhere; they recognized that He had made 'the heaven and the earth and the sea, and all that in them is' (Ex 2011), that the thunder was His voice and the lightning flashes His arrows of destruction (Ps 18¹³), that fire and hail, snow and vapour, and stormy wind fulfilled His word (Ps 148⁸); but they had no thought of nature as a whole, a totality, which might be conceived of as an abstract idea, without any special reference to the particular phenomena which represent it in the concrete. The power of forming abstract ideas comes late in the development of mental life, and it was not until Hebraism came into contact with Hellenism that the idea of $\phi \dot{\phi} \sigma \iota s$ was introduced into Hebrew thought. In 4 Mac 57 we find Antiochus recommending Eleazar to consent to eat swine's flesh, on the ground that it is given to us by nature. And St. Paul argues that 'nature itself teaches' us that a man's head ought to be uncovered, but a woman's covered (1 Co 11¹⁴). In both of these instances nature is spoken of as a unity, and it is personified in a fashion which would have been unintelligible at an earlier period of Jewish thought. Again, the word poors is used occasionally in the writings of St. Paul and in the Bk. of Wis (as it is still) to describe the sum of the properties or characteristics of a species—the system of its constitution (as Butler would put it). E.g., among the subjects on which σοφία is engaged are mentioned φύσεις ζώων, 'the natures of living creatures' (Wis 7²⁰), and St. Paul speaks of abominable vices as being παρὰ φύσιν (Ro 1²⁰), i.e. abominable vices as being πapa φυσιν (Ro 1-1), i.e. contrary to the nature of man; and in Ro 11²⁴ of a wild olive-tree being grafted into a good olive-tree πapa φύσιν, i.e. contrary to its nature. The uncircumcised condition of the Gentiles is described as η έκ φύσεως ἀκροβυστία (Ro 2²⁷), this being, as we would say, the natural state of man. Larger questions are suggested by the apostle's words, 'we were by nature (φύσει) children of wrath' (Eph 2³), which are considered elsewhere. See FALL.

It is easy to understand how such expressions and such a warea of the word discussional grown.

and such a usage of the word φύσι should grow up, once the conceptions of the world as a system, and of each animal and plant upon it as possessing a constitution of its own, became familiar. The word only gives rise to ambiguity when we are using it in reference to questions which touch theology; it then becomes necessary to ask whether he who employs it understands it in sense (1) as the complex of the mechanical and chemical forces of the Cosmos, in sense (2) which reckons man's will and reason as part of his φύσις, or in sense (3), the true religious conception, which ultimately refers every operation of phenomenal force to the Agency of Supreme Mind, directing and ordering

NAUGHT, NAUGHTY, NAUGHTINESS. — The Eng. word 'naught' is formed from the Anglo-Saxon na, not, and will, a whit, a thing. At an early stage, perhaps under the influence of the verb 'ought,' the spelling 'nought' came in. Then the word was contracted to 'not.' Thus 'naught,' 'nought,' 'not' are all forms of the same word, and do not differ in meaning. In AV of 1611 the spelling is always nought, except in Lk 2311 'Herod, with his men of warre, set him at naught,' and Scrivener (Camb. Paragraph Bible, p. xlvii) says that in this passage 'naught' is a

The meaning of 'naught' was originally 'not anything,' 'worthless.' But it soon came to mean 'bad,' 'vicious,' and this was the usual meaning in the 17th cent. Consequently in the 1638 ed. of AV the word is spelt 'naught' in 2 K 2¹⁹, Pr 20¹⁴, the Heb. being yr ra,' 'bad'; elsewhere 'nought,' the Heb. being yr ra,' 'bad'; elsewhere 'nought,' the Heb. being some expression of worthlessness rather than of wickedness. This distinction was preserved by Scrivener, and is found in most mod. editions of AV.

Examples of 'naught' or 'nought' in the sense of 'bad' are Udall's Erasmus' Paraph. i. fol. 54, Why therfore saye ye that that whiche is good of it selfe cummeth from Beelzebub, who by your owne judgement is al naught?'; Barlowe, Dialoge, p. 76, Why do ye then dispise the universall churche, because some of them be noughte?'; Mt churche, because some of them be noughte?'; Mt 2016 Rhem. 'Is thine eye naught, because I am

Naughty means 'worthless' in Pr 612, Heb. Dig 727:72, usually 'a man of Belial,' here 'a naughty person,' RV 'a worthless person.' Cf. Tind. Expos. p. 7 'These and all such are naughty arguments.' Elsewhere it means 'bad,' Pr 174 'A liar giveth ear to a naughty tongue '(nin 167). RV 'a mischievous tongue'); Jer 243 'The other basket had very naughty figs' (nin, RV 'bad'); Wis 1210 'they were a naughty generation' (πονηρά η γένεσις αὐτῶν, RV 'their nature by birth was evil'). So in Udall's Ernsmus' Paraph. ii. fol. 284 the devil is called a 'naughtie lord.' Latimer (Sermons, p. 115) says, 'The herte of man is naughti, a croked, and a froward pece of worke.' In the Preface to his Dialoge (p. 35) Barlowe says, 'Where as is enmyte and contention, there is 'Where as is enmyte and contention, there is inconstancy and all noughty doyng.' Cf. also Mt 21⁴¹ Rhem. 'The naughtie men he wil bring to naught'; and Milton, Arcopagitica, p. 16, 'Best books to a naughty mind are not unappliable to occasions of evill.

Naughtiness occurs only in the sense of 'wickedness': 1 S 1725 'I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart' (२२२२ r'); Pr 11⁶ 'Transgressors shall be taken in their own naughtiness' (२,७, RV 'mischief'); Wis 4¹² 'The bewitching of naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest' naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest' (βασκανία φαυλότητος); Ja 121 'Lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness' (περισείαν κακίας, RV 'overflowing of wickedness,' RVm 'malice'). Cf. Udall, Erasmus' Paraph. ii. fol. 284, 'The whole world is set altogether on naughtynes'; Mt 2218 Rhem. 'Jesus knowing their naughtines, said, what do you tempt me Hypocrites?' and Ac 326 Rhem. 'To you first God raising up his sonne, hath sent him blessing you; that every one should convert him self from his naughtines.' This word 'naughtiness' is effectively made use of hy Driver as the randering of the TV in the content of the TV in naughtines.' This word 'naughtiness' is effectively made use of hy Driver as the rendering of the Heb. word 'aven in the Psalms and elsewhere (Parallel Psalter, at Ps 714 107 etc., and note on p. 449 f.). See Vanity.

NAYE.—The centre part of a wheel through which the axle passes. In AV 'nave' is the rendering of I, which is also translated 'boss' of a shield in Job 1526, and 'high place' AV, 'eminent place' RV, in Ezk 1631. The Arabic name is kab, not unlike an in sound. In RV win is tr. 'nave,' the word meaning literally the gathering or binding together, and when applied to a wheel refers to that part which binds together the spokes, i.e. the nave. It is found only in 1 K 7⁸³ (בְּיִישְׁיִם). בּיִּ is tr. in RV 'fello,' or the rim of the wheel. W. CARSLAW.

NAYE (Navi).—The Gr. form of the Heb. name Nun (which see). It occurs only in Sir 461 (AV).

NAZARENE (Najaρηνός from Najaρά, like Mayðaπαλακκικ (αξιαρμός from Nαζαρα, fike Μαγδαληνή from Μαγδαλά [cf. Dalman's Aramāisch: Grammatik, p. 141, note 7]; Nαζωραῖος used exclusively in Mt, Jn, Ac, and probably so in Lk.* The form Nαζοραῖος occurs in some MSS).—This term is used in the Gospels, but only by those outside the circle of His intimate friends, to distinguish Louise & Nagarath from others. tinguish Jesus of Nazareth from others of the same name. In Ac it is also employed by St. Peter (2²² 3⁶ 4¹⁰), by St. Paul (26⁹), and by the risen Lord (22⁸). In Mt 2²⁸ the evangelist says that Jesus went to dwell at Nazareth, that 'it night be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene' (Najwpiws). Many interpretations of this passage have been given, none of them entirely satisfactory. The most important are: (1) that which connects it with the word γι in Is 11'; (2) that which assumes a play on the word 'Nazirite'; (3) Hitzig's view that it refers to the word 'γι γι in Is 49's; (4) that it has reference to a lost prophecy, or one that was only traditional and never written; (5) that the use of the plural προφητών precludes any reference to a single word, and that the evanvelist alludes to prophecies asserting that the any reference to a single word, and that the evan-gelist alludes to prophecies asserting that the Messiah would be despised. Jerome, in his con-mentary on Is 11, objected to the first interpreta-tion on the ground that the f of Na_fωραĵos does not correspond to the x of xy. The same objec-tion applies to Hitzig's view. The objection to (2) is that Jesus was not a Nazirite; and to (4) that it is a counsel of despair. The last explanation (5) is already given by Jerome in his commentary to Mt 2²², and is perhaps the most probable (cf. Weiss in Meyer's Kommentar³, in loc.). Finally, the word Nasapalwe is used in Ac 24⁵ of the Christians. It is similarly employed by the Jews in the time of Tertullian: 'Unde et ipso nomine nos Judæi Nazaræos appellant per eum' (adv. Marcionem, iv. 8). After this, however, it practically disappears from literature in this sense until about A.D. 400, when it appears as the name of a Christian sect.

NAZARETH (Nasaρέθ, Nasaρέτ, Nasaρέτ, Nasaρέτ, Nasaρέθ, Nasaρέ, mod. Arab. en-Nāṣira; on etymology and meaning of the name see Swete on Mk 19) was situated in a high valley running from S.S.W. to N.N.E. among the most southerly of the limestone hills of the Lebanon range just before it drops down to the Plain of Esdraelon. The base of the valley is about 1900 feat above the level of the Mediter. is about 1200 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, while the western hill (which is higher than the hills on the N. and E.), on which the town was built, rises to a height of 1600 feet. The floor of the valley is covered in the season with wild flowers, and the olive, fig, mulberry, lemon, pomegranate, almond, and quince flourish. Want of soil, however, causes many bare spots in the landscape, which is further characterized by the long irregular rows of cactus hedges. The climate is moderate on the whole, though it is hot in the summer and snow is not unknown in the winter. Like many other parts of Palestine, it is subject to severe storms. The old town of N. has entirely disappeared, but, judging by the rock-tombs that remain, it probably extended higher up the western hill than the modern village. It seems to have been a place of no importance for the national life (cf. Jn 146), although it was only a day's journey from the Mediterranean at Carmel, and about the same distance from Capernaum and Tiberias, while it was a three days' journey from Jerusalem. Roads go out from it to Sefurieh, Akka, Kefr Kenna, Tiberias, Mt. Tabor, Jaffa, and the Plain of Esdraelon; but no main line of traffic passes through it. The only permanent water supply comes from the Virgin's Spring ('Ain es - Sitt Mariam), which rises near the Greek church of Cabriel and is conducted by a capal of about Gabriel and is conducted by a canal of about 120 steps to its present outlet. Attempts have been made to secure a supply from other sources, but without much success. As the outflow from the Virgin's Spring in the summer is only about 170 gallons an hour,—an amount that scarcely suffices for the present population of 7500 people, even with the addition of stored rain-water,—the population of Nazareth could never have been very large. N. is not mentioned in the OT, Josephus, or the Talmud (but cf. Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 190), and derives its importance entirely from its connexion with the life of Jesus. entirely from its connexion with the life of Jesus. To 'a city of Galilee, named Nazareth,' Gabriel was sent to the Virgin Mary to announce the birth of Jesus (Lk 126), from Nazareth Joseph went up to be taxed in Bethlehem (Lk 24), and to it Mary and he returned after the birth of Jesus (Lk 250). Matthew represents Joseph and Mary as going to live at Nazareth after the birth of Jesus, that a prophecy concerning the Messiah might be fulfilled (Mt 22; see NAZARENE). At the age of twelve Jesus was still living at Nazareth (Lk 25), and according to Mark He came from Nazareth of Galilee to be baptized in the Jordan (1º). To Nazareth He returned after the Temptation, only, however, to leave it for Capernaum (Mt 4¹²). Finally, it was in the synagogue of Nazareth that He declared Himself the fulfilment of prophecy, and so enraged the people that they led Him out to the hill above the city and sought to throw Him down * (Lk 416, cf. Mk 61, Mt 1314). From His close association with Nazareth, Jesus was often spoken of as 'the Nazarene' (see article above).

* In Westcott and Hort's text Naζapurés occurs in Mk 134 1047 164, also in Lk 434, where it is probably copied from Mk or a common source. Apart from these instances it occurs only in Lk 2419, where, however, the MSS A, D, etc., read Nαζα κίδε. It thus seems probable that Nαζαμητές was the only form used in the original source of the Synoptic Gospeia.

The important features of Nazareth for the life of Jesus are

Roman legions and princes' retinues, all passed within sight. Many phases of Greek and Roman life could be observed from here, both in the town life of such places as Sefurieh and on the main roads of the plains. At the same time national feeling was stirred to its depths by the memories connected with the hill of Carmel, the battlefield of Esdraelon, and the mountains of Gilead.

NAZIRITE (τη; LXX in Nu 6^{12.51} εὐξάμετος; in vv. 18.19.20 ἡδγμέτος; in Jg 13° Β ταζείρ, Α τηνασμέτος ταζιραῖος; in 13° 16¹⁷ Β άγιος, Α ταζειραῖος; in Am 2¹² τηνασμέτος).—The term πακτ is derived from πακτ, * 'to consecrate,' and denotes 'the consecrated one,' the one separated from among the rest of the people. It is used of two classes: Nazirites for life, and Nazirites for a limited period. The law in Nu 6¹⁻²¹, which is of late origin and is the only part of the law taking notice of Nazirites, refers only to the latter class.

According to this law, the Nazirite is one who consecrates himself (or herself, v. 2) to the Lord, consecrates himself (or herself, v.2) to the Lord, and is bound by his vow of consecration (a) to abstain all the days of his Naziriteship from the use of wine and all other intoxicating drink, from vinegar formed from wine or strong drink, from any liquor of grapes, from grapes dried or fresh, and indeed from the use of anything produced from the vine (v. .); (b) not to suffer a razor to come upon his head, but to let he locks of the heir of his head grow long (v. ); and (c) to swoid hair of his head grow long (v.); and (c) to avoid all ceremonial defilement from contact with any dead body, even that of his nearest relatives (v. ... where, however, wife and child are not mentioned). If through the sudden death of any one beside him he becomes defiled, he must observe the usual rites of purification (Nu 19¹¹⁵.); on the seventh day he must shave his head, his hair being cut off, because defilement was specially likely to cling to it, and also perhaps because it was the visible sign of his consecration, which had been rendered invalid; on the eighth day he must offer through the priest, at the door of the sanctuary, two turtle doves or two young pigeons—one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering (Lv 57 126 148%. and the other for a burne-defining (1976) 22 12 15 14. 224.); his sin in even unwittingly violating his vow (Lv 425. Nu 1525.) being thus atoned for, he must reconsecrate himself to the Lord, and, having offered a he-lamb of the first year for a guilt-offering (Lv 1412. 31), he must hold himself consecrated in the lamb of the constant of the consta offering (Lv 14^{12.13}), he must hold himself conse-crated for the whole period involved in his original vow (v.⁹⁻¹²). On the expiry of that period, the law regulated, with equal minuteness, the way in which he was to return to the sphere of ordinary life. He was brought to the door of the sanc-tuary, where, through the priest, he offered his oblation to the Lord (vv.³⁹⁻¹⁷): first (v.¹⁶), a ewe-lamb of the first year without blemish as a sin-offering for sing committed unwittingly during the lamb of the first year without blemish as a sinoffering for sins committed unwittingly during the days of his separation; then a he-lamb of the first year without blemish as a burnt-offering, along with the customary meal- and drink-offerings (Nu 15²⁶); and, last of all, a ram without blemish, along with a basket of unleavened bread (Lv 7¹²;

cf. also Ex 29²², Lv 2⁴ 8²) in addition to the usual meal- and drink-offerings, as a peace-offering or thanksgiving for having been enabled to complete his period of consecration. He then shaved his head at the door of the sanctuary, and put his hair on the fire under the thank-offerings, as a precaution against its profanation, and as a sign that it was surrendered to the Lord (v.18). The priest then took the sodden shoulder of the ram along with an unleavened cake and an unleavened wafer out of the basket, put them on the hands of the Nazirite (cf. Lv 827), and waved them as a wave-offering before the Lord. These parts of the sacrifice, in addition to the customary wave-breast and heave-thigh (Lv 72857), were assigned to the priest (v.184); this increase of what was given to the Lord (in the person of the priest) was probably meant to represent that His participation was greater than usual in the sacrificial meal of the Nazirite, whom He thereby specially acknowledged as His own. Having thus performed his vow, the Nazirite was allowed to drink wine (v.29), very likely at this sacrificial meal; and he thereby emerged from the state of consecration into ordinary life. If when he took the vow of a Nazirite he took in addition a vow special to himself, he had also at the same time to perform this latter vow.

The Nazirites expressly mentioned in the OT (Samson, Samuel,* the half-Israelitish Rechabites, and probably also those referred to in Am 2^{111.}) belong to the class of Nazirites for life. What is said of them does not exactly correspond with the law in Nu 6. Apart from the fact that Samson and Samuel were dedicated to the Lord by their parents before their birth, the restrictions laid upon them were not identical with those specified in that law. Of Samson it is merely said that 'no razor shall come upon his head' (Jg 13'); no mention is made of abstinence from wine, though his mother is forbidden, during her pregnancy, to drink wine or strong drink or to eat any unclean thing (vv.4 and '), or anything that cometh of the vine (v.10). Samson came frequently into contact with the dead (Jg 140 1515), without his consecration thereby ceasing; and it is assumed by some that he would naturally drink wine at the marriage feast (1410). Of Samuel also it is merely said that 'no razor shall come upon his head' (1 S 111). The Rechabites (2 K 1015 f., Jer 35) not only abstained from wine, but from everything that was characteristic of a settled life; while Amos (212) makes mention only of abstinence from wine. The Nazirate was evidently of a much more manifold character, and played a greater part in the religious life of Israel than the law in Nu suggests. That law is simply an attempt, at a late stage of Israel's history, to regulate an institution that had grown up independently of it. Other abstinences than those specified in it were doubtless occasionally practised; but these three had gradually come to be regarded as what was essential.

Whether the lifelong or the temporary Nazirate was the original form, it is impossible to determine. The case of Samson merely proves that tradition was acquainted with Nazirites for life at a comparatively early period. The law in Nu, as already remarked, refers only to the temporary Nazirate; and the hair of a dead person could not be offered to the Lord. The latter fact, however, is not conclusive against the lifelong Nazirate; for the long locks of the Nazirite might, from time to time, have been cut off and offered at the sanctuary, without his thereby ceasing to be a specially consecrated person. Nor can it be said with certainty whether abstinence from wine, etc., or the hair-offering was the original content of the vow. Abstinence from wine is alone mentioned by Amos (2¹²), while, in the case of Samson, both in the announcement of his birth and in the narrative of his exploits, the emphasis is laid entirely upon his unshorn locks. His mother, it is true, is forbidden the use of wine, etc., during her pregnancy; and from this fact, along with others, opposite inferences have been drawn. By others, opposite interences have been drawn. By most it has been assumed that the omission in the case of Samson himself is purely accidental: the restriction laid upon his mother already implies that he is to be a specially consecrated one from the very beginning of his existence. By others, however, it is argued that Jg 13, which narrates the circumstances attending Samson's birth, contains two traditions of these circumstances, and belongs to a different period from chs. 14-16, in which everything is opposed to the notion of his leading an ascetic life. In favour of the view that regards the hair-offering as the essential element, reference is also made to Jer 72, where unshorn hair is called nézer, and to Lv 25.11, where the vine that was left undressed during the Sabbatic year and the year of Jubilee is called a nāzīr; but in view of Am 2¹² these passages are not decisive. Nazīrites are mentioned so seldom in the OT * that on such points we must refrain from dogmatic statements; but on the whole it seems probable that the temporary Nazirate was the most common form, and that from the first abstinence from wine was one of the restrictions. imposed on them. There is no instance in the OT of a female Nazirite.

*That Samuel was a Nazirite is denied by many moderns (e.g. Smend, Nowack). He is nowhere called a Nazirite in the OT; and the special service to which he was dedicated by his mother was that of the sanctuary at Shiloh (1 S 124ff.). It is implied in Exk 4420 that some Semitic priests allowed their hair to grow long. The LXX, which adds to 1 S 111 'and he shall not drink wine or strong drink,' seems to regard him as a Nazirite. While the Rechabites are held by some to be even the strictest of all the Nazirites, they are held by others to be simply very closely akin to them. 'The only certain historical example of a Nazirite, mentioned in the OT, is Samson' (Driver, Joel and Amos, p. 153).

Regarding the meaning of the restrictions to which they were subjected there is now very general agreement. (1) Abstinence from wine, etc. This was the strictly ascetic element in the vow of the Nazirite. It has often been explained as symbolizing abstinence from all deliciae carnis; but, as Dillmann remarks, if the Nazirite was forbidden all deliciae carnis, he would have had to avoid them, not merely symbolically, but in reality. It finds an analogy in the late law forbidding the priests to drink wine or strong drink, while engaged in the service of the sanctuary (Lv 10⁸⁶.); and some have accordingly explained it as meant merely to secure at all times the sobriety of mind becoming in a man specially dedicated to God (cf. Hos 4¹¹). But the prohibition extended not only to wine and strong drink, but to the whole produce of the vine. It is now, therefore, generally explained as 'a reaction in favour of the primitive simplicity of Israel in the days before it came into contact with Canaanite civilization and Canaanite civilization in favour of the simple life of ancient times' (W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, p. 84 f.). 'All Semitic nomads view wine growing and wine-drinking as essentially foreign to their traditional mode of life. Canaan, on the contrary, is pre-eminently a land of the grape, and the Canaanite worship was full of Dionysiac elements. Wine was the best gift of the Baalim, and wine-drinking was prominent in their luxurious worship' (ib.). This reaction in favour of a simple nomadic life was carried furthest by the Rechabites; but though the Nazirites generally did not carry their protest so far, still, by their abstinence

*All the passages in which they are mentioned are cited above. In La 47 'Nazirites' should be 'princes' or 'nobles,' princes as well as priests being among the Hebrews consecrated persons; cf. Gn 493, Dt 8316, where Joseph is called the Nd2r among his brethren.

(2) The long hair of the Nazirite was the visible mark of his consecration; like the high priest's 'mitre' with the inscription 'Holy to the Lord' (Ex 28362 296 3950, Lv 89, where the Heb. word for 'crown' or 'diadem' is the same as that rendered consecration in Nu 6; of. also Lv 2112, 2 S 11 2 K 1112), it was the sign, manifest to all, that he was a God-consecrated man. The law in Nu 6 even calls it his 'consecration' (v. 19; see also vv. 7.9. 11. 18, Jer 720), and enacts that, when the period of his vow is over, it must be offered to the lord along with the peace-offerings (v. 18). In Samson's case it is also the seat of his personal strength; as soon as it is cut off, his special relation to Jehovah ceases, and he becomes weak as other men (Jg 16¹⁷⁻²²). The general idea underlying this restriction is that whatever is to be, or has been, consecrated to God must be kept inviolate, in the condition in which it has come from its maker's hand (cf. Ex 20²⁵, Lv 22²⁴, Nu 19², Dt 15¹⁹ 21³, 1 S 6⁷). But it is the Nazirite himself, and not merely his hair, that is consecrated to Jehovah: how, then, are we to explain the emphasis laid on the latter? 'The hair,' says W. R. Smith, 'is regarded by primitive peoples as a living and important part of the body... it is often regarded as the special seat of life and strength.' 'All over the world the head and hair of persons under taboo are peculiarly sacred and inviolable, and the primitive notions about the hair as a special seat of life are quite sufficient to account for this. . . . It is easy, for example, to understand why, if an important part of the life resides in the hair, a man whose whole life is consecrated—e.g. a Maori chief, or the Flamen Dialis, or in the Semitic field such a person as Samuel or Samson—should either be forbidden to cut his hair at all, or should be compelled, when he does so, to use special precautions against the profanation of the holy growth $(RS^2 \text{ pp. } 324, 483)$. The inviolability of the Nazirite's hair is thus the manifest token of the consecration of his whole personality

(3) The requirement to avoid all uncleanness due to contact with the dead is simply an enhancement of what is required of every Israelite, and more especially of the priests (Lv 21^{1st}). One that has specially devoted himself to the service of Jehovah must naturally avoid everything ceremonially defiling. He must come into contact with nothing that renders him unfit for the service of the living and holy God. In this respect, so long as his vow lasted, the Nazirite stood on a level with the levitically holiest person among the people, viz. the high priest (Lv 21^{11t}, where only father and mother are mentioned). Though Samson does not seem to have been subject to this restriction,; the importance attached to it generally is manifest from what is said in Nu 6

*A similar hostility to the use of wine is found among many ancient peoples. Among the Romans the priest of Jupiter was forbidden even to touch the vine; the Nabatasans of the Syrian desert were forbidden to use wine; among the Arabs also, long before the Koran, there was a strong repugnance to the vine.

*Like all barbarians, the Arabs were fond enough of getting drunk; but wine was a foreign and costly luxury, and the opposition to its use found distinguished advocates before Mohammed (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 388).

† Among the ancient Arabs we find a similar connexion between the hair and vows; the pligrim allowed his hair to grow until his vow was paid; he then out it off and thereby returned to the state of ordinary secular life. He was not ever permitted to comb and wash his locks till the pligrimage was accomplished. This rule was not sectic; it was simply a consequence of the fact that the hair of his head was inviolable. Pilgrims to Mecca are still forbidden to out the hair of their head or even to pare their nails during their pligrimage.

† Schultz remarks (p. 110) that this restriction naturally did not prevent one from engaging in the holy wars of Jehovah. A similar hostility to the use of wine is found among many as to the Nazirite who has been accidentally defiled.

The Nazirites are mentioned so seldom in the OT that we cannot trace the history of this peculiar institution. It may be confidently assumed, however, that it grew up spontaneously on Israelitish soil, and that, too, as early as the time of the Judges. Israel had been unable to conquer the Canaanites completely, and, through intercourse with the latter, was gradually losing its distinctive character. If it was to maintain its existence and fulfil its vocation as the people of Jehovah, it must return to the customs which the fathers had brought with them out of the desert. The Nazirites were leading representatives of this reaction; 'they were men, who, when the sensual and self-indulgent habits of the Canaanites threatened to make their way into Israel, endeavoured by a vow of abstinence to set an example of moderation and self-denial, which might help to preserve the old simplicity of Israelitish life' (Driver, Joel and Amos, p. 152f.). They were a class of persons 'holy to the Lord' in a peculiar sense. That which formed the basis of their consecration was neither birth nor office, but a vow of a special kind. In an ordinary vow, a man consecrated some material thing; the Nazirites consecrated themselves (Nu 62.5). Occasionally parents dedicated their unborn child to the life of a Nazirite (e.g. Samson and Samuel), in which case the mother had, during her pregnancy, also to abstain from the use of wine, etc. (Jg 13⁴⁻⁷⁻¹⁴). As a rule, however, and probably originally, the Nazirite, following an inner prompting, which he recognized as company from the Lord (Am 211) declined him as coming from the Lord (Am 211), dedicated himself. He thereby devoted himself wholly, for a limited time or for life, to the positive service of Jehovah. Though his vow committed him to certain abstinences, it was not, at least originally, a vow of mere abstinence; the life that he led was not necessarily that of a mere ascetic. As representing to his fellow-countrymen the ideal of a genuine Israelite, he naturally abstained from everything that was out of keeping with that ideal; but these abstinences were simply consecutive. quences of his state of positive consecration. did his vow compel him to withdraw from fellowship with his fellow-men; there is nothing in the OT to indicate that the Nazirites generally either lived apart by themselves or in guilds like 'the sons of the prophets.' The Nazirite was originally a zealot for the national religion; he was one that had devoted himself to the service of Jehovah and His people. The service to which his vow called him might be very manifold: now it might possibly be to spend much of his time in prayer or in the service of the sanctuary, or to protest against current evils by a life of asceticism; and now it might be to fight the nation's foes or to rule the nation as judge. Whatever the service might be, he was regarded as a special instrument whereby God worked on behalf of His people. Samson, as being a Nazirite, is to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines (Jg 13⁸); he achieves his various exploits because the Spirit of the Lord moved him or came nightily upon him (Jg 13²⁵ 14⁶. 18 1518), and Ames (Sill) regards it see a rather than the contract of the contract 146. 19 1514); and Amos (211) regards it as a mark of God's grace towards Israel that He not only raised up prophets from among their sons, but also from among their young men Nazirites, who by their abstinence from wine protested against the sensuality that evidently abounded so greatly in the northern kingdom during the reign of Jeroboam II. 'The temporary Nazirate afterwards became a purely private asceticism, which the individual vowed to God in order to secure the fulfilment of this or that desire. Perhaps the early Nazirites also hoped to obtain something for themselves in return for their abstinence. But above everything they served the whole community; they sought to exhibit, both for Israel and for Jehovah, the true nature of Israel. They felt themselves impelled to do so, after the manner of the prophets, by the Spirit of Jehovah. They did not thereby acquire any merit for themselves; it was a mark of the grace of Jehovah to His people, that He raised up Nazirites' (Smend's, p. 95 f.). It must not be assumed that the Nazirites were necessarily saintly men, in the modern sense of that expression. Their consecration to J" certainly implied a separation in several respects from ordinary secular life; but they might nevertheless be men of a very secular spirit. In speaking of them, we must therefore guard against using exaggerated language. It must not be forgotten, however, that Amos, who had a very ethical conception of J", says that they were raised up by the Lord (211), and regards it as a grievous sin on the part of the Israelites that they tempted them to break their vow (v.12). It may safely be inferred from this that the Nazirites known to him personally or from tradition were men of real moral worth, good gifts of God to His sinful but beloved people. implied a separation in several respects from beloved people.

From the circumstance that the restrictions imposed upon the Nazirites were similar to those imposed upon the priests, and especially upon the high priest, it has been often inferred that the former represented the idea of the priestly life. But there is no positive evidence in support of this inference. Amos does not class them along with the priests, but with the prophets; we do not hear of their ever discharging priestly functions; and the similarity of the restrictions in the two cases is sufficiently explained by the fact that Nazirites and priests were alike specially consecrated persons. The former were men in whom (at least in early times) 'the characteristic spirit of Israel expressed itself most clearly and most uniquely' (Schultz).

The Nazirites were doubtless more numerous than the few notices of them in the OT might lead us to suppose. Am 2^{11t} and the Rechabites show that they were found both in Israel and in Judah down to a late period in the history of the Rethauter for the Rethauter f both kingdoms. After the Return from the Exile the institution flourished again, and naturally, the institution hourished again, and naturally, considering the strictly legal character of post-exilic Judaism, in the form prescribed by the law in Nu 6. They are mentioned in 1 Mac 3st and also in Josephus (BJ II. xv. 1, Ant. XIX. vi. 1). We also hear of 300 Nazirites being together, and finding difficulty in providing the sacrifices required at the expiry of their period of separation, in the time of Alexander Jannæus. By this time however the Nazirata had lost its old this time, however, the Nazirate had lost its old significance, and had become a purely private asceticism. The vow was generally taken in times of sickness or other trouble, or when one was making a journey; it was looked on as a means whereby one might seems the follower than the seems that the seems the seems that the seems that the seems that the seems that the see whereby one might secure the fulfilment of some wish, or escape some feared danger. 'I shall become a Nazirite, if such and such a thing happen,' became a common formula of asseveration; and this formula was abused so as to compel some and this formula was abused so as to compet some against their will to become Nazirites. The scribes also exercised their ingenuity upon the law in Nu 6, developing it more fully, rendering it more precise, and bringing it into complete harmony with the historical instances. They disallowed a Nazirite vow for a shorter period than 30 days; they distinguished between the lifelong Nazirate in accordance with the law, and that after the manner of Samson; the former permitted the Nazirite to cut his hair from time to time (after the example of Absalom (2.8 14²⁸), whom they regarded as a Nazirite), while the latter permitted him to come into contact with a dead body, with out having in consequence to go through the legal process of purification. But even in these days genuine piety was by no means extinct, and there must have been some among the Nazirites who were animated by a genuinely religious spirit. John the Baptist is described as a Nazirite for life to the process of the second of t (Lk 115), as was also, according to Eusebius (HE II. xxiii. 3, following Hegesippus), James the brother of our Lord. Anna (Lk 2^{not}) also is supposed by some to have been a Nazirite, but this is a mere conjecture.

Ac 2117ff. shows that the early Jewish Christians occasionally took the temporary Nazirite vow. It is also an illustration of the custom mentioned by Is also an illustration of the custom mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XIX. vi. 1), that wealthy Jews paid, in the case of poor Nazirites, the cost of the sacrifices required on the expiry of the period covered by the vow, and thus enabled poorer Israelites to undertake such a vow. Those who were thus 'at charges' for these poorer Nazirites, having themselves been purified for the purpose, might appear along with them in the temple, and had probably to regard themselves as consecrated had probably to regard themselves as consecrated persons until all the prescribed rites were duly performed. The seven days mentioned in v. 2 do not imply that in such cases they had also to take a vow for seven days; the expression merely in-forms us that, in this particular instance, seeing there were four vows to be paid, it required seven days to offer the necessary sacrifices (cf. v.  until the offering was offered for every one of them').

Nazirite vow. According to the rules laid down by the scribes, such a vow might be made outside of Palestine; but it had to be performed, in harmony with Nu 613, at the temple in Jerusalem. As to this, the only point of difference between the schools of Hillel and Shammai referred to the length of time during which the person who had vowed the vow in a heathen land must reside in Palestine before he was permitted to pay it at the temple. The school of Shammai demanded a residence in Palestine of only thirty days, which was the shortest and most common period of consecration; whereas the school of Hillel insisted that it must be for the whole time to which the vow originally referred. Nor can St. Paul's shearing of his head have been in consequence of levitical defilement contracted during the vow period (Nu 6°); for, according to the scribes, in the case of the defiled Nazirite, the shearing of the head had to take place in the holy land (though not necessarily at the temple); and on the eighth day he had to offer his sacrifice of cleansing at the temple (cf. Nu 6¹⁰). The vow in question cannot therefore have been a strictly Nazirite vow. In order, nevertheless, to vindicate its character as a real Nazirite vow, some have supposed that, having been living among Gentiles, the apostle shore his head at the beginning of his period of consecration, after the analogy of the Nazirite who had been in any way defiled; while others have supposed that it was a vow of special consecration to God, involving a temporary growth of the hair, and a subsequent cutting of it off, and that such a vow, though simply analogous to the Nazirite vow, and not involving a personal appearance at the temple, or the co-operation of the priests, was allowed to Jews of the Dispersion as a substitute for the strictly legal vow. It is admitted, however, that there is no evidence in support of these suppositions. It was evidently a private vow which the apostle had taken, and which he paid by shearing his head at Cenchreæ.

Knobel identifies it with Neiel of v. To comparing the relation of the words Jabneh and Jabneel. This does not help us much in any case, for the site of Neiel itself has not been discovered, and it was probably considerably west of Neah.

NEAPOLIS (Néa Πόλις, 'new city') was the port at which St. Paul landed, when, in accordance with his vision at Troas (Ac 16"), he sailed thence for Macedonia (Ac 1611) to begin his ministry in Europe. It was the seaport of Philippi, which lay about 10 miles inland. Its position has been generally identified, or at least closely associated, with that of the modern town (of about 5000 inhabitants) called Kavalla, in the vicinity of which various remains have been found pointing to an earlier town of some importance, especially a great aqueduct bringing water from some distance, and stones bearing Greek or Latin inscriptions. Cousinéry (Voyage dans la Macédoine, ii. p. 119 ff.) and Tafel (de Via Egnatia) have argued in favour of a site some 10 miles farther to the west, where there is a deserted harbour called Eski or Old Kavalla; but Hackett (see art. 'Neapolis' in Smith's DB) appears to have finally settled the matter in favour of the town now bearing the name of Kavalla. The latter is situated on the bay which takes its name from it, at a point where, nearly opposite to the island of Thasos, a promontory projects, having a harbour on either side; that one which faced the west, especially, affording so suitable an anchorage that at the time of the battle of Philippi the triremes of Neapolis (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv. 106). Its earlier name would seem to have been Daton or Datos, for Strabo designates Neapolis 'a town of the Dateni,' and describes Daton as 'possessing fruitful plains, and a port (λίμνη), and streams, and shipbuilding, and lucrative gold-mines, whence comes the proverb as to the "good things of Daton" (Strabo, vii. fr. 36). Probably the place received the newer name on becoming the seat of some fresh colony (from Thasos or from Athens?). Pliny (HN iv. 18) treats Neapolis as belonging to Thrace; but Strabo (vii. 330) and Ptolemy (iii. 13) connect it with Macedonia.

NEARIAH (ηγη)). — 1. A descendant of David, l Ch 3²². 2. A Simeonite, l Ch 4⁴². In both these passages B and A have Νωαδ(ε). d, but Luc. has Νεαριού and Νααριά. The interchange of ¬ and ¬ accounts for the difference between MT and BA of LXX. Which has preserved the true reading must remain uncertain.

NEBAIOTH (n'34 or n'34), Sam. κρι: LXX Naβαιώθ).—Firstborn of Ishmael, Gn 25¹⁵ 28° 36°, 1 Ch 12°. In Is 60° coupled with Kedar as the name of a pastoral tribe. The same tribe is mentioned repeatedly in the Cylinder Rm 1 of Assur-

banipal also in company with Kedar; the Assyrian form of the name is Na-ba-ai-te. In col. 8, ll. 15 ff. of that inscription we learn that their king Natnu, who was the first prince of the tribe that paid homage to the Assyrians, joined the revolting Arabs, but was defeated by Assurbanipal's forces. Their country is described as 'very distant' (asharshu ruuku) in l. 58; Glaser (Skizze, ii. 267, etc.) places them in the Arabian provinces Yemamah and Kasim, but it may be doubted whether they can be localized so exactly. His opinion, however, that the name has no connexion with the Nabataans, is probably to be accepted. In the despatch K. 562 (S. A. Smith, ii. 36) there is a reference to the Niba'ati, who probably represent the same tribe; and a king Nadan is mentioned in K. 524 (ib. 54), who may or may not be the king of Nebaioth. The king's name seems to be the equivalent of the Hebrew Nathan; it may have been altered by the Assyrian transcriber. The etymology of the name Nebaioth is probably to be found in Arabic; according to the Lisan al-Arab, xx. 172, nabawāt would mean 'lofty places, eminences.' The name certainly seems to be a feminen plural, which would exclude connexion with the Nabat.

NEBALLAT (5)33; BA om., $N^{a.a.mg int}$ Na β a $\lambda\lambda d\tau$).—A town mentioned only after the Captivity, along with Lod and Ono, as inhabited by Benjamites, Neh 11²⁴. It is probably the modern Beit Nebâla, a village N.E. of Lydda.

NEBAT (pq; Naβár (Naβáθ)).—Father of Jeroboam I. (1 K 11²⁸ and onwards). The constant designation of Jeroboam I. as 'ben-Nebat' is probably the usage of a writer later than Jeroboam ben-Jossh. It is intended, doubtless, to distinguish the two kings. On the first occasion of its use (1 K 11²⁸), the formula has been added at the expense of appropriateness, since Jeroboam is further described as the son of a widow (B viòs γυναικὸς χήρας). 'Son of Nebat' may have been absent from the earliest form of the narrative. It is less probable that 'widow woman' is secondary. Nebat was therefore dead before his son's advancement under Solomon. The name perhaps signifies 'brightness.' Its equivalence to happ' God is splendour' has been suggested (Cheyne, JQR xi. 559). That is known as a Sabsean name (Gesenius, HWB 12). The interpretation 'Nabatæan' conflicts with 1 K 11²⁸ ('Nebat, an Ephraimite').

NEBO (\text{\text{Naβ$\psi}}, Assyr. Nabium, contracted Nabu, 'the Prophet').—Nebo was the interpreter of the will of Bel-Merodach of Babylon, and consequently had a shrine in E-Baggilla, the great temple of Bel, at Babylon. But his own temple was Ê-Zida (now Birs.-Nimrdd) in Borsippa, the suburb of Babylon. He was the son of Merodach and Zarpanit, and the husband of Tasmit 'the hearer.' He presided over literature and science, and the cuneiform system of writing was regarded as his creation. Hence, in the pre-Semitic Sumerian language of Chaldea, he is termed dim-sar, 'the scribe.' Among his titles are those of 'the wise,' 'the intelligent,' 'the creator of the oracle,' 'the maker of writing,' 'the opener,' and 'enlarger of the ear.' Assurbanipal traces to him his zeal for knowledge. 'Nebo and Tasmit had given him broad ears and seeing eyes,' he says, so that he had caused the older literature of the country to be republished, as well as 'the secrets of Nebo, the list of all the characters that exist.' In later days Nebo was identified with Nusku, a solar deity of fire, who was the messenger of Bel of Nippur, just as Nebo was the messenger of Bel-

Merodach of Babylon. In the period of Bab. influence in Western Asia (B.C. 3800-1400) the name and worship of Nebo were carried into Syria name and worship of Nebo were carried into Syria with those of other Babylonian deities. Hence we find a Mount Nebo in Moab (Dt 32¹⁹, Is 15³), and a town of Nebo in Reuben (Nu 32⁹); see the following two articles. In Is 46¹ Bel-Merodach and Nebo represent the city of Babylon, over which they presided. In the days of the later Chaldean empire, the kings' names were for the most part compounds with Nebo (e.g. Nabopolassar, Nebuchadrezzar, Nabonid). See, further, Schrader, KAT² 412 f. [COT ii. 105 f.]; Meyer, Gesch. i. 179; Tiele, Gesch. 207 ff., 532 f. The name Abed-nego (Dn 1⁷ etc.) is for Abed-nebo, i.e. 'servant of Nebo.'

And I took thence the altar-hearths (?) of Jehovah and offered (?) them before Chemosh.' Nebo is not mentioned in the catalogue of Reubenite towns in Jos 13¹⁵⁻²⁵.

Eusebius (Onomasticon, 283, 93, 100) and Jerome (de Situ et Nom.) distinguish the town, Naβώρ, Nabo, from the mountain, Nabau, Naban, and place the town 8 miles south of Heshbon, and identify it with Chanaath (Kenath), or Nobah. Buhl (Geogr. 266) holds that the site of Nebo is to be looked for amongst the ruins on Mt. Nebo (Jebel Neba). Either the mountain received the name Nebo as containing a sanctuary of Nebo (cf. NEBO [god]), and the town was named after it; or the sanctuary was in the town, and the mountain was named after it; or the town and the mountain were so named independently, because each contained a sanctuary of Nebo.

Jerome, on Is 15°, states that there was at Nebo, Serome, on is 15°, states that there was at Nebo, 'Belphegor,' i.e. Baal-peor, the idol of Chemosh.

2. Town in Judah (12; Nαβειά, Ναβιά, Ναβού, Ναβού, Vulg. Nebo); mentioned Ezr 22°, Neh 7° 'the other Nebo,' as giving name to the 'children' or 'men of Nebo' who returned with Zerubbabel. According to Ezr 10°, in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, seven 'children of Nebo' had foreign whom they were compelled to discard wives, whom they were compelled to discard.

As Nebo, in Ezr 2, Neb 7, follows Bethel and Ai, it should be represented in the Greek (1 Es 5^{21}) by Neipels B, $\Phi weis$ A, which follows Betolion. But Lucian has $Ma\kappa \beta els$, and the number of the 'children of Niphis,' 158, is that given to Magbish in Ezr-Neh. Hence Neipels, etc., is held to represent Magbish (RVm, Meyer, Entstehung, 145). This Nebo is often identified with Nob, cf. Is 10²³, Neh 11²³, and the Nobai or Nebai of Neh 10²⁰, which is probably the clan of Nob, corresponding to the 'children of Nebai of Nebai of Nebai or Nebai Nob. The site of Nebo has been fixed at Beit Nuba, 12 miles N.W. of Jerusalem, and 8 from Lydda, or at Nuba, 4 miles south of Adullam (Armstrong, Names and Places, etc.; Buhl, Geogr. p. 198; Meyer, Entstehung, etc. pp. 145, 149, 155 i.).

It follows from the passages in Ezr-Neh that families from Nebo (Nob) had remained together in the Exile, and returned together, and thus became a post-exilic clan named after their original home. Beit Nuba is the Nobe or Anob of Jerome's Onomasticon, the Betenoble or Castellum Arnaldi of the Crusaders (Lane-Poole, Saladin, pp. 332–339).

The mention in 1 Ch 88 of Benjamite settlers in Moab suggests the possibility of a Benjamite colony in the Moabite Nebo, which when driven

NEBO, MT. (κτικό), Ναβαό).—The mountain from which Moses viewed, the promised land before his death. The word Nebo occurs in connexion with Moses only in Dt 32° (the command to ascend) and Dt 34¹ (account of the ascent) [both P]. It is found in the itinerary, Nu 33° (P). Comparing the command as given in Dt 3° and Nu 27° (closely parallel in substance but not in expression with Dt 3°) with the ascent described Dt 34½ and noting the 'mountains of Aberim' of 34th, and noting the 'mountains of Abarim' of Nu 33°, it follows that (1) Mt. Nebo forms part of the range of Abarim, and (2) the Top (head) of Pisgah (D) and Mt. Nebo (P) are alternative designations of the same spot (cf. Driver on Dt 341 in Internat. Crit. Comm.). Its situation may be determined within narrow limits. A ridge runs out west from the plateau of Moab (see note on Mishor in art. MEDEBA), sinking gradually; at first a broad brown field of arable land, then a at first a broad brown field of arable land, then a flat top crowned by a ruined cairn (to which the name Neba applies), then a narrower ridge ending in the summit called Sidahah, whence the alopes fall steeply on all sides (Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 129). Neba is 5 miles S.W. of Heshbon and 9½ W. of the north-east end of the Dead Sea. From it Western Palestine is in sight; but the view to the E. is shut out by the higher edge of the Mishor, and to the S. by the ridge running out from el-Maslubiyeh. Passing westward from Neba along the ridge to its western summit Siaghah, a distance of about 1½ mile, the whole of the Jordan Valley opens out to view, and the traveller may Valley opens out to view, and the traveller may see Gilead, Hermon, Tabor, Ebal and Gerizim, Neby Samwil and the Mt. of Olives, Jericho, the Lower Jordan and the Dead Sea as far as En-gedi. fuller descriptions may be found in Tristram, Land of Moab, p. 325; Bible Places, p. 360; Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 129 f.; G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 563; and Driver on Dt 34. The view may well be described as embracing 'all the land.' It has been questioned whether all the places mentioned been questioned whether all the places mentioned in Dt 34¹⁻³ can be seen from any point of the ridge. Those who wish to pursue this inquiry in detail may be referred to an article in PEFSt for April 1898, 'The Prospect from Pisgah,' by W. F. Birch. The 'hinder sea' RV (that is, westward, RVm), 'utmost sea' AV, is generally taken to mean the Mediterranean, as in Dt 11²⁴; and this count from any woint of the Neber range. cannot be seen from any point of the Neba range, though one traveller speaks of 'a faint and distant bluish haze' in the direction of Mt. Carmel. Birch says, 'From no mountain on the east side of the Dead Sea is it possible to see the Mediterthe Dead Sea is it possible to see the Mediterranean near Judah. Higher mountains intervene.' He suggests that 'the hinder sea' in this passage means the Dead Sea, as being behind Moses when he began his survey. But the passage need not imply that the Mediterranean is included in the view from Nebo or Pisgah. When rightly translated it runs as follows: 'And J' showed him all the land—(even) Gilead as far as Dan, and all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim and Manasseh, and all the land of Judah as far as the hinder sea, and the South and the Round [see CICCAR], (even) the plain of Jericho, the city of palm-trees as far as Zoar.' The writer says that God showed Moses all the land (compare the words of Dt 3²⁷), and what follows is his description of its extent, in which he states quite correctly that Judah extends as far as the hinder sea or Mediterranean.

Moses parted from the people whom he had led to their inheritance before undertaking that last mysterious journey; and of what he was permitted to see, it may be said, as of his sepulchre, no man knoweth it unto this day. The passage, translated as above, reduces the force of an objection which has been urged. Why should the land of Gilead be shown to Moses after he had already traversed it in the campaigns against Sihon and Og,* and allotted it to the 2½ tribes? Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 48) mentions Nebo as a very high mountain opposite Jericho; and Eusebius in the Onomasticon puts it 6 Roman miles west of Heshbon. The position seems to have been forgotten, for until recent times Jobel Attarus, a mountain about 10 miles to the south of the Neba ridge, has been identified with Nebo.

NEBUCHADREZZAR (ΨΑΤΡΣΙ, afterwards corrupted into Nebuchadnessar, ΨΑΙΡΣΙ, Ναβουχοδονοσόρ, Nabuchodonosor).—The Bab. Nabu-kudurriuzur ('O Nebo, defend the landmark'), the eldest son of Nabopolassar, and founder of the Bab. empire, who reigned from B.C. 604 to 561. A younger brother of his, Nebo-sum-lisir, is mentioned in a contract-tablet dated in the reign of tioned in a contract-tablet dated in the reign of Nabopolassar. He seems to have been of Kalda or Chaldæan origin, like Merodach-baladan. Acor Chaldean origin, like Merodach-baladan. According to Abydenus (Euseb. Chron. i. 9), he married Amuhia the daughter of the 'Median' (i.e. Manda) king. In B.C. 605 he defeated Pharaohnecho in a great battle at Carchemish (now Jerablûs) on the Euphrates (Jer 46³⁻¹³), and drove the Egyptians out of W. Asia. Bab. power was now established as far as the frontier of Egypt, and the king of Judah became a Bab. vassal. At this moment Nabopolassar died, and Nebuch. was recalled to Babylon, where he was proclaimed king, B.C. 604. Nebuch now entered upon an era of wars and building. Of the wars we have hitherto learned but little from the inscriptions, which are filled with accounts of his building operations. Tyre, which had revolted, was be-sieged from the 7th year of his reign (Jos. c. Ap. i. 21) for 13 years, and apparently captured (but see Ezk 29¹⁵; art. BABYLONIA in vol. i. p. 229⁵, also Expos. Times, 1899, pp. 378, 475, 520). In the 40th year of Nebuch.'s reign (see contract-tablet in RP, new series, iv. 99 f.), it was full of Bab. officials. After the investment of Tyre, Nebuch. marched against Jerus., where Jehoiakim had also rebelled against Jerus., where Jehoiakim had also rebelled (2 K 241). Jehoiakim was put to death (according to Jos. Ant. X. vi. 3), and his son Jehoiachin placed on the throne. Three months later he was deposed, and carried captive to Babylonia, his uncle Zedekiah being appointed king in his place. Zedekiah, however, intrigued with Apries of Egypt, and threw off the Bab. yoke. For the third time, accordingly, Nebuch. invaded Judah; the Egyp. army was forced to retreat (Jer 375-8), and Jerus. was closely besieged. At the end of two years (B.C. 586) Jerus. was taken, the palace and temple destroyed, and the upper classes carried temple destroyed, and the upper classes carried into exile (2 K 25^{15.}). Zedekiah, who had escaped from the city, was captured near Jericho, and brought to Nebuch. at Riblah, near Hamath, where his eyes were put out, and his sons and chief nobles put to death. Gedaliah, a Jew, was made governor of Judah, the Babylonian garrison there being placed under the command of Nebuzaradan (2 K 25^{st.}). It is to this period that we should probably assign the inscriptions of Nebuchadrezzar which have been found on the bank of the Nahr el-Kelb, north of Beyrout, and in the Wādy Brissa, on the road to Hamath. A fragment of his annals informs us that in his 37th year (B.C. 567) he made a campaign against Amasis of Egypt, overrunning a portion of the Delta (see Jer 46¹²⁻²⁵, Ezk 29²⁻²⁰), and defeating the soldiers of 'Phut of the Ionians' (Putu Yavan). He was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach in B.C. 561.

Babylon, which had been destroyed by Sennacherib, and rebuilt by Esarhaddon, became one of the wonders of the world under Nebuchadrezzar. He made it practically impregnable with three limes of wall, the two principal of which were called the Imgur-Bel and the Nimitti-Bel. He also surrounded it with a deep moat, and lined the bed of the Euphrates, which passed through the city, with brick, building walls and quays on either side. He lavished an enormous amount of treasure on the temples of Babylonia and the other cities of Chaldea; built a new palace which was completed in 'fifteen days'; and is said to have erected 'a hanging garden' for his 'Median' wife. Great canals were dug or reopened throughout Babylonia; a huge reservoir was constructed near Sippar for storing the water needed in irrigation; and a port was founded on the shores of the Persian Gulf. Nebuch. gives an account of his architectural works in the India House inscription (translated by Ball, RP, new ser. iii. pp. 102-123). We gather from his inscriptions that he was a man of peculiarly devout and religious character (see Sayce, Religion of the Ancient Babylonians, p. 97). Cf., further, Schrader, KAT's 361 ff. NEBUSHAZBAN (1719th); LXX omits; Theodotion, quoted from the Hexapla in Qms, has Nafowasafafar. The writing of the final; small, and the substitution of t instead in Kennicott's MSS, is probably due to the desire to mutilate names compounded with those of heathen deities, as exemplified in the name of Abed-nego for Abed-Nebo; compare also Nimrod and Nisroch).

To all appearance there were among the officials of the Babylonian court many who bore the same title, and there is no reason to suppose, therefore, that Ashpenas (Dn 18) succeeded Nebushazban as rab-sarts—indeed, another official of the same title is mentioned in Jer 392. The name Nebushazban occurs in the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions under the form of Nabu-susibanns, 'Nebo, save me,' the first time in a list of names printed in WAI ii. 64, col. i. l. 32, and again in Inschriften von Nabonidus, 161, l. 6. This latter text is dated in the 4th year of Nabonidus, that is, 34 years after the capture of Jerusalem; and although it is not by any means impossible that the personage named may be identical with that mentioned in Jer 3913, it must be assumed, in the absence of any confirmation, that he is a different individual. The name is quite Babylonian in its form, the first element, Nebu, being the Hebrew reproduction of the divine name Nabū (Nebo, Nebu) found in Nebuchadnezzar and Nebuzaradan (Nabū-zēr-iddina). The second element, sazib, is the imperative sing. of the Shaper of &zebu, 'to save,' the third element being the pronominal suffix [an]ni indicating the 1st person (object). In all probability, proof could easily be found that the Hebrew form approximates very closely to the popular Babylonian pronunciation, which the interface of the country of the cou in which the i of sazib was probably suppressed (cf. NEBUZARADAN (בְּחִיאָרָה, Νεβουζαρδάν, Bab. Nabu-zira-iddina, 'Nebo has given a seed '), a name which is by no means uncommon in the contract-tablets. He commanded Nebuchadnezzar's bodyguard, and, after the fall of Jerus., was entrusted with the work of carrying out the wishes and policy of his master (2 K 25⁸⁻²⁰). He selected the captives, and brought the leading supporters of Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. Five years later he was again sent to Palestine, and carried away from it into exile 745 persons (Jer 52). This was after the murder of Gedaliah.

NECK (was savedr, ητό 'ōreph'; τράχηλος).—1. The neck under the yoke was a figure borrowed from agriculture, and implied a state of ownership, dependence, and toil. The broken yoke was recovered freedom (Gn 27%) Is 10²⁷, Jer 27⁸, Ac 15¹⁰). Closely connected with this was the stiffness of the neck that refused to recognize God's right to possess, command, and direct (Dt 31²⁷, Jer 7²⁶, Neh 3°). 2. The foot on the neck was an emblem of complete subjection, borrowed from military conquest (Jos 10²⁴, Ro 16⁴, cf. Ps 110¹). It is frequently seen on the Egyptian monuments. RV correctly tr. 2 S 22²¹ (= Ps 18²⁰) 'Thou hast made mine enemies turn their backs to me,' for AV 'Thou hast given me the necks of mine enemies' (cf. Ex 23²⁷, 2 Ch 29⁶, Jer 18¹⁷ etc.). 3. For the neck adorned with a chain, the words in garon and הוויף gargārāh [only in pl. הוויף] throat' are also used (Pr 1°, Ezk 161). 4. To fall upon the neck is a form of salutation in the East (Gn 334 4629, Lk 15%). The head is laid on one shoulder and then on the other close to the cheek. It is still part of the usual act of salutation when a meeting takes place between relatives or intimate friends of the same sex. It is the brotherly kiss of the monks and Oriental clergy. With them a custom originating in natural affection has descended to ecclesiastical routine and automatic formality. For Mt 186 (and parallels) see MILLSTONE.

The sources for the history of this Pharaoh, who succeeded his father Psammetichus I. as second king of the 26th Dynasty† (B.C. 610-594), are the references to him in the OT and a short notice by Herodotus. No native monuments of historical importance No native monuments of historical importance from his reign have come to light. The 26th Dynasty is localized by Manetho at Sais in the Delta. It is, however, possible that, although residing principally there, the family was of Ethiopian descent (see Schäfer in £g. Ztschr. xxxiii. 116). Psammetichus had initiated a policy of larger commercial interests which, unknown to the Egypt of preceding dynasties, had already reached a considerable development in his son's

The monarchy relied now, both in foreign wars and against internal revolts, not upon native But Neco aimed also at a more extended in-fluence at sea, and set about constructing a canal which should, by joining the waters of the upper Delta and the Bitter Lakes, make navigation between the Mediterranean and Red Sea possible (Herod. ii. 158). But the work was not finished by him: whether owing to discouragement from an oracle or to the pressure of external politics, the canal was abandoned, to be completed eventually by Darius.* The fleets of triremes which he built on both seas (ib. 159), and the Phenician expedition which he engaged to circumnavigate Africa (iv. 42), were further results of the same policy.

The information in 2 K 23207. as to his Syrian The information in 2 K 23 as we also system campaign (in 608) corresponds to a shorter account by Herodotus (ii. 159). The desire to regain the lost ascendency in Asia was always in Egypt a mediant motive for such an undertaking; the immediate inducement may have been the defencelessness of Assyria, but recently overthrown by the onslaught of the new Babylonian monarchy. We are told that, during their northward march, the Egyptians were encountered by the army of Assyria's vassal, Josiah of Judah, at Megiddo (2 K 23²⁶K., and a mere amplification of this in 2 Ch 35²⁶K.) or, according to Herod. (l.c.), at Magdolus (Mayouhis way to the Euphrates; but, on arriving there, returned, capturing on his southward journey the town of Kadytis, and sending in gratitude his armour to the shrine of the Didymæan Apollo at Branchide. Certain points in the story are, however, obscure. The locality of the battle is either (1) Megiddo S. of Mt. Carmel, which—though Herodotus' \(\pi_i \) speaks for this—would be outside Josiah's frontier;\(\pi\) or (2) Migdol = Magdolus, in which case there is a choice between several places of the near that in Forth S. of Polynian. in which case there is a choice between several places of the name, that in Egypt, S. of Pelusium, being the least probable. W. Max Müller (in Mitt. Vorderas. Ges. 1898, 3. 54) proposes Migdal-Gad (Jos 15³⁷); Winckler (in Orient. Lit. Z. 1898, 395, and in Benzinger's B. d. Könige, 207) recalls another Migdol, the Turris Stratonis (Cæsarea) S. of Akko. Kadytis again has been taken for Jerusalem, for Kadesh on the Orontes, and—the most probable view—for Gaza (cf. Herod. iii. 5 and Jer 47¹). and Jer 471).

Neco, pursuing his Asiatic policy, refused to countenance the popular election of Josiah's son, Jehoahaz, to the throne. During a second campaign the newly elected king was seized at Riblah, and taken to end his days in Egypt. He was re-placed by his elder brother Eliakim, whose name was changed, perhaps in compliment to the anti-Babylonian party, || to Jehoiakim. Through him Neco was able to exact from the Jews, as earlier Pharaohs had so often done in Syris, a considerable fine—100 talents of silver and a talent of gold (2 K 232).

Now, however, he found himself forced to face the advancing power that had destroyed Nineveh. Nebuchadrezzar II., son of Nabopolassar, led a Babylonian army against him, and completely routed him at Carkemish (604). All his Syrian provinces were at the disposal of the victors (2 K

NEEDLE'S EYE (τρήμα [var. lec. τρυτήμα] ραφίδος, Mt 19²⁴; τρυμαλιά ραφίδος, Mk 10²⁸; τρήμα βελότης, Lk 18²⁸).—The impossibility of a camel's passing through the eye of a needle is used by Jesus to emphasize the difficulty of a rich man's entering into the kingdom of God. An attempt is sometimes made to explain the needle's eye as a reference to the small door, a little over 2 ft. square, in the large heavy gate of a walled city. This mars the force without materially altering the meaning. the large heavy gate of a walled city. This mars the figure without materially altering the meaning, and receives no justification from the language and traditions of Palestine. There is no custom of traditions of Palestine. There is no custom of calling this small opening 'the eye'; it is usually named 'the small door,' 'hole,' or 'window.' If there were such a custom, it would not help the interpretation suggested, because Orientals never speak of the eye of a needle; it is simply the slit or hole, 'n hur, Arab. khurm. The literal meaning is therefore to be preferred.* See, further, Swete on Mk 10²⁸, and art. CAMEL in vol. i. p. 345³⁵.

G. M. MACKIE. MERSING.—There are in Middle English two distinct verbs fness and ness. The former means 'to breathe hard' and is connected with the Gr. The found in Anglo-Sax., means 'to sneeze.' Sneeze,' which is pure Teut., though not found in Anglo-Sax., means 'to sneeze.' Sneeze, 'is in fact simply a dislocation replaced 'nesse,' is in fact simply a dislocation replaced 'nesse,' is in Sheeze, which has now replaced 'neese,' is in fact simply a dialectic variety of that word (cf. 'lightly' and 'alightly'). In the 1611 ed. of AV the word 'neese' is accepted from Coverdale in 2 K 436 'the child neesed seven times.' The meaning is evidently 'sneezed' (Heb. אור Po. of [אור] prob. onomatopoetic, cf. sternuo), and mod. editors (since 1762) have so spelt it (though Scriv-ener returns to the older spelling 'neesed'). the word of. Chapman, Odysseys, xix. 732, 736. For

 $^{\circ}$ On the ingenious but futile proposal to substitute 'cable' $(x \neq \mu \lambda \epsilon)$ for 'camel' $(x \neq \mu \lambda \lambda \epsilon)$, found as early as Cyril of Alexandria, see Hastings and Nestle in Expos. Times, ix. (1898), 188, 474.

'This said, about the house, in echoes round, Her son's strange neesings made a horrid sound; At which the Queen yet laugh'd, and said, "Go call The stranger to me. Heard'st thou not, to all My words last utter'd, what a neesing brake From my Telemachus?"

But in Job 41¹⁹ we find in 1611 AV 'By his neesings a light doth shine,' which again comes down from Coverdale. Modern editors have retained the spelling 'neesings' here, perhaps from a feeling that the modern 'sneeze' did not express the meaning, as it certainly does not. The Heb. (my ou) is a different word from that found in 2 K 4¹⁵, and clearly refers to the crocodile's habit of inflating itself, as it lies basking in the sun, and then forcing the heated breath through its nostrils: this in the sun appears like a stream of light (Dav.). Now this is the meaning not of neese, but of fnees. Wyclif's word in 1388 ed. is 'fnesynge,' and it is probable that Coverdale, by whose time the verb fness had gone out of use, adopted 'neese' either as the same word or its nearest equivalent. In any case 'neesings' should no longer be retained, still less should it be replaced by 'sneezings' as in Amer. RV; the modern word is 'snortings.' In Jer 8'6 Wyclif has (1382) 'Fro Dan is herd the fnesting of his hors,' and there, though the Heb. word ("TIL) is different, the meaning is the same, and AV has 'snorting,' after Douay 'snoring (sic) noyse.' this in the sun appears like a stream of light (Dav.).

NEGEB (1με, lit. 'the dry'; LXX νάγεβ, ή ξρημος) was a name specially applied to that district south of Judah which in comparison with the rest of Pal. was waterless.* From the fact that this region did lie to the south of Judea rose the later use of the word to indicate that point of the compass.† This use became so habitual, the original sense of Negeb as a geographical term so obscured, that AV ignored the distinction. Wilton (The Negeb, London, 1863) was among the first to call attention to its exact sense, and RV has restored the more accurate trⁿ. About forty passages in OT can be understood only when this is remembered. Thus, e.g., Abraham is represented (Gn 13¹) as going up from Egypt into the land of the Negeb, while of course the direction of his marsh was not south course the direction of his march was not southwards but northwards.

The hill-country (vo) of Judah near Hebron marks the limit of the Negeb on the north. On the marks the limit of the Negeo on the north. On the E. its mountains form steep and barren precipices above the Southern Ghor and the Arabah. W. it descends more gradually and with wider wadis toward the sandy tract along the Mediterranean. On the S. the plateau of Jebel el-Magrah, 'about 70 miles long and 40 to 50 broad,' marks the natural boundary, though it is probable that, when the inhabitants were able to possess themselves of what are now the mountains of the Azazimeh, the name of Negeb may have extended to these also.

The entire district is mountainous, composed of ridges, which run in general from E. to W. and which rise from el-Magrah towards the 'hill' of Judah in a succession of great terraces. These are drained by a number of wadis, shorter and more drained by a number of wadis, shorter and more abrupt on the E., wider and more gradual on the west. One result of this characteristic of the Negeb was that no great road ever ran through it from north to south. Trade and war flowed between Pal. and Egypt along 'the way of the sea,' the shore-road by Gaza and the Wady el-'Arish. The peoples of the N. and N.E. would seek Egypt

by what is the modern Hajj road, which leaves the Negeb precipices well to the W. of it. Traders from Gaza to Akabah and Arabia could avoid the worst of these mountains by skirting them on the W. and crossing into the Arabah to the southward of Jebel el-Magrah. Only the men of Hebron and S. Judah, in order to reach these points, would probably be forced to climb one of the steep passes of Magrah—Yemen, Sufah, or Fikreh.* The country was always isolated. A further consequence of this character belonging to the district was that the Negeb formed a natural frontier to Judah on the south. No army, especially if it possessed cavalry or chariots, could reach Hebron and Jerus. in this direction. Only once do we read of an invasion entering by this route, when Chedorlaomer (Gn 14), after rounding the S. end of the Dead Sea, led his army across the 'plateau of the Amalekites,' and so fell on Hazazon-tamar. †

In comparison with Judah the country is barren and waterless, though in comparison with the desert et-Tih it is fertile. 'Almost sudden was the transition to the upland wilderness, the Negeb, a series of rolling hills clad with scanty herbage here and there, especially on their northern faces. Nothing can be barer than the south-country of Judah, neither grand desolation, nor wild, but utter barrenness—not a tree nor shrub, but stunted herbage covered with myriads of white snails which afford food to thousands of birds.' So writes Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 360 f.), and he adds that the suddenness of the transition (he was travelling northwards) has a geological cause, because the soft limestone covers on these hills the hard crystalline which makes the south wilderness hopeless. But Palmay (December 1972) ness hopeless. But Palmer (Desert of Exodus, vol. ii.) states that there are abundant signs that this region in earlier times was cultivated, and maintained a large population. Toward the S. there are many rude cairns from a prehistoric period, and hazerim or stone enclosures for folding sheep. Toward the N., and especially the N.W., the ruins of towns are frequent, the hillsides are covered with flint-heaps over which to train vines, many of the wadis show signs of cultivation in terraces and dams which would keep and use the winter torrents that stream through these. This latter feature of the cultivation has largely determined the fate of the Negeb. The artificial character of the irrigation, without which cultivation was impossible, depended for its continuance upon Whenever this was granted to the Negeb, its towns bloomed into a fitful importance; but, whenever this ceased, the neglected works fell into ruin, the desert reasserted itself, the Bedawin swarmed in from the south, or the people reverted to that earlier condition. And what has always aided that reversion has been that the country when in its natural condition is stated to be the very ground for browsing camels.

Thus the Negeb was the favourite home of the early Israelites, while they were still nomads. Here their forefathers are represented as wandering between the more settled Egypt and Palestine (Abraham Gn 20¹, Isaac 24^{cs}, Jacob 37¹ 46⁵). The original home of the traditional Avvim may be looked for in this district (Jos 13st), and of them the chief characteristic which is noted (Dt 2^{cs}) is that they 'dwelt' in hatērîm, those stone enclosures of a nomad-race which depends on its locks. But, when Israel approached this border

* Those indomitable road-makers, the Romans, did not shun even these hills, as the Peutinger tables and broken milestones prove. from the wilderness, the spies reported that the Negeb was inhabited, not by Avvim, but by Analek (Nu 13²⁸, cf. Gn 14⁷); and this people associated with the Canaanites (Nu 14²⁸. ⁴⁹) was strong enough to repel the invaders at Zephath-hormah, the modern Sebaita. It is possible that Amalek held the plateau, while the Canaanites occupied the more cultivated wadis. With Amalek as old inhabitants of the land 1 S 27⁹ associates the Geshurites and the Gizrites or Girzites.

The region was overrun by Simeon when that tribe turned southward with Judah from Jericho; at least the cities assigned to Simeon (Jos 19¹⁻⁶) lie here. Along with them went the Kenites, who, with the natural instinct of a clan which had never known anything except the life of nomads, settled near Amalek (Jg 1¹⁶°). But the shock of conquest, where it succeeded, shook down the artificial cultivation; Amalek till the days of Saul was ever on one flank, the Philistines rose into strength upon the other side; Simeon was probably from the beginning the rudest of all the clans (Gn 34, etc.). This tribe, never left in peace, needing peace more than the others, and planted in a district which peculiarly required peace, could not maintain itself, and merged partly into Judah, partly into the Southern Bedawin. The cities of the Negeb are enumerated in Jos 15²¹⁻²³, and assigned there to Judah. On the edge of this district, at Ziklag, Achish

On the edge of this district, at Ziklag, Achish planted David (1 S 276). One cannot but suspect that by means of this outpost of men, who were already accustomed to border war, he hoped to cover, against the raids of the lawless border tribes, the route down to Egypt, and possibly that to Akabah. Incidentally it is noted (1 S 3014 2710) that the south country was divided at this period into the Negeb of the Cherethites, of Jerahmeel, of the Kenites, of Judah and of Caleb, to which Jg 116 may add that of Arad (for details see these names). During the royal period the Negeb was considered a part of Judah, and shared the fortunes of that kingdom. Jeremiah (1316) speaks of it as belonging to Judah, and as suffering, perhaps more than the rest of the country, from the troubles of his time; but in an exhaustive list of the districts which made up the Southern realm (1726 3244 3315) he promises restoration to the Negeb as to the rest. Obadiah (v. 1861.) anticipates that its cities shall possess Edom, from which some have inferred that Edom, which finally overran this district, was then pressing on the borders of the weakened kingdom. See, further, on this passage, art. Obadiah, p. 579.

LITERATURE.—See references in the body of the article. Most of the usual books on Pal. geography devote a section to this subject. Of these, Robinson, BRP, is here the best. E. Wilton, The Negeb, and Trumbull, Kadsah Barnes, are devoted to that district, but are popular. The most thorough work is still that of Palmer, Desert of the Brookes, vol. ii.

NEGO (121 [once Dn 3 min]).—Found only in the compound proper name Abed-nego (121 The Servant of Nego') given by the prince of the eunuchs to Azariah, one of Daniel's three companions, Dn 17 22 3125. (LXX and Theod. 'Aβδεναγώ). It is practically certain that '121 is a corruption, which may be set down to the mistake of a copyist or, more probably, of the author of Dn, from '21 NEBO (wh. see). Cf. the use of Nebuchadnezzar for the correct form -rezzar. This is the view of Hitzig, Grätz, Schrader (KAT 429 [COT ii. 126]), Sayce (HCM 532), etc., and is supported by the discovery of the name 'Abed-nebo' on a bilingual Assyr.-Aram. tablet of the 7th cent. (iii. Rawl. 46 col. i. 82) and in two Aramaic inscriptions of the 6th and 5th cents. B.C. discovered, one of them by Flinders Petrie and the other by Sayce, on the sandstone "Bead in the last clause 'went and dwelt with Amalek.'

rocks north of Silsilis in Upper Egypt (see HCM 177 n.). The same name was borne, long after the Christian era, by heathen Syrians (Bevan, Daniel, p. 61). It is possible that the author of Dn purposely changed Nebo into Nego, in order to obscure the reference to a heathen deity.

J. A. SELBIE. NEHELAMITE, THE (ヤウロハ).—An epithet applied to Shemaiah, a false prophet who opposed Jeremiah, Jer 29^{24, 31, 32}. According to analogy the word should mean an inhabitant of Nehelam, but there is no place of that name mentioned in the Bible. This, however, is not a fatal objection. The Targ. derives the word from a place Helam, LXX $\Delta h \lambda d\mu$, which is mentioned in 2 S $10^{16.17}$ as apparently near the Euphrates. The LXX in apparently near the Euphrates. The LXX in Jer 36 [Heb. 29] has B Alλaμείτην, ANQ Έλαμίτην. Vulg. agrees with English Versions. 'Nehelamite' might also be related to the personal name Helem (1 Ch 728, Zeo 614). The AVm 'dreamer' is of course incorrect, yet there can be little doubt that a play on the words 'chyn and chn' to dream' was in the prophet's mind. This verb and the cognate noun (ch'n) are used specifically in Jer (23^{25, 27, 28, 28}, cf. Dt 13^{2, 4, 6}) of the dreams of false prophets. The words elsewhere are scarcely ever used of the higher inspiration, being employed, e.g., of Jacob, Gn 28¹²; Joseph, 37²⁶; Pharaoh and his servants, 40²⁶. 41¹⁶. (all E, not elsewhere in Hex.); of a lower order of prophets than Moses, Nu 12⁶ (cf. lower order of prophets than Moses, Nu 12⁶ (cf. Job 33¹⁸); of the Midianite, Jg 7^{13.13}; the object of Saul's desire, 1 S 28^{6.18}; of Solomon, 1 K 3¹⁸; of old men in latter days, Jl 2²⁶; of Nebuchadnezzar, Dn 2^{16.}; of Daniel, Dn 1^{17.}

NEHEMIAH (πρη.).—Nehemiah is a conspicuous instance of the right man in the right place. It was his privilege to render great service to his nation, for which both his character and his posi-tion fitted him. He was patriotic, courageous, and God-fearing; he knew how to exercise the inflexible will of an autocrat, as well as to be persuasive when that would best accomplish the good end he had in view. Our reliable informa-tion concerning Nehemiah and his times is contained almost wholly in the parts of his memoirs which have come down to us. We may regret that this memoir was not preserved in full, but we cannot but rejoice in what we have; for it affords us a picture of this great patriot which is clear and well-proportioned. It gives us no information, however, about his early life or ancestry, except in the heading that he was the son of Hacaliah (Neh 11).

The first of Chisley, the ninth month (our Dec.), of the 20th year † of Artaxerxes I. ‡ Longimanus, B.C. 445, found Neh. in Susa, the chief city of Elam, and the winter residence of the Persian court

See EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. Torrey holds that only chs. 1. 2. 33-39 (Eng. 41-9) are genuine memoirs of Nehemiah. The rest of the book he assigns to the Chronicler; and this, with the whole of Exr as a historical source, he says, 'has no value whatever'.—Comp. and Hist. Value of Exr.-Neh. 1896 (Beihafts

† If Chislev and Nisan (cf. 1¹ and 2¹) were both in the 20th year of Artaxerxes, Neh. must have reckoned the year from the autumn. Nisan was the first month of the Jewish as well as of the Bab year. If Neh. reckons in the usual way, his audience with the king (2¹) must be placed in the king's 21st year, and so B.O. 444. On the chronology see Nowack, Heb. Arch. i. 214ff.; Berth.-Bys. Kom. 226; Schrader, KAT'; in loc.

† Torrey says that we do not know which Artaxerxes is referred to in Neh. He is inclined to put the composition of Neh about the year B.O. 372 (7).

(Del. Paradies, 326). A company of men, among whom was his brother Hanani, had just returned from Jerusalem. Neh. eagerly questioned them about the condition of the city and of the people who with Ezra had been struggling to rebuild the State. Their report was most depressing to the patriot: 'The remnant which is left from the captivity there in the province are in evil plight and in great reproach; the wall of Jerus. is broken down, and its gates are burned with fire' (11-3).

Does Hanani refer to the destruction of the city by command of Nebuch. in 586 (2 K 25^{MT}.), or to a recent catastrophe? In favour of the former view it may be urged that we have no record of either the rebuilding of the walls and the setting up of the gates, or their second destruction. Whatever may be the date of Exr 4^{MT} (see EZE.-NEH., BOOK OF), it is evident that the rebuilding described there was merely begun, not finished. The enemies of the Jews procured an edict to stop the building, but not to destroy the little that was already restored. If such a destruction had taken place, it is singular that it should be mentioned neither by Exra nor by the compiler. On the other hand, if the destruction reported by Hanani had taken place more than a century before, the report would not be unexpected news, and consequently would not make so great an impression upon Nehemiah. It might be urged that he had hoped that measures had been taken to continue the restoration, and was depressed to learn that nothing was being done. But Neh.'s narrative lends no colour to such an interpretation. See, further Stade, GVI ii. 161; Benjamin, Persia (Story of the Nations) 127; Montefiore, Höbert Lect. 1892, 311; Chepne, Ramp. Lect 1898, 71, 82, 231 t., JRL 37 fl.; Gräts, Hist. of the Jews, Eng tr. i. 383.

When Nah heard the had news he 'sat down Does Hanani refer to the destruction of the city by command

When Neh. heard the bad news he 'sat down and wept, and mourned for days, fasting and praying before the God of heaven. His prayer, which is full of Deuteronomic expressions (OTJC² 427), acknowledges the sins of the Jewish people, but calls upon God to fulfil His promise in view of the repentance of the people, and to 'grant his servent (Neh) mercy before this man' is the king servant (Neh.) mercy before this man, i.e. the king (1⁴⁻¹¹). The prayer put into Neh.'s mouth by Josephus is somewhat different: 'How long, O Lord, wilt Thou overlook our nation, while it suffers so great miseries, and while we are made the prey and spoil of all men?' (Ant. XI. v. 6).

Nehemiah's position as cupbearer to the king ensured him an audience; and as the office was high one with rich emoluments, he had a point of advantage in preferring a request, and the means to accomplish his purpose. Yet it was four months before his wishes were made known to the king. He was waiting a favourable opportunity; and this came only when he was called to serve the wine when 'no one else was before the king' (216 acc. to LXX). His agitation was so great when the decisive moment came that his face betrayed him, and he was sore afraid as the king reprovingly asked him the cause of his dejection. However, he stated his troubles frankly: 'Have I not reason for a dejected countenance, since the city of the graves of my fathers lies in ruins, and its gates are destroyed by fire! (2°). Encouraged by the king, he asked permission to go to Jerus. to rebuild the city. As Neh. mentions the fact that the queen was sitting by her lord at the time (2°), she may have exerted her influence in his favour.† At all events the king granted his officer a limited leave of absence, gave him letters to the governors of the provinces west of the Euphrates, and to Asaph, the keeper of the royal forest, that Neh. might secure timber for the gates of the citadel of the temple, for the wall of the city, and for the temple itself.‡ Neh. set out with an armed escort furnished by the king, and on the way delivered the letters to the governors, not to apprise them of his plans, as Grätz supposes, but to secure his passage through the country, his letters to them being virtually passports. At the outset he learned of the hostility of Sanballat and Tobiah, who were troubled at the news that a man had come from Paris to sale the majorness the come from Persia to seek the welfare of the Israelites (27-10).

Neh. waited for three days (211) to study the situation, then without disclosing his plans to any one (2125.) he made a night inspection of the walls (2^{1st.}) he made a night inspection of the walls attended only by his guard, or by Hanani and a few others who had come with him from Susa. A city was in antiquity a city in the full sense of the word only if it preserved its walls' (Stade). An exilic poet had cried, 'build thou the walls of Jerusalem' (Ps 51^{1s}), and Neh, was determined now to remove Jerusalem's reproach. Accordingly he assembled the leaders and said to them, You see the evil plight we are in, in that Jerus. is in ruins, and its gates burned with fire' (217), at the same time informing them of the powers which the king had conferred upon him, and of his purpose to restore the walls. The people saw the opportunity, and responded readily to the call. Sanballat and Tobiah, joined now by Geshem, or Gosham as Wellhausen says it should be read (Irr. Gesch. 2 169), insinuated the charge of rebellion against Neb. but the charge neither intimilion against Neh.; but the charge neither intimi-

It is impossible to tell how extensive the damage to the walls was. The word used by Neh. in 1³ and to the walls was. The word used by Neh. in 1° and 218 (728) implies that there were only breaches to repair; but these were evidently of wide extent. Neh. was fortunate in securing the aid of the whole population of Jerus, and of several companies from other parts of Judah. There were men from Jericho, Tekoa, Gibeon, Mizpah, Zanoah, and Keilah. Men of every class laboured at the walls with their own hands: it is said to the discredit of the poles of Tekoa en if it were an execution. the nobles of Tekos, as if it were an exceptional case, that they refused to put their neck to the work (3⁵); we find express mention of priests, Levites, goldsmiths, and perfumers (or apothecaries) among the labourers. Neh. divided the work among the various bodies with characteristic insight; we read of five cases in which men were working at the breaches close by their own dwellings. (3^{10, 22, 25, 20)}.

Some serious difficulties had to be met, however, before all the breaches could be closed. Sanballat, finding that his insinuation of rebellion had been ineffective, and that the Jews were evidently serious in their purpose to rebuild, tried to rouse the army stationed in Samaria; Tobiah indulged freely in ridicule, trying to persuade himself that the labour of the Jews could not accomplish Neh.'s purpose. 'If a fox should go up on their stone wall, he would break it down' (3. Eng. 4.).

The people did not heed the scoffing, but continued their work with a will. When all the breaches were closed with a wall half its proper height, Sanballat and his allies, augmented now by guer-illa bands of Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites, realized that prompt and vigorous action was necessary if the almost incredible progress of the wall was to be stopped. They resolved to march secretly to Jerus, and stop the restoration by force of arms (4⁵, Eng. 4¹¹). Meanwhile the working under high pressure was telling upon men unused to such labour as laying a massive stone wall, especially when the clearing away of the rubbish was so difficult and laborious a part of the task. But their burdens could not be lightened yet; in fact, the activity of the enemy now added much to their hardships. Reports came in of the intended attack, and Neh. at once armed his workmen for resistance.* He was acting according to the authority vested in him by the king, while his enemies were taking the law into their own hands. The Jews exchanged the trowel for the sword, and were stationed to defend the most unprotected places in the wall. The enemy had counted upon a surprise. When they saw the Jews armed and drawn up for battle, they abandoned their purpose to attack, and the builders resumed their work. But the enemy evidently remained in the neighbourhood waiting a chance to take the Jews at a disadvantage, so that the labourers on the wall kept their swords by their side, and a part of the men were detailed to hold the larger weapons and defensive armour in readiness. Neh. kept a trumpeter by him to give warning of the point of attack (4⁶⁻¹⁷, Eng. 4¹⁹⁻²⁸). The people were all now obliged to remain in the city at night, for the enemy held possession of the outlying country, and the city could not be left for a single hour without vigilant defenders; so critical was the time, that Neh. and the people alike slept in their clothes. Yet there is no record of an actual battle, and such silence is a pretty sure indication that the Samaritans and their allies never ventured on an open attack, and never found the coveted opportunity for a surprise; but the vigilance and precautions of Neh. show plainly that the danger was for a long time imminent.

Another form of trouble now required the leader's attention. The people who were labouring at the walls had been obliged to abandon their usual occupations, many of them to leave their homes and fields. The enemy overran the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will apply the country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country districts at will be considered as a second country district. tricts at will, and very likely plundered the homes of those who were working at the walls. Supplies were getting scarce for such people, so that they had to mortgage their fields and vineyards and houses, either to get food or to pay the king's tribute. Many had pledged their children for debt, and these were sold as slaves. The wealthier classes had taken advantage of the necessity of classes nad taken advantage of the necessity of the poor. Neh. was justly angry, and promptly summoned the offenders before a public meeting. He reviewed his own generous course, and appealed to them to be liberal, restoring the mortgaged land, and remitting a part of the debt which the people were unable to pay. It is pleasant to know that his request was responded to cordially; and the people took an oath to execute their pledge (ch. 5).

The walls were finished amidst such trying difficulties, and there only remained the doors to be set up in the gates to make the city's defences com-plete. But Nehemiah's enemies had not yet given up. Having failed to intimidate him by threats, or discourage him by ridicule, or take him unawares by force, they now tried cunning. Four times they invited him to meet them in conference in the valley of Ono in the land of Benjamin; but Neh. replied that he could not leave the great work he was engaged in (6¹⁻⁴). A fifth messenger came with an open letter † from Sanballat saying that it was reported that Neh. aspired to the kingdom of Judah and had appointed prophets to proclaim him, and giving warning that word of this rumour would surely reach the king; Sanballat asked for a conference, as if he wished to aid Neh. in clearing himself of the above. himself of the charge. Neh. knew well that autocratic kings listened eagerly to such imputations, and were not apt to investigate very closely, preferring to err on the (for them) safe side; nevertheless he rested secure in his integrity, and accused Sanballat of feigning the charges out of his own evil mind (6⁵⁻⁶). Sanballat all the while had allies and emissaries in Jerus. (6¹⁷⁻¹⁹), and, having failed himself to get within reach of the leader, he set them to work. A prophet named Shemaiah counselled Neh. to shut himself in the temple at night to avoid assassination. Other prophets were also hired to stir up his fears, and induce him to take a step that would lead to his downfall (6¹⁰⁻¹⁴). But they reckoned without their host.

—Cheyne, Bamp. Lect. 70 f.

The Heb. text in 46 (Eng. 415) is obscure and confused. The LXX furnishes a clear and estisfactory reading: 'And it was so that when the Judsans who dwelt by them came, they said to us, They are coming up from all places against us.' The first news of the intended assault was brought by the workmen who lived at remote parts.

It is said that an open letter was an insult; see Thomson, The Land and the Book, iii. 63 f.

By the month Elul (Aug.-Sept.), of what year we do not know, the restoration was complete, having been accomplished, we are told, in the remarkably short time of fifty-two days + (6¹²). Neh. appointed his brother Hanani, who had evidently come with him from Suss (of. 1²), and Hananiah the governor him from Susa (cf. 1²), and Hananiah the governor of the castle, in charge over Jerus.; he enjoined them strictly to keep the gates shut until the sun was well up in the heavens,‡ and to keep a guard posted. The latter command was not easy of execution, for the people in Jerus. were few, and the houses for the most part still in ruins. It was apparently difficult to induce people to take up residence in the city.§ Those who did so voluntarily were commended as patriots, and one of every ten drawn by lot was obliged to move from the country to the city (7⁴ 11²¹¹). The completion of the walls was celebrated with a great dedication service. Walls and gates and people were purified, and two processions formed to move around the circuit of the walls in opposite directions, Ezra ¶ at the head of one company, and Neh. of the other, the head of one company, and Neh. of the other, until they met near the temple, where the ceremonies of thanksgiving and dedication culminated in sacrifices and rejoicings. Appointments were also made for the proper observance of the temple rites (12^{272.}). These things being completed, Jerus. being once more a city without reproach, social and religious order being well established, and Neh.'s leave of absence expiring, he returned to the court of Persia (136). Rawlinson holds that he was recalled, but there is no evidence for such a theory.

How long Neh. had been in Jerus. is uncertain. The text bears conflicting testimony not easy to reconcile. The memoirs are in this part preserved only in somewhat mutilated fragments. In 5th we appear to have a sufficiently definite statement that the first stay at Jerus. was twelve years: 'From the day when he appointed me to be governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even to the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes the king, twelve years, I and my brothers did not eat the governor's bread.' But in 135 Neh. says, 'While all this was going on I was or 'The prophets of the time were opposed to Neh. and apparently in league with the hostile neighbours,' Monteflore, 312; see also Wellh, Gesch. 2194. But these prophets, inferior as they were to their predecessors of pre-exilic days, felt that Neh, like Esra, was reconstituting Judaism on lines not in harmony with prophetism; and in a measure they were right. See, for a fuller development of this view, Kuenen, Rel. of Isr. ii. 228 ff. 4 According to Jos. (Ant. II. v. 8) the wall was two years and four months in building; according to Ewald, Hist. v. 157, nearly five years. The fifty-two days is not only a very short time for such a great work, but also for the conditions described in ch. 5 to develop. Yest there was every motive for urgent haste. Perhaps only the main part of the work was accomplished in the fifty-two days.

3 See Milman, Hist. of the Jews, vol. i. p. 437.

1 According to Grätz, Hest. 394, this celebration took place two years and four months after Neh.'s arrival in Jerus.; according to Rawlinson, Esr. Neh. 150, not till Neh.'s second visit. There are no good grounds for the latter view.

1 On the relation of Esra and Neh. in their administration, and on the promulgation of the Law (Neh 8-10), see art. Ezra; and Kosters, Wiederherstellung Israels, 1895.

not in Jerus: for in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes the king of Babylon, I went unto the king, and asked of the king a leave of absence. And I went to Jerusalem.' This verse is obscure, and its meaning uncertain. 'I went unto the king' may refer to Neh.'s return from Jerus., or to his entering the royal presence to prefer his request. The other doubtful clause is literally 'to end of days,' and is generally taken as a reference to the undefined period between Neh.'s return to the king and his second departure. The words favour this interpretation, the context the notion of a limited leave as rendered above. See the commentaries on the passage.

Neh. either returned to the king after twelve years' absence, and then, after a period of a year as Kuenen supposes, or three or four years as Gratz holds, secured a second leave; or else he returned sooner, and in the thirty-second year, B. o. 438, started again for Jerusalem. 514 in the latter case would mean that Neh. was the real governor of Judah even when absent on court duty, ruling by his appointed deputies. On the whole, this view seems more probable than the other; for it seems unlikely that the king, who required Neh. to stipulate a limit to his leave before he would grant it (29), would agree to so long a period as twelve years. Neh.'s chief purpose was to rebuild the walls: 'If his took only fifty-two days, there would be no reason for a long stay. The events narrated might all easily take place in three or four years, and they are described as initial movements. If Neh, had protracted his stay, we should probably be informed of the development of the evils which confronted Neh, in his second administration, especially for the appearance of a mixed speech among the children of half-foreign parentage (13²⁴).

During Nehemiah's absence at the Persian court, serious evils had made their appearance in Jerusalem. Sanballat and his allies had been checkmated; Jerus. had been freed from external enemies; but internal disorders had sprung up which affected the life of the people harmfully. Eliashib had housed Tobiah in one of the temple chambers (1342); the Levites were not supplied with their lawful perlies were not supplied when and an arrange portions (see Mal 37-18), so that they were compelled to seek their living as laymen, or wander about homeless (1310) as in the days of Micah (see Jg 17 f.). On the Sabbath day, work in the fields went on as usual (1311); produce was carried to the market in Jerus.; and the Tyrian merchants sold fish and merchandise on that day (v. 16). In spite of Ezra's great effort, marriages with foreign women were common, and the children of such marwomen were common, and the children of such marriages spoke partly the language of their mothers (v. 22.). Even a grandson of Eliashib the high priest had married a daughter of Neh.'s inveterate enemy Sanballat (v. 26). It is highly probable that the report of these evils impelled Neh.'s return. When he arrived he set about the necessary reforms with characteristic vigour. Tobiah's belongings were cast out of the temple chamber, and it was restored to its sacred uses (13st.). The people were compelled to pay the tithe † for the support of the Levites and other temple officers (v.14). The city gates were ordered to be closed during the whole of the Sabbath, the vendors who then set up their stalls outside of the gates were threatened so that they were afraid to renew the offence (v. 1867.). The men with foreign wives suffered disgrace and punishment, and the people were put under oath to discontinue this violation of the Law. The arch-offender, Eliashib's grandson, was banished from Jerus. (v. 2011.). According to Jos. (Ant. XI. vii. 2, viii. 2), Manasseh, a brother of Jaddus, married Nicaso the daughter of Sanballat, left Jerus. and built the rival temple on Gerizim. Josephus places these events in the time of Alexander, but he was not a master of chronology, e.g. he places Neh. in the time of Xerxes; and many hold ne places roel. In the time of Aerxes; and many hold that this Manasseh was the son of Joiada and grandson of Eliashib (see Kuenen, Rel. Irr. ii. 236; Montefiore, Hib. Lect. 351; Ryle, Can. 92).

In spite of the effort of the author of the beautiful story of Ruth to soften the harsh spirit of the leaders, Exra and Neh. held the same decided view against foreign marriages, though from different motives. The great offence in Ezra's eyes was the infringement of the sacred law. But Neh., while he was impressed with the dangerous consequences of such alliances, citing the sin of Solomon and the havo it wrought (18²⁸), held the great evil to be the imperilling of the mother tongue by the introduction of foreign elements. From this it would appear that already the Old Heb. speech was in danger, and the patriotism of the people was appealed to to preserve it from extinction. How long it lasted as a living tongue after this time is uncertain. But the seeds of death must have been apparent.

Tradition was as little silent about Neh. as about zra (see Ewald, Hist. v. 161 ff.). To these two Ezra (see Ewald, Hist. v. 161 ff.). To these two men 'grateful posterity has attributed all the beneficial institutions, of whose origin it was ignorant.' Among the worthies praised by Jesus the son of Sirach is Neh., whose 'memorial is great, who reject up to the worthing that were falled. who raised up for us the walls that were fallen, and set up the gates and bars, and raised up our homes again' (Sir 49¹³). In 2 Mac 1¹⁸⁵ we read that Neh. purified the sacrifices with the water taken from the pit where the priests had hid the sacred fire. His literary activity was also known: 'The same things were related both in the public archives and in the records that concern Neh., and how he, founding a library, gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and the books of David and letters of kings about sacred gifts (2 Mac 2¹³). See Ryle, Can. 102; W. R. Smith, OTJC² 170 f. On the character of the letters in which this passage

Neh. rendered a great service to his people, and its effect was more enduring than that of Ezra. was magnanimous in his generosity towards his subjects. He even purchased the liberty of many Jews held as slaves in strange lands (5°); he had refused the remuneration which belonged to his office; and he entertained at his own expense 150 of the chief Jews (517). But he was by no means unconscious of his virtue, nor unhopeful of receiving a suitable reward from God; in 5¹⁹ (cf. 13^{14. 31}) he records a favourite prayer: 'Remember unto me, O my God, for good, all that I have done for this people' (see Montefiore, Hib. Lect. 211). He shows also the vindictive spirit found in some of the psalmists (3^{361.}, Eng. 4^{41.} 13³⁵; see also Cheyne, Bamp. Lect. 78). But a frank acknowledgment of such weaknesses does not obscure the real greatness. such weaknesses does not obscure the real greatness of the man. It has been truly said of him that he was 'the only man who had at once the spirit to awaken the old fire of national enthusiasm, and the power both to heal dissensions within and to repel attacks from without' (The Psalms Chronologically arranged, by Four Friends, 311). On Neh.'s character and work, see further Wellh. Gesch.² 173; Raudingen France and Neh. ch. vi. 18 Paren Hitter. Rawlinson, Exr. and Neh. ch. xi.; Renan, Hist. of the People of Isr. bk. vii. 82 ff. Josephus says of Neh.: 'He was a man of good and righteous char-Neh.: 'He was a man or good and righteous character, and very ambitious to make his own nation happy; and he hath left the walls of Jerus. as an eternal monument of himself' (Ant. XI. v. 8).

NEHEMIAS (Neeulas). —1. 1 Es 58, one of the REFLEMINS (Neemas).—1. I Es 5° , one of the leaders of the first return from captivity under Zerub. = Nehemiah, Ezr 2° , Neh 7° . 2. (B Naumias) 1 Es 5° , Nehemiah the contemporary of Ezra. The insertion of his name here appears to be due to an incorrect gloss on 'Arbapias or 'the Tirshatha,' Neh. being usually called by that title. In the canonical parallels (Ezr 2° , Neh 7°) the name is absent, and the Tirshatha alluded to is Zerubbabel the Tirshatha alluded to is Zerubbabel.

H. St. J. THACKERAY.

NEHILOTH.—See PSALMS.

NEHUM (conn).—One of the twelve heads of the Jewish community, Neh 77. This form of the name is probably due to a scribal error, the parallel passage (Egr 2°) having Rehum (απη; Α Ίροσόμ, Luc. 'Peϊοόμ'). In Neh the LXX supports MT, reading Nαούμ. The name appears in 1 Es 5° as Roimus (B Ρόσιμος, Αο 'Ρομέλιος).

NEHUSHTA (κτφη; Luc. Neeσθάν, Β Νεσθά, Α Ναισθά).—Wife of king Jehoiakim and mother of Jehoiachin; a native of Jerusalem (2 K 24°). or Jenoischin; a native of Jerusalem (2 K 24). She was taken a prisoner to Babylon with her son in 597 (2 K 24¹³), and no doubt died there. Regarding her father, see ELNATHAN. The vowels of MT and the rendering of Jerome, as eius, connect the word with ngm; 'bronze.' Barzillai is possibly another example of a proper name derived from the name of a metal. But the stem concentrate of the name of a metal. But the stem consonants of the word are those also of yo, 'serpent,' and animal names are characteristic of the period (Gray, Heb. Proper Names, p. 103 f.). The Lucianic transliteration identifies the name with Nehushtan (2 K 184).

W. B. STEVENSON.

NEHUSHTAN.—In the received text of 2 K 184 we read that Hezekiah, in addition to removing the bāmôth (EV 'high places'), with their mazzēbahs (RV 'pillars'), throughout the country, carried his zeal for reform so far as to 'cut down the Asherah' (so RV; see ASHERAH)—presumably that attached to the Temple at Jerusalem—and to break in pieces 'the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for puto those days the children of had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he (Hezekiah) called it Nehushtan.' The doubts which so many recent critics have expressed regarding the historicity of the greater part of this verse we need not pause to examine, inasmuch as it must be, and is, admitted that at least the statement with which the verse closes, and which alone concerns us here, is certainly historical. The further question as to the relation of this incident to the Pentateuch narrative, Nu 21st (esp. v.º), also lies without the purview of this article (see SERPENT [BRAZEN]). Two points, however, appear to demand examina-tion, viz.: (1) the signification of the name here applied to the object destroyed, and (2) the reason

(1) The name of 'Nehushtan.' Two significations of Nehushtān (pēṇṇ) are possible. (a) That clearly intended by the Massoretic punctuators, and since generally adopted, viz. 'the brazen thing' [opus]aeneum κατ' ἐξοχήν. According to this view, Nehushtān is a denominative from nṛṇ nēhūsheth by addition of the formative suffix—ān (so Ges. Buhl, Stade, König, Lehrgeb. ii § 60. 9°, Barth, Nominalbildg. § 207°). The further idea of the Massoretes, reflected in our EV, that this name was given to the venerable object by Hezekiah at the time of its destruction, must, however, be rejected. The context requires must, however, be rejected. The context requires rather that we should find in Nchushtan the name by which it was popularly known, and this may be got by a slight change in the pointing of the verb (cf. Lucian's text και εκάλεσαν αυτόν Νεεσθάν, and see the Commentaries). (b) The transliteration of the word in the oldest Greek versions (A Neσθά», B Νεσθαλεί, and best of all Νεεσθάν, Lucian) suggests affinity with της nāhāsh 'serpent' rather than with něhôsheth 'brass.' For in 2 K 24° the than with něhôsheth 'brass.' For in 2 K 24* the name of the queen-mother, who appears in MT as κεψη: Něhūshtā, appears in A as Nauθά, which is identical with B's Neσθά, Luc. Neεσθάν (see NE-HUSHTA). But it is far more probable that the personal name Nehūshta is to be classed with the other 'serpent-names,' NAHASH and NAHSHON (which see), than with the derivatives of něhôsheth. Hence it is possible, at least, that the name of this object of the Hebrews' veneraties. tion—pronounced with vowels other than those of Nöhushtün—was also connected in the popular mind with nāhāsh, perhaps in the signification 'the [sacred] serpent' or 'the serpent' par excellence (cf. for form and signification [077])."

(2) The reason for the destruction of the Nehushtan is clearly stated. Whatever may have been its origin—to inquire into this would be to anticipate the article Serpent (Brazen) in vol. iv.—it had in recent times become an object of idolatrous worship. Incense was offered to it as to a divine being. Its continued existence, therefore, was incompatible with, and would have been a constant menace to, that purer form of the religion of J" which it was the aim of Hezekiah and his spiritual advisers to introduce.

NEIEL ('ΜΥ); Β' Ιναήλ, Α' Ανιήλ).—A place on the borders of Zebulun and Asher, apparently north of Cabul, Jos 19²⁷; possibly the same place as Neah of v.¹³. The site is uncertain.

NEIGHBOUR () shākhên, Arab. sāken, γείτων 'inhabitant'; κατοbh, Arab. karīb, ὁ πλησίον, περίοικος 'near'; κατοκά που 'āmīth, φίλος 'friend').

—The law of neighbourhood is of great importance and influence in the East. It takes rank after family life with regard to the number and authority of the customs created and regulated by it. Neighbourhood is not an occasional incident, but a constant necessity of Oriental social life, and the latter

The importance of neighbourhood is due to the fact that there are no farmhouses scattered over the agricultural districts of Palestine. For purposes of common safety, the population is congregated in the villages, following in this respect the custom of the pastoral tribes in their encampments. From these villages, where the houses are generally built quite close to each other, the peasants go out to their daily labours in the surrounding fields. Domestic life is thus touched at every point by the larger circle of neighbourhood. Originating under circumstances of common danger, this social condition has now passed into a kindly preference of use and wont. Such village life is now regarded as a convenience. The Oriental dislikes silence and solitude; very rarely takes a solitary walk for pleasure; chooses summer lodgings where neighbours are numerous; and, in renting, buying, or building a house, considers first of all the character of the neighbours.

Among the modern inhabitants of Palestine the Arab. karib, 'near,' on account of the surviving similarity of social circumstance, means, like the Heb. kārībh, both 'neighbour' and 'relative.' The sense of religious protection and union that enshrined the family life is seen in expanded form in large towns such as Damascus and Jerusalem, where Christians, Jews, and Moslems occupy different parts of the town.

All the Bible references to neighbourhood indicate that it was an institution of high social value, with privileges to be enjoyed and duties to be discharged.

1. Its helpfulness is stated in the maxim of Pr 27.10 'Better is a neighbour that is near than a brother that is afar off.' The Arabs have a familiar proverb to the same effect, and they further happily indicate the service that can be rendered by a friend or neighbour by saying, 'You cannot clap with one hand.' There are, however, unhelpful friends, who flatter and ruin the man who seeks popularity by lavish entertainment, Pr 18²⁴. With these is contrasted the true friend who 'sticketh closer than a brother.' This is often and becomingly referred to the Heavenly Friend, but the original sense is a comparison between the bond of family life and that of mere neighbourhood, and a declaration that in certain cases the latter is superior. Similarly, an Arab proverb says, 'How many brothers I have had who were not children of my parents!' cf. Pr 17¹⁷ (RVm).

* It seems to us safer not to hazard any further conjecture as to the form of the word. Both Nöldeke's and Klostermann's attempts in this direction are open to serious objection. The former (ZDMG xiii. p. 483, note) suggests that [NFN] may be compounded of FN; + 18 (= 138, see the Lexx.), while the latter asserts categorically that [NFN] is similarly a compound of FN] and [N' (= [NFN]; see this root [N' in Oxf. Heb. Lexx.), as if denoting the 'everlasting or the primeval serpent' (Kurzgef. Komm. in loc.).

bond of family life and that of mere neighbourhood, and a declaration that in certain cases the latter is superior. Similarly, an Arab proverb says, 'How many brothers I have had who were not children of my parents!' cf. Pr 17¹⁷ (RVm).

2. Intimacy is another of the leading features of Oriental neighbourhood. Village life is one of the chief fields of Scripture parable. It is easy to understand how in the villages people of an excitable sympathetic temperament, living close to each other, and having so many interests in common, would necessarily have a very intimate knowledge of each other's affairs. This communicativeness accounted for the groups of women around the fountain, and of the elders at the city gate. The shepherd who brought back his sheep in safety and the woman who recovered the lost coin must hasten to tell their friends and neighbours, Lk 15³⁻¹⁰. In the declaration 'I have called you friends' (Jn 15¹⁵) all the intimacy springing from Oriental neighbourhood is made possible in the believer's communion with Christ.

3. The sincerity and sanctity of this relationship are constantly emphasized. One of the commonest forms of neighbourly service was that of borrowing and lending money and valuables, or the keeping of each other's goods in safe custody during a time of absence, Ex 227-10, Pr 61 1718. Among modern Orientals the giving of bread and flour, and the lending of kitchen and table requisites on emergencies of hospitality, are constantly practised, and it is an everyday occurrence in the bazaars to see an open shop left with a thin netting over the entrance in charge of the merchant in the next shop.

In the Bible, prohibition is frequently uttered against bearing false-witness, making unfounded statements, or framing malicious devices of any kind against a neighbour, Ex 20^{16, 17}, Dt 5²⁰, Pr 3²⁰ 24²⁰ 25¹⁸. The duties of neighbourhood are not to be evaded by polite words, Pr 3²⁰, nor its courtesies turned to mercenary advantage, Dt 23^{24, 25}, Jer 22¹³. Neighbourhood is a part of sainthood, Ps 15³. The great purpose of true religion is the perfecting of social life, Mt 7¹². The want of natural feeling in this respect indicated the moral collapse and pointed to the political extinction of Israel, Jer 9⁴.

The highest expression of neighbourhood, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Lv 19¹⁸), is repeated and expanded in Mt 5⁵⁴ 19¹⁸, Ro 13⁹⁻¹⁰. In the case of the lawyer's assumed bewilderment (Lk 10²⁵⁻³⁷) as to the limit at which the law of neighbourhood began to come into force, the explanation pointed out rather the greatness of the distance to which it might reach. Neighbourhood was shown to be a creation of the kind heart that would discover opportunities and feel obligations where the nearest in place and kinship might pass by without perceiving anything to do.

by without perceiving anything to do.

In the East, neighbourhood is an important legal claim in the disposal of property. Next to a co-proprietor, the neighbour has the first right of purchase, especially if his land be irrigated from the same source of water-supply. Such a right Ahab would have had if Naboth had wished to sell his vineyard.

Neighbourhood, which by intimacy, equality, and identity of interest gave to social friendship a basis of patience, trust, and sympathy, also furnished the occasion to special temptations. Such close intimacy gave the fullest opportunity to envy, pride, and uncharitableness. According to an Arab proverb, 'Envy dwells among neighbours, and hatred among relatives.

It was because neighbourhood was almost exclusively the condition of social contact that the neighbour was specified in connexion with the Mosaic provisions of mercy, truth, and justice. The stranger was guarded by the law of hospitality. For the treatment of strangers entering the circle of neighbourhood, see FAMILY in vol. i. p. 849, and GER.

NEKEB.—Only in the collocation πριπ τοτκ 'the pass of Adami' (?), Jos 19²⁸. The LXX finds here two proper names (Β καὶ 'Αρμὲ καὶ Νάβωκ, Α καὶ Αρμαὶ καὶ Νάκεβ). Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. p. 225) gives Ziyadathah as a later name for Nekeb, and there is a ruin called Seiyadah near the village ed-Dâmieh on the plateau east of Tabor (see SWP vol. i. sheet vi.). The 'cutting' or 'pass' is probably one leading from the eastern precipices near Tiberias. Nekeb is mentioned in the list of Thothmes III. as a town of Galilee. See, also, ADAMI-NEKEB. lilee. See, also, C. R. CONDER. ADAMI-NEKEB.

NEKODA (κήτρι). — 1. Eponym of a family of Nethinim, Exr 2⁴⁶ (B Νεχωδά, Α Νεκωδάν) = Neh 7⁵⁰ (BA Νεκωδά, Ν Νεκωδάμ); called in 1 Es 5²¹ Noeba (which see). 2. Name of a family which returned from the Exile, but were unable to prove their Israelitish descent, Ezr 2⁶⁰ = Neh 7⁶³ (both Νεκωδά); called in 1 Es 5²⁷ Nekodan (Νεκωδά»).

NEKODAN (Ne $\kappa\omega\delta d\nu$, AV Necodan), 1 Es 5^{27} = Nekoda, Exr 2^{20} , Neh 7^{22} . The name is Noeba in 1 Es 5^{21} .

NEMUEL.—See JEMUEL. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 307, considers Jemuel the corruption and Nemuel the original form. 'Either form is etymologically obscure.' Nemuelites, the patronymic of the family of Nemuel, occurs in Nu 2612.

NEPHEG (123).—1. Son of Izhar and brother of Korah, Ex 6^{21} (Ná $\phi\epsilon\kappa$). 2. One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem, 2 S 5^{15} (Ná $\phi\epsilon\kappa$)=1 Ch 3^7 (B Ná $\phi\epsilon\kappa$, A Ná $\phi\epsilon\gamma$) 14^6 (B Ná $\phi\epsilon\delta$, A Ná $\phi\epsilon\gamma$).

NEPHEW.—In his Select Glossary (p. 146) Trench points out that the Eng. word 'nephew' has undergone exactly the same change of meaning that nepos in Latin underwent. In the Augustan age nepos meant 'grandson,' in the post-Augustan age sister's or brother's son. Nephew (which comes from nepos through the Fr. neveu, the original Anglo-Sax. nefa having dropped out) formerly signified grandson or more generally some descendant, and only within a century or more came to be restricted to its present meaning. The meaning of 'grandson' is clearly seen in Holland, Plutarch's Morals, p. 555, 'The warts, black moles, spots and freekles of fathers, not appearing at all upon their own children's skin, begin afterwards to put forth and show themselves in their nephews, to wit, the children of their sons and daughters'; and in Tymme's Calvin's Genesis, p. 872, 'Jacob layeth his handes uppon his nephewes. To what end? Namely, to prove that he giveth them place among his sonnes, and that so, Joseph being but one, might make two heads.'

In AV the word occurs four times. In Jg 1214 in AV the word occurs four times. In Jg 12. He had forty sons and thirty nephews,' the Heb. (τ.μ. μ) is exactly expressed in AVm and RV 'sons' sons.' In Job 18. and Is 14. the Heb. (τ.μ.) is more general, 'descendant.' So also in 1 Ti 5. (ξκγονος), though in this place the meaning is clearly 'grandchild': 'If any widow have children to receive (RV 'grandchild': 'If any widow have children to receive the secondary 'grandchild': 'If any widow have children to receive the secondary of the secondary of the secondary is the secondary of the seconda

NEPHILIM. — This word (pt/vp), translated giants' in the AV, is found in two passages in the OT. The first passage is the note, syntactically separate from its context, in Gn 64 'The Nephilim were in the earth in those days, and also afterward, forasmuch as the sons of God used to go in to the daughters of man, and they were of old, the men of name. The connective 'forasmuch as' articulates the statement better than the word 'when,' used in the English versions. It is not explicitly said that the Nephlim were the heroes borne by women to the 'sons of God,' and some scholars have held that they were not; but this writer certainly meant that they were, for otherwise it is impossible to account for his mentioning them at all. There is much here not easy to understand; but in these four verses we certainly have an allusion to that region of we certainly have an allusion to that region of mythology so copiously treated in the sacred legends of other peoples, the region of demigods and heroes. The Nephtlim, whatever else may be true of them, are thought of as beings analogous to the demigods of the nations.

The other passage is most naturally thus translated: 'And there we saw the Nëphilim, sons of Anak of the Nëphilim; and we were in our eyes as grasshoppers, and so were we in their eyes' (Nu 13³⁸). Evidently, the word Něphtlím here has exactly the same meaning as in Genesis. These men are trying to find the strongest possible lan-guage for expressing the terribleness of the gigantic Anakim; and this they effect by saying that the Anakim are veritable demigods. Per-haps they intended to be understood to imply that the Anakim were descended from the demigods; or perhaps their language is metaphorical. It made the Anakim seem more dreadful thus to suggest that there was something supernatural and uncanny about them. When we have examined these two passages we have exhausted the direct evidence in regard to the Něphilim. Among the derivations proposed for the name, one makes it to be from nāphal, 'to fall'; either as meaning beings fallen from a previous high estate (cf. Is 14¹², Lk 10¹⁸), or as fighters who fall upon the enemy fiercely. The latter view has been supposed to be favoured by the Greek versions, the LXX having γίγαντες, Aquila ἐπιπίπτοντες, and Symmachus βιαΐοι, but see Dillm. on Gn 64.

In former generations the passage in Genesis was voluminously discussed, especially the question as to who the 'sons of God' there mentioned were. Some account of these discussions, with references to the literature; may be found in Smith's DB under art. 'Giants'; see also the various commentaries on this passage; Lenormant, Beginnings of History; art. GIANT (in vol. ii.) with the literature therelmentioned; Budde, Urgeschichte, 30 ff.; Wellhausen, Comp. 308.

NEPHISHESIM, NEPHISIM.—See NAPHISH.

NEPHTHAR (Ne $\phi\theta d\rho$, AV Naphthar), Nephthai (Ne $\phi\theta da$, AV Nephi).—In 2 Mac 1¹⁸⁻³⁰ there is a legendary account of the hiding of the sacred fire of the temple at the Captivity, and of its recovery by Nehemiah. It states that the fire was concealed by the priests at the command of Jeremiah (see 2') in a dry well or pit. When Nehemiah had built the temple and the altar (sic), and was about to offer sacrifice, he sent the descendants of those who had hidden the fire to bring it back. They found in the well only a thick liquid (δδωρ παχύ), which was drawn up and sprinkled upon the wood and the sacrifice. On the sun shining out from behind a cloud, a great fire was kindled on the altar. When the sacrifice had been consumed, the remainder of the liquid was poured, by Nehemiah's orders, upon great stones. It again ignited, but its flame soon spent itself, while that on the altar continued to burn. The king of Persia, having heard of the matter, surrounded the well with a sacred enclosure, and used to bestow portions of the liquid on those to whom he wished to show special favour (so RV). Nehemiah and his companions called this substance Nephthar, but it was generally known as Nephthai (v. 26).

The second word appears in MSS as Naphai, Naphai, Naphai, Napha. Cod. A simply repeats Naphap. Syr. has $4.2.10_1 and The reading of v.31 is uncertain (merazūr, marazūr, zarūzv), and the meaning of v.320 and of v.35 is obscure. The legand is repeated by the Jewish historian Joseph ben-Gorion, who describes the liquid as 'water like thick oil and honey,' and among Christian writers by Macarius (Hom. 11). A different legend is given in the Ethiopic Book of Adam (Dillmann, 1863;), which states that Exra found in the vaults of the temple a censer filled with fire. According to the common Rabbinical tradition, the sacred fire was one of the five things lacking in the second temple (Buxtorf, 'de Igne sacro,' in Ugolino's Thesaurus, x. 426).

The names Nephthar, Nephthai, along with the interpretation of the former as 'cleansing' or 'purification' (καθαρισμός), constitute the chief problem of this passage. They were applied to the substance, and not, as Vulg. (hunc locum) suggests, to the place where it was found. Two suppositions are possible—

1. That Nephthar was the original word, and Nephthas a popular corruption. On this view various attempts have been made, some elaborate, and none very successful, to connect Nephthar with the meaning καθαρισμός, or otherwise to exwith the meaning κασαρομος, or otherwise to explain its derivation. (a) According to Benfey and Stern (Die Monatsnamen einiger alter Völker, 1836), Νεφθάρ corresponds to the Zend naptar. Naptar apanm is said to denote the sacred elemental water (Urwasser), otherwise known as arduisur, to which the highest powers of purification were attributed; (b) Lagarde (Gesammelte Abhandlunger 1775) Suda that the Serm 100 company. gen, 177 f.) finds that the Syr. iAno corresponds to the Bactrian vidavakra, meaning purigen, 1771.) ands that the Syr. Malo corresponds to the Bactrian vidtofakra, meaning purification; (c) Neφθάρ may originally have been πρη, from πρ 'to be pure'; (d) it may have been πρη, from πρ 'to set free, and may mean 'liberation,' i.e. of the concealed fire; (e) it may be connected with Aram. πτη 'unleavened' (Ewald).

2. That Nephthai is the original, and Nephthar the corruption. In this case the form of the word and the circumstances of the negretive combine and the circumstances of the narrative combine to suggest that Ne $\phi\theta al$ is the same as naphtha ($\nu d\phi\theta a$), the well-known combustible mineral oil. The inflammable properties of naphtha, as well as its medicinal virtues, were well known in ancient times (Strabo, Geog. xvi. i. 15; Pliny, Nat. Hist. ii. 105; Plutarch, Alexander, xxxv.; Dioscorides, Materia Medica, i. 85), and it was further associated with sacred fires. Strabo (Geog. xvi. i. 4) mentions a naphtha well in connexion with the temple of Anæa. The natural flames in the oil region of Baku on the Caspian Sea have long been, and still are, held sacred by a sect of fire-worshippers. The legend in 2 Mac 1 may have had some actual spontaneous ignition of naphtha by to suggest that Neφθal is the same as naphtha some actual spontaneous ignition of naphtha by the sun's rays as its basis, but it is unlikely that it originated in Palestine. Naphtha is found in the waters of the Dead Sea (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 371), but not in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The well Bir Eyab, a little below the junction of the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Hinnom, is known also as the 'well of Nehemiah,' and is connected with this legend, but the tradition does not seem to be older than the 16th cent. (see EN-ROGEL, JERUSALEM, vol. ii. 285b; Robinson, BRP i. 331-3; Pierotti, Jerusalem Explored [Eng. tr. 1864], i. 188 Pierotti, Jerusalem Explored [Eng. tr. 1864], i. 188; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 456; Warren and Conder in SWP, Jerus. vol. 371-5). Most probably the story came from Persia or Babylonia, in both of which naphtha is abundant. This supposition is confirmed by the part assigned to the Persian king in vv. 28. 3. The Jewish writer who transferred the legend to Jerusalem may have invented the form Nephthar and its derivation, the latter being perhaps suggested by the idea of 'purification' in vv. 18. 38. On the whole subject see the commentaries of Grimm (1853). Keil (1875). see the commentaries of Grimm (1853), Keil (1875), Bissell (Lange), Rawlinson (Speaker's Comm.), Zöckler (Kurzgef. According to the Talmud (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. p. 146), Nephtoah was the same as Etam, now Ain Atan, south of Bethlehem at the so-called Pools of Solomon—Pilate's consider. This position seems to earne with aqueduct. This position seems to agree with Ephron (which see), being the mountain district west of Bethlehem. Nephtoah has been placed at Lifta (so Tobler, Robinson, Sepp, Baedeker-Socin, etc.), about 3 miles N.W. of Jerusalem, but this name does not contain the necessary guttural, and the site appears to be irreconcilable with those of Chesalon and Kiriath-jearim, since the border would run S.W. instead of N. from Kiriath-jearim to Chesalon. See KIRIATH-JEARIM. Lifta is more probably Eleph (which see) of Benjamin. It is not remarkable for its water supply (but see Barclay, City of Great King, p. 544), whereas 'Ain' Atan is a fine spring. For both sites see SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.; and cf. ZDPV iii. 79. C. R. CONDER.

NER (u; B N $\eta \rho l$, N $\eta \rho$, A N $\eta \rho$).—The son of Abiel and father of Abner, and therefore the uncle of Saul (1 S 14 $^{50.51}$). According to 1 Ch 8 38 =9 30 , Ner was the father of Kish, and therefore the grandfather of Saul: the same authority (9²⁰⁴.) gives Jeiel ('½'''; AV Jehiel) as the name of Ner's father, but probably both statements are erroneous (cf. Bertheau on 1 Ch 8²⁰). The statement of the Chronicler has misled some scholars into treating the words 'Saul's uncle' (1 S 14so) as referring to Abner; the more natural construction is to take them as a description of Ner. The view adopted them as a description of Ner. The view adopted above as to the relationship of Ner and Saul is confirmed by Josephus (Ant. VI. vi. 6, Νῆρος δὲ καὶ Κεῖς ὁ Σαούλου πατὴρ ἀδελφοὶ ῆσαν, νιοὶ δ΄ ᾿Αβελίου)

In accordance with this testimony we must read 'sons of' (μ) for 'son of [Abiel]' (μ) in 1 S 14⁵¹, and render that verse, 'And Kish the father of Saul, and Ner the father of Abner, were sons of Abiel'; so Driver, Klost., Budde.

The form of expression, 'salute Philologus and Julia, Nereus and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints that are with them,' suggests that these persons formed a small Christian community by themselves. The name is found in inscriptions of the imperial household (CIL vi. 4344), and is well known in the legends of the Roman Church. The Acts of Nereus and Achilleus which are of a late date and composite character, call these saints the eunuch chamberlains of Damasus describes them as two soldiers whose faith compelled them to desert their unchristian profession, and who had to pay the penalty with their lives. There are other archæological remains, and the Church of St. Nereus and Achilleus was very old, dating under the name of Fasciolae from the 4th cent. at least. The Acts state that Nereus and Achilleus were buried in the cemetery of St. Domitilla in the Via Ardeatina, and probably the origin of the legend in the Acts is that these two names appeared somewhat conspicuously in the catacomb near the tomb of Domitilla, and suggested that they might be associated with her in history. The fact that Nereus is combined with Achilleus a name which does not appear in the Epistle to the Romans—suggests that there was an independent archæological source for the name, and that it belouged to the early history of the Roman Church.

Nergal-sar-usur, 'O Nergal, defend the king'!).—In Jer 39^{3, 13} we read that after the capture of Jerusalem the chief Babylonians entered the city and sat in 'the middle gate,' among them being Nergal-sharezer the Rab-mag, and that, subsequently, Nebuzar-adan the commander of the body-guard, Nebushashan the Rab-saria (Rab. Rab-saria (shief of the ban the Rab-saris (Bab. Rab-sa-risi, 'chief of the princes'), and Nergal-sharezer the Rab-mag, released Jeremiah from the prison into which he had been thrown. In v. the text has fallen into confusion, and we ought to read 'Samgar-nebo the Sar-sechim, Nebushasban the Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer the Rab-mag.' Rab-mag is the Babylonian Rab-mugi or 'chief of the physicians,' and it is hardly doubtful that the Nergal-sharezer who in Jeremiah occupies a place so near Nebu-chadrezzar is the Nergal-sharezer who subsequently became king of Babylonia, and is known to classical writers as Neriglissar. We learn from the inscrip-tions that he married a daughter of Nebuch., and his name appears in several contracts drawn up in the reign of Evil-Merodach the son and successor of Nebuch., more especially in relation to the purchase of house-property. In one of the contracts mention is made of his son Merodachbal-uzur. Nergal-sharezer was the son of Belsum-iskun, to whom, in one of his son's inscriptions, is erroneously given the title of 'king.' In B.C. 559 Evil-Merodach was murdered, and Nergal-sharezer seized the throne, which he held for nearly four years. He built a palace on the right bank of the Euphrates, and was succeeded in B.C. 556 by his son Labasi-Merodach (Laborosoarchod), who was murdered after a reign of nine months. There are grounds for believing that Nergal-sharezer's reign was troubled by invasion. Immediately after his accession he married his daughter to Nebo-sum-yukin the priest of Nebo at Borsippa, who may therefore have had much to do with placing him on the throne. The same name appears in another Greek form Nari ($N\eta\rho(\epsilon)$ i) in St. Luke's genealogy of our Lord, according to which one Neri was the father of Shealtiel, Lk 3²⁷.

NERIAS ($N\eta\rho las$).—The Greek form of the name NERIAH (wh. see). It occurs only in Bar 1¹ as the name of the father of Baruch.

NERO (Né $\rho\omega\nu$).—The name of Nero does not occur in the NT, but he is the 'Cæsar' to whom St. Paul appeals in Ac 25^{11} ; before whose tribunal he was twice tried (assuming an earlier acquittal and later reimprisonment); and in whose imperial establishment the apostle had fellow-believers and probably converts (Ph 42).

Nero's reign covers an important period of NT history, and his attitude towards the early Church had a memorable influence on its fortunes. Born in A.D. 37, of parents—Domitius and Agrippina—who both belonged to the family of the Cæsars,* Nero was destined from childhood for the imperial throne by his ambitious mother, who first (A.D. 49) secured her own marriage to the emperor Claudius, her uncle; then the betrothal of Nero and Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messalina (the marriage being consummated four years later); finally, in A.D. 50, the adoption of Nero as the emperor's son and designated successor, with the emperor's son and designated successor, with the supersession of Claudius' own son, Britannicus. When Claudius died suddenly, in A.D. 54,† Nero, mainly through his mother's strategy, was peacefully accepted as emperor by army, senate, and people (Tac. Ann. xii. 68, 69).

Trajan is said (Aur. Vict. Epit. Nero) to have described the first emission of Nero's prigon described the first quinquennium of Nero's reign as far superior to any other period of imperial rule.

During those years he was under the guidance of Seneca, the philosopher (his tutor in boyhood), and of Burrus, prefect of the prætorian guard, an honest and virtuous soldier. By these counsellors the influence of Agrippina, originally potent, was at an early stage counteracted, and eventually supplanted.‡ The emperor's exemplary clemency s in the beginning of his reign; his habitual accessi-

† According to Pliny (HN xxil. 22), Tac. (Ann. xil. 66), and Buet. (Claud. 44), Claudius was poisoned by Agrippina. Suet., however, admits discrepancies in the reports as to occasion, administration of poison, and attendant circumstances.

† Tac. Ann. xil. 2, 5, 6, 21, xiv. 2. At the outset of his reign Nero gave, on one occasion, as military watchword, 'The best of mothers.'

bility and liberal provision of spectacles and largesses (Suet. Nero, 10, 11); his constitutional recognition of the authority of the senate (Tac. Ann. xiii. 45); his laudable endeavours to mitigate taxation and suppress extortion (ib. 50, 51); and his vigorous foreign policy against Parthian aggression and British insurrection,*—all this secured favour for Nero personally, as well as respect for his government. It caused, also, some toleration to be extended to his excessive vanity, adulterous amours, and scandalous nocturnal escapades, when he roamed in disguise throughout the city, and committed outrages on peaceful citizens (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12, 25, 46).

It is difficult to believe that, within the first year of his reign, Nero (without his mother's complicity and against her desire) deliberately poisoned Britannicus, his brother through adoption, a boy of fourteen. The early incidental reference (c. 78 A.D.) to the murder by Josephus (BJ II. xiii. 1); and the later detailed account of Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 15 ff.), followed by Suetonius (Nero, 33) and Dio (61. 7. 4), amply prove that the crime was attributed to Nero soon after, if not before, his death. Motives are found in Nero's youthful jealousy and fear of an imperial rival whom even Agrippina might support. But (1) the remark of Tacitus (Ann. 1. 1) must be kept in mind that the histories of Nero and other early emperors were 'during their reign falsified through fear, and after death fabricated through hatred'; (2) Seneca, writing soon after Britannicus' death (de Clem. i. 11), declares that Nero had never shed the blood of a Roman citizen nor of any human being in the world; (3) the details of the alleged murder are not inconsistent with Nero's own allegation that Britannicus died in a fit of epilepsy.† Sudden death was frequently ascribed to poison; and the later undoubted crimes of Nero might induce belief in his earlier guilt.

Nero's connexion (from A.D. 58) with Poppess (the wife of Otho, afterwards emperor), and her fatal ascendency over him, became the chief factor in his thorough demoralization, and a direct or indirect occasion of many of his crimes. Poppea coveted the position of empress, and determined to secure the divorce and removal of the neglected Octavia. Agrippina's remanent influence stood in the way, and must be destroyed. Nero had already been partially alienated from his mother by her interference with his private habits as well as imperial administration; and her vindictive disposition had raised up enemies against her in the court. Poppæa fostered filial estrangement and encouraged the animosity of courtiers. The issue was Agrippina's tragic death, of which two con-flicting accounts have come down, both inherently improbable—(1) Nero's own statement to the senate (Tac. Ann. xiv. 11) that Agrippina, foiled in an attempt to compass his death, had atoned for her crime by suicide. An ambitious woman might have conspired against a court-party from which she was excluded; but Nero's death would have destroyed her one hope of regaining power. () The account of Tacitus (xiv. 3-8), followed by suctonius (Nero, 34), that Nero was guilty of deliberate and persistent methicide employing his freedom Aprica for matricide, employing his freedman Anicetus, first to cause Agrippina to be shipwrecked, and then, on her escape, to assassinate her. The details of

* Corbulo and Suetonius Paulinus, the two ablest generals of their day, were sent, the former in 55 to repel the Parthians, the latter in 85 to complete the subjugation of Britain.

† Apart from this incident, there is no actual evidence that the ancient Romans were acquainted with any poison which, after double dilution, could have caused instantaneous death or sudden lividness, as related by Tacitus. Undoubtedly, however, a distillation from the leaves of the cherry-laurel, which might then have been obtained from Asia Minor, would have produced the effect desired (Burnett's Med. Bot. ii. 117).

this record bristle with improbabilities: (a) the secret preparation of a vessel which would suddenly fall to pieces, without the majority of the seamen knowing what would happen; (b) the hardened emperor caressing the mother whose murder he had arranged, and clinging fondly to her bosom; (c) the virtuous Burrus and Seneca joining in the crime with a calculating callousness worse than that ascribed to Nero himself. (d) Suetonius adds that Nero had thrice previously tried to poison Agrippina, who had fortified herself beforehand with antidotes! It is not improbable that Nero, under Poppæa's influence, believed in his mother's conspiracy against the existing administration; that in the midst of a nocturnal debauch he ordered her violent arrest; and that in the con-

The death of Burrus, in 62 (not without some suspicion of poison, Tac. Ann. xiv. 5), relieved Poppea of another obstacle to her ambition; and Poppea of another obstacle to ner amounts, and the appointment of Tigellinus as prefect of the prætorians in his stead provided her with a willing accomplice and Nero with another evil genius—a fresh instigator to vice as well as crime. Imperial orgies became viler and more shameless. Influential senators were removed from Rome and assassinated (Tac. Ann. xiv. 57, 59): Seneca, in despair, withdrew into private life (ib. 53-66). Poppea's time had come. Octavia, through perjured witness pronounced guilty of infidelity, was divorced, banished, and finally murdered (Tac. xiv. 60-64). Poppæa was espoused, and before the close of the year, on the birth of a daughter (who died in infancy), received the title of Augusta. The unbounded extravagance which the empress and Tigellinus encouraged led to financial embarrassments. These were relieved by charges of treason (followed by confiscation) against wealthy citizens, through which the upper classes were exasperated; and by oppressive taxation, which made Nero unpopular even among those who would have tolerated his crimes; while the emperor's exhibition of himself upon the stage, however acceptable to the lowest class, and publicly applauded, excited much private disgust (Tac. xiv. 14, 15).

Before this time Nero's relations with the Christians had begun. St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, with its favourable reference to the 'powers that be' (13¹⁻⁵), had been written during the first quinquennium, to which also belongs the charge of superstitio externa (supposed by some to be Christianity) against Pomponia Græcina, wife of Aulus Plautius (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32; de Rossi, Roma Sotter. ii. 360 ff.; cf. Lightf. Clement, i. 30 ff.). The apostle's arrival in Rome took place, probably, soon after Agrippina's death (see art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in vol. i. p. 424); his mild imprisonment, tolerated evangelization, and earlier trial, issuing in acquittal (according to the common theory), belong to the period of Poppeas's ascendency. That St. Paul was tried by Nero in person, although not certain is highly probable. although not certain, is highly probable; for, amid much carelessness, the emperor was particular in his attention to appeals from the provinces in criminal cases. He received from each of his assessors a written opinion, and pronounced sentence personally from the tribunal on the following day (Suet. Nero, 15; cf. Tac. Ann. xiii. 4). Poppæa had leanings towards Judaism, is described by Josephus (Ant. XX. viii. 11) as θεοσεβής, and twice interceded with Nero on behalf of Jews (Jos. l.c. and Vita, 3). She may not, however, have concerned herself with St. Paul's case; and, in the absence of any powerful antagonistic influence at court, the clogium of Festus would tell strongly in the apostle's favour. The intervention of Seneca, the brother of Gallio (indicated in the apocryphal Passio Pauli, i.), is no more than possible.* Up to the time of Gallio's proconsulship (i.e. A.D. 52-3 or 53-4), and probably for some years afterwards, the Roman government regarded Christians, apparently, as only a sect of Jews. The trial at Rome of a Christian who was also civis Romanus may have been, as Ramsay suggests (Expositor, July 1893), the occasion of a more thorough investigation which enlightened the imparial enthosities as to the true selection between perial authorities as to the true relation between Christianity and Judaism.

In A.D. 64 the tolerant attitude of Nero's government towards Christianity was suddenly transformed into cruel hostility. In July of that year took place the great fire at Rome, which raged for nine days, and through which, out of fourteen civic districts, three were totally, and seven partially, destroyed. Nero was at Antium when the conflagration broke out. The measures taken by the government for the suppression of the fire (Tac. Ann. xv. 40); his own fearless supervision of these efforts without a guard (io. 50); and the occurrence of the disaster at a time when the imperial finances were seriously embarrassed, render it highly improbable that Nero either instigated or deliberately extended the conflagration. But he probably gave occasion for the charge of com-plicity, which was widely believed at the time, t by previous sanitation reforms, laudable but keenly opposed (Lanciani, Anc. Rome, p. 122), unbecoming admiration of the magnificence of the spectacle, ill-disguised pleasure at the opportunity of rebuilding large portions of the city in a more magnificent style, and the significant annexation of a considerable part of the desolated area for the erection of his 'Golden House.': The fact, moreover, that the flames, after temporary arrest, broke out afresh in the gardens of Tigellinus, gave some colour to the suspicion that if he had nothing to do with the original fire, he might, nevertheless, have caused the second outbreak (Tac. Ann. xv. 40). The common belief in Nero's guilt, and the danger of revolution, owing to bitterness engendered in many thousands of ruined and homeless sufferers, led to the emperor, either spontaneously, || or at the suggestion of Poppæa ¶ or some malignant courtier, imputing the conflagration to the Christians. Some

* Seneca, however, who had probably not yet retired, may have been an assessor; and, in any case, to the equitable principles of administration established under his influence, the acquittal of St. Paul was largely due.

† It is accepted as a fact by Pliny (HN xvii. 1. 1), who wrote about A.D. 77; also by Suetonius (Nevo, 38) in A.D. 120. Tacitus writes (A.D. 115-117), 'forte an dolo principle incertum,' and indicates that older authorities were divided in opinion (Ann.

xv. 38).

† Of this Golden House, which reached from the Palatine to the Esquiline, and had triple colonnades a mile in length, Nero declared that 'now at last he was housed like a human being' (Suet. Nero, 33; cf. Tac. Ann. xv. 42; Middlet. Anc. Rome, ii.

declared that 'now at last he was housed like a human being' (Suct. Nore, 33; cf. Tac. Ann. xv. 42; Middlet. Anc. Rome, ii. 146).

§ The story that 'Nero fiddled while Rome was burning' originated, doubtless, in the report (Tac. Ann. xv. 42) that he sang, during the fire, of the ruin of Troy—a report based probably on the fact that, a year after the fire, the emperor, with questionable taste, read in public his 'Troica,' a poem containing frequent allusions to the recent fire (kenan, Hibb. Lect. p. 721.).

§ Nero might have heard from Jews, at St. Paul's trial, calumnies against the Christians, which, although proved to be baseless in the apostle's case, would now suggest themselves to the emperor as a convenient foundation for his charge.

¶ Clement of Rome (Ep. to Cor. 5, 6) writes that the Christians suffered 'through envy and jealousy.' The reference is indefinite, but may apply (in part) to Jews in Nero's time who employed Poppus as a medium for fixing the charge of arson on the Christians (Farrar, Early Days of Christianity, i. 64).

There seems to be no good reason for questioning the accuracy of Tacitus' reference to Christians as the sole objects of persecution in connexion with the fire. The 'ingens multitudo' of victims (Tac. Ann. xv. 44) referring to judicial executions, need not imply more than several hundreds. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, ch. xvl.) conjectures that the real victims were Jewish Zealots who had received the name Galilæans from Judas of Galilee (Ac 557), and thus were afterwards confounded with Christian 'Galilæans'; but there is no evidence that the plausibility would be given to the charge by their horror of pagan temples, many of which perished (Tac. Ann. xv. 41), by their supposed disloyalty and 'hostility to society' (ib. 44), and by their expectation of an impending destruction of the world by fire (2 Th 18, 2 P 37). According to Tacitus, 'those in the first place were brought to trial who made open profession' (is of the Christrial who made open profession' (i.s. of the Christian faith). 'Thereafter, on information elicited from these, a great multitude were convicted, far less on the charge of incendiarism than of odisms humani generis.' The injustice of conviction was equalled by the brutality of execution. Some were 'covered with the hides of wild beasts and worried to death by dogs'; and the culmination of inhumanity was reached when others, robed in the tunica molesta, covered with pitch, were 'set on fire at nightfall' to illuminate the imperial gardens on the occasion of Circensian games (Tac. Ann. xv. 44)—a fiendish exaggeration of the penalty of death by fire inflicted on malignant incendiaries (Juv. viii. 236). Nero does not appear to have organized any persecution of Christians beyond the city of Rome; but the notorious treatment of them there could not fail to influence provincial governors in dealing with other charges made against Christians within their respective territories. In the Neronian persecution we discern a distinct stage in the development of imperial policy regarding Christians out of prosecution for alleged particular crimes into prosecution on account of Christian faith and profession. Whether this development was completed under Nero is disputable. Ramsay, to whom, mainly, is due the abandonment of the old theory that persecution 'for the name' began under Trajan, maintains (Church in Rom. Emp. p. 242 ff., and Expositor, July 1893) that while the substitution of the charge of 'hostility to society' for that of arson was a notable development, the condemnation of Christians even on the later charge 'was pronounced in respect not of the name, but of serious offences (fagitia) connected with the name,' and that 'Christianity had not yet come to be recognized as in itself a crime.' There would have nized as in itself a crime. There would have been otherwise no occasion (he argues) for any lengthened second trial of St. Paul as described in 2 Ti 4. Sanday (Expos., June 1893) and Hardy (Christianity and the Rom. Goot.) hold that odium humani generis is not a definite charge, but an assumed characteristic of Christianity and that assumed characteristic of Christianity, and that the condemnation of Christians on this account the condemnation of Christians on this account is tantamount to a proscription of the name. They appeal to 1 P 4¹⁶; but Ramsay, while not denying the Petrine authorship of the Epistle, dates it c. 80 A.D. At some date soon after the horrors of A.D. 64—perhaps in 65 (see art. Chronology of NT in vol. i. p. 420)—occurred St. Paul's second imprisonment and trial, issuing the mantyredom. By this time the ferceity in his martyrdom. By this time the ferocity of persecution had abated; and the apostle, while confined in the Mamertine dungeon, appears to have been tried in an orderly manner (2 Ti 4), and would probably be condemned under the charge of 'odium,' or as a disturber of the imperial charge of 'odium,' or as a disturber of the imperial Zealots were ever so called. Merivale (Romans under Empire, ch. liv.) and H. Schiller (Gesch. d. röm. Kats. p. 433 ff.) suppose that the persecution assailed both Jews and Christians, to whom the name of 'the Christia sufferers alone was preserved. The silence of Josephus, however, who professes (Ant. XI. viii. 3) to silence of Josephus, however, who professes (Ant. XI. viii. 3) to record accurately all that happened to the Jews under Nero, and especially their calamities, tells heavily against both theories; while the limitation of the persecution to Christians by Tacitus is confirmed, so far, by Suetonius (Nero, 16).

"The earliest writer who asserts an extension of the imperial persecution to the provinces is Orosius (Hist. vii. 7), who wrote c. 400 A.D. Regarding a mutilated inscription found at Pompeli, of doubthul interpretation, but supposed to refer to a bloody persecution of Christians there, prior to A.D. 79, see Aubs, Perséc. p. 415 ff., and Schaff, Apostolic Christianity, p. 384.

peace. Regarding St. Peter's alleged arrival in Rome and martyrdom about the same time, see art. Peter.* The alleged banishment of St. John under Nero (contrary to Iren. adv. Hær. v. 30, and Eus. HE iii. 18. 20) rests mainly † on what is regarded as strong internal evidence for the com-position of Rev in 68-69 (see REVELATION [BOOK OF]). The Neronian persecution was the first of three outstanding events in close succession (the destruction of Jerusalem and the settlement of St. John in Asia being the other two) which paved the way for the consolidation of Jewish and Gentile Christendom. Amid common peril and suffering, the sectional friction noted in Ph 1¹³⁶. would decline and mutual sympathy increase; while the fiery ordeal would rid the Roman Church at once of Judaizing false brethren who alienated Gentile believers from the Jawish Christian accom-Gentile believers from the Jewish Christian community, and also of Gentile professors whose lax morality prejudiced Jewish believers against Gentile Christians as a whole.

In A.D. 65 the widespread discontent aroused by the conflagration and its supposed origin, by the divorce and death of Octavia, and by the emperor's murderous rapacity and extortionate levies, issued in a powerful conspiracy being organized, the object of which was to depose Nero, and to enthrone Calp. Piso, a man of noble birth, great wealth, and general popularity. Many senators, knights, and other influential persons were drawn into the plot, including Fenius Rufus, one of the prefects; Plautius, consul-elect; Lucan the poet, Seneca's nephew; and Senecio, one of Nero's most intimate courtiers. The conspiracy was prematurely dis-closed by the imprudence or the treachery of some who were implicated, and the leaders of the movement were put to death. Among others condemned without evidence was Seneca, whom Nero constrained to commit suicide. A reign of terror ensued. 'The city was thronged with funerals, the Capitol with victims' (Tac. Ann. xv. 71). On flimsy pretexts, almost every prominent citizen whose virtue rebuked Nero's vices, whose wealth tempted his cupidity, or whose popularity excited his jealous fear, was mercilessly executed. The most notable victims were the senators Thrasea and Sorranus, whose death Tacitus (Ann. xv. 21) ascribes to Nero's passionate desire to 'extirpate virtue itself.' Petronius, long a prime favourite, killed himself to avoid execution. The cruelty of the emperor was matched by the callousness of a populace whose hostility he averted by largesses and spectacles; by the servility, also, of a debased senate which condoned the condemnation of its noblest members. It outdid the former deification of deceased emperors by decreeing the erection of a temple to Nero, as to a god, in his lifetime; and it voted divine honours to Poppæa, at the instance of the emperor, for once remorseful, when he had killed her with a kick during pregnancy (Tac. Ann. xv. 74, xvi. 21 f.).

Amid his career of shameless debauchery, unnatural self-prostitution, and murderous frenzy, Nero remained a devotee of art. He played on the lyre, and was vain of his voice; he posed as an orator, and wrote tolerable poetry; he attained some proficiency in painting and sculpture; he acted on the public stage, and was an accomplished acted on the public stage, and was an accomplished charioteer (Tac. Ann. xiv. 14, 21; Suet. Nero, 52, 53). A visit to Greece, long projected, and accomplished in A.D. 66, provided him with the opportunity not only of gratifying his artistic tastes, but of enjoying an apparently greater appreciation of his talents than even a servile Roman crowd could supply. National Greek games, which recurred in successive years, were all crowded into the period of his visit, so that he might be awarded every notable prize for music, acting, and chariot-racing, and attain the coveted distinction of 'periodonikes,' or universal victor. He rewarded Greek adulation by declaring Achaia 'free'; and endeavoured at once to benefit Greek commerce and to glorify himself by initiating a scheme—soon given up—for piercing the Isthmus of Corinth (Suet. Nero, 23 f.; Dio, lxiii. 10-16).

* Nero occupies a prominent place in apocryphal and legendary 'Acts of Aposties,' particularly in the Acts of Peter and Paul. He is there represented as deceived by Simon Magus (through a magic trick) into the belief that Simon after being beheaded had come to life again. Ultimately, when Simon attempts to fly, Peter's invocation causes him to fall into the Via Sacra and to be killed. This, however, does not prevent Nero from ordering Peter to be crucified and Paul to be beheaded. † The external evidence includes (1) the title of the Syriac Version of Rev (ascribed to 6th cent.); (2) the Syriac Apocryphal History of John (Wright's Trans. ii. 56); (3) Hieron. adv. Joe. i. 26, where (if the reading be correct) Tertullian is in accurately reported as ascribing to Nero St. John's torture prior to exile.

The visit to Greece caused no interruption in the course of imperial bloodshed. Rich victims were to be found in Achaia, as in Italy. Ignoble jealousy and fear prompted Nero to summon from the East the brilliant conqueror Corbulo, only to condemn him to immediate suicide, the general's sole crime being that he had been urged, but had refused, to proclaim himself emperor. In Rome executions and confiscations continued under the delegated authority of Helius, a freedman (Dio, lxiii. 12, 17). Meanwhile, however, disaffection among citizens and armies had developed into an organized conspiracy to place Galba, governor of Hither Spain, on the throne; and when Nero returned to Rome in the spring of 68, loaded with laurels, it was already too late to stem the tide of insurrection. Sycophantic senators and courtiers described him; the pretorian guard was seduced by bribes from its mercenary allegiance. Eventually, Nero fled from Rome in disguise to the suburban villa of a faithful freedman; and, after exclaiming Qualis artifex perco / stabbed himself on the approach of emissaries from the senate, to avoid a more painful and ignominious doom (Suet. Nero, 42-49). A touching incident lights up the gloom of this closing 'tragedy of the Cæsara.' The last ministries to the dead were performed by two nurses * of his innocent childhood, and by an early cast-off mistress (Acte) whom he had once sincerely loved (ib. 50).

The obscurity of Nero's death led to the widespread belief that he had not really died, but was in concealment or had escaped to Parthia, and would reappear to re-claim the empire for the Caesarean dynasty, of which he was the last representative. In spite of his crimes and misrule, which the troubles that followed his death partially overshadowed, a party in the empire remained loyal to his memory, and several pretended Neros arose to take advantage of the belief in his survival (Tac. Hist. i. 2, ii. 8; Suet. Nero, 57). The belief extended to Jewish and Christian circles. It is embodied in Bk. iv. (vv. 1197. 1377.) of the Sibylline Oracles, which is usually dated c. 80 A.D. and is probably of purely Jewish origin (Harnack, Chronol. p. 582); also in Bk. v. 33. 91. 363 by a Christian Sibyllist, who hints (v. 1861.) at Nero's actival arthar they survival. Such revival is more revival rather than survival. Such revival is more distinctly referred to at the close of the Carmen Apologeticum of Commodian (c. 250 A.D.); by (Pseudo?) Victorinus, who writes of Nero as 'to be raised' (Comm. Apoc.); and by Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xx. 19), who mentions two current notions of his time,—that of pagans, who supposed Nero to be still alive, and that of Christians, who expected him to rise from the dead as Antichrist.

According to some writers, the expectation of Nero's return finds expression even in the Book of Revelation (13³ 17^{10t})—in the description of the beast whose 'deathstroke was healed,' which was and is not, and is 'of or from the seven kings' and 'an eighth.' That the Apocalypse (even if the date in the end of the reign of Domitian, as attested by Irenseus, adv. Hær. v. 30, be upheld) should contain reminiscences of Nero and the Neronian persecution, is only what might have been anticipated. The reference to the beast may have been suggested not merely by Dn 7, but by a designation of Nero in Christian circles as 'mala bestia (Lact. de Mor. Pers. 2, who may there reproduce an epithet handed down from former times), and by his vile habit of covering himself with the skin of a wild beast, and in that disguise was all ting men and women (Suet. Nero, 29). The war of the beast with the saints (Rev 137), the cry of the slain martyrs, 'How long?' (6⁵⁶.), and the description of 'Babylon' as drunken with their blood (176 1824), may be reminiscences of the truculent tribulation of A.D. 64. The fact of the number 666 being the equivalent of Neron Kaisar written in Hebrew characters may be more than a coincidence.† But the recognition of such Neronian colouring (more or less) appears to the present writer quite compatible (1) with rejection of dubious references to the literal return or revival of Nero (so Zöckler, Comm. in loc.), and (2) with the view that the beast is not Nero exceptionally as an individual, nor even the Roman government exclusively, but rather the entire antichristian world-power, represented, in the time of the writer, by the ungodly and persecuting pagan empire, and are belief the property of the property embodied, throughout the ages, in all that is opposed to the progress of Christ's kingdom.

After every possible allowance is made for exaggerations on the part of those unknown original authorities on whom Tacitus and others relied, Nero remains a moral monstrosity. His fundamental vice appears to have been vanity rather than cruelty. Originally well disposed, even amiable and generous, he became through inordinate vanity the moral prey of base and selfseeking flatterers, and intolerant of all who could not, or would not, pander to his insatiable lust for applause. This morbid vanity made him crave for notoriety not only in what was harmless, but in extravagance, wantonness, reckless exercise of despotic power, and provision of fresh stimulants to the jaded popular appetite for exciting 'pleasure.' Vanity, moreover, constrained him to regard as enemies to be removed all whose character or popularity detracted from his own reputation, and as indispensable victims those whose wealth would be serviceable for the gratification of his cravings. The only possible palliation of his later enormities is the supposition that through vicious indulgence of his passions he had become, at intervals, in-sane (Wiedemeister and Baring-Gould).

The composition of the Apoc. is referred by these writers to the time of Galba or of Vespasian (A.D. 68-69), and the alleged reference to Nero Redivirus is associated with the appearance about that time of a pseudo-Nero in the island Cythnus (Tac. Hist. ii. 8). The most significant alleged parallel, however, between the Beast and the returning Nero (viz. 'one of the seven kings' who is 'fallen,'yet to be 'an eighth') depends on a disputable exegesis of is xiv irra irr. This rendering, 'is one of '(instead of 'proceedeth from'), although grammatically tenable (cf. Ac 219), is not in accord with the usus of Rev, which elsewhere inserts ii (713-157-171-219).

NEST (12 ken, record, roord).—The receptacle constructed by a bird in which to lay its eggs and rear its young (Dt 22⁴ 32¹¹). Swallows make their nest in the Lord's house (! Ps 84³); eagles, on inaccessible pinnacles of the rocks (Job 33³⁷). Hence a secure fortification, esp. in the mountains, is called a nest (Nu 24²¹, Jer 49¹⁶, Ob 4, Hab 2⁹). Many birds return, from year to year, to the same nest, and do not wander in search of another (Pr 27⁸): a forsaken nest is a special type of desolation 278); a forsaken nest is a special type of desolation (Is 16³ m). A quiet, assured, permanent home is called a nest (Job 29¹⁸). The sippor makes its nest in the cedars, and the stork her house (nest) in the fir trees (Ps 104¹⁷). Hence the 'inhabitress (Jer 22²⁸) of Lebanon' is said to make her 'nest in the cedars,' and 'all the fowls of heaven made their nests' in the boughs of the emblematic Assyrian cedar tree (Ezk31°), i.e. all nations were under Assyr. protection. The art with which birds conceal their nests is alluded to (Is 1014). Owls choose ruins (Is 3415); doves, holes of the rock (Jer 4826). The 'rooms' in the ark are called kinnim, 'nests' (Gn 614 m), perhaps in allusion to the nests of gregarious

The nests of the NT (Mt 820, Lk 926) are not provaid but κατασκηνώσεις = 'resting places,' or 'roosting perches.' This makes the Saviour's comparison more forcible. He has not merely no home, but not even a cave like a fox, or a lodging place like a bird. With this corresponds the verb κατασκηνώω, which is tr⁴ (Mt 1322, Mk 420, Lk 1319) 'lodge,' and (Ac 2260) quoted from Ps 16°, where the Heb. is β2° yishkôn (LXX κατασκηνώσει), 'rest.' The word means camping or bivouacking, not residing. word means camping or bivouacking, not residing. G. E. Post.

NETAIM.—AV of 1 Ch 4256 reads, 'Those that dwelt among plants (RVm plantations) and hedges,' but RV gives 'the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah,' and this is probably the correct tra of מַנְיִם מִינִים בְּיִים 'בְּיִיִי'. The taking of מַנְיִם as a proper name is supported by the LXX (B 'Aṭaciµ, A 'Araciµ). The site has not been identified, but Netaim, like GEDERAH (wh. see), was probably in the Shephelah of Judah. the Shephelah of Judah.

NETHINIM (AV Nethinims).—The word is always preceded by the article, cyrny, 'the Nethinim.' In one passage, Ezr 8°°, the Kere has the regular participial form cyrny. The unused sing. The LXX usually has of Naθευνείμ, but in several passages there are obvious clerical errors, such as τῶν 'Αθανείμ, Καθευνείμ; 1 Ch 9° has of δεδομένοι. The Pesh. generally transliterates 1Δ1, but in some places omits; at 1 Ch 9° it has 1°° (sojourners), at Ezr 8°° 201.? 1°° (their servants). Josephus (Ant. XI. v. 1) calls them leposoukos, and this agrees well with the obvious derivation of the word from [12]—'to give': they were the men given to the temple as its slaves to

Very little is said about the early history of the Nethinim. Nu 31^{20.47} (R) states that at the close of the campaign against the Midianites 'Moses took one drawn out of every fifty, both of man and of beast, and gave them (127) unto the Levites.' Jos 9²¹ (R) relates that the Gibeonites were punished for their guile by being made 'hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation and for the altar of the Lord.' In the historical books there is no further reference to persons occupying such a position until Ezekiel bitterly denounces the employment of heathens in connexion with the sanctuary: 'Let it suffice you of all your abominations, in that ye have brought in aliens, uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary,' 44^{6.7}. 'Aliens,' though it may be doubted whether they were allowed to remain uncircumcised, had been unhesitatingly employed by former generations in doing the drudgery of the temple, and the disagreeable tasks requisite to sacrificial worship. Many of them may have continued to be heathen at heart notwithstanding their enforced conformity to the worship of J'. Others certainly became devout worshippers of the God of Israel. And this protest of Ezekiel's was for a long time quite ineffectual: so strict a zealot as Ezra welcomed the services of the Nethinim.

It is in the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles that this class of temple servants comes prominently into view. The list of their family-names contained in Ezr 2⁴³⁻⁵⁴, Neh 7⁴⁶⁻⁵⁶, confirms the generally accepted belief that they were in great part descendants of captives taken in war. The names have quite a foreign air. 'The children of Meunim,' Ezr 2⁵⁰, were in all probability descended from the Meunim, the people of Maon, whom Uzziah conquered (2 Ch 26⁷; cf. 2 Ch 20¹ LXX). 'The children of Nephisim,' Ezr 2⁵⁰, are doubtless representatives of the race mentioned Gn 25¹⁵. 'The children of Solomon's servants,' who, in both lists, immediately follow the Nethinim, are spoken of in such a way as to show that their functions were substantially the same as those performed by the Nethinim, but that they occupied a slightly lower plane. Their ancestors may have been Canaanites given to the temple by Solomon, or captives taken by him in war. Ezr 8²⁰ asserts that David and his princes gave the Nethinim 'for the service of the Levites': such a gift would be sure to consist of captives.

It is, however, in the actual accounts of the Return from the Exile that we find ourselves on firm ground. From the two lists already referred to, Ezr 2⁴³⁻⁵⁴ and Neh 7⁴⁶⁻⁵⁶, we learn that 392 Nethinim and children of Solomon's servants formed part of the first company, which returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel, B.C. 538. Eighty years later, when Ezra had started on his momentous journey to the Holy City, he discovered that amongst his companions were very few ministers for the house of God. He therefore halted beside the river that runneth to Ahava,' and sent to procure a supply of suitable men from a city called Casiphia. We are hardly entitled to argue from the corrupt text of Ezr 8¹⁷ that the person whose aid he especially invoked was himself a Nathin, although the EV runs, 'I told them what they should say unto Iddo, and his brethren the Nethinim.' The LXX omits the name Iddo: 'I put in their mouth words to say to their brethren.'
If this omission does not commend itself to our judgment, we may, with the minimum of textual alteration, read "in unm, 'and his brethren, and the Nethinim,' or may omit "in as a gloss on purply. The last-named expedient seems best: the Nethinim in w "a are not senders but sent: Iddo Nethinim in v. 20 are not senders, but sent; Iddo and his brethren, the former in particular, were Levites who possessed authority over all who were qualified to serve in the temple, including the Nethinim (see vv. 18. 18. 19). And it appears from v. 20 het hat 220 Nethinim were now sent to strengthen v.³⁰ that 220 Nethinim were now sent to strengthen Ezra's hands. Thirteen years later, when Nehemiah had joined his dispirited fellow-countrymen in Jerusalem, and had put new life into them by inducing them to rebuild the city walls, 'the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel, unto the place over against the water-gate toward the east, and the tower that standeth out' (Neh 3²⁰). V.²⁰ of the same chapter mentions 'the house of the Nethinim.' Hence it would appear that such of them as resided in Jerusalem had a quarter of their own on the southern continuation of the of their own on the southern continuation of the temple hill. From this post they would easily reach the scene of their daily duties, the temple itself. And 'they were thus posted near to the exit which communicated with the Virgin's Spring; and if their duties at the temple at all resembled those of the Gibeonites, we can understand why their residence over against the water-gate is thus carefully noted' (Ryle, Ezra, etc. p. lviii). Some of the Nethinim, however, lived in other cities of the Nethnim, nowever, lived in other cities which Ezr 2⁷⁰ designates as specially belonging to the ministers of the temple. Wherever they lived, they, in common with the other religious officials, were freed by the decree of Artaxerxes (Ezr 7²⁴) from 'tribute, custom, or toll.' Those who dwelt in Jerusalem, possibly their brethren in the other towns also, formed a guild under two superintendents. These two, at any rate in Nehemiah's time, were chosen out of their own class. miah's time, were chosen out of their own class, for Ziha, one of the two (Neh II²¹), is in the lists at Ezr 2⁴⁵, Neh 7⁴⁵.

We hear but little concerning the Nethinim subsequently to this period. It is easy to trace the gradual incorporation of the singers and the doorkeepers with the Levites. It is practically certain that the Nethinim, who are so often mentioned immediately after these two classes, obtained the same privilege. In the post-exilic legislation the Levites alone are mentioned, and almost take the name Nethinim. Nu 3º 186 (both P) state that the Levites were upon upon to Aaron and his sons. And 1 Ch 6^{34.} (Mab.) declares that the Levites were upon 'for all the service of the tabernacle of the house of God.' Cf. also 1 Es 1³ ros Acuetras, lepodoúlous roû 'Ispath. Ezekiel's reform is thus at last carried out in the letter, perhaps in the spirit also. Schürer (GJV³ ii. 279 [HJP II. i. 273]) has shown, that although the Talmudical writers frequently refer to the Nethinim, they exhibit no real sense of the existence and activity of such an order, for they ascribe the performance of the duties which once devolved on this order to another set of men altogether, the upon or the many upon out their bitterness against everything that is not strictly Jewish. 'Ezra removed them as it is said (Neh 11²¹): the servants dwell in darkness, and in the world to come God will put them away from Him, according to the words Ezk 48³⁹: the servants of the city shall serve Him' (Kiddush. iv. 1); 'a priest is before a Levite, a Levite before an Israelite, an Israelite before a Mamzer, a Mamzer before a Nathin, a Nathin before a proselyte, a proselyte before a manumitted slave' (Hora). iii. 8). At Jebam. ii. 4, an Israelite is forbidden to marry a descendant of those devoted to the temple service, and this is grounded on 2 S 21². Such passages as Jebam. vi. 2, vii. 5, viii. 3, Maccoth iii. 1, Kethub. i. 8, iii. 1, Kiddush. iii. 12, may also be consulted.

Similar institutions have existed in other lands, both in ancient and in modern times. Hermann (Lehrb. der Griech. Antiq.2 Theil 2, p. 107) points out that it was as natural for a temple as for an individual to possess slaves who would perform the lower duties which were necessary daily. In a note he refers to Pausan. x. 32. 8, τοῦ θεοῦ δοῦλοι; and v. 13. 2, ἐστὶ δὲ ὁ ξυλεὐς ἐκ τῶν οἰκετῶν τοῦ Διὸς, ἔργον δὲ αἰνῷ πρόκειται τὰ ἐς τὰς θυκετῶν τοῦ Διὸς, ἔργον δὲ αἰνῷ πρόκειται τὰ ἐς τὰς θυκετῶν τοῦ Διὸς, ἔργον δὲ αἰνῷ πρόκειται τὰ ἐς τὰς θυκιας ξύλα τεταγμένου λήμματος καὶ πόλεσι παρέχειν καὶ ἀνδρὶ ἰδιώτη. In proof that these slaves were captives taken in war, or persons bought with money, he points to Pausan. iii. 18. 3, and to Herod. vi. 134: in the latter place an αἰχμάλωτος γύνη is called ὑποζάκωρος τῶν χθονίων θεῶν. Burckhardt (Travels in Arabia, i. 288 fi.) says that the employment of slaves or eunuchs in the mosque at Mecca is of very ancient date, Moawya Ibn Abi Sofyan, a short time after Mohammed, having ordered slaves for the Kaaba. 'The eunuchs perform the duty of police officers in the temple; they prevent disorders, and daily wash and sweep, with large brooms, the pavement round the Kaaba. . . . The number of eunuchs never exceeds forty, and they are supplied by pashas and other grandees, who send them, when young, as presents to the mosque: one hundred dollars are sent with each as an outfit. Mohammed Aly presented ten young eunuchs to the mosque.' See, further, art. PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

LITERATURE.—There is an excellent brief account of the Nethinim in Ryle's Ezra and Neh. p. Iviii, and in the Notes to that Commentary. The art. Generalogy, in vol. ii. of this Dictionary, p. 160, gives the lists of Ezr, Neh, and I Es; but the spelling of the names in the leading MSS deserves careful attention. It should also be mentioned that Torrey, who does not stand alone, holds that all the OT passages which mention the Nethinim are from the Chronicler, whom he considers quite unreliable. See his Composition, etc., of Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 17. The reader may consult also Bertholet, Die Stellung der Isr. u. der Juden zu den Fremden, pp. 52, 133, 342.

Netupha).—A town, the name of which first occurs in the list of the exiles who returned under Zerubbabel (Ezr 222 – Neh 726=1 Es 518). Owing to its position in this list between Bethlehem and Anathoth, it has been argued that Netophah must have lain somewhere to the south of Jerusalem, between the capital and Bethlehem, and is to be identified with Khurbet umm-Toba. More probable is the view that the name Netophah is still preserved in the modern Beit Nettif at the entrance to the Wady es-Sunt or Vale of Elah; the valley of Beth Netophah, which is mentioned in the Mishna (Shebith ix. 5), will then correspond to that part of the Wady en-Najil which connects the Wady es-Sunt and the Wady es-Surar (Guérin, Jud. ii. 374 ff.; PEF Mem. iii. 24; Neubauer, Gtogr. p. 128; Buhl, GAP p. 194).

Netophah was the birthplace of two of David's heroes, Maharai and Heldai (2 S 23^{28, 29}), and also of Seraiah, one of the captains who supported Gedaliah (2 K 25²³, Jer 40³ [EPHAI]): according to 1 Ch 9¹⁶ it was a priestly city, inhabited by singers (Neh 12²⁶). Hence the Gentilic name the Netophathite(s) ('nobin'; 2 S B δ' Eντωφατείτης, A δ Νεθωφαθείτης; 2 K B δ Νεφφαθείτης, A δ Νεθωφαθείτης; 1 Ch B δ Νεθωφατεί . . . δ Νετωφαθεί; in Neh 12²⁸ B omits, A Νετωφαθί).

NETTLE.—Two Heb. words are trd in AV and RV 'nettle.' (1) אָרָיה hārāl occurs twice (Job 30', Zeph 20'), and in the plural form מַרְלִים hārālim once (Pr 24³¹). (2) מַרְשׁׁה kimmôsh (Is 34¹³), or מַּרִים kimôsh (Hos 9°). The pl. form יוֹשְׁיִּבְּיִם kimmēshónim (Pr 24³¹) is trd in EV 'thorns.' The sense and content the first transfer and sense and content to the first transfer and sense text of the first two passages in which kimmosh and kimosh occur are well met by the rendering 'nettle,' and this rendering is supported by many versions and scholars. If it be adopted, then kimmeshonim should be also rendered by 'nettles' instead of 'thorns.' In that case haralim (Pr 24⁸¹) cannot be trd 'nettles.' This has led commentators to seek for another plant which will fulfil all the conditions. The harul must grow in the wilderness, associated with the malliah (mallows AV, saltwort RV), shih (bushes), and the retem, and must be large enough for the famine-stricken outcasts to gather beneath (Job 30³⁻⁷). It must be something that would naturally be associated with salt pits as an emblem of desolation (Zeph 29). It must be something that covers the face of a waste field (Pr 24st). Celsius (Hierobot. ii. 165) gives a list of candidates, which he rejects in favour of Zizyphus Spina-Christi. Royle thinks that hārdl is the same as the Arab. khardal=mustard. This would require the supposition that had been written by mistake for n. The wild mustards would suit all the conditions, being plants which grow in neglected situations (wildernesses), which cover deserted fields, and which grow large enough to enable several persons to gather under them. Still there is no proof that this is the correct rendering. 'Wild vetches' (RVm in all the passages: cf. 'chick-pea' of Oxf. Heb. Lex.) would hardly suit the conditions. The present writer is inclined to look upon the word as generic, and equivalent to thorn, scrub, or brush, either one of which would fulfil all the conditions. Such scrubs are to be found everywhere in the desolate places, and include a considerable number of such plants as the three indigenous species of boxthon, Lycium Europæum, L., L. Arabicum, Schweinf., and L. Barbarum, L. (all of which are known in Arab. as 'ausaj), and Nitraria tridentata, Desf., the gharkad. All of these are thorny shrubs, growing in waste places and in salty soil, and would furnish a sufficient shade to be welcome to a sun-stricken wretch such as Job describes. The thorny Zizyphus and Acadia sorubs would also suit the growing magning. scrubs would also suit the generic meaning.

Of nettles we have Urtica urens, L., U. dioica, L., U. pilulifera, L., and U. membranacea, Poir, all of which are known in Arab. as kurreis or kureis or kureis in neglected fields and gardens. In the deserts we find Forskahlea tenacissima, L., the lizzak of the Arabs, the name of which signifies a plant which sticks or clings. It belongs to the same Order as Urtica. The signification of the Arab names of all these species is similar to that of kimmûsh. G. E. Post. of kimmûsh.

NEW, NEWNESS (270; Kaupbs, véos, Kaupbrys).—In the East many tendencies converge towards the the East many tendencies converge towards the veneration of use and wont. Of these the following are the most noteworthy:—(1) The uniformity with which a certain kind of weather prevails through a certain season of the year, Gn 8²², 1 S 12¹⁸⁻¹⁸; (2) the conservative influence of the patriarchal form of government; (3) the transmission of the same handicraft, such as masonry, weaving, etc., from father to son; (4) the fact that when lands are sold, the agricultural labourers continue to occupy the small houses of the village included in the property, and thus become practiincluded in the property, and thus become practically serfs upon the estate; (5) the religious conviction that whatever exists, exists by the will of

By such influences Orientals come to regard Custom as a regulative power of high authority.
One of their Arabic proverbs says, 'Everything follows Custom—even religion,' and another, 'The world is composed of earth, air, fire, water—and Custom.' Hence anything departing from the usual routine affects Orientals with profound surprise, and finds them unprepared to account for it or deal with it. The Indian Mutiny was quelled by quick initiative. In every unexpected situation Orientals have one exclamation, 'What shall I do?' In the presence of anything novel they give themselves up to the simple pleasure of surprise, without much attempt to find the explanation of what is strange in the action of familiar forces. Every phenomenon in nature is referred at once to the First Cause with the exclamation, 'Praise to the Creator'; and on seeing any ingenious mechanism or hearing of any incident of conspicuous veracity or unselfishness, it is enough to say as an expression of the general feeling, 'This is new, we have never seen anything like this!' The mental habit that passes over secondary causes leads Orientals to set a slight value on the patience and precision of thought and statement required for the discovery and application of such causes. The moral forces which adorn conduct and character are also regarded as given rather than cultivated.

The prevalence of routine, and the mystery connected with anything unusual, coupled with the excitable nature of the people, cause everything

Throughout the Bible there are many instances of the astonishment, attractiveness, and authority connected with strange occurrences and new be-ginnings. With regard to natural and religious seasons, each day has its light and darkness, week is separated from week. The appearance of the new moon announcing the commencement of the month was also a day of religious festival, I S 20°. 20. The Feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles were connected with the new produce of the year. New Year's Day was reckoned for different purposes five times in the year. The year of Jubilee was a time of recovery and renewal for those who had been crushed by adversity.

In matters of personal experience and religious symbolism, the same interest attaches to what is new. In the Bible Abraham and Jacob receive new names; so with Jerusalem Is 6224, the disciples Jn 1515, the saints Rev 217. Among modern Orientals, the birth of a firstborn son gives a new name to the father; among the Jews, new clothes are always worn at the Feast of Passover; the soul is believed to ascend during sleep to the presence of the Recording Angel and to return anew to the body in the moment of consciousness; so also the seraphim before the throne are thought of as created every day to feel and proclaim the glory of the Divine Presence. As the new rite of Passover announced the creation of Israel as a chosen people, so the new testament in Christ's blood (Mt 2620) created the nationality of world-wide sainthood.

The celebration of the New Moon belongs to the most ancient of Hebrew rites. It perhaps goes back to the time when the moon was still an back to the time when the moon was still an object of worship (Smith, Internat. Crit. Comm. on Samuel, p. 185). Lagarde held that the generic Heb. term for 'joyous praise' (ארל) was derived from an old name of the New Moon (see Gesenius-Buhl, s.v. אל, II.). The New Moon was a feast of nomads, but it was carried over to their new agricultural conditions by the Israelite settlers in Canaan (Cobb, Origines Judaica, p. 138). In the time of the earlier prophets, the New Moon the time of the earlier prophets, the New Moon stood in the same line with another lunar observance, the Sabbath (see FEASTS). No work or business was attended to on either day (Am 8⁵). Hosea (2¹¹) speaks of the feasts, the New Moons, the Sabbaths, and festal assemblies as passing away with the national independence; and a similar connexion between the New Moon and the other solemn days is found in Is 113.

Just as the New Moon occupies a prominent place with the prophets, so does it with Ezekiel and in the Levitical legislation (P). Ezekiel, who curiously enough frequently dates his prophecies on the New Moon (26¹ 29¹⁷ 31¹ 32¹, cf. Hag 1¹), describes the gate of the inner court of the temple looking eastwards as kept shut for the six working days, but opened on the Sabbath and New Moon (Ezk 461). The prince, besides making special arrangements for the great New Moons of the first and seventh months (this is the probable meaning of Ezk New Moons (Ezk 46¹⁻⁷). The gate was open till the evening, and while the people stood without the prince was allowed to stand by the threshold. According to Ezekiel (46°), the New Moon offerings consisted of a young bullock, six lambs, and a ram without blemish (the Sabbath burnt-offering was less, v.4), as burnt-offerings; an ephah for the bullock and for each ram, a handful of flour for each lamb, and a hin of oil to an ephah as a meal-offering (vv. 7.8). In Nu 2811 the burnt-offering consisted of two young bullocks, one ram, and seven he lambs of the first year without blemish; fine flour, oil and wine carefully proportioned (vv. ¹³⁻¹⁴), and a he-goat as a sin-offering (v. ¹⁶). The offerings here, as in Ezekiel, are more important than for the Sabbath (Nu 28^{9. 10}). An additional detail is added in Nu 10¹⁰, where the law ordains that 'in the days of your gladness, and in your set feasts, and in the beginnings of your months' the two silver trumpets were to be sounded during the sacrificial rites as a 'memorial before your God.' Some authorities have held that Ps 81⁹ [Heb.4] 'Blow up the trumpet in the New Moon, at the full moon, on our solemn feast day,' refers to the ordinary New Moon. Thus Aquila and Symm. render to πάση νεομηνία; but the LXX, like the EV, omits 'every.' The Targum refers the passage solely to the New Moon of the seventh month (Lv 23²⁴); and this, the traditional Jewish view, has been adopted by modern commentators (see Baethgen and Duhm, ad loc.). The subject is further treated in the article TRUMPET.

Some difficulty has been found in explaining the omission of the New Moon in Deuteronomy and in the documents named JE. It has been seen that the New Moon was very ancient, and that it was of great importance after the Exile (see, e.g., Is 66²³ and other references cited above and below. In Chronicles the New Moon is assumed as an established institution). Dillmann suggests that the omission in the intermediate period is due simply to the fact that the observance was a popular feast that needed no specific legal sanction. It may, however, be (as Wellhausen, Prolegomena, p. 118, holds) that there was a temporary cessation of the observance of the New Moon, both because heathen elements intruded into the festivities (Isaiah speaks of the 'monthly prognosticators,' 47¹³), and also because the greater importance attached to the Sabbath must have made the observance of the New Moon (which came, unlike the Sabbath, on irregular days) irksome. After the Exile the New Moon recovered its importance because the great feasts were fixed in accordance with it. (This view is adopted by Benzinger, Heb. Arch. p. 465, and Nowack, Lehrbuch der Heb. Arch. ii. 140). See Time.

As to the manner in which the New Moon was observed, there were other features besides the sacrifices. There was no 'solemn convocation' on the New Moon, but it is usually inferred from 2 K 423 that visits were paid to the prophets on that day. The servants and asses were available for longer journeys than on the days of labour. Some (e.g. Duhm) explain Is 6623 as referring to general assemblages in Jerusalem for worship on the New Moon ('jeden Monat am Neumond'), and this passage of Isaiah was the text for a fine Rabbinical homily in the Pesikta Rabbathi for the New Moon. Ezra publicly read the law on the New Moon of the seventh month (Neh 8²). The New Moon was apparently the time for changing David's officials, according to 1 Ch 27. It is not easy to gather the full significance of the incident related in 1 S 20° . David evidently refers to a family feast on the New Moon, but it is not clear that the king had a special feast on that day. It is very probable that this was so, but Wellhausen's remark as cited by Driver (Notes on the Hebrew Text of Samuel, p. 127) is evidently weighty. 'David, as appears from v. 226., was, together with Abner and Jonathan, Saul's daily and regular companion at table: thus the sentence 'ואנכי ישב וני cannot be so related to the preceding one, as though the new moon were the occasion of his being a guest at the king's table: on the contrary, the new moon is rather alleged as the excuse for his absence. Consequently, the rendering, "To-morrow is new moon, and I must sit with the king at meat," is excluded; and the only course remaining open is to read with LXX משר מי "To-morrow is new moon, and I will not sit with the king at meat; but thou shalt let me go," etc. No time of day is specified for the king's meal from which David absented himself; but, as Smith points out, from the fact that Jonathan waited till next morning after the second day to carry his news to David, the meal was probably late in the day.

Fasting was avoided on the New Moon (Jth 8). The observance of the New Moon fell into disuse in the Christian communities (Col 2¹⁶). In the medieval Jewish circles the New Moon, however, retained its importance. Women did not work, fasting was prohibited, and in the synagogue liturgy many special features were introduced. On the Sabbath before the New Moon the event was publicly announced, on the day itself a reading from the law (Nu 28¹⁻¹⁵) was introduced, special Psalms (forming part of the Hallel, Pss 113-118) were chanted, and other liturgical pasages were added. These are retained in the modern synagogue, and are fully described in the Shulchan Aruch, Orach Chayim, par. 417 ff. See also Maimonides, Hilchoth Kiddush Ha-Chodesh (of which there are several Latin translations). The Blessing of the Moon is also retained. This is a collection of passages of varying antiquity, and is recited at night while the moon is visible, a Saturday night in the first week of new month being preferred for the celebration. (The best commentary on these rites is to be found in Landshut's edition of the Hebrew Prayer-Book, Hegyon Leb, p. 390 f.). Some of the ceremonics are clearly very ancient, especially the dances, which until quite recently were performed in Jewish communities in the public streets. Others of the rites are at least as old as the Talmud. The modern Arabs of the desert still 'greet the New Moon with devout ejaculations, and the women chant their perpetual refrain of a single verse, and dance for an hour or two' (Doughty, Travels in Samuel, p. 185).

We are without information as to the method by which the New Moon was fixed and announced in biblical times. But the Mishna (Rosh Hashana) describes the method then prevalent. There was no fixed calendar till the 4th cent. (see TIME), and the New Moon was declared from actual observation. The eye-witnesses were carefully examined on the 30th day of each month (especially of the months Nisan, Ab, Elul, Tishri, Chislev, and Adar), and, if the testimony of the witnesses was accepted, that day was declared 'sanctified' by fiat of the Sanhedrin. If no witnesses were available, then the following day was New Moon, as the Jewish month never contained more than 30 days. The New Moon was announced in Judæa till the year 225, when the declaration was made in Tiberias. The news was conveyed by means of signals, torches being lit on the hills. The Samaritans rendered a change necessary, as they ignited similar bonfires at wrong periods. Messengers were despatched to more distant parts, where it was not unusual for two days to be observed as New Moon, a custom which still prevails at certain months of the Jewish year. After the 4th cent. the New Moon was no longer fixed by observation, but the Karaites restored the older custom. Schwartz (Der jüdische Kalender) holds that the New Moons of the first and seventh months (Nisan and Tishri) were fixed by astronomical calculation and not empirically, as early as the time of Ezra. Certainly, the Jews must have had sufficient knowledge of astronomy to make such a calculation possible (but see Time).

Exodus and Leviticus, p. 577 t.; Pineles, Darcha shal Torah, p. 251 ff.; Epstein, Alterthuemer; Poxnanski, $JQR \times p.$ 153 ff. (This writer holds that the New Moon was also fixed empirically by some Rabbanites as late as the 10th cent.). A popular account of the Jewish Calendar and the details as to the New Moons will be found in J. Jacobs' (annual) Jewish Year Book. I. ABRAHAMS.

NEW TESTAMENT.—The name 'testament' is derived from the Latin testamentum, which was erroneously adopted in the Old Latin Version as the equivalent for the Gr. word διαθήκη employed in the LXX to represent the Heb. "" 'covenant." in the LXX to represent the Heb. 1713 'covenant.' It is in this sense that \(\delta a \text{that} \eta_i a \text{that} \text{that} \) is used in the NT to designate the old or the new Dispensation, and has come to be applied, in accordance with Heb. usage (Ex 247, 2 K 233, 1 Mac 187, Sir 2428), to the literature in which the respective history and principles of the two Dispensations are authoritatively set forth. (Cf. Mt 2628, Lk 2229, 1 Co 1125, 2 Co 38-14, and Gn 174, Ex 248, Jer 3121 et supra). In the OT Jerome usually took care to employ fadus or pactum as the Latin equivalent for 1714; but in his revision of the NT tra he unfortunately adhered to the old expression, the consequence being that the false meaning thus imported into the Latin passed into the EV, whose 'testament' is as misleading as testamentum, and has rightly been altered to 'covenant' in the RV, except in one doubtful passage, He 916-17 (see Westcott, ad loc.).

Westcott, ad loc.). Relation of the NT to the OT and to the APOCRYPHAL LITERATURE OF THE JEWS.—The NT forms the second and concluding portion of the sacred writings which embody the Divine revelation communicated in the line of Jewish history. Before any part of the NT had been written, the Heb. canon had been virtually closed; and the idea of a new collection of sacred writings which should be held in no less veneration than the old was slow to take possession of the Christian Church. Hence the OT Scriptures, to which the apostles constantly appealed for evidence that Jesus was the Messiah, continued to be for many years the only authori-tative writings in the Church. But the way had been so far prepared for the association of Christian Scriptures with the OT by the recent inclusion in the LXX of certain apocryphal works which had no place in the Heb. canon. The language of the LXX was also that in which the new religion was to express itself; and the character of the Gr. tongue, so rich and flexible and many-sided, even in its degenerate Hellenistic form, and so worldwide in its use, was itself a token of the freedom from Judaic bonds which Christian thought was to work out for itself, and gave promise of a literature which should be more or less in touch with the intellectual life of the whole civilized world. With the exception of Luke, who seems to have been a Greek (an inference from Col 4¹¹⁻¹⁴, which is borne out by the tone and style of his Gospel and the Bk. of Acts), the writers of the NT were of Jewish extraction, and they were all filled with the deepest reverence for the OT. They quote from it nearly 300 times, their quotations being drawn from almost all parts of it; while the instances in which its influence can be traced without any direct quotations from it are still more numerous. The whole NT from first to last reflects the characteristics of the OT in thought as well as in expression; and in the Epistles and Acts and Apocalypse as well as in the Gospels we find constant illustration of Christ's words, 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil.' The NT fulfils the OT, not by supplementing it but by spiritualizing it, transforming rules into principles, and resolving the outward, temporary, and national into that which is inward, permanent, and universal. In other words, it brings to light and sets free of limitations the essential principles lying at the root of the OT, on which the latter depends for its spiritual life and meaning,—according to the well-known words of Augustine, 'Novum Testamentum in Vetere latet; Vetus Testamentum in Novo patet.' Even in their bodily structure a close analogy has been traced between them, the first rootion of each being mainly characterized by first portion of each being mainly characterized by the personal manifestation of God, the next by the revelation of His will through the acts and words of His chosen servants, the third and last by prophetic visions of the future. Yet, notwithstanding this intimate relationship between the two, there is at the same time a strong and essential contrast between them-a contrast as great in their character and contents as in the process of their growth. To some extent the difference in their character may be accounted for by the new conditions of existence to which the Jewish nation was subjected under the Roman Empire, of which we have many tokens in our Lord's parables as well as in other parts of the NT. In some degree, also, it may be traced to the new elements of thought contained in the later Jewish writings already referred to. While the points of contact between the NT and heathen literature are extremely few,* the LXX, on the other hand, was familiar to most of the NT writers, their OT quotations being generally derived from it. their OT quotations being generally derived from it and not from the Heb.; and the influence of several apocr. books contained in it, notably the Bk. of Wisdom, can be discerned in a number of the Epistles, although there is not a single express quotation from any of these books in the NT. In a few instances, also, chiefly in St. Paul's Epistles,†

and in the Ep. to the Heb. and the writings of St. John expressions are to be found (such as Λόγος, Παράκλητος, 'Αρχιερεός, applied to Christ) showing an affinity with the views of Philo, the chief representative of the fresh impulse which Jewish thought received from contact with Greek philogeness of Alexandria. sophy at Alexandria and elsewhere. But the most striking signs of transition to a new age are to be found, not in the OT Apocr., properly so-called, or in Rabbinical scholasticism or Hellenistic philosophy, but in the pseudonymous apocalyptic literature (partly recovered within the last century), which was framed on the model of the well-known Book of Daniel, and prepared the way for its Christian counterpart, the Apocalypse of John. Whether this literature was a spirited offshoot from the main stem of Pharisaic thought, or formed part of the esoteric doctrine of the Essenes, whose strange tenets and literature are described by Philo and Josephus, although their name is never even mentioned in the NT, is a question which has not yet been determined. But in Jude we find a direct quotation from one of the most important of these apocalyptic works (Bk. of Enoch); and elsewhere there are a few stray quotations and allusions to circumstances not mentioned in the OT for which the writers were probably indebted to a similar

More important than such Haggadic details are certain ideas and expressions in the extant remains of this apocalyptic literature, which appear to be reflected in the thought and language not only of the NT writers but also of our Lord Himself. There are Christian interpolations in these books, and their date of composition is often very uncertain, but, even in those parts of them to which a pre-Christian date may be safely assigned, there are more distinct foreshadowings than any of the OT books contain of a number of truths relating to the spiritual world which hold a more or less prominent place in the NT. Among such elements of Christian thought are the unique personality of of Christian thought are the unique personality of the Messiah (of which we have a token in the frequent occurrence in the Bk. of Enoch of the expression, 'the Son of man,' with a Messianic reference that goes far beyond the meaning of the words, 'one like unto a son of man,' in Dn 7¹²), the doctrine of immortality, of the resurrection (of Dn 102) of a future judgment with eternal (cf. Dn 12°), of a future judgment with eternal rewards and punishments, of a hierarchy of angels with manifold operations, of the agency of demons, and of predestination, together with enlarged conceptions of Divine providence as embracing universal history, and of the Messianic promise as securing the interests of the individual as well as of the nation: all these developments being due, partly to the foreign elements of thought which the Jews imported from Babylonia and Persia, and partly to the growing hopelessness of their national position (as regarded mere mundane possibilities), which naturally disposed them to the study of eschatology. It was, doubtless, these anticipations of Christianity that gave some of these books so high a place in the estimation of the Church Fathers, who sometimes treated them as if they had been canonical; the Bk. of Enoch, for example, being cited as γραφή in the Ep. of Barnabas. In other respects, however, both ethical and theological, this literature comes far short of 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'; and we have still to fall back on the mystery of the Incarnation, with its attendant doctrines of Christ's atoning sacrifice (of which there is scarcely any trace in contemporary Jewish thought, so absorbed was the nation in the formal keeping of the Law as the only means of salvation), of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men revealed in Christ, of the life and immortality secured by His resurrection from the dead, and of the Holy Spirit imparted by Him to His Church, in order to find an adequate explanation of the majesty of Christ's person and the sublimity of His teaching as depicted in the Gospels, and at the same time to account for the sure and certain hope, the humble and self-re-nouncing faith, the loving and grateful devotion, the pure, tender, and world-wide morality which are characteristic of the whole NT.

ii. History of the NT, including its Rela-tion to the Church Fathers and the Chris-TIAN APOCRYPHA.—As already indicated, a New Testament in our sense of the term was something which the apostles never dreamt of. The charge which they had received from their Master was to which they nad received from their master was to preach the gospel, and the promise of the Spirit was expressly connected with the bearing of oral testimony. As they had received nothing in writing from their Master's hands, they were written not likely to see any necessity for a word, so long as they were able to fulfil their commission to preach the gospel, especially as they were looking for a speedy return of their Lord, and had no idea that so many centuries were to elapse before the great event should take place. Probably the earliest nucleus of the NT consisted of notes of the apostles' preaching, either drawn up by their hearers for their own use, or intended as an aid to catechists and teachers. Some such notes (probably in Aramaic, of which we have many traces in the Greek text) seem to have formed the basis of our Synoptic Gospels. Although not published in their present form till long after Christ's death, the Gospels narrate events, not in the light shed upon them by subsequent experience, but as they were regarded by the disciples at the time of their occurrence. They also preserve expressions in our Lord's discourses which scarcely ever appear in the phraseology of the early Church, while they are at the same time free from forms of while they are at the same time free from forms or speech which betray the post-apostolic date of apocr. Gospels; and in other respects harmonize with the state of things prior to the destruction of Jerusalem in a.D. 70. Before the Gospels assumed their present form, many of the Epistles were already current in the Church. These letters were naturally prized by the Churches to which they were addressed as well as by other which they were addressed, as well as by other Churches which received copies of them, and they were readily admitted to public reading in the congregation, first of all on special occasions (1 Th 5") and in course of time as a general practice, along with prescribed portions of the OT, after the manner of the Jewish synagogue. As the apostles one after another passed away, their testimony and that of those most closely associated with them was more and more treasured by the Church; and the writings in which that testimony was embodied were felt to be indispensable to the faith and life of the Church. In the Apostolic Fathers we can discern signs of the growing reverence for these writings, not only in their reproduction of the thought and language of a considerable number of the Epistles, representing the leading types of apostolic teaching found in the NT, but also in the terms in which St. Paul's writings are referred to by representative men so far distant from one another as Clement of Rome, Ignatius of Antioch, and Polycarp of Smyrna; while our Gospels are also accredited by the substantial harmony of their contents with the facts assumed by the sub-apostolic writers as the basis of their teaching, although the verbal coincidences are neither numerous nor exact, unless we except the Didacht in its quotations from the First and Third Gospels.

But the formal recognition of a new body of Scriptures worthy of being associated with the OT came much later. As the writings composing the NT came into existence only by degrees, in the course of about half a century, to meet the practical needs of the Church, so the collecting of these writings and their setting apart for public use was accomplished only gradually, as the leading representatives of the Church in different parts of the world came to realize the insufficiency and uncertainty of local tradition, and the need for securing the orthodox faith against invasion and corruption. It is not, indeed, till near the close of the 2nd cent. that we find a generally accepted collection of sacred books substantially identical with our NT and equally sacred with the OT. From the nature of its contents, as well as from the language of Patristic writers on the subject, it is evident that the general principle on which the Church proceeded in forming the NT was to admit to it only the writings of apostles, and of those who had written under the influence and direction of This naturally arose from the fact that apostles. the new life of the Church was centred in the person of Jesus Christ, and that the faith of its members depended on the testimony of those who had been brought into close personal contact with Him, or had received a special commission to preach the gospel. But the principle was not always easy of application, and it sometimes led to different conclusions in different parts of the Church, according to the views held as to the authorship of disputed books; while the association of canonical and uncanonical books in the LXX, to which the Fathers were accustomed, tended to make them less rigorous in their judgments than they might have otherwise been. Outside of our NT there were three books which were held in special reverence, being sometimes read in church and occasionally included in great Scripture MSS, viz. the Epistle of Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas; the authors of these books being supposed by many to be identical with the persons of the same names mentioned in the NT in connexion with the Apostle Paul (Ph 4, Ac 12%, Ro 16¹⁴). On the other hand, as regards the disputed books contained in our NT (chiefly minor Epistles, with the Ep. to the Heb. and the Book of Rev), it was because their apostolic authorship was more or less distrusted in certain quarters of the Church, owing to the obscurity of their early history or to some dissatisfaction with their contents, that the right of these books to a place in the Canon was more or less called in question, until at length the public opinion of the Church found expression at the 3rd Council of Carthage in A.D. 397, when the very same books as are contained in our NT were acknowledged to be canonical, and declared to be the only books that should be read in church.

This decree (which seems to have reflected the general mind of the Church, and which has been practically acquiesced in ever since, notwithstanding occasional controversies regarding individual books, and amid conflicting theories as to the authority of Scripture) had the effect of excluding from the Canon not only the three writings already referred to, and one or two other productions of the postapostolic age which were highly esteemed in the Church although they made no claim to apostolic authority, but also another and less worthy class of writings, dating from the 2nd to the end of the 4th cent., which played an important part in the life of the Church, and throw a valuable light on the history of the NT. These are what are known as Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses, apparently numerous, but of which only a small part have come down to us, a few in their entirety, some in a fragmentary form, and others only in name. They varied greatly in their form and contents, but, apart from the early compositions referred to in St. Luke's Gospel (11.2), which completely strategies and contents. which soon disappeared (unless our Second Gospel was one of them) in the survival of the fittest, they were either supplementary to the Canonical Scriptures, furnishing information or doctrine on subjects but little dealt with in the NT, or, more frequently, they were composed for the purpose of bolstering up heretical opinions or practices which were seen to have little or no canonical support. Many of the 'Gospels' were mainly derived from those in the NT (the recently recovered 'Gospel of Peter' borrows from all the four), with more or less modification of the original in the interest of some Gnostic or other heresy. The modification was Gnostic or other heresy. The modification was liable to alteration from time to time (as may be seen from the wide variations in the different MSS of the same work) to meet the exigencies of successive teachers, who issued their several recensions cessive teachers, who issued their several recensions under great names—generally those of apostles—after the manner of the pseudonymous Jewish writers already referred to. Very often the same work was known under a variety of names. For example, the 'Gospel of the Hebrews,' which may have been a Judaic recension of the Heb. original of our St. Matthew, has been identified with the 'Gospel of the Nazarenes' and the still more here-tical 'Gospel of the Ebionites,' as well as with the Gospels of Bartholomew, Cerinthus, and the Twelve Apostles. In this 'Gosp. of the Hebrews' and some other primitive documents, such as the 'Gosp. of Peter' (c. A.D. 125, or, acc. to some, 165) and the

'Gosp. of the Egyptians' (also dating from the 2nd cent.), it may well be that a certain amount of oral tradition was incorporated, which had been preserved by the Jews who resided near the scene of served by the Jews who resided hear the scene or the evangelic history. It in no degree weakens the authority of the NT to find a few grains of such extra-canonical matter appearing in the works of an early Patristic writer, such as Justin Martyr, or even to find an apocr. Gospel quoted by a writer of an eelective turn, like Clement of Alexandria. So far from impairing the credit of the NT writings, these apoor, productions of a later age bear witness to the authority which the written word had already acquired in the Church, and show the necessity under which heretical teachers lay either to manipulate the text of the received books or to adduce other and equally high testimony in favour of their peculiar views. In general, the literature in question is manifestly counterfeit. Much of it is of a character degrading to Christianity, the extravagance and absurdity of its miracles, especially in its pictures of the Saviour's childhood, presenting a sad contrast to the chaste dignity of the canonical records; and there is none of it which, either in respect of outward attestation or intrinsic excellence, can be held to have been unjustly dealt with in being denied admission to the NT. The writings of the Church Fathers show how little influence it exerted in the early Church compared with the NT writings, which formed the general standard of faith and practice, and sometimes even contributed the only element that redeemed Patristic literature from inanity and unprofitableness. The lapse of time, while it exalted the NT Scriptures to honour, brought the apoor. literature into general disrepute. Within a century or two after it had reached the height of its popularity (4th cent.), it lost its place in public esteem and gradually passed out of the notice of the Church, leaving its traces indeed on the productions of Christian art, and influencing by its legends the festivals and preaching of the Church, but deemed of no account by thinkers and theologians, until the rise of modern criticism invested it with a new and scientific interest, when a fresh sense of its immeasurable inferiority to the Canonical Scriptures has impressed itself upon the mind of the Church.

The following are notable features in the history of the NT, from a literary point of view as well as in the interests of criticism. (1) The age and number of its MSS. Some of these date from the 4th or 5th cent.,† and the whole number of them exceeds 2000, forming an immense array of witnesses, compared with the few MSS of classical works, which can frequently be counted on the fingers, and in some cases do not reach back to within a thousand years of the age in which the work was produced. (2) The number of its VSS. It has been translated into almost all languages, beginning with the Old Lat. and Syr. VSS, which may have originated in the first half of the 2nd cent., followed a little later by the Egyptian (in three different forms)—the Gothic in the 4th cent., the Ethiopic in the 4th or 5th cent., and the Armenian in the middle of the 5th century. (3) The extent to which it has been reproduced in subsequent writings. It is quoted, echoed, or commented on by the great majority of early Christian writers. The sympathy of the Apostolic Fathers with its contents has been already mentioned. The extant writings of the next half century are mainly defences of Christianity addressed to unbelievers, admitting of

*We have an early example of this in what Eusebius tells us (HE vi. 12) of the obscurity into which the once popular 'Gospel of Peter' (used apparently by Justin as one of his 'Memoirs') had fallen in the time of Scrapion, bishop of Antioch (c. a.p. 200).
†The Oxyrhynchus fragment containing Mt 11-9.13 14-20 may date from the end of the 3rd cent. (see Grenfell and Hunt)

fewer quotations from the Scriptures than if they had been intended for members of the Church. But, speaking generally, it may be said that the language, and still more the substance, of the NT is woven into the earliest Christian writings that have come down to us, while the quotations by a single writer in the end of the 2nd and in the 3rd, 4th, and 5th cent. are sometimes so extensive as to amount to a considerable part of the whole NT—more than half of it, for example, being imbedded in the works of Origen.

These circumstances, while they give the NT a unique place in literature and afford valuable means for proving the antiquity and integrity of its contents, are attended with the disadvantage of causing uncertainty in innumerable passages as to the precise terms of the original. A careful examination of the existing authorities has led to the discovery of about 200,000 'Various Readings,' which are chiefly to be accounted for by the greater liability to error in copying with the hand than in the use of the printing-press. The difference between the various readings, however, is seldom of such a nature as to affect in the slightest degree the substance of the NT. If all the expressions whose accuracy is in question were brought together and printed in a consecutive form, they would not exceed the length of St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, while the disputed verses possessed of any doctrinal significance would not be equal collectively to the shortest Epistle of St. John.

In this connexion it may be well to point out that there is nothing to justify the assumption that we possess all the apostolic writings that were ever in the possession of the primitive Church. So far from this, there are expressions in some of St. Paul's Epistles which suggest that he wrote other letters besides those which have come down to us (1 Co 5°, 2 Th 3¹¹, cf. 2 Co 11²²). We can understand how an apostle's letters might be less prized during his lifetime than after his death, when the loss of any of his writings would be seen to be irreparable; and it is no more astonishing that Providence should have suffered such writings to perish, than that so many of our Lord's spoken words, and those of His apostles, should have been allowed to pass away, or that so many of His great deeds should have been allowed to go unrecorded (Jn. 21²²).

iii. CONTENTS OF THE NT (Its individual Books and their Writers).—The NT consists of 27 different books, by 9 different authors, each book having its special characteristics corresponding to the personality of its writer, and the circumstances in which it was written, but all contributing their part to one divine whole centred in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. As early as the 2nd cent. there was a recognized distinction between 'the Gospel' and 'the Apostle,' just as we find a three-fold division of the OT in Lk 24" and elsewhere. The former denoted the four Gospels; the latter, the Epistles of St. Paul, to which were added by degrees the Book of Acts, the Catholic Epistles, and the Apostles.' All these were seldom comprised in one MS, and their arrangement varies in MSS containing more than one section and in canonical lists given by Church Fathers, as is also the case with the arrangement of the several books in each section, showing that the consolidation of the NT was a process still going on.

with the arrangement of the several books in each section, showing that the consolidation of the NT was a process still going on.

1. The Gospels.—In all cases the Gospels come first. This position has been fitly assigned to them, not only because they were perhaps the first NT Scriptures to be regularly associated with the OT in the public reading of the Church, but also because the history which they record forms the cornerstone of the Christian religion, which bases its doctrines not on speculation but on fact. up without concert and without the formal sanction of the Church, they contain, in a form suitable for all ages and for all classes, several independent records of Christ's life and teaching, of which it may be said with truth that they are better authenticated and more nearly contemporaneous with the events narrated than any other record we poss in connexion with any other period of ancient history. A comparison of the four Gospels, however, reveals a marked difference between the fourth and the first three. The latter give in one common and the first three. The latter give in one common view the same general outline of the ministry of Christ, but this outline is almost entirely confined to His ministry in Galilee, and includes only one visit to Jerusalem; whereas the Fourth Gospel gives an account of no fewer than five ministry chiefly in Judea. A still more important distinction between them has been briefly expressed by designating the Synoptic Gospels as the bodily Gospels, and the Fourth as the spiritual Gospel—by which it is meant that the former relate chiefly the which it is meant that the former relate chiefly the outward events connected with the Saviour's visible presence, reported for the most part without note or comment, while the latter is designed to represent the ideal and heavenly side of His personality and work. Akin to this distinction is the fact that the first three report Christ's addresses to the multitude, consisting largely of parables, while the Fourth contains discourses of a more sublime character, frequently expressed in the language of allegory and addressed to the inner circle of His followers. Furthermore, when we enter into a close examination of the Synoptic Gospels and compare them with one another, we find an amount of similarity in detail, extending even to minute expressions and the connexion of individual incidents, combined with a diversity of diction, arrangement, and contents, which it has hitherto baffled the ingenuity of critics fully to explain. While further investigation may shed more light on the historical and literary relations of the Gospels, there is a deep underlying unity amid their diversity which may be best discerned, not by attempting to piece them together so as to form a complete chronological history, but by studying each from its own point of view, and learning from it what it has to teach concerning the many sided character and life of Jesus Christ. Speaking generally, we may say that, while the First Gospel sets forth Christ's life and teaching with reference to the past, as the fulfilment of the OT, the Gospel of St. Mark exhibits that life in the present, as a manifestation of the activity and power so congenial to the Roman mind; St. Luke, as a Greek, depicts it in its catholic and comprehensive character, as destined in the future to embrace within its saving influence all the kindreds of the Gentiles; while the Fourth Gospel represents it in its absolute perfection, as it is related to the Father in eternity.

With regard to the authorship of the Gospels, it is a remarkable fact that two of them do not bear the names of apostles but of companions of apostles (Mark and Luke), and that, of the other two, only one bears the name of an apostle of eminence (John)—which is so far a confirmation of their genuineness. With regard to the First Gospel, there is no reason to doubt the tradition of the ancient Church, beginning with Papias in the first half of the 2nd cent., which assigns it in its original form to St. Matthew. But whether it was originally written in Heb., as stated by Papias, and how far it has been altered by recension, are questions which have not yet been determined. See MATTHEW (GOSPEL OF). With equal unanimity the testimony of the Fathers, beginning with Papias, ascribe the Second Gospel to St. Mark, who is said to have embodied in it the preaching of St. Peter. This view is strongly confirmed by the tone and character of the book, which is generally regarded as containing, in a more or less modified form, the earliest cycle of apostolic teaching. See art. MARK. With regard to the authorship of the Third Gospel, there is substantial unanimity. Tradition has always ascribed it to St. Luke, the friend and companion of the Apostle Paul, at the same time assigning to the latter a part in its production somewhat similar to that which St. Peter is believed to have borne in relation to the Gospel of Marka view supported to a certain extent by the character of the Gospel itself, which forms an excellent historic groundwork for the doctrine of salvation by grace that was characteristic of St. Paul's preach-ing. See art. LUKE. Until the close of the 18th cent. the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel was never seriously challenged. In some respects than any of the others; and the whole tone of the book gives the impression that it was written by one who was familiar with the inner life of Christ and His apostles, as well as with the topography of Jerusalem and the ideas and customs prevalent among the Jews before the destruction of their capital. Moreover, the spiritual elevation of the book is vastly superior to anything we find in the sub-spostolic age, and the Johannine authorship is attended with fewer difficulties than any other that has been suggested. If it was written in Ephesus about A.D. 85 (which is in accordance with the earliest tradition), an interval of more than half a century had elapsed since the death of Christ, during which Christianity had spread into many lands and furnished subjects for reflexion to many minds. In these circumstances it was inevitable that the truths of the Gospel should be viewed in new lights and assume more speculative forms; and in Ephesus, as the great meeting-place of Oriental mysticism and Greek philosophy, the deeper questions and more theological aspects of the new religion would naturally claim a large measure of attention. See, further, art. John (GOSPEL OF).

2. The Book of Acts.—This invaluable document, which is our chief authority on the history of the Church for nearly a generation after Christ's death, is evidently from the same pen as the Gospel of Luke, to which it is intended to be a sequel. The writer conceives of Christ as still carrying on His work in virtue of His resurrection and ascension, and seeks to trace the gradual expansion of the Church from its first beginning, as a seeming phase of Judaism, to its full development as a Catholic communion, free alike to Jew and Gentile. Although the author does not speak in his own name till he reaches the point in his narrative at which he joined St. Paul's company at Troas, and was evidently dependent in the earlier part of his work on a variety of sources, oral and written, yet the book has a natural unity of diction and style, which forbids us to assign it to more than one author; and its several parts are so interlaced by corresponding observations and allusions as to lead to the same conclusion. Becent investigations have enhanced the reputation which the work had previously enjoyed for historical worth and accuracy; and the belief is begoming general that it must have been written by a historian of the first rank. Regarding its date of composition, no conclusion has been reached beyond what may be inferred from the fact that it was written by a contemporary and companion of the Apostle Paul, at some time subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome (A.D. 63). See art. ACTS.

3. The Pauline Epistles and the Ep. to the Hebrews.—One of the characteristics of the NT, as compared with all other sacred books, is the epistolary character of a large part of its contents.* Although most of the Epistles were written at an earlier period than the Gospels in their present form, they represent in general a more advanced stage of Christian theology. They give us the fruits of from twenty to fifty years' reflexion on the cardinal facts and truths contained in the Synoptic Gospels, and are the chief source of Christian doctrine on such subjects as the Trinity, the relation of Christ to the human race and to the Church, the Atonement, Justification by faith, and Sanctification by the Holy Spirit. They contain more explicit claims, in varying modes and forms, to divine inspiration and authority, than the Gospels or the Bk. of Acts; but, while largely doctrinal in character, most of them were written for the purpose of dealing with questions of a practical nature, and are enlivened with many personal allusions.

What has just been said is especially true of the Epistles of St. Paul. While bearing evidence in many passages of being written more or less under the conscious influence of the Holy Spirit, they had their rise in the special needs and circumstances of the various Churches to which they were addressed. They are thirteen in number, and may be divided into four groups, extending over the last fifteen years or more of the apostle's life, and exhibiting, amid many similarities and correlations, a well-marked development of thought: viz. (a) 1 and 2 Th, which were written about A.D. 53 [Turner, 50-52], at least sixteen years after the apostle's conversion, and turn largely on questions relating to Christ's Second Coming. (b) 1 and 2 Co, Gal, and Ro, which were written during his third missionary journey (A.D. 57-58 [Turner, 55-56 for 1 and 2 Co and Ro, date of Gal he leaves undecided]), and were and Ro, date of Gal he leaves undecided]], and were mainly designed to vindicate his apostolic authority and preserve the gospel from the inroads of Judaism. (c) The Epistles of the Imprisonment, viz., Ph, Col, Philem, and Eph (the last named being in all probability a circular-letter, identical with 'the epistle from Laodicea' referred to in Col 416), which were written from Rome about A.D. 62-63 [Turner, 59-61], and range from the humblest personal details to the loftiest acculations regard. personal details to the loftiest speculations regarding the being and destiny of the Church. (d) The Pastoral Epistles to Timothy and Titus, which are distinguished from all the others by their want of historical agreement with any period in St. Paul's life as recorded in the Bk. of Acts, and also by their strongly-marked individuality alike in style and substance. These circumstances have given rise to serious doubt of their genuineness, which is largely obviated, however, by supposing them to have been written after the imprisonment recorded in the closing chapter of the Acts, and in the last year of the apostle's life—say A.D. 67-68. It is worthy of note that the Epistles in the second group are almost universally admitted to be group are amost universary samuted to be genuine, which is a most important admission from an evidential point of view, as they contain many allusions to detailed matters of fact mentioned in the Gospels, and prove that the story of Christ's death and resurrection as told in the four Gospels was the chief theme of St. Paul's preaching. The evidence is all the more valuable because ing. The evidence is all the more variable, it is indirect, the letters having manifestly been the indirect, in view, and being written without any such object in view, and being addressed to several independent communities far removed from one another. Having regard to the tone of sincerity, tempered with sobriety of judg-

*It contains twenty-one letters by six different authors. Nine of these are addressed to individual Churches, viz. 1 and 2 Th, 1 and 2 Go, Gal, Ro, Ph, Col, 2 Jn; five to individual persons, viz. Philem, 1 and 2 Ti, Tit, 3 Jn; two to Heb. Christians, viz. He and Ja; the remaining five being of a more or less general nature, viz. Eph, 1 and 2 P, 1 Jn, and Jude.

ment, which characterizes these Epistles, as well as to the early association of the writer with the Jewish authorities at Jerusalem, and the opportunities he had for ascertaining the real facts of the evangelic history, we are led inevitably to the conclusion that St. Paul's Gospel had the same historic groundwork of essential and well-attested facts regarding Christ's life and teaching as we find recorded in the four Gospels. See separate arts. on these various Epistles.

As regards the Ep. to the Hebrews, which has always been closely associated with the Pauline Epistles, there is evidence that from the latter half of the 2nd cent. it was assigned by the Eastern Church to the Apostle Paul, although some of the most competent judges were constrained by internal evidence to depart somewhat from the traditional view, their idea being that St. Paul might have written the original, and one of his disciples have translated it into Greek, or that the apostle might have supplied the thoughts, and one of his disciples have put them into words. In the Western Church, on the other hand, opinion was for a long time adverse to the Pauline authorship; and it was not till the close of the 4th cent. that the Ep. was acknowledged to be a writing of St. Paul's.
This view has now been generally abandoned, as the result of a closer study of the style and structure of the book; and for the same reason, the idea that it may be a translation of a work by the apostle is also admitted to be untenable. At the apostle is also admitted to be untenable. same time there seems no reason to doubt that it was written by one of St. Paul's school. Luke, Clement, Apollos, Barnabas, have all been suggested, the latter two being those in whose favour most can be said. As to the destination of the Ep., various allusions show that it was not intended for Heb. Christians in general, but for some definite community. Alexandria, Antioch, Ephesus, Rome, have each had their advocates; but the position of Christians in Jerusalem or in some other part of Palestine seems to answer best to the situation which the writer has in view. Respecting the date of composition, the mention of Timothy's liberation (He 1322), which took place presumably at Rome, whither he had been summoned by St. Paul in his last imprisonment, points to a time shortly anterior to the destruction of Jerusalem—an inference which is confirmed by other expressions in the Ep., referring to the decadence of the Jewish Dispensation. The great theme of the Ep. is the superiority of Christianity to Judaism, which it attempts to prove, not so much by minimizing the old covenant (as St. Paul had been obliged to do in vindicating the freedom of his Gentile converts) as by magnifying the new as a fulfilment of the old. See, further, HEBREWS (EPISTLE TO).

4. The Catholic Epistles.—There are 7 Epistles which from the 4th cent. have gone under this name, viz. Ja, 1 and 2 P, 1 2 3 Jn, and Jude. They were so called in contradistinction to St. Paul's Epistles, which, with the exception of the Pastoral Epp. and Philem, are addressed to individual to the pastoral Epp. and Philem, are addressed to individual to the pastoral Epp. and Philem. rastoral Epp. and Philem, are addressed to individual Churches, also 7 in number.* In most of the Greek MSS the Cath. Epp. stand next to Acts, although they were much later than the Pauline Epp. in obtaining general recognition in the Church.

(a) The General Ep. of James.—This is now generally admitted to be a genuine work of 'James, the Lord's brother' (Gal 1¹⁹), who for many years presided over the Church at Jerusalem.

* The symbolism of numbers has an interesting bearing on the proportions of the NT, not only in the use of 7 in the cases above mentioned (cf. Rev 19 and in the case of the Pauline Epp., which (including He)=7×2, but also in the number of the Gospels, to which Irensus and others, under the influence of a revived Neo-Pythagoreanism, ascribed a mystic virtue.

The internal evidence is strongly in its favour, and the rarity of allusions to it in the early Christian writers may be accounted for by its circulation being confined to Jewish Christians, as well as by the narrow sphere of labour in which the writer himself moved, his whole life apparently having been spent in Jerusalem. It is addressed 'To the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion,' and there is no reason to take the words in any other than a literal sense. The tone of the Ep. is eminently practical, the object of the writer being to inculcate Christian morality as essential to salvation. Hence it partakes largely of the ethical character of the Sermon on the Mount, which it resembles not only in its general tone and sentiment, but in many of its expressions. The marked absence of anything like developed. Christian doctrine, as well as the expectation which it exhibits of Christ's speedy coming to judge the world (5⁸), and the application of the term 'synagogue' (2²) to an assembly of Christian worshippers, seem to require an early date for the Ep.; and as there is no sign of acquaintance with the sharp controversy regarding the obligations of the Jewish law, which came to a head in the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 50), there seems good reason to regard this as the oldest book in the NT, reason to regard this as the oldest book in the NI, dating between A.D. 44 and 49. See, further, JAMES (EPISTLE OF).

(b) The 1st Ep. of Peter.—There is no reason to doubt that this Ep. was written by the apostle whose name it bears. Hardly any book of the NT is better supported by external evidence, while internally it bears in many of its features the stamp of St. Peter's mind and the traces of his experience, as these are represented to us in the experience, as these are represented to us in the Gospels and the Bk. of Acts. It is addressed 'To the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia'; but there is a difference of opinion whether these words are to be taken in a literal sense, as denoting Jewish Christians merely, or as embracing 'the Israel of God' in the widest sense. As it appears, however, from a number of passages that the readers of the Ep. were largely Gentiles, the the readers of the Ep. were largely Gentiles, the latter supposition seems to accord best with the facts. Similarly, 'Babylon' (5¹³) should probably be understood in a figurative sense as meaning Rome, the writer's point of view being in full harmony with this supposition. There is also some controversy as to the date of the Epistle. Some would assign it to the period of the Flavian dynasty, but the probability seems to be that it dynasty, but the probability seems to be that it was written shortly after the outbreak of the Neronian persecution, when the Christians in the provinces were beginning to experience the effects of the imperial example at Rome, about 64-65. The very name of Christian was becoming a term of reproach (416), and the chief object of the writer is to inculcate patience under trial and perseverance in well-doing in a spirit of hope.

(c) The 2nd Ep. of Peter.—The genuineness of this Ep. has been more questioned than that of any other book in the NT. The external evidence for it is comparatively meagre; but the chief objection to it both in ancient and in modern times has arisen from its differing so greatly in tone and substance from the 1st Epistle. This objection is so far obviated by the fact that while the 1st was designed to encourage and support Christians under persecution, this was evidently intended to warn against false teachers, who were spreading corruption in the Church. Moreover, amid the general difference of style, a close experience of the learning of t amination of the language and thought in this Epistle brings out many points of resemblance between it and St. Peter's expressions elsewhere; and in several respects it does not tally with the supposition of forgery. The mention of St. Paul's Epp., however (3^{15} . 16), as if they were already known to the Asiatic Churches, and in the same category as 'the other Scriptures' (7^{15} $\lambda o_1 \pi v_0^2 \gamma \rho a \phi ds$), as well as the marked resemblance of this Ep., in style, to the recently discovered 'Apocalypse of Peter,' seem to imply a post-apostolic date; and there is much to favour the view of Prof. W. M. Ramsay, who regards the Ep. as the work of 'a disciple who was full of the spirit and words of his teacher, and who believed so thoroughly that he was giving the words of his teacher that he attributed it to that words of ins teacher that he attributed it to that teacher.' See, further, PETER (EPISTLES OF).

(d) The Ep. of Jude.—This Epistle is in the name of 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' The James whom the writer here claims as his brother was the well-known head of the Church at Jerusalem, one of our Lord's brethren, and the writer of the Ep. that bears his name; and therefore Jude is not to be identified with any of the apostles of the same name mentioned in the Gospels. There is such a striking resemblance between this Ep. (consisting of a single chapter) and the 2nd chapter of 2 P as to justify the belief that the one was borrowed from the other. But as this Ep. has some features of originality about it which the other lacks, we may infer that Peter and not Jude was the borrower—a supposition confirmed by the way in which certain quotations in Jude from non-canonical Jewish Scriptures almost disappear from 2 P, along with one or two references to Levitical uncleanness, as if the writer desired as far as possible to adapt his writing for general use. This Ep. is full of sharp and stern denunciation aimed at practical evils of a most heinous character, founded on a gross abuse of Christian liberty. It probably emanated from Palestine in the period immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. See, further, art. JUDE (EPISTLE OF).

(e) The 1st Ep. of John.—There is abundance of evidence, both external and internal, to prove that this Ep. was written by the author of the Fourth Gospel, and forms a sequel to it. The readers are not specified, but in all probability it was addressed in the first instance to the Churches of Asia, among whom St. John spent the latter part of his life. The writer speaks in a quiet tone of authority, as if he were well known to his readers and were well acquainted with their dangers and their needs. He insists on the translation into the Christian life of those great truths regarding the fellowship of God with man, which, in the Fourth Gospel, are exhibited in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. (f) The 2nd Ep. of John.—This Ep. has all the appearance of being genuine. It bears a strong resemblance to the 1st, no fewer than 7 of its 13 verses having something parallel in the other. It is addressed 'Unto the elect lady and her children,' by whom we are probably to understand a Church and its members; and the object of the Ep. is to warn them against the insidious and corrupting influence of certain heretical teachers who were going about denying the reality of Christ's humanity. The title of 'the elder,' which the writer assumes, implies that he was a wellknown personage in the Church, and is one that could be fitly claimed by St. John as the last of the apostles.

(g) The 3rd Ep. of John.—This Ep., like the 2nd, is written in the name of 'the elder,' and it has so many expressions in common with the other that they have been fitly termed 'twins.' It gives us a momentary glimpse of Church life in Asia towards the close of the 1st cent., and illustrates the practical difficulties which had to be encountered in the government of the Church. It is addressed 'Unto Gaius the beloved,' a faithful and liberal member of the Church, whose influence and example the writer invokes, in opposition to the intolerant and factious conduct of an ambitious ecclesiastic named Diotrephes, who had gone so far as to close his doors on 'the brethren' who had come in the name of 'the elder,' apparently bearing a letter from him—perhaps our 2nd Epistle. further, JOHN (EPISTLES OF).

5. The Revelation of St. John.—The Apocalypse has experienced greater vicissitudes as regards its acceptance in the Church than any other book of the NT, owing partly to the Chiliastic views associated with it, and partly to the marked difference in its language and style as compared with the other works ascribed to St. John. It bears to be written by 'John to the seven Churches which are in Asia'; and it is a significant fact that its apostolic authorship was accepted by Justin Martyr (not to mention some earlier apparent witnesses) in the dialogue which he held with Trypho at Ephesus within half a century after St. John's death. Its wide divergence from the Fourth Gospel, both in ideas and in language, may be accounted for in some measure by the difference in the nature and contents of the two books, the one being mainly narrative or colloquial, the other formed on the model of Jewish apocalypse; and there are not wanting some important features of resemblance between them, betokening an identity of authorship. With regard to the date of this book, there is a growing conviction that the theory which connects it with the persecution in the reign of Nero, and puts its composition before the destruction of Jerusalem, must be abandoned, and that the 'tribulation' referred to (19) was that which befell Christians in the provinces, especially in Asia Minor, at a later date, when they refused to pay divine honour to the emperor. The main theme of the book is the second coming of Christ, pictorially set forth as the glorious consummation of great struggles and marvellous events. Its unity recently been assailed, but the attempts to disintegrate it have not met with general acceptance. See, further, art. REVELATION (BOOK OF).

INTRODUCTION.—The subject of this article is the formation of the NT, the gathering, into one, of the collection of books which we so name, to be the sacred books of the New Dispensation. These the sacred books of the New Dispensation. These writings form the Canon of the NT (for the term Canon, its idea and history, see art. CANON). It is with the process which resulted in the recognition of a Canon that we are here concerned. The investigation and right conception of this history have proved, and are still, a very hard and com-plicated task. The evidence is to be gathered from early Christian literature; but the age and authenticity of many of its documents, especially for the two or three generations succeeding the apostles, which form the most important period of all, have been hotly contested; and, even apart from this, the evidence supplied by them is, from special causes (as we shall see), difficult to interpret. Neverthèless, some real progress has been made in the illumination of the subject. A common judgment has been attained, or there is an approximation to one, in regard to some of the most important of the documents concerned and as to the bearing of some portions of the evidence, on the part of many students whose doctrinal points of view are very diverse; and the important questions still at issue have been narrowed and cleared. It would hardly be possible now to maintain views of the formation of the Canon such as those of men so learned as Lardner (supplement to pt, ii. bk. i. of the Credibility, ch. iii. 2pd ed. p. 49) and Mosheim (Eccl. Hist. bk. i. pt. ii. ch. ii. § 16, i. p. 64 in Eng. tr. of 1863) in former times. It was a more gradual process than they imagined, and it had more than one stage. The student of the history of the Canon must endeavour to mark the stages and the epochs at which they were reached, to determine the greater or less rapidity of the movement towards the establishment of the Canon, to ascertain the causes which promoted or retarded the control of the causes which promoted or retarded it, and the considerations which were influential in bringing about the acceptance or rejection of -different writings.

A certain development of thought and feeling in respect to the books of NT must be acknow-ledged. But to say this is by no means inconsistent with belief in their authenticity as genuine products of the apostolic age. It required time, and the experience of needs which were not fully felt at once, for the Christian Church to perceive clearly what a treasure she possessed in these writings. And the most important question which has to be decided in regard to the history of the Canon is, Whether the development which can be traced was one which involved a misrepresentation of facts, or only an awakening to the real significance of facts which had long been known.

In judging of the evidence, it will be right to remember the conditions implied in the very supposition of such a growth as has just been indicated. Convictions which are more or less latent, which have not been formulated, exercise far less authority than those which have been definitely put forth and for some time accepted without question. So long as the belief of Christians in regard to the new Scriptures was of the former kind the signs of its existence might be somewhat obscure, and there might be more or less serious departures from it here and there, in spite of its being in reality widely diffused and well founded.

The special circumstances must also be borne in mind, which were of a nature to retard for a time the formation of a Canon of NT, and also to make the recognition accorded to the apostolic writings appear to us less decided than it was in reality.

(a) The fact that Christians already had a Bible the OT-must first be noticed. In time, no doubt, this may have facilitated the reception of another body of Scriptures. For the idea of a Bible, a collection of inspired, authoritative writings, had been rendered familiar, and it was necessary only that it should be applied to the books which enshrined the New Revelation. But this could not be at once accomplished. Great as the veneration for the apostles was, there could not be the same feeling for new writings as for those which had long been hallowed. Moreover, in form the apostolic writings were different in many respects from those of the OT, and, in particular, they did not bear so plainly upon their very face a claim to inspiration as its prophetic and legislative books did. Besides all this, the OT itself largely supplied the place of Christian Scriptures in apostolic and sub-apostolic times. To an extent which we find hard to understand, it was used as a source of Christian instruction. The divine truths newly imparted and the actual facts of the life of Christ and founding of His kingdom were read between the lines of the ancient Scriptures (Lk 245 44 45, Ac 825, 1825, 2 Ti 315, and last fragment of Melito, ap. Eus. HE iv. 26). The need was thus partially met which the apostolic writings could alone adequately satisfy. (b) Again, the gospel message and the new law had first been delivered by word of mouth, and there is good reason to believe that even the memory of the oral teaching of the apostles was for a time, in some measure, a rival of their own written testimony in the regard and affections of Christians.

A just and vivid sense of these peculiar conditions, and some others which will come before us in the course of our survey, is necessary, if we are to understand the phenomena aright, and to refrain from giving undue weight to objections which are founded on paucity of evidence. Proof, however. of a positive kind that, from the confines of the lifetime of the apostles, the writings of NT were known among Christians, can be found only in a full estimate of the facts as a whole, supplied by the documents not only of the one or two earliest but of subsequent generations. When the alleged indications of the use of NT writings at the former time are taken by themselves, they may be far from convincing; they may show little more than that it is a tenable assumption, that our Christian Scriptures, or the chief of them, were already in circulation. But when we advance a few years, we find them clearly occupying a position which they could not have attained at a bound, and which no other writings shared with them. And we are justified in inferring that the earlier signs referred to are—not only possibly but—really traces of acquaintance with them. In this way we reach a highly probable conclusion, even when the facts directly connected with the reception of these writings are alone taken into account. It will be strongly confirmed if the belief (the grounds of which can barely be touched upon in this article) is well founded, that there was substantial continuity of life and organization in the Christian Church from the beginning till its history emerges into full light in the latter part of the 2nd cent., such as would afford a guarantee for the faithful preservation of traditions on important matters.

The history of the Canon of NT may be divided into the following periods:—A, the first, which is by far the most important, extends from the end of the apostolic age to the early years of the 3rd cent. (for convenience we may say to A.D. 220, which was about the time of the deaths of Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Hippolytus). At this latter epoch we see the greater part of the books of NT occupying the position in the Church which they have ever since held. B, the second, extends, roughly speaking, to the pacification of the empire under Constantine (A.D. 323). It was a time of comparison between the lists of NT Scriptures accepted in different Churches, and discussion of the claims of those not universally received; but there was much uncertainty still in regard to certain books. C. From A.D. 323 onwards, the final settlement, though it was attained at various times in different parts of the Church.

A. FROM THE END OF THE APOSTOLIC AGE TO THE EARLY YEARS OF THE THIRD CENTURY.—
In reviewing this period, it will be convenient to subdivide. Further, under each subdivision the evidence as to the use of the Gospels and as to that of other writings of the NT should be separately examined. There is more than one reason for proceeding thus. It is probable that, even before a comprehensive collection of the sacred writings of the new dispensation was thought of, its formation was being advanced through the independent formation of groups of writings which afterwards became important constituent elements of the whole body, as well as by the recognition of the authority of individual writings which might or might not belong to these groups. Two of these minor collections, the making of which must readily have suggested itself, would seem to have been that of the Four Gospels and that of the Epistles of St. Paul. The rolls on which the writings of these two classes were written were commonly kept, we may imagine, each in its own roll-case.

The evidence as to the reception of the Gospels is affected by special circumstances. Owing to the nature of their subject-matter—the occurrence of the same sayings and incidents in different Gospels, the possibility that some of these may have been found also in other documents or orally reported—it may not be open to us to infer with certainty the use of any particular Gospel from parallelisms of statement and of language between them and early Christian writers. On the other hand, when a striking, unusual sentence or phrase found in one of the other writings of NT appears in a work of post-apostolic times, even though it may not be introduced as a quotation, there can generally be little doubt that there is a literary relationship between the two, and that it was not the NT writer who was the borrower.

But this is not all. The facts of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and His words made up the substance of the Gospel. Owing to the sublimity of the subject, mem's eyes were turned at first solely to it, and away from the witnesses and the form of the records. The substance was felt to be everything. For some time little sense is shown of the importance of reproducing accurately the individual testimony of different writers. There was also a very natural disposition to combine various accounts with a view to greater fulness or succinctness. Not a few probable illustrations of this tendency might be given, and a very elaborate effort of the kind was made soon after the middle of the 2nd century.

The manner in which τὸ εὐαγγέλων is used (sing, and with def. art.) is another illustration of the same or similar habits of thought. It occurs where the existence of the evangelic history in a written form is implied; and some have inferred that those who so expressed themselves knew only of one such document. But there seems to be no ground for this. The mode of speech in question shows only that the characteristics of the several written embodiments of the Gospel were but slightly regarded in comparison with its general contents and purport. Writers who unquestionably were acquainted with several works of the nature of Gospels continued so to express themselves. And there is a survival of it to this day in the titles of our Gospels—τὸ εὐαγγέλων κατά, 'the Gospel according to.' this or that evangelist

i. THE SUB-APOSTOLIC AGE, i.e. the generation immediately following that of the apostles. As belonging to this time, we will take only the Ep. of Clement to the Corinthians, the Seven Epp. of Ignatius, in the short Greek or Vossian form, and the Ep. of Polycarp. Some critics of the highest repute would, besides, assign to it the recently recovered Didaché and the Ep. of Barnabas, and a few more would also include the Shepherd of Hermas. But in an inquiry of this kind it is better to understate than to overstate evidence. Moreover, the present writer is personally inclined to place the composition of these last three writings in the second quarter of the 2nd cent. And it will be very generally admitted now that the case for placing them earlier than this is far less strong than that for the others, and that they do not, by their authorship, create the same kind of with the apostolic age. Those writings before mentioned may, indeed, with great confidence be declared to be the genuine works of the men with whose names they are connected. Two of the writers at least, and probably all three, had known apostles, and held positions of eminence in the Church at the close of the first and near the beginning of the 2nd cent. There are very strong reasons for believing that the Ep. written to the Church of Corinth in the name of that of Rome, which has from very early times been attributed to Clement, is really his work, and for referring it to the close of the reign of Domitian, c. A.D. 95 (see Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. i. p. 346 ff., and Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 251 ff.). Again, the gennineness of the Seven Epp. of Ignatius discovered by Voss in the Medicean MS has been firmly established by the labours of Zahn and Lightfoot. This is fully admitted by Harnack (Chronol. i. p. 381 ff.). Their exact date cannot be quite so clearly determined. Lightfoot supposes it to be c. A.D. 110. Harnack was a few years ago inclined to place them near to A.D. 140 (see Expos. for 1886, pp. 15-22); but he now speaks in a very hesitating manner (Chronol. i. p. 395 f.). The only reason for questioning the genuineness of the Ep. of Polycarp falls to the ground when that of Epp. of Ignatius is admitted, and its date is fixed by a reference in it as only later by a few weeks than theirs.

(1) Evidence as to the use of the Gospels.—Sayings of Christ are cited in the writings now before us, as spoken by Him, but not as from a written source or sources. From the first days of the Church the Lord's Words must have been treasured as Divine Oracles. And as a sense of their authority must have preceded their being committed to writing, so also after this it would naturally be independent of that of the record, and the habit of referring to them directly, with-out considering the intermediary through whom or which they were delivered, might continue. facts just noticed in connexion with the writings of the Apostolic Fathers are an illustration of this. Their usage is still that of St. Paul in 1 Co 710, or in the Address to the Elders at Miletus (Ac 2085). They may, in spite of this, have taken their quotations from documents, and those, too, our Gospels. It is a point not easy to decide. In the Ep. of Clem. sayings are quoted as the Lord's closely corresponding, indeed, in substance with such as are recorded in our Gospels, but which differ from them to a greater or less degree in form. It is to be observed, too, that Polycarp (c. ii.) quotes in part the same sayings as Clement in the former of these passages, with the same divergences from our Gospels [μνημονεύοντες δέ ων είπεν ο Κύριος διδάσκων · Μή κρίνετε, ίνα μή κριθήτε · άφίετε και άφεθήσεται υμίν · έλεᾶτε, Ινα έλεηθήτε · ῷ μέτρφ μετρεῖτε ἀντιμετρηθήσεται καί ότι ' Μακάριοι οί πτωχοί και οί διωκόμενοι Ενεκεν δικαιοσύνης, ότι αὐτών έστιν ή βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ'] ; while, to pass for a moment beyond our present period, the whole piece of Christ's teaching which occurs in Clem. Rom. c. xiii. is given in the same form by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 18). It has been argued that these peculiarities, recurring in more than one writer, point to a documentary source other than our Gospels. If, however, the passages in question are examined, it will be seen that they appear to have the character of summaries, and that their differences from the Gospels may well be accounted for as the effects of compression and of the combination of phrases derived from the parallel passages in our Gospels, or in documents which have been embodied in our Gospels. General considerations which have already occupied us have prepared us for this phenomenon. For such traits as cannot be explained in this way, and which ought not to be regarded as accidental variations, there would seem to be a sufficient explanation in the influence of Oral Tradition, which was doubtless still powerful in the Sub-apostolic Age. Further, the persistence of certain features, which has been noticed, in the quotations of sayings and collections of sayings, may reasonably be traced to catechetical instruction and the impressions left by it. Such compendia of precepts, from the Sermon on the Mount and other parts of our Lord's teaching, may well have been imprinted thus upon the memory of Christians generally, and consequently quoted by writers who were familiar with the Gospels, as Clem. Alex. was. In Polyc. vii. we have a clause of the Lord's Prayer, as given both in Mt and Lk, with the difference only that it is turned into the indirect form; also words spoken by our Lord in Gethsemane, exactly as in Mt and Mk. [defoeau αίτούμενοι τον παντεπόπτην θεόν 'μη είσενεγκείν ήμας els πειρασμόν,' καθώς είπεν ο Κύριος · το μέν πνεθμα mt 26³¹ or Mk 14³⁸)].

For further parallelisms with the language of the Gospels and for allusions to incidents in the life of Christ in the two writings so far considered, see among other passages—Clem. Rom. xvi. end (Mt 11^{28, 30}), xxiv. (Mt 13⁸, Mk 4⁸, Lk 8⁵); Polyc. v. (Mk 9⁸⁵, Mt 20²⁸), xii. (Mt 5⁴⁴).

Ignatius was led by his controversy with Docetism to dwell upon the facts of our Lord's human life and sufferings rather than upon His teaching; and the only saying of Christ which he expressly quotes is one asserting the verity of His corporeal nature after His resurrection [δτε πρὸς τους περί Πέτρον ήλθεν, έφη αὐτοῖς ' Λάβετε, ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ έδετε ότι οὐκ εἰμὶ δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον' (Smyrn. iii.)]. The incident referred to seems to be that recorded in Lk 2435-39, where the words of our Lord are similar in substance and partly in form. According to Origen, however (de Princ. præf. 8), they were contained in The Preaching of Peter in the same form as in Ignatius. Eusebius, on the other hand (HE iii. 36), who notes the fact that Ignatius has the saying, declares that he does not know whence it was taken; while Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 16) says that it occurred in the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews. It is possible that a writing which contained the saying may have existed in the time of Ignatius, and that he may have obtained it thence; but it is at least an equally probable supposition that he derived it from oral tradition; and that from the same source it passed into one or more Apocryphal Gospels. We shall have occasion to recur to the question of the use made of apocryphal writings in the 2nd century.

There are in the Epp. of Ignatius several allusions to incidents in the life of Christ which are recorded in our Gospels as well as parallelisms of expression with them, and among these, in two expression with them, and among these, in two places, some remarkable coincidences with the thought and language of Jn. See Eph. xiv. (Mt 12²⁸, Lk 6¹⁴); Trall. xi. (Mt 15¹³); Rom. vii. (Jn 4¹⁵); Philad. vii. (Jn 3³); Smyrn. i. (Mt 3¹⁵ and other points); Smyrn. vi. (Mt 19¹²); Polyc. ii. (Mt 10¹⁶). See also Magn. xi. and Trall. ix. In Philad. v. his language suggests the idea that he was thinking of the Gospel as embodied in a written form; for he speaks of it as something to which Christians could as it were turn, and refers in the same context to the prophets. At the same time a passage in c. viii. of the same Ep. seems to show the difference between the position which any written Gospels had so far attained and that of the OT (comp. Lightfoot, Epp. of Ignat. ad loc. and also ib. vol. i. p. 388).

(2) The evidence as to the use of other writings of NT at this time may be treated much more briefly.—St. Paul's first Ep. to the Corinthians is expressly referred to in the Ep. of Clement to the same Church (xlvii.), and St. Paul's Ep. to the Philippians in that of Polycarp (xi.). Thus NT writings are actually mentioned in two of the cases in which it is most natural that they should be; these are exceptions which, if they do not explain, are consistent with, the habit of not quoting by name where there was not the same kind of reason for it. Coincidences of phrase with various NT Epp., so striking from their character or number as to leave no doubt whence they are derived, occur in the three writers under consideration: in Clem. Rom. with He (xxxvi. and xliii.); in Polyc. with 1 P (i. ii. v. vii. viii. x.) and 1 Jn (vii.); in Ignat. with 1 Co (Ephes. xvi. xviii.) and with Eph (Polyc. v.). Indications more or less clear of a knowledge of other NT writings might be named, e.g. of 2 Co, Gal, and 1 and 2 Ti in Polycarp. All these facts, while interesting and important as regards the books of NT immediately concerned, also have a bearing on the question of the use of the Gospels. They show that absence of direct citation in this age can have little weight for proving want of know-ledge. Further, the sign of acquaintance with 1 Jn in Ep. of Polyc. has significance in regard to the Gospel acc. to Jn also. On internal grounds there is strong reason for attributing these to the same author, and the circulation of the one cannot have been separated by any great interval from that of the other.

The signs of knowledge of the apostolic writings in Polycarp are, it may be observed in conclusion. remarkable, and far greater than in Clement or Ignatius, in spite of his Epistle being far shorter. This may be reasonably accounted for by the consideration that he was in all probability a much younger man, and that he had acquired familiarity with those writings from his youth.

ii. THE SECOND QUARTER OF THE SECOND CENTURY.—(1) Use of the Gospels.—The so-called Ep. of Barnahas.—Critics have referred the composition of this work to various dates between A.D. 70 and 130. Though it contains references to contemporary events, they are obscure. To notice only some of the more recent views, Lightfoot (Clem. Rom. ii. p. 505 ff.) has explained the allusions in a way that would bring the time of composition within the reign of Vespasian, i.e. before A.D. 79. Ramsay (Church in the Roman Empire, p. 307) has adopted Lightfoot's theory with some modification, but not so as to affect the date. Harnack, however, in his recent work, has made a very ingenious suggestion for over-coming some of the chief difficulties; and his view seems, on the whole, the most tenable. According to him, the little treatise in its present form was, produced in A.D. 130 or 131 (Chronol. i.

This writing affords what appears to be the earliest instance of the citation from a book of NT as Scripture. The words πολλοί κλητοί όλίγοι δέ έκλεκτοί are introduced (iv. end) with the formula ώς γέγραπται. These words are not known to occur except in Mt 2211. There are also several other indications in the Ep. of Barn. of acquaintance with that Gospel. The parallelisms with Mt's account of the Trial and Crucifixion of Our Lord are striking (vii.). Again, words found in Mt 918 (though also in Mk 217, Lk 522) are used in v. A saying of Christ is also quoted as such, which bears a resemblance to that in Mt 2016, though it

The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.—Dates ranging from A.D. 90-165 have been assigned for the composition of this work, the recovery of which in our generation has created so much interest. Unhappily, the indications available for forming an opinion as to the date are almost entirely such as are connected with the state of Church organization and life reflected in it, and on the history of these very diverse views prevail. It must further be observed that it may have emanated from some portion of the Church where movement had been slow, or whose customs had always been peculiar. There are expressions in it which betoken the habits of a rural district. On the whole, it may be most prudent to take it as belonging to the period which we are now con-sidering, while at the same time we forbear to treat it as illustrative of the mind and practice of the Church generally within any narrow limits of time. In respect to the use of the Gospels, it seems to represent a slight advance upon the Apostolic Fathers. There is language, more distinct than that of the passage of Ignatius above referred to, which suggests the idea that the Gospel existed in a written form (Did. xv. 3, 4-ws exerc έυ τῷ εὐαγγελίφ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, and comp. viii. 2 and xi. 3). The citations are only of words of Christ, and introduced as what the Lord said; but they are more abundant, and, although not given entirely as in our Gospels, they appear on examinaentrely as in our Gospers, they appear on examination to be still more plainly combinations of phrases from both Mt and Lk. Such compilations there are at Did. i. 2-5 [Mt 22^{st. 39} (or Mk 12^{sp. 31}, or Lk 20²¹); Lk 6^{28. 38. 38. 35} (Mt 5^{44. 46}); Mt 5³⁹⁻⁴² and Lk 6^{29. 39}; Mt 5²¹]; and at Did. xvi. [Mt 25¹⁸, Lk 12^{38. 49}, Mt 24^{10. 11} etc. etc.]. The former of these is a collection of precepts on our duty to God and our neighbour, the latter on the duty of watching for the Coming of Christ. There are, besides, other citations or parallels at Did. vii. (Mt 28¹⁹), viii. 2 (Mt 6⁹⁻¹³), ix. 5 (Mt 7⁶), xiii. (Mt 10¹⁰).

The Shepherd of Hermas.—The Muratorian fragment on the Canon (c. A.D. 200, see below) contains a statement that the Shepherd was written during the episcopate of Plus (bishop of Rome, A.D. 140-155), by a brother of his named Hermas. Recent investigations have added to the importance of this statement, which could not in any case have been lightly set aside, for they have shown that it may probably have been taken from a list of bishops drawn up c. A.D. 170 in the time a list of bishops drawn up c. A.D. 170 in the time of Soter (Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 192). On the other hand, in the work itself (Vis. ii. 4. 3) there is a reference to Clement, which, if understood literally, must imply that he was still alive; and he died long before the beginning of the episcopate of Pius (A.D. 140). Zahn (Der Hirt des Hermas, p. 70.5 Applications of Christian Diet of 70 ff.) and Salmon (art. 'Hermas' in Dict. of Christian Blography), on the ground of this passage as well as of features in the work which they think point to an early age, suppose it to have been composed

c. A.D. 100. While Lightfoot and Westcott treat the allusion to Clement as part of the fictitious setting of the work, and rely on the testimony of the Muratorian fragment, Harnack endeavours to reconcile in a measure the two views. He supposes that the work, though all by one author, was not all composed at one time, and that it was finally put forth A.D. 140 (Chronol. i. p. 257 ff.).

As the Shepherd is a collection of revelations and instructions given by an angelic guide, it would not have been in character that it should contain express quotations, and there are not any in it from OT any more than from NT. But parallels showing acquaintance with NT writings are not wanting. Sim. v. 2 appears to be an adaptation of the parable of the Vineyard (Mk 12^{1st}.). In Sim. ix. 12 we are rather forcibly reminded of Jn 10¹ and 146, in ix. 16 of Jn 35, and in ix. 24 of Jn 116.

The Fragments of Papias. - There cannot be any very serious differences of opinion as to the approximate time at which Papias put forth the work from which some few fragments have been preserved to us. He had conversed with men of an older generation than his own who could give first-hand information as to what the oral teaching of several of the apostles was (Euseb. HE iii. 39). Irenæus (adv. Hær. v. 83. 4) seems to have been mistaken in supposing that he had himself seen and heard John the Evangelist (Euseb. l.c.); but he may have been a contemporary, if not an actual hearer, of Aristion and 'the Elder John,' 'disciples of the Lord' (ib.). He must therefore have been born before, most likely some few years before, the end of the lst cent. The time when he had opportunities of collecting the information referred to may probably have been several years before he wrote the work of which Eusebius has given us an account, largely in Papias' own words. But at latest the publication of this work cannot have fallen much after A.D. 160, and may more reasonably be supposed to have taken place somewhat earlier. When, further, we consider the character of his work, we can have no hesitation in saying that his testimony (so far as its general effect is concerned) is to be connected with the first half of the century.

The title itself of his work, Λογίων κυριακών εξηγήσεις, 'Expositions of Dominical Oracles,' is interesting and important. In view of those habits of thought of the time upon which we have already commented, we may best take 'Dominical Oracles' to mean passages of Our Lord's teaching. These, as is clear from his own language in the portion of his prologue preserved to us by Eusebius, Papias took from some documentary source or sources; but for the illustration of them he availed himself of all that he had been able to glean from independent tradition. As Harnack observes, 'he distinguishes the matter orally delivered, even so far as it contained portions of evangelical history, in a marked manner from the matter which he expounds' (Chronol. i. 690, n. 1). This fact, then, that written records supplied the basis for his comment, or the pegs on which he hung the more or less trustworthy additional narratives or statements that he had collected, lends special interest to the inquiry whether he knew and used our Gospels or any of them.

We need not hesitate to claim his account, which he gives on the authority of 'the Elder'—apparently, from the context in Eusebius, the Elder John—of the composition of a Gospel by Mark, as referring to a work at least substantially the same as our Second Gospel. It has been urged, indeed, that the observation contained in this fragment, whether it is the Elder's or Papias' own, that Mark did not arrange his matter 'in order,' is not ap-propriate to our Mark, which is not less orderly in point of arrangement than the other Gospels. But this objection seems clearly unsubstantial, and is now generally admitted to be so. The criticism implied in Papias' words may have been simply a fanciful and mistaken one. Or, again, Mark's arrangement may have been assumed to be wrong wherever it differed from that of either our First or (see below) our Fourth Gospel, which are connected with the names of those who were followers of the Lord during His earthly life, which Mark was not. Some comparison of this kind seems to be implied in the words of Papias' fragment itself. (See, further, art. MARK, p. 244). The questions as to the right interpretation of the fragment of Papias (ib.) on a writing by Matthew are more serious. Critics of more than one school have seen in the words, Ματθαΐος μέν οὖν τὰ λόγια συνεγράψατο, a description of a Collection of Discourses and Sayings which has (it may be) been embodied in our First Gospel, but which was in many respects a different work. Against this view it has been urged that λόγια does not mean 'discourses,' but 'oracles,' and that in the NT itself it is applied to the OT. These arguments, however, somewhat miss their mark. For it does not seem likely that the term should have been applied to a writing of the NT as such, so early as the time of Papias, and still less of his informant, if this, as is probable, was the same 'Elder' whom he reports in the case of Mark's work. Nor could τὰ λόγια in that sense have been suitably used of a single writing, though it would be natural as a description of the Lord's teaching. The statement, however, which we are considering consists only of one brief sentence; we do not know what the context may have been. And whatever inferences it may be fair to draw from Papias' expressions as to the history of the composition of our First Gospel, we may gather that, at least when he wrote, a work representative of a Hebrew writing by the Apostle Matthew. And it is hard to imagine that this could have been any other work than that which a generation later, or less, was certainly known in the Church, as it is still, as the Gospel acc. to Mt. A substitution of one book for another could not have been effected in so short a time. (Comp. Harnack, Chronol. i. p. 693). See, further, art. Matthew (Gospel of).

Eusebius makes the following statement at the end of his section on Papias: 'The same (writer) has made use of testimonies from the former Ep. of Jn and from that of Peter likewise. He has, moreover, also set forth another narrative, concerning a woman charged before the Lord with many sins, which the Gospel acc. to the Hebrews contains.' Use of the First Ep. of Jn indirectly affords evidence, as we have already had occasion to remark, of the existence and circulation of the Gospel according to John. It must not be assumed, indeed, on the ground of this notice, that Papias attributed these works to the apostle; but we may at least feel sure that he said nothing plainly inconsistent with this view of their authorship: if he had done so, Eusebius could not have failed to mention it, more especially as he was not in sympathy with some of this writer's opinions.

Something more as to Papias' use of the Johannine writings may, it would seem, be learned from Irenæus. The latter, in language that recalls Papias' prologue preserved in Eusebius, repeatedly adduces the testimony of 'the elders' who had seen and heard John, the disciple of the Lord, or again, in another place, 'who were disciples of apostles'; and when we examine the passages in which he refers to them and quotes their sayings, we find that their character is just such as we might expect it to be if they were derived from Papias' Exegeses, in view, on the one hand, of its aim as described by the author him-self, and of his chiliastic predilections [adv. Hær. v. 5. 1; 30. 1; 33. 4]. In one of these places (v. 33. 4) Irenæus, after alluding to the elders, proceeds to quote from Papias' book by name. Now, among the passages which may with probability be regarded as extracts, more or less exact, from Papias, there is one in which a saying of the Lord, recorded in Jn 14², and not in any other Gospel, is quoted and commented on (adv. Hær. v. 36. 1); there is another relating to the number of the Beast in the

To conclude: the evidence as to Papias, though it is much more scanty than we should like, and though it is in part obscure, tends to show that he derived the 'Oracles of the Lord,' which he made his starting-point, from our Gospels and not from any other source, and that he knew at least the Gospels acc. to Mt, Mk, and Jn.

The so-called Second Ep. of Clement .- This work is of considerable interest in connexion with the history of the Canon, more especially as to the use of Apocryphal Gospels and the position accorded to them in relation to our Gospels. Its date is consequently important. Hilgenfeld (Nov. Test. extr. Can. p. xxxviii f.) and Harnack (Patres Apostolici, pp. xci, xcii) took the view that it was the Epistle sent by Soter to Corinth, c. A.D. 170 (Euseb. HE iv. 23). But since the recovery of this work in an unmutilated form, through Bryennios' discovery in 1875, it has become evident that it is not a Letter at all but a Homily, and its identification with the communication of Soter ought no longer to be regarded as tenable (see Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. ii. p. 194 ff.; Harnack, however, still adheres to the identification, Chronol. i. pp. 440–450). The character of the work in general, it may be added, is favourable to an earlier date. It may most reasonably be taken as illustrating the state of things in respect to the recognition of the New Testament Scriptures, c. A.D. 140, or perhaps somewhat before this.

We will next briefly notice the recently recovered Apology of Aristides, an example of a class of Christian writings which has even given a name in Church history to an age—that occupying the middle portion of the 2nd cent. This one appears to have been addressed not as Eusebius says (HE iv. 3) to Hadrian, but to Antoninus Pius (Emp. 138-161); but it probably belongs to the earlier rather than the latter part of his reign (comp. J. R. Harris, Texts and Studies, i. p. 8, and Harnack, Chronol. i. pp. 271-273). The special character of compositions of this kind, like that of others, and even more than that of some others, must be remembered in order that the effect of the evidence supplied by them in regard to the Canon may be fairly judged of. The argument and purpose of the greater part of the Apology of Aristides did not afford opportunities for quoting from Christian documents. It contains, however, one passage which illustrates in an interesting manner a time of transition when memories of the oral delivery of the Gospel were linked with a growing dependence upon a written form of it. (See tr. of Syriac in Texts and Studies, I. i. p. 36).

We pass to the writings of a far greater 'apologist,' Justin Martyr, and we may confine our attention to the three extant works bearing his name, which are by common consent admitted to be genuine—his First and Second Apologies and Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. Recent investi-gations, beginning with those of Volkmar, Theol. Jahrb. von Baur u. Zeller, 1855, and of Hort, Journ. of Philol., 1857, have served to show that the First Apology should be placed a little later than it commonly used to be, and that the Second Apology was written soon after the First. The Dialogue was written after the Apologies, but how long after cannot be determined. We shall not be far wrong if we say that all three writings were composed c. A.D. 150. The Apologies were written in Rome, as was also probably the Dialogue, though it may be inferred from the latter (c. i.) that Justin was teaching as a Christian philosopher in Ephesus soon after A.D. 135. He was the most eminent Christian of his generation, while he writes, not as one who is putting forward his own views, but who is representing and defending the faith and practice of the Church; and he well knew what they were in at least two of its chief centres.

Now, Justin twice in his First Apology and many times in the Dialogue describes the main authorities for the Life and Teaching of Christ as 'the Memoirs of the Apostles' or simply 'the Memoirs.' We have to ask whether by this name he intended at least principally our Gospels, whether he recognized all these, and whether they held a place in his estimation which no other accounts of the whole or a portion of the Lord's Life and Teaching shared. His use of the term itself just referred to affords no ground for doubting that he has the Gospels which we acknowledge in his mind. It is probable that the name 'Gospels' was only beginning in that generation to be applied to the writings which contained the Gospel even among Christians, and he was addressing those who were not Christians. It would be natural for him to employ some term which would be to them more easy of comprehension and more expressive. The course he adopts in this case has an exact parallel in his treatment of other Christian terms, e.g. Baptism and the Eucharist (First Apol. lxi. and lxvi.). In First Apol. lxvi., after using the word 'Memoirs,' he adds, 'which are called Gospels.' And this, it may be observed in passing, is the earliest instance of the application of the name 'Gospels' to the heads. Justin himself commonly 'Gospels' to the books. Justin himself commonly writes of 'the Gospel' in the manner which we have observed to be customary in the writings of his predecessors and elder contemporaries. To proceed: in one place he characterizes 'the Memoirs' with special fulness as 'composed by the Apostles and those who followed them.' The suitability of this twofold description to our Gospels will be noticed, and it gains in point from the circumstance that in the context he preserves one trait which is peculiar to St. Luke's account of the Agony in the Garden (Dial. ciii.). In another place he refers to a fact, mentioned only by St. Mark, as contained in Peter's Memoirs (see, further, below). Again, he speaks of the doctrine of the Person of Christ, which he defines in part in terms peculiar to Jn, as derived from 'the Memoirs.' Further, in five of the cases in which Justin distinctly quotes from evangelic writings, using the formula γέγραπται, he agrees almost verbally with Mt or Lk. (For these and for a discussion of the remaining two, comp. Westcott, Canon, p. 130 ff., and Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, p. 88 ff.).

For the most part, however, Justin does not adhere closely to the words of any one evangelist in his accounts of and references to the facts of the Lord's Life and His Teaching. He gives the substance of their narratives, and to a certain extent combines what is found in different Gospels. In doing this he acted in accordance with the very natural tendency of which we have already seen examples in early Christian writings. Moreover, it is quite obviously his purpose in a considerable portion of his First Apology to give a summary of the evangelic history and of some chief points in Christ's teaching for the enlightenment of heathen readers. And not less obviously in a large part of the Dialogue he is rapidly reviewing the facts, which was all that was required, in connexion with an argument from the fulfilment of prophecy. This being so, it was to be expected that he should avail himself now of one, now of another Gospel, and should be satisfied with giving what he con-ceived to be their general meaning and purport. With the object he had in view, he would often find it sufficient to rely upon his memory of their narratives. And, indeed, even his quotations from the OT are marked to a considerable extent by the same characteristics of combination and compression, and want of minute accuracy. Nevertheless, the general character of the representation which Justin gives of the evangelic history, and which he derives, as he repeatedly indicates, from records which were acknowledged in the Church to have apostolic authority—its contents, with comparatively slight exceptions, its main outline, the style of the language, and many of the actual words—are those of our Gospels. The features of the Synoptics are, indeed, more fully and directly reproduced than those of the Fourth Gospel, though there are striking coincidences with special points in it also; while it is most natural to suppose that the conception of Christ as the Logos, which holds a prominent place in Justin's works, was derived by him from the same source, although he develops it in part in his own way, in accord-ance with philosophical ideas that were familiar to him.

In his summaries of or allusions to the Gospel history, Justin introduces a limited amount of -a certain number of touches and incidents -not found in our Gospels. From the presence of this element it has been argued that he did not use our Gospels. But to reason thus is to defy every principle of sound criticism. For there is no evidence that any other work or works existed which could have supplied him with the bulk of his facts about the life and teaching of Christ, together with the language in which he relates them, besides our Gospels. Moreover, that these were already in existence, and that he must have had opportunities of becoming acquainted with them, is certain, as will more clearly appear from facts to be considered presently. It is now, indeed, admitted by critics of more than one school that the first three Gospels ranked among Justin's principal authorities, and that the fourth was known to him. The chief questions still sub lite are (a) to what extent he used other records in and dition to our canonical ones, and whether he regarded any of them as possessed of apostolio authority; and (b) whether there was a difference between his attitude to the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics.

(a) The question of the source or sources whence Justin drew what we may for convenience briefly call the 'apocryphal' matter in his accounts of the Gospel history has received new and special interest from the recovery, since 1892, of a fragment of the so-called 'Gospel of Peter' (see The Akhmîm Fragment, or the Apocryphal Gospel of St. Peter, by H. B. Swete). In some points in which Justin diverges from the canonical Gospels he is found to coincide with 'Peter.' The importance of the inquiry whether Justin used 'Peter' is greatly increased by the fact that, if he did, it must in all probability have been the work which he describes as 'Peter's Memoirs' (Dial. cvi.), and he must have given it an equal, if not a pre-eminent, place among the authorities for the Gospel history. The use of 'Peter' by Justin is maintained by Harnack (Bruchstück des Evangeliums und der Apokalypse des Petrus, 2nd ed. p. 37 ff.), and is accepted by Sanday (Inspiration, pp. 305, 310); but against it, see Swete, l.c. pp. xxxiii-xxxx. Swete's argument may also be greatly strengthened by observing the contrasts between Justin and 'Peter.' It is certain that the former has been but slightly influenced by the latter on the whole, and it is difficult to understand how, if he knew the book and regarded it as the work of the chief of the apostles, which it claims to be, his use of it should have been so limited.

In Justin's age information concerning the Gospel history was gleaned not only from tradi-tion, but also from documents other than our Gospels, less unsuspectingly than came to be the case a generation or so later. We have seen an example of this in the so-called Second Ep. of Clement; we learn also from Eusebius (HE iv. 22) that Hegesippus, the contemporary of Justin, made some quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Justin's practice illustrates the same attitude of mind. With the matter supplied by our Gospels, he weaves in traits which he has probably derived from such sources, though we are unable to say from which of them he obtained most, or whether indeed he made special use of any one. There is, however, no reason to think that any work of the nature of a Gospel, other than ours, held practically the same position as they did for Justin, or for the Church of his time.

(b) Some critics who admit the cogency of the evidence that Justin was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel, yet maintain that he clearly did not place it on the same level as the Synoptics (see Keim, Jesus of Naz. i. p. 186 ff.; Holtzmann, Einl. p. 479). The only ground for supposing this is that he makes more sparing use of it. But there was good reason for this difference. In view of the persons addressed both in the Apology and in the Dialogue, and also the tenor of the arguments in these works, it was natural that he should have fewer quotations from and parallels with it than the others.

Before leaving this quarter of the century we must touch upon the question of the use of the Gospels by Gnostic heretics. In discussing it we shall be taken back even to the earlier part of the time. It has, however, been reserved till this point, both on account of the different relation to the Christian faith of the persons to be considered, and because the evidence is of a more indirect

Basileides had begun to teach at Alexandria in the reign of Hadrian. He was the author of a work in 24 books entitled Expositions of the Gospel, from which we have a few extracts in extant works of Clem. Alex. One of these seems like a portion of a comment on a passage of Mt. There are two others, which may be comments on sayings of our Lord taken from Lk and Jn respectively (Zahn, Kanon, i. pp. 766, 767). The possibility of coming to any fuller conclusion as to the use of the Gospels by Basileides must depend on the estimate formed of the account of Basileides and his school given by Hippolytus, and of the citations which it includes. Some have supposed Hippolytus to have been misled when he took the work from which he quotes as a product even of the school of Basileides (e.g. Zahn, ib. 765). But the result of a comparison with the extracts in Clem. Alex. is strongly in favour of the view that the treatise used by Hippolytus gave a genuine exposition of Basileidean doctrine (see Hort's art. 'Basileides' in Dict. of Christian Biog.). Whether it was the Exceptica or some other work is more questionable. That the quotations are from Basileides himself, at least in some cases, and those the most important for our present purpose, is the most natural view of Hippolytus' language (cf. Westcott, Canon, p. 297 n., and Hort, l.c.). The theories expounded bear the marks of great metaphysical power; and if the writer from whom they are taken, partly in his own words, was not Basileides himself, he may probably have been Isidore. Basileides' eminent son and disciple, whom Hip-polytus names along with his father. Even in this case we should have to do here with a writing composed not much later than, if so late as, the middle of the 2nd cent. It undoubtedly appeals to the Fourth Gospel as to an authority (Hippol. Hær.

Valentinus, who was a younger contemporary of parileides, need not now detain us. We know Basileides, need not now detain us. We know nothing of the employment he made of books of the NT, except as it may be inferred from the practice of his school in the next generation.

On the other hand, of the treatment of the NT Scriptures by Marcion, who flourished c. A.D. 140, we know much from Tertullian's Contra Marcionem. Beyond all reasonable doubt, the Gospel which he made for himself and his sect was a mutilated form of Lk. And it may be observed that in selecting it, even though he found it necessary thus to adapt it to his own purpose, he did homage to the authority which it had acquired. An examina-tion of the peculiarities of the text used by Marcion seems also to show that the text of the Gospel had already in his generation a history (see Sanday, Gospels in Second Cent. p. 231 ff.).

From a man and his writings we turn to a movement. Montanism arose in Phrygia not long after the middle, and it spread remarkably during the remainder, of the 2nd cent.; it found tendencies and needs favourable to it in various parts of the Church. In the present connexion it is important only from the fact that its insistence on the promise of the coming of the Spirit, designated as the Paraclete, is a sign of the influence of the Gospel according to John.

(2) Other veritings of NT.—A few points only need be noticed. We learn from Tertullian's treatise against Marcion that this heretic acknowledged 10 Epp. of St. Paul. It was natural, and yet important as a step in the formation of the Canon, that the Epp. of this great apostle should be regarded collectively, and we have in Marcion's case the first clear sign of such a view of them. There is, it may be added, no reason to think that Marcion in rejecting, as he did, the 3 Pastoral Epp. was actuated by any other motive than a dogmatic one.

In a passage of Justin we have a noteworthy instance of another kind—the earliest reference by name to a NT writing. The work so cited is the Apocalypse, its authorship by John the Apostle being mentioned (Dial. lxxxi.).

For the rest, it will suffice under this head to notice parallelisms which are striking, and which prove the use of writings not otherwise abundantly attested. Those in Hermas with Ep. of James are specially remarkable (Hermas, Vis. II. ii. 7, IV. ii. 6; M. II. 3. 4, VI. 7, VIII. 10, IX. 4. 11, XII. 5. 2 vi. 3; Sim. VI. i. 1, VIII. vi. 4). Again, those with Acts in Justin seem clear (Apol. i. 40; Dial. xvi. and lii.). The statement, which we have already had occasion to refer to, may also here be recalled, that Papias 'made use of testimonies from the former Ep. of Jn, and likewise from that of Peter' (Eus. HE iii. 39).

iii. THIRD QUARTER OF SECOND CENTURY.—
(1) Gospels.— Tatian.—Through a succession of remarkable literary discoveries in recent years controversy has practically been closed in respect to the general character of Tatian's Diatessaron. We may not fully have recovered its original form, but it can no longer be seriously doubted that substantially it was a harmony of our Four Gospels (see Zahn, Forsch. Pt. 1, Kan. i. pp. 387-422, ii. 530-556; Lightft., Essays on Sup. Rel., 1889, pp. 272-288; S. Hemphill, The Diatessaron of Tatian; and Hill,

The Earliest Gospel Harmony).
In more than one respect Tatian is a valuable link between the middle and the last quarter of the century, supplying evidence in regard to the history of the Cauon for a period, the remains of which are specially scanty. His Diatessaron, while it is an example of the working of that tendency to dwell on the common result of the testimony of different witnesses, which we have seen to be characteristic of the first two or three generations, is also the first distinct indication of the fact, which is so emphatically asserted a little later, that there were four records whose authority was unique.

(2) His Apology shows traces of acquaintance with various writings of the NT, but for the most part there is in it the absence of express citation which is commonly to be observed in works of the same class. In one place, however, some words from the prologue to Jn are introduced as 'that which has been said' (xiii.).

iv. THE LAST QUARTER OF THE SECOND CENTURY AND BEGINNING OF THE THIRD.— The point of transition to the last quarter of the 2nd cent. will be the most convenient opportunity for considering the impuguers of St. John's writ-ings commonly called the Alogi. The evidence ings, commonly called the Alogi. which has so far come before us, if it is in any respects unfavourable to the authenticity of any NT writings, is so by way of defect. Even such a writer as Marcion appears mainly as a witness for the Canon. We have now, however, to notice a body of persons who are specially characterized by their refusal to acknowledge one group of writings those attributed to St. John.

Much attention has of late been directed to this phenomenon. It has been discussed in particular from opposite points of view by Zahn (Kan. i. pp. 220–262) and Harnack (NT um d. J. 200, pp. 58–70, and Chronol. i. pp. 670, 671); see also Lightfoot (Clem. Rom. ii. p. 394) and Sanday (Inspiration, p. 14 f.). The chief documents are Iren. III. xi. 12 (which refers only to the rejection of the Gospel); Epiph. Hær. li.; and Philaster, lx. The value of the last two is that in all probability they derive their information from a lost work of Hippolytus. It is not, however, altogether easy to distinguish the conjectures of Epiphanius, and his disquisitions on points that interested him, from the matter which he took from his authority, while Philaster's

The motive for these opinions was primarily dogmatic, not critical, though those who held them sought to strengthen their case by pointing out differences between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics, and by strictures upon the imagery of the Apocalypse (see Epiph. l.c.). It was 'in order to frustrate the gifts of the Spirit,' Irenæus tells us, that some do not admit that form of the Gospel which is according to John, in which the Lord promised that He would send the Paraclete.' One kind of extravagance begets another. Begause the Montanists appealed to Jn 14-16 in urging their wild views and preposterous claims, these others were for denying the authority of that Gospel itself. Again, the Montanists and many other Christians in the 2nd cent. were millenarians, and supported their materialistic notions by a literal interpretation of the Apocalypse. Consequently, those who were repelled by millenarianism were tempted to call the authenticity of that work in question.
The theory of the Alogi, that Cerinthus was the author of the Johannine writings, must have been suggested first in the case of the Apocalypse, and extended to the Gospel; for while, according to the best information which we possess, Cerinthus was a millenarian, his Christology had nothing in common with that of the Fourth Gospel. Thus Thus the rejection of the one work was, in part at least, associated with that of the other; in part, however, the attack on the Apocalypse was more widely spread, and had more lasting effects (cf. Eus. HE iii. 28 and vii. 25).

The name Alogi seems to have been Epiphanius' invention. He gave it both as a jest and to betoken their refusal to accept the Gospel which contained the doctrine of the Logos. Whether they in reality objected to this doctrine, or this was simply Epiphanius' inference, is not clear. But if they did, they might here again find a common ground of opposition both to the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse.

It should be observed that the Alogi, by their association of the Gospel according to John and the Apocalypse in a common condemnation, and the attribution of them both to Cerinthus, are witnesses to the tradition, that both were by the same author, and that, in assigning them to a heretic who was contemporary with St. John, they are

Harnack lays special stress on the fact that the Alogi were not visibly separated from the Church, and apparently did not intend to depart from the Christian faith. Δοκοῦσι και αυτοί, says Epiphanius, τὰ ίσα ἡμῦν πιστεύειν (l.c. § 4). Yet the agreement of which he speaks seems to be only relative. He is comparing their position with that of more pronounced heretics, such as the Gnostics. Further, it is to be remembered that the machinery did not exist in the 2nd cent., which there came to be in the Church of after-times, for passing judgment on erroneous opinions. And, moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the number of those who rejected the most important work at least, the Gospel, was considerable, and it is certain that they produced no lasting impression.

At the same time, the instance of the Alogi illustrates a stage in the reception of the NT Scriptures. It shows that beliefs which this party opposed had not yet obtained that firm hold upon the minds of all which only clear definition and a prescription of many generations can give. But that these beliefs were neither of recent growth nor limited to a narrow area, we plainly see from the works of the age we have now reached which

Among the earliest is the treatise of Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, which is in the form of a vindication of the Christian faith, addressed to a philosophic heathen friend. He dwells upon the inspiration of the apostles. With the Holy Scriptures, i.e. the OT, still best known by this title, he couples 'all the inspired men' (πνυματοφόροι), expressly mentioning John. He quotes Jn 1^{1.3} as from 'the apostle' (ud Autol. ii. 22, and cf. ib. ix. 10). In iii. 12 he speaks of 'the Gospels' in the plural, and asserts that the contents of the Prophets and the Gospels are in harmony with the law, 'because all the inspired men spoke by one Spirit of God.' Again (ib. 13), men spoke by one Spirit of God.' Again (10. 13), after citing a passage of OT he refers to 'the still more urgent injunction of the Evangelic Voice,' and quotes Mt 5^{23.32}; and he compares the Gospel with Isaiah, quoting Mt 5¹⁴ (10. 14).

We may here suitably refer to the Ep. ad Diognetum, a work of similar aim, the birthplace and date of which compares he fixed with correlate and date of which cannot be fixed with certainty, but which may with most probability be assigned to about the same time. In c. xi. the writer enumerates 'the fear of the law,' 'the grace of the prophets,' 'the faith of the Gospels,' 'the tradition of the Apostles.'

It is, however, when we pass to writings of a different class, designed for the refutation of heresy or the instruction of the faithful in the Christian life and creed, to Irenseus (adv. Hær., composed before A.D. 190), and the works of Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, and Hippolytus, composed near the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd cent., that for the first time, in place of the partial gleams afforded by the remains of former generations, we have a flood of light upon the thought and practice of the Church. We must review the evidence as to the position of the writings of the NT in the generation we have now reached, and consider what inferences may be drawn therefrom as to their reception.

(1) Writings whose place in the Canon was already at and from this time fully secured.—The express statements of the eminent writers just named, and their ordinary assumptions, leave no doubt as to the inspired authority attributed to by far the larger part of our NT in the important Churches of which they were members, or with which they were well acquainted and maintained active relations. In common they recognize (a) our four Gospels, and none besides; (β) 13 Epp. of Paul, i.e. all which bear his name in our NT, except that to Heb.; (γ) the Acts, 1 P, 1 Jn. These form also the class called afterwards by

(a) Remarks as to the area from which this evidence comes.—It may have been observed that hitherto we have been almost exclusively concerned with the faith and usage of Greek-speaking Christians, and that we are so mainly still. By the mention of Tertullian the fact is for the first time brought before us of the hold that Christianity had obtained, comparatively recently, at the epoch of which we are speaking, among a Latin-speaking people. In Rome itself, alike in the 1st cent. and throughout the 2nd, the Church was mainly Greek. It may be well here to point out the special advantages belonging to the Greek-speaking Christians of the first few generations, as witnesses in regard to the NT writings. Not only are we best acquainted with the expansion of the Church to the west, north, and north-west of Jerusalem, through Greek-speaking cities, but to all appearance that was by far the greatest expansion in apostolic times. Here lay the scenes of St. Paul's labours, with which his Epistles and the Acts have rendered us familiar. More dimly we see the figures of several of the Twelve, including St. Peter and St. John, moving and working in these same regions, when they voluntarily left or were driven from their home. It was in consequence of the spread of the gospel among populations whose ordinary language was Greek, to meet the needs of converts made from them, that all the writings of the NT came into existence. This is true even of the First Gospel in the form in which we have it.

Here and there some other Christian writing may in early days have won a position similar to that of the books received as canonical. We may have an example of this in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. But special circumstances of language and locality so well account for this in an outlying district, that such an instance does not detract from the force of the testimony of

It seems strange, however, at first sight that the Christians of Palestine and of the Aramaic-speaking East should have received the NT writings from the West, with one probable exception—the Ep. of James. Yet such was the fact. The Hebrew Christian community at Jerusalem was virtually broken up by the siege and capture of the city, A.D. 69-70. After the suppression of Barcochba's revolt (A.D. 135) a Greek Church arose there. In other parts of Palestine the Hebrew Christian Church had to contend, during the latter part of the 1st and earlier part of the 2nd cent., with a strong Jewish reaction. What progress the gospel made beyond Jordan to the east and north-east, through the labours of any of the Twelve, or the preaching and example of more ordinary Christians who fied from Palestine when Jerusalem fell, and to what extent the Christians of those districts in the 2nd cent. may thus have traced their lineage to the Church of apostolic days, and have cherished its traditions, it may be said: we hear of no work written in Hebrew or Aramaic by an apostle, or immediate companion and follower of the apostles, except the one attributed to St. Matthew. The Gospel according to the Hebrews may have embodied this work, and doubtless contained traditions that had been current among Hebrew Christians; but it would seem not to have been preserved long in an uncorrupted form, and it is noteworthy that it obtained no enduring authority even in the East.

As regards the history of the Canon of the Syrian Church, it may suffice here to allude to the strange hold which Tatian's Diatessaron obtained there. It was popularly used as a substitute for the Gospels, to the neglect of the reading of them in public worship—an abuse which had to be dealt with by authority as late as the 5th cent. But such a fact is of importance as throwing light upon the history of that Church generally, not as bearing on the authenticity of the Gospels. [The subject of the history of the Canon in the Syrian Church is a very obscure one: for discussions of it see especially Zahn, Kan. i. c. 8, and Harnack's criticism thereupon in NT um 200, § 10.]
